Leeward Islands, THE, a colony formed by federation in 1871 of the five presidencies of Antigua (Barbuda and Redonda), St. Kitts-Nevis (Anguilla), Dominica, Montserrat, and the Virgin Islands with Sombrero, has a federal executive council of twenty, of which ten are elected by the local legislative councils of Antigua (4), Dominica (2), and St. Kitts-Nevis (4) and a federal legislative council of ten official and ten elected members who are chosen by the unofficial members of the local legislative councils of Antigua (3), Dominica (2), St. Kitts (3), Montserrat (1), and one by the governor of the Virgin Islands, which has no legislative council. Part of the Caribbees until 1671, they were then separated from Barbados and placed under a separate governor-in-chief. In 1689 Codrington was appointed with power to call legislatures of a nominated council and an elected assembly in each of the islands and one for the federal group. The general legislature met five times until 1705, when it defined the constitution by which each island was to elect five members to the general assembly, which, however, only occasionally met until it lapsed in 1798. Divided into two divisions in 1816 (Antigua and Montserrat one; St. Kitts-Nevis and Virgin Islands the other), they were reunited in 1833 and Dominica added. Attempts to revive the legislature failed until 1871.

Legates, PAPAL, were the messengers or ambassadors of the pope, the recipients of the formal delegation of the papal authority within a given country. Before the Norman Conquest the presence of a papal legate in England was rare and exceptional. The earliest founders of Christianity in England were indeed in such close relation to the popes that there was very little need for other than direct intercourse with them. Accordingly there is no trace of papal legation between the mission of John the Precentor to Theodore's council at Hatfield (q.v.) in 680 and the mission of George and Theophylact, "to renew the faith which St. Gregory had sent us" ("Anglo-Saxon Chronicle," s.a. 785) at the famous council of 787. During the next three centuries papal legations are equally rare. The subordinate position of Nothhelm "præco a domino Eugenio Papa," at the Clovesho Synod of 824, shows the legation invested with few of the dignities of later times. Under Edward the Confessor the mission of an envoy of Alexander II to counteract the adhesion of Stigand to the anti-pope marks the beginning of a new period which the Conquest further developed. But while admitting the papal delegates, and using them in 1070 to reform the Church on Norman lines, William I established the rule that no legate should be admitted into England unless sent at the instance of the king and Church. Anselm claimed for the see of Canterbury a prescriptive right to represent the pope in England. Archbishop William of Corbeuil obtained from Honorius II (1126) a formal legatine commission over the whole island of Britain. From this precedent grew the ordinary legation of the archbishops, which, acceptable by Church and nation as involving less practical interference with the ordinary rule of the Church, was agreeable to the pope as implying that the independent metropolitical jurisdiction of Canterbury was the result of papal delegation. The steps in the process are as follows: on William of Corbeuil's death, Henry of Winchester was preferred to Theobald, the new archbishop, who obtained the legation, however, after the death of Henry's patron, Pope Innocent II. Henry II for a time got Roger of York appointed legate instead of Becket; but during the quarrel Becket received the delegation. The next two archbishops were appointed legates, though Longchamp of Ely succeeded Baldwin, when the latter went on crusade, and Hubert Walter had to give up the title on the death of Celestine III. The surrender of John gave opportunities for extraordinary foreign legates, such as Gualo (q.v.) and Pandulf (q.v.), who almost ruled England in the minority of Henry III; but Langton obtained their recall, and the appointment of himself as legatus natus, and a promise that in his lifetime no other legate should be sent. Henceforth the archbishops of Canterbury were regularly recognized as ordinary legates. In 1352 Thoresby of York acquired the same privilege for the northern province. The suspension of Chichele by Martin V because he could not get the Statute of Provisors repealed seems not to have been recognized; and Beaufort of Winchester's special delegation did not supersede the ordinary jurisdiction of Canterbury. But legati missi, legati a latere were still sent upon occasion. The missions of Otho and Othobon, and of Guy, Cardinal Bishop of Sabina, are good instances during Henry III's time. Wolsey combined with his small ordinary jurisdiction as Archbishop of York an extraordinary commission as legate, which became the excuse for his overthrow, and for the abolition of a power which, from the days of the Statute of Præmunire, can hardly be said to have had any legal basis in England, however conformable to the general ecclesiastical law. Nothing but the compromise of the legatus natus made the position of the legate tolerable to the national feelings of England. It involved a subordination to an alien jurisdiction antagonistic to the imperial claims of the English Crown. One of the earliest steps of the Reformation was to ignore the claims of the papal legates. The mission of Campeggio in 1529 was, but for the revival of the ordinary legation of Cardinal Pole, and his supersession by Peto, the last instance of papal legation in England.

Legge, HENRY BILSON (1708-64), was the son of William, 1st Earl of Dartmouth. He became lord of the admiralty in 1745 and lord of the treasury in 1747. In the following year he was appointed envoy extraordinary to the court of Berlin, and in 1749 became treasurer of the navy. In 1754 he became chancellor of the exchequer, but in 1755 he rebelled against Newcastle, refusing to sign the treasury warrants necessary for carrying the treaty for the Hessian subsidy to a conclusion. He was accordingly dismissed. He again assumed office as secretary of state in 1756, but was dismissed in the following year, to be shortly afterwards reinstated as chancellor of the exchequer; he was, however, again dismissed in 1761, owing to a quarrel with Bute. He continued, until his death, to adhere to Pitt in politics, although bound by no ties of friendship.

Legge, WILLIAM, 1ST EARL OF DARTMOUTH (1672-1750), was a prominent statesman in the reign of Queen Anne. His principles were those of a strong Tory and High Churchman. He married a daughter of the Earl of Aylesford. On the accession of the queen he became a member of the privy council; and on the downfall of Godolphin's ministry he was made secretary of state and keeper of the privy seal of Scotland (1710). It was by making use of him that Marlborough tried to avoid dismissal from his appointments by a close union with the Tory ministry. Dartmouth was one of the persons appointed by Anne to confer with the French envoy Ménéger on the preliminaries for the Treaty of Utrecht. The wholesale creation of twelve peers did not meet with his approval, but he continued in the ministry, and was created lord privy seal (1714). On the accession of George he ceased to take any share in politics.

"Legion Memorial," THE (1701), was a Whig pamphlet written to express the public disgust at the treatment by the Commons of the Kentish petitioners (q.v.). It is supposed that its author was Daniel Defoe. The pamphlet takes its name from its concluding words, "our name is Legion, and we are many." Its language is extremely violent, and it contains not only questions of national politics, but also a bitter attack on the Unitarians, and on John Howe, a speaker against the Kentish petition. It accurately represented the temper of a large section of the population. The Whigs were delighted, and the Tories infuriated with it.

Legislation. There was little legislation, or formal enacting of new laws, before the Norman Conquest. The unwritten customs and rules of law that the Angles and Saxons had brought to Britain were, from time to time, authoritatively declared, revised, amended, added to, adapted to the advancing experience of the race, or even reduced to crudely constructed codes; and the result was called after the king by whom or at whose instance the task had been undertaken. This moderate measure of legislation would seem regularly to have been the joint work of the king and witan; the successive issues of laws profess to have been made either by the king and his witan, or by the king "with his witan," or "with the counsel of his witan." Indeed Alfred tells us that to his laws the consent of his witan was given; and the language of more than one ordinance of Ethelred II's reign states the authority of the witan alone. Kemble would rather "assert that they possessed the legislative power without the king, than that he possessed it without them." We may perhaps assume that their practical importance to this function varied with the character of the king. Very few laws were made in the reigns of the Norman kings. But in the making of these few the sovereign's will is believed to have been the sole effective force; the voice of the great and wise of the kingdom declined into an influence merely—perhaps into less. Yet it was seldom ignored; the charters and ordinances of William I and Henry I generally express the counsel or concurrence in some form of the higher clergy and barons, though it is likely that their approval was often taken for granted. The tendency, however, of the succeeding reigns was to make the share of the Great Council in the work more and more of a reality. Even the strong-willed Henry II was careful to gain its assent to the assizes or constitutions he drew up. And this tendency grew until this body was recognized as a co-ordinate power with the king in this province. In one or two instances, indeed, notably in that of Magna Carta, what now pass for laws were really treaties concluded between conflicting parties in the state. As yet the only part the people had in legislation was to hear and obey the laws that were declared to them by sheriffs or itinerant justices. "Legislative action," says Stubbs, "belonged only to the wise, that is, to the royal or national council." The incorporation of the commons with this council was gradually followed by the concession to the representatives of the people of a share in this action. But not at once an important share. First their participation was either deemed unnecessary or assumed; then it was admitted to be essential to the repeal of a law; next, laws were enacted on their petition; and for some time this last remained the usual practice. During the fourteenth century the right of the Commons to present petitions and receive answers to them tended steadily to become the exclusive basis of legislation. There were exceptions, certainly—more than once a petition of the clergy led to the framing of a statute; but the regular course was for the king to ordain the law at the request of the Commons, and with the assent of the Lords. And to several laws even the assent of the Commons is stated. But the king was still largely in fact, as in form he has always been, the author of all legislation; and the statutes that he caused to be framed on the petitions of parliament were often inadequate, evasive, or useless. To make sure of the fulfilment of their desires, therefore, parliament, towards the end of Henry VI's reign, adopted the practice of proceeding by bills which could not be altered without their sanction, but might originate in either House, or even with the king. The method of petition was not altogether abandoned; but its use became rare, except in private legislation. And already in the fifteenth century the course of procedure seems to have been substantially what it is now. The three readings, the going into committee, the proposal of amendments, were established forms by the Tudor period. Then, too, the enacting clause of statutes had taken its final form—"be it enacted by the king, our sovereign lord, by and with the advice of the Lords spiritual and temporal and Commons in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same." The language of our legislation has varied. It was generally English, but sometimes Latin, before the Conquest; was almost exclusively Latin from the Conquest till the Mad Parliament, when French made its appearance. French did not at once drive out Latin; but became the fashion of Edward I's reign, and almost universal after it. But ever since 1489 our laws have been written exclusively in English. French, however, still lingers in a few phrases: le roy le veult is the expression of the royal assent, and le roy s'aviserà would be the form of royal refusal if such could now constitutionally be given.

Leicester, THE EARLDOM OF, which had been held from early in the twelfth century by the Norman family of Beaumont, passed in 1204 or 5 to Simon de Montfort, the crusader, who was the son of Amicia, sister to the last Beaumont earl. Simon, however, seems never to have enjoyed more than the title, and when he died (1218) his eldest son, Amalric, was well content to surrender his rights to his next brother, Simon, the famous national leader, who secured seisin of the lands in 1231. On his death at Evesham in 1265, however, all his honours became forfeit. The earldom of Leicester was granted to Edmund, Earl of Lancaster, youngest son of Henry III, and followed the fortunes of that title until the death of Henry, Duke of Lancaster, in 1361, when the honour of Leicester descended to William, Count of Holland, husband to this prince's elder daughter and co-heiress, and on her death (1362) to John of Gaunt, who married the second daughter. In the person of John of Gaunt's son, Henry of Bolingbroke, the honour was merged in the Crown. In 1564 the earldom was granted to Lord Robert Dudley, younger son of John, Duke of Northumberland; he died without legitimate issue in 1588, and the title became extinct. In 1618 it was granted to Sir Robert Sydney, Viscount Lisle, in whose family it continued until its extinction in 1743. In the following year Thomas Coke, Baron Lovel of Minster Lovel, was created Earl of Leicester, but died in 1759 without surviving issue. In 1784 George Townshend, son of George, Viscount Townshend, was created "earl" of the county of Leicester, but on the death of his son in 1855 this title also became extinct. Meanwhile, in 1837, Thomas William Coke, a great-nephew of the Thomas Coke above named, was ennobled by the singular style of Earl of Leicester of Holkham, co. Norfolk. This title still exists.

Leicester, ROBERT DUDLEY, EARL OF (1532 ?-88). [DUDLEY.]

Leicester, SIMON DE MONTFORT, EARL OF (1203 ?-65). [MONTFORT.]

Leigh, THOMAS, a supporter of Robert, Earl of Essex, was executed for alleged complicity in a plot to procure the earl's release (1601). It is said that the revelation of his project determined Elizabeth to sign Essex's death-warrant.

Leighton, ALEXANDER (1568-1649), a Scottish divine, filled the chair of Moral Philosophy at Edinburgh from 1603 to 1615. He published two works, "Zion's Plea" (1628) and "The Looking-glass of the Holy War" (1624), in which he violently attacked the bishops, counselling the parliament "to smite them under the fifth rib," and spoke of the queen as a Canaanite and an idolatress. For this he was sentenced by the Star Chamber to have his nose slit, one ear cut off, be publicly whipped, and imprisoned for life. In 1640 he was released by the Long Parliament, and made keeper of the state prison at Lambeth Palace in 1642.

Leinster, THE KINGDOM AND PROVINCE OF, according to the Irish legends, was first colonized by the Firbolgs, one of the pre-Gaelic peoples of Ireland, and after they had been defeated by the Tuatha Dé Danann it was the starting-point from which the Milesians, the last invaders of ancient Ireland, overran the country. When their leader Erimon divided the land he is said to have given Leinster to Crimthann, a descendant of the Firbolgs, which race formed the bulk of the population. About the time of the Christian era Leinster was occupied by a number of kinglets, but Tuathal Techmar, who was a member of the dominant tribe, the Scoti, broke their power, imposed upon them a fine known as the "boro-mean," or cow-tribute, and took a portion of their territory, including the sacred hill of Tara, to form, with additions from the other kingdoms, the over-king's kingdom of Meath. His grandson, Conn "of the hundred battles," however, had little hold on the country, and the King of Leinster joined Mogh of Munster in a victorious struggle against the over-king. At the time of the mission of St. Patrick (A.D. 433) Leinster, which comprised the present counties of Wexford, Wicklow, Carlow, Queen's County, parts of Kilkenny, King's County, and Kildare, together with the part of County Dublin south of the Liffey, had apparently been consolidated into one kingdom under the Maelmoras, or Mac-Murroughs. It had already been partially converted to Christianity by Palladius and others. The Leinster kings seem to have been practically independent of the over-kings of the Hui-Neill dynasty (438 and onwards), and in 681 they obtained an abolition of the "boro-mean" tribute, at the instance of St. Moling. From time to time, however, their country was invaded from Meath, and terrific defeats inflicted upon them. The country suffered also from the ravages of the Northmen and Danes, the latter of whom established a permanent dominion round about Dublin, Waterford, and Limerick. At the end of the tenth century Leinster had to submit to Brian Boru (q.v.), King of Munster, who thus became king of the southern half of Ireland. With the aid of the Danes of Dublin, Leinster attempted in 1000 to cast off his yoke, but the allies were completely defeated at Glen Mama. Maelmora was placed on the throne by Brian as sole king, but promptly began to intrigue afresh with the Danes against him, and was in consequence met by the combined forces of Brian Boru and Malaughlan, King of Meath. The battle of Clontarf (1014) (q.v.) resulted in the utter overthrow of the kings of Leinster and Dublin. It was not long, however, before the kingdom recovered and by the middle of the century we find Diarmait (Dermot), King of Leinster, driving out the Danish king of Dublin, and his son Murchad (Murtough), making the Isle of Man tributary; but these acquisitions were not long retained. Dermot's great-grandson, Dermot Mac-Murrough, having been expelled because of his treacheries and cruelties, repaired to Henry II in Aquitaine, and obtained permission to raise forces in England against the high-king, Roderick

O'Connor. Hence began the Anglo-Norman invasion, which speedily resulted in the conquest of the coast towns, and victories over the tribes, into which it is unnecessary to enter here. On the death of Dermot in 1171, Strongbow, who had married his only child Eva, claimed the kingdom of Leinster, and his heiress transferred the claim to her husband, the great William Marshal, Earl of Pembroke. From him it eventually descended to his five daughters as co-heiresses. These ladies all married English nobles, whose descendants drew their rents, and lived away in England, the estates eventually becoming forfeited to the Crown under the statute against absentees. Large tracts of land were also given by Dermot to others of the invaders, and these grants were confirmed by Henry on his visit to Ireland in 1172. Thus the Leinster Fitzgeralds held by subfeudation under the de Vescis, lords of Kildare, the descendants of one of Strongbow's daughters, until in the reign of Edward I the de Vesci estates were forfeited, and bestowed on the Fitzgeralds, who soon became of great importance as earls of Kildare (1316) and dukes of Leinster. They maintained a long and arduous struggle with the Irish tribes, the O'Tooles, who often confined them to their walled towns. In 1399 Richard II came to the assistance of the English Pale, but the Mac-Murroughs evaded battle, and he had to retire; Kildare, and the country round Dublin, was now all that was left in Leinster to the English. This state of affairs did not mend until the reign of Henry VIII, when a double policy of coercion and conciliation was pursued with some success; the Geraldines were crushed; the estates of absentee landlords were confiscated; MacMurrough, who now took the name of Kavanagh, the representative of King Dermot, was pensioned, and the other chieftains won over, their loyalty being secured by gifts of confiscated Church lands. Under Mary, Gerald of Kildare was restored to his earldom, and the districts of Leix and Offaly were planted with English colonists, becoming Queen's County and King's County respectively. During the reign of Elizabeth Leinster suffered comparatively little in comparison with Ulster and Munster, the scenes of the O'Neill and Desmond rebellions, though there was continual war then between the Geraldines and Butlers. In this reign the old kingdom of Meath was added to Leinster, together with Louth, formerly a part of Ulster. James I, true to his policy of governing Ireland by English ideas, determined to effect the Plantation of Leinster. By means of a commission to inquire into defective titles, he despoiled the natives, and even the Anglo-Irish, of large portions of their lands, which were transferred to "Undertakers" (q.v.), who speedily formed a new Irish nobility. Charles I declared large districts of land in Wicklow and Wexford to be forfeited to the Crown, but such was the outcry against the proceedings that it had to be abandoned. When Cromwell repaired to Ireland, in order to subdue the rebellion which had broken out in 1641, his stern displeasure fell heavily upon Leinster, and the massacres of Drogheda and Wexford went far to break all further opposition. In the settlement that followed, the Irish Catholic gentry were transported across the Shannon, and their lands given to Cromwellian soldiers, and adventurers who had advanced money, but after the Restoration about one-third of their estates were restored to the dispossessed Catholics. The last great Irish land settlement—that which followed the Treaty of Limerick (1691) (q.v.)—resulted in a further forfeiture of Catholic property, but it did not affect Leinster so much as the other provinces of Ireland, and its history as a separate province may be said to have ended with the Revolution.

Leinster, MEINHARD SCHOMBERG, DUKE OF (1641-1719). [SCHOMBERG.]

Leith, the port of Edinburgh, was burnt by the English in 1313 and 1410, and again (by Hertford) May 1544 and 1547. It was afterwards held by the queen regent, Mary of Guise, and a French garrison against the Lords of Congregation, and in 1560 was besieged by a combined force of Scots and English. In 1571 it was held by the party of James VI, who nearly fell into the hands of Lord Bothwell here in 1594. During the ascendancy of Cromwell it was occupied by Lambert and Monk. In 1715 it was for a time in the hands of the Jacobite insurgents.

Lennox, ESMÉ STUART, 1ST DUKE OF (1542 ?-83). [STUART.]

Lennox, MATTHEW STUART, 4TH (or 12TH) EARL OF (1516-71). [STUART.]

Lenthall, WILLIAM (1591-1662), was called to the bar in 1616, and, having a considerable practice, and being a member of an ancient county family, was chosen Speaker of the Long Parliament in 1640. He does not appear to have been equal to this important position, though on the attempted arrest of the Five Members (q.v.) by the king (January 4, 1642), he showed considerable spirit. In 1643 parliament made him master of the rolls, and in 1646 one of the commissioners of the great seal. In 1647, fearing the mob which attempted to overawe parliament, he withdrew to the army, but soon after returned and resumed his office of Speaker, which he continued to hold down to the expulsion of the Long Parliament in 1653. In the parliament of 1654 he was again chosen Speaker, and in 1656 was made one of Cromwell's House of Lords, having taken a prominent part in favour of the protector's assuming the title of king. On the Restoration he was deprived of his judicial office, but was one of those who received the king's pardon. He thereupon retired into private life, and to the end remained unmolested by the new government.

Leofric (d. 1057) was the son of Leofwine, Earl of Mercia. He received from Canute large grants from the lands formerly held by Northmen, and between 1024 and 1032 succeeded his father in the earldom of Mercia. On the death of Canute Leofric supported the claims of Harold. During the reign of Edward the Confessor he occupied a middle position between the foreign or court party and the party of Godwin, and in 1051, when matters had come to a crisis, he prevented the outbreak of civil war by mediation. He died in 1057, and was succeeded by his son Elfgar. Leofric and his wife Godgifu (the "Lady Godiva" of legend) were justly celebrated as builders of churches and monasteries, chief among them being the great minster of Coventry. [COVENTRY.]

E. A. Freeman, "Norman Conquest," vol. ii, 1867-71.

Leofwine (d. 1066) was the fifth (?) son of Earl Godwin. Probably in 1057 he was appointed to an earldom, which included the shires of Kent, Surrey, Middlesex, Essex, Hertford, and Buckingham. He was slain in the battle of Hastings.

Leslie, ALEXANDER, 1ST EARL OF LEVEN (d. 1661), having gained considerable military experience in the Low Countries and Sweden, returned to Scotland in 1638, and after serving as lieutenant to Montrose, was appointed commander-in-chief of the Covenanting army, February 1639, in the May of which year he led the Scottish army to the Borders, encamping on Duns Law just opposite the royal forces. A collision was for the time averted, but in 1640 Leslie entered England, winning the battle of Newburn and taking Newcastle. On a treaty being concluded at Ripon, Leslie was created Earl of Leven by Charles I, who hoped to win him over to his side. In 1644 he again led an expedition into England, and was present at the battle of Marston Moor. After the execution of Charles I Leven supported Charles II against Cromwell, but being captured in 1651 at Angus was sent to the Tower. He was kept in honourable confinement, and released in 1654, when he retired into private life.

Biography by C. S. Terry, 1899.

Leslie, DAVID, 1ST BARON NEWARK, (d. 1682), nephew of Alexander Leslie, Earl of Leven (q.v.), and an even more able commander, accompanied his uncle to England (1644) in the capacity of major-general. He was present at the battles of Marston Moor and Naseby, and in 1645 defeated Montrose at Philiphaugh. In 1650 he was opposed to Cromwell, who defeated him at Dunbar, and was taken prisoner at Chester, and sent to the Tower, where he remained until the Restoration. He was created Lord Newark by Charles II in recognition of his services at Worcester.

Leslie, JOHN, 7TH EARL OF ROTHES (1630-81), was taken prisoner at the battle of Worcester. After the Restoration he became Lord treasurer and chancellor of Scotland, and in 1680 was created a duke. On his death in 1681, without male heirs, the title became extinct.

Leslie, NORMAN, Master of Rothes, was one of the Scottish commanders at the battle of Auncrum Moor (1545). In 1546 he headed the conspirators against Cardinal Beaton, although he took no personal part in the assassination. He was captured by a French force at St. Andrews (1547) and sent to France, but subsequently escaped.

Lethington, WILLIAM MAITLAND OF (1528?-1573). [MAITLAND.]

Levellers was the name given to an important party during the period of the Commonwealth. Early in 1647 a considerable ultra-Republican sect appeared in the New Model Army, especially among the Adjutors. The rejection of the army proposals by Charles I, and the increasing hostility displayed by the Commons towards the army, furthered the spread of such opinions, and many of the soldiers distrusted Cromwell himself on account of his too lenient treatment of the king, and their distrust produced the mutiny of November 15. [ADJUTATORS.]

A more formidable outbreak took place early in 1649. Lilburne (q.v.), and those who thought with him, considered the existing republic too aristocratic, and little better than the monarchy to which it had succeeded. In two pamphlets, "England's New Chains Discovered" and "The Hunting of the Foxes [i.e., the army magnates] from Newmarket and Triploe Heath to Whitehall by Five Small Beagles," Lilburne demanded that the council of state should be dissolved and the management of public affairs should be given to parliamentary committees of short duration; that greater liberty of conscience and of the press should be permitted; that a new and reformed parliament should speedily come together, and the Self-denying Ordinance be revived. Lilburne and three other of the next conspicuous Levellers—Overton, Walwyn, and Prince—were arrested and brought before the council; they were committed to the Tower. On April 25 a mutiny broke out among a troop quartered in Bishopsgate, who refused to obey an order to leave London. But Fairfax and Cromwell came up quickly and crushed the rising; fifteen mutineers were tried by court-martial, and one, Lockyer, was shot in St. Paul's Churchyard. More formidable risings took place in various parts of the country. A Captain Thompson with two hundred troopers rose in revolt at Banbury, issuing a manifesto; but he was overpowered by his colonel. From Salisbury a thousand insurgents marched towards London; they were surrounded by Cromwell at Burford, and surrendered, and the very dangerous military Levelling movement was over.

Before this, another and more harmless Levelling movement had been defeated. Some thirty men met on St. Margaret's Hill and St. George's Hill, near Cobham in Surrey, where they "dugged the ground and sowed it with roots and beans." They were dispersed, and their leaders brought before the council. There, one of them, Everard, declared that "what they did was to renew the ancient community of enjoying the fruits of the earth, and to distribute the benefit thereof to the poor and needy. But they intend not to meddle with any man's property nor to break down any pales or enclosures; but only to meddle with what was common and untilled, and to make it fruitful for the use of man; that the time will suddenly be, that all men should willingly come in and submit to this community."

Cromwell's attitude towards the Levellers appears in a speech of 1654, where he declared his approval of "the ranks and orders of man whereby England hath been known for hundreds of years. A nobleman, a gentleman, and a yeoman; that is a good interest of the nation. Did not that Levelling principle tend to the reducing of all to an equality? What was the purport of it but to make the tenant as liberal a fortune as the landlord?"

Leven, ALEXANDER LESLIE, 1ST EARL OF (d. 1661). [LESLIE.]

Leveson-Gower, GRANVILLE GEORGE, 2ND EARL GRANVILLE (1815-91), was first elected M.P. in 1836. In 1840 he became under-secretary for foreign affairs. He acted on Liberal principles, and was a consistent supporter of free trade. In 1846 he succeeded to the peerage. In 1848 he was appointed vice-president of the board of trade; in 1851 obtained a seat in the cabinet; and in December of that year succeeded Palmerston as foreign secretary, retiring with the Russell ministry in 1852. He was appointed president of the council in 1853, and in 1855 undertook the leadership of the House of Lords. He was reappointed president of the council in 1859 in Palmerston's second ministry. In December 1868 he accepted office under Gladstone as colonial secretary, and retained that position till July 1870, when he succeeded the Earl of Clarendon as secretary for foreign affairs, which position he occupied till 1874. He became foreign secretary again on the accession of the Liberal party to power in 1880, and colonial secretary in 1886.

Biography by Lord Fitzmaurice, 1905.

Lewes, THE BATTLE OF (May 14, 1264), was fought between Henry III and the barons under Simon de Montfort (q.v.). After the failure of the Mise of Amiens (q.v.) war became certain, though negotiations still went on for a while. At first the war was confined to the capture of a few castles on either side, but in May both armies found themselves in Sussex, de Montfort marching to the relief of the Cinque Ports, which were threatened by the king. The royal army was encamped at Lewes, and on May 13 de Montfort arrived at Fletching, a village some nine miles distant. A final offer of peace was rejected by the king, and the baronial forces prepared to fight. At the break of day de Montfort suddenly advanced, and seized the heights above the town. Thus firmly established, he induced the royal army, by skilful strategy, to take the offensive. Prince Edward opened the battle, and by a furious charge broke through the Londoners stationed on the right of the baronial army, and pursued them for some miles from the scene of action. Meanwhile, however, the royalist centre and left, crowded between the heights and the river, were completely defeated by de Montfort. The king himself, with his brother, the King of the Romans, was taken prisoner. Edward cut his way into the midst of the baronial troops, and, unable to retrieve the fortune of the day, was eventually obliged to surrender also.

W. H. Blaauw, "Barons' War," 1844.

Lewes, MISE OF (1264), was the name given to the treaty made between Henry III and the barons after the victory of the latter at Lewes. By this treaty the Provisions of Oxford (q.v.) were confirmed, a new body of arbitrators (of whom all save one were foreigners) was appointed to decide disputed points, and to choose a council for the king, to consist entirely of Englishmen; the king was to act by the advice of this council in administering justice and choosing ministers, to observe the charters, and to live of his own without oppressing the merchants or the poor; Prince Edward and his cousin Henry of Almayne were given as hostages; and the Earls of Leicester and Gloucester were to be indemnified.

Lewis, SIR GEORGE CORNEWALL (1806-1863), elder son of Sir Thomas Frankland Lewis, was educated at Eton and Christ Church, and called to the bar at the Middle Temple (1831). In 1835 he was appointed one of the commissioners of inquiry for the relief of the poor and into the state of the Church in Ireland; in the following year was placed on the commission of inquiry into the affairs of Malta; and was a poor-law commissioner from January 1839 to July 1847, when he was first elected member for the county of Hereford. He sat for that county until 1852, and from March 1855 until his death represented the Radnor district of boroughs. He succeeded to the baronetcy on the death of his father in 1885. He filled numerous important offices in the government. He was appointed secretary to the board of control from November 1847 to May 1848; under-secretary for the home department to July 1850; financial secretary to the treasury to February 1852; chancellor of the exchequer from March 1855 to February 1858; and was appointed secretary for the home department, June 1859. On the resignation of Lord Herbert, 1861, Sir George was appointed by Palmerston secretary for war, which office he held till his death.

Ligonier, JOHN, EARL (1680-1770), belonged to a family of French Protestant refugees. He first appears in history as a volunteer at the storming of Liège (1702), and served as a soldier of fortune under Marlborough, being present at the battle of Blenheim. He was knighted for his gallant conduct at the battles of Dettingen (1743) and Fontenoy (1745). As commander-in-chief of the British forces in Flanders he greatly distinguished himself at the battle of Roucoux (1746); but in the following year he was taken prisoner at Lauffeld (q.v.), owing to the extreme ardour of the British horse, of which he was in command. It is said that he endeavoured to pass off as one of the enemy's officers when surrounded. Marshal Saxe availed himself of the capture to make overtures for peace through Ligonier. In 1748 he was returned to parliament for Bath, and became lieutenant-general of the ordnance, and subsequently governor of Plymouth (1752). In 1757 he was removed from the ordnance, much to his disgust, but created Viscount Ligonier of Enniskillen and commander-in-chief, although no longer fit for active service. He was created an English peer in 1763, and an earl in 1766.

Liburne, JOHN (1614-57), a man of good family, in the county of Durham, was apprenticed to a tailor in the city of London, became engaged in the circulation of the prohibited books of Prynne and Bastwick, was brought before the Star Chamber, whipped, and imprisoned (1638). On the meeting of the Long Parliament he was released, and compensated for his sufferings (November 1640). When the war broke out he entered the army of Essex, fought at Edgehill, was made prisoner at Brentford (November 1642), tried for high treason before a council of war at Oxford, and only saved from death by the intervention of the Parliament. Afterwards he escaped, and served in the Earl of Manchester's army, finally attaining the rank of lieutenant-colonel. At the close of the war he took to writing on all subjects, and was summoned before the House of Lords for attacking the Earl of Manchester, sentenced to pay a fine, and committed to prison. When released in 1648 he became one of the leaders of the party termed Levellers (q.v.), and wrote numerous pamphlets, notably the "Foundations of Freedom." In February 1649 he presented to the Commons a paper called "The Serious Apprehensions of a Part of the People on behalf of the Commonwealth." On March 5 appeared "England's New Chains Discovered," and before the end of the month it was followed by "The Hunting of the Foxes from Newmarket and Triploe Heath to Whitehall by Five Small Beagles." For this he was committed to the Tower, where he found means to summarize his views on government in a new pamphlet called "An Agreement of the Free People," and, after six months' confinement, was tried for high treason. The jury acquitted him, and he was released in November 1649. In 1652 he was banished and fined £7,000 for a libel on Sir Arthur Hesilrige. After the expulsion of the Long Parliament he ventured to return to England, but was arrested, tried, and a second time acquitted (August 1653). In spite of this he was confined by order of the council of state in the island of Jersey, but after a time released on his promise to live quietly.

"Notes and Queries," 1888, for a list of Lilburne's pamphlets. [C. H. F.]

Lillibullero was the name of a song satirizing James II and the Catholics, written by Thomas, Lord Wharton, in 1687, and set to music by Purcell. It became very popular, and added in no slight degree to the feeling against the king. Bishop Burnet says that this "foolish ballad made an impression on the king's army that cannot be imagined by those who saw it not. The whole army, and at last the people both in city and country, were singing it perpetually. And, perhaps, never had so slight a thing so great an effect." There was some justification for Wharton's boast that he had sung the king out of three kingdoms. "Lillibullero" and "Bullen-e-lah" are said to have been passwords used by the Irish Catholics in their massacre of the Protestants in 1641.

The ballad will be found in Percy's "Reliques," in Wilkins's "Political Ballads," and in W. Scott's "Irish Minstrelsy."

Limerick, THE SIEGES OF, occurred in 1651 and 1691. (1) The town was besieged by Ireton on June 3, 1651, during Cromwell's campaign in Ireland. The early bombardment effected little, but negotiations opened by the garrison came to nothing, and after an abortive attempt to storm the town by boats (June 23) Ireton closely invested it in August. The garrison was slowly starved into surrender (October 27). By the terms of the capitulation the citizens and soldiers went free under a general pardon, from which, however, twenty-two persons, including Hugh O'Neill, were exempted. (2) In 1691 the Irish army was besieged in Limerick after its defeat at the Boyne. Sarsfield, commanding the 20,000 defenders, repulsed the first English assault on August 27, 1690, and enjoyed a year's respite until after the battle of Aghrim, when the Irish army again retired into the town under D'Usson and Sarsfield. Ginkel invested Limerick on August 11, 1691, and stormed the bridge connecting the Clare and Connaught portions of the city. The populace clamoured for capitulation, Sarsfield was compelled to negotiate for an armistice, and on October 3 the Treaty of Limerick (q.v. below) was concluded. With the fall of Limerick the war in Ireland came to an end.

H. Mangan, "Sieges of Derry and Limerick," 1903. [A. C. F. B.]

Limerick, THE TREATY OF (October 3, 1691), was the result of negotiations between the English and Irish commanders at the conclusion of the second siege of Limerick. The articles of capitulation were divided into two parts—a military treaty and a civil treaty. By the first it was agreed that such Irish officers and soldiers as should declare they wished to go to France should be conveyed thither. French vessels were to be permitted to pass and repass between Brittany and Munster. The civil treaty granted to the Irish Catholics such religious privileges as were consistent with law, or as they had enjoyed in the reign of Charles II. To all who took the oath of allegiance a perfect amnesty was promised, and their lands and all the rights and privileges they had held under Charles II were to be restored. Of the Irish army eleven thousand volunteered for the French service, but of these many afterwards deserted; three thousand either accepted passes from Ginkel, the English commander, or returned home. The terms of the civil treaty were discussed in the English parliament. A bill was prepared in the Commons providing that no person should sit in the Irish parliament, enjoy any office whatever, or practise law or medicine in Ireland until he had taken the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and subscribed the declaration against transubstantiation. This was, however, found inconsistent with the terms of the treaty of Limerick. The bill was accordingly amended by Chief Justice Holt, and accepted in that form by the Commons. The question whether Roman Catholics could be admitted to parliament was not finally settled until the reign of George IV. The Irish legislation under William III and Anne, and during the greater part of the eighteenth century, was completely opposed to the spirit of the Treaty of Limerick. [IRELAND.]

Lincoln was a Celtic town before the coming of the Romans and afterwards a Roman colony. The name (Lindum Colonia) is a compound of Celtic and Latin. The Roman colony was founded about A.D. 100. It is said to have been besieged by Hengest in 475, and became an English town. It was frequently ravaged by the Danes, and became one of the five boroughs of the Danelagh. It was recaptured by Edmund in 1016. The castle was begun by William the Conqueror in 1068. The cathedral was commenced in 1086, and built chiefly in the twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth centuries. Stephen won and lost the town in 1141, and regained it in 1146. Prince Louis of France besieged it in 1216. The first charter was granted by Henry II in 1157, and parliaments were held at Lincoln in 1301, 1316, and 1327.

Lincoln, THE FAIR OF (1217), was the name given to the battle which was fought at Lincoln at the beginning of the reign of Henry III between the Earl of Pembroke and the adherents of Louis of France. The battle was fought in the streets of Lincoln, the castle of which was being besieged by the French. Pembroke was completely victorious, and the leader of the French army, the Count of Perche, fell in the battle.

Lincoln, JOHN DE LA POLE, EARL OF (d. 1487). [POLE.]

Lincolnshire Insurrection, THE (1536), was the first of the rebellious movements set on foot by the priesthood after the dissolution of the lesser monasteries. It differed strikingly from the rising which immediately followed it in Yorkshire, in that it proceeded almost entirely from the lower orders. So much aloof, indeed, did the county gentry hold themselves from the Lincolnshire revolt that the insurgents regarded them as opponents rather than as sympathizers, giving unmistakable evidence of their opinions on the subject by holding a large number of the gentry in a state of siege in the close at Lincoln. The town of Louth was the scene of the first distinct outbreak of local discontent, where the rumour industriously spread about that Heneage, one of the clerical commissioners, who, accompanied by the Bishop of Lincoln's chancellor, was then going his prescribed rounds, had instructions to carry off the more valuable contents of the church treasury was quite sufficient to excite the country people to deeds of violence. Led on by Dr. Mackerel, the abbot of Barlings, who styled himself for that occasion Captain Cobler, the people of Louth locked and guarded the menaced church; and then, carrying away with them its great cross by way of standard, set forth en masse to raise the neighbouring towns and villages (October). The speedy arrival, however, of the king's troops under Sir John Russell and the Duke of Suffolk prevented any very violent display of hostility, and the rebels contented themselves with sending a humble petition to the king for the redress of their grievances, which they enumerated as coming under five heads, viz. :—(1) the demolition of the monasteries; (2) employment of persons of mean birth as ministers of the Crown; (3) levying subsidies without any adequate occasion; (4) taking away four of the seven sacraments; (5) the subversion of the ancient faith through the instrumentality of several of the bishops. Suffolk, having conferred with some few gentlemen who had joined the insurgent ranks with a view to confusing and counteracting their plans, returned an absolute refusal to these requests, but promised a general pardon from the king in the event of an immediate submission and dispersal of the rebels. This had all the desired effect, and the movement, so far as Lincolnshire was concerned, came to an end on October 19, 1536. Severe measures, however, were taken subsequently by the king. In March 1537 forty-six of the leaders were hanged in Louth, Horncastle, and Lincoln.

Lindiswaras, THE, were an Anglian tribe occupying part of Lincolnshire, and having their centre about that portion of the county still known as Lindsey.

Linlithgow, the chief town of the shire of that name, was occupied by Edward I in 1298, and soon afterwards was taken by stratagem by Bruce. It contains a royal palace, the birthplace of James V (1512) and Mary, Queen of Scots (1542), and the scene of the assassination of the Regent Moray (1570). In 1661 the Covenant was publicly burned at Linlithgow.

Lisbon figured in English history in 1147 when the English and French crusaders engaged in the Second Crusade halted at Lisbon on their way to the east and helped Alfonso I of Portugal to capture the town from the Almoravids.

Lisle, LADY ALICE (1614-85), was the wife of John Lisle, one of Cromwell's lords. After his death she lived a retired life near Winchester. She was accused before Jeffreys of harbouring fugitives from Sedgemoor. Being reluctantly found guilty by the jury, she was sentenced by Jeffreys to be burned, but her sentence was commuted, and she was beheaded at Winchester (September 2, 1685).

Litster, JOHN (d. 1381), was probably a native of Norwich, and, as his name implies, a dyer by trade. He headed the insurgents in Norfolk, during the Peasants' Rising of 1381 (q.v.), and assumed the title of King of the Commons. For a short while the whole country was at the mercy of the rebels; but Bishop Le Despenser of Norwich, having raised a force, defeated the insurgents of North Walsham, and caused Litster to be hanged.

Liverpool, EARLS OF. [JENKINSON.]

Livery and Maintenance, STATUTES OF (1495 and 1504), formed part of Henry VII's attempts to curb the power of the noble families and to prevent the spread of corruption among royal officials. The famous Statute of Liveries was passed in 1504, and the chief act against Maintenance in 1495. The classic case of the Earl of Oxford, who met the king at Hedingham at the head of hundreds of his followers and was heavily fined, is well known. [MAINTENANCE.]

Livingstone, DAVID (1813-73), missionary and explorer, embarked in 1840 for Africa after an early life of toil and hardship in a Lanarkshire mill, and worked as a missionary until 1849, when he discovered Lake Ngami. In 1852 he set out from Cape Town to explore northwards, ascending the main Zambezi and journeying through Shinte, Kioko, and Kasanji to Loanda, whence he returned by a different route, discovering the Victoria Falls of the Zambezi on his way (November 1855), and arriving at Cape Town in May 1856 after four years' absence. In 1857 he returned to England, but soon sailed for Africa again as British consul at Quilimane, with a commission to explore eastern and central Africa. This second expedition (March 1858) was remarkable for his trip up the River Shire early in 1859, his discovery of Lake Nyasa (September 16, 1859), the loss of his vessel in December 1860, his exploration of the shores of Lake Nyasa in 1861, the death of his wife from fever in April 1862, and his journey up the Rovuma in the following August. He returned to England from Mozambique in July 1864. Next year, having meanwhile finished his book on the Zambezi, he sailed for Africa again on an endeavour to find the source of the Nile. The expedition started for the interior in the summer of 1866, but ten of his fourteen men soon deserted him through fear of Zulu attacks, and he was fast being worn out by fever and privation when he sighted Lake Tanganyika on April 1, 1867. Nevertheless he pushed on, until he was met, a living skeleton, by H. M. Stanley at Ujiji (July 1871). Stanley had been sent to find him by Mr. J. Gordon Bennett, proprietor of the New York Herald. He stayed with Livingstone until March 1872, when the explorer set off towards Tanganyika to continue his quest. He died on April 30, 1873, in the Ilala country. His body was conveyed to England by a relief expedition sent out by the Royal Geographical Society, and buried in Westminster Abbey, April 1874. The value of his work is beyond estimation. He opened up central Africa to the influences of Christianity, was a means of abolishing the slave trade, travelled over one-third of the African continent, and discovered the Zambezi, Lakes Nyasa and Tanganyika, and the Upper Congo. His work was taken up by Stanley.

Llewelyn. [WALES.]

Lloyd George, DAVID (b. 1863), born near Criccieth, practised for a time as a solicitor in London, and entered parliament for Carnarvon boroughs in 1890. In the Liberal government of 1905 he was president of the board of trade until 1908, when he became chancellor of the exchequer and submitted (1909) a notable budget which differed in many respects from previous budgets, particularly in aiming at producing an expanding revenue for future years in addition to meeting the requirements of the current year. In December 1909 the Lords refused to pass the budget before its approval by the country. But Mr. Lloyd George was returned again for Carnarvon in the two elections of 1910. In 1911 he achieved the National Health and Unemployment Insurance Acts. His scheme for land reform developed in 1912 and 1913 was curtailed by the "Marconi affair" and the Home Rule crisis in Ireland. He remained chancellor of the exchequer for the first ten months of the Great War, and then joined the Asquith-Bonar Law coalition of May 1915 as minister of munitions. As the war progressed he advocated a diversion of part of the allied offensive from the western to the eastern front, and compulsory military service. The latter plan was realized in 1916. And in June of that year, following the death of Lord Kitchener, Mr. Lloyd George resigned the ministry of munitions and became minister for war. Six months later his disagreement with Mr. Asquith on the question of reorganizing the cabinet war committee precipitated the resignation of the coalition (December 4, 1916). A second coalition was formed with Mr. Lloyd George as prime minister. In 1917 he devoted himself to the task of securing unified control on the western front, which was ultimately achieved under Marshal Foch after the German offensive of March 1918.

Before the Peace Conference a general election was held (December 1918) and the result was an overwhelming victory for Mr. Lloyd George. At the Peace Conference (January 1919) he was one of the inner council of three, composed of himself, President Wilson, and M. Clemenceau, —and played an arduous part as conciliator and moderator of conflicting claims. On his return he was met by domestic unrest and industrial strife; particularly the coal crisis of 1919 (shelved by the appointment and report of the Sankey Commission) and the national strike precipitated by the railwaymen in October 1919. Financial panic developed during the next two years, and was met by Mr. Lloyd George in the establishment of the Geddes Committee. But the ministry fell in October 1922 on its policy of concession in Ireland and resistance to the Turks at Chanak. On the elevation of Mr. Asquith to the peerage (1925) Mr. Lloyd George became the leader of the Liberal party (dwindled to 40 members) in the Commons. The party was subsequently weakened by internal dissension during the general strike of May 1926.

Local Government Acts. Numerous statutes were passed during the reign of Queen Victoria, giving to certain districts the power of adopting and carrying into effect the provisions of the Public Health Act, without the necessity for a provisional order of the former board of health confirmed by act of parliament. The important act of August 13, 1888, established county councils throughout England and Wales. [COUNCILS, CIVIL.] The act of 1894 completed that reconstruction of English local government outside the municipal boroughs which was begun in 1888. It made the civil parish the primary unit of local administration, providing that (1) in every parish there should be a parish meeting; (2) in every parish having a population of 300 and upwards there should be a parish council of from five to fifteen members, annually elected, which should appoint the overseers, take over all the secular duties of the vestry and churchwardens in regard to parish charities, etc., and those of the boards of guardians in regard to the sale of parish property and the working of the Allotments Act. The parish might also provide for water supply and acquire rights of way. It was limited in respect of its rating powers. The power of adopting the "Adoptive Acts" [RATES] rested with the parish meeting exclusively. Parishes with a population of less than 300 might be grouped together under one parish council, or given separate parish councils by an order of the county council. District councils were also established by the act. They were popularly elected, and replaced the rural sanitary authorities in rural districts and the improvement commissioners or local boards in urban districts, and also took over the powers of the highway authorities. The act also abolished the plural or property vote in the election of boards of guardians, and ex-officio or nominated membership thereof.

S. and B. Webb, "English Local Government from the Revolution to the Municipal Corporations Act," 1907-8.

Local Government Board, The, established in 1871, was a committee of the privy council, and superseded the old Poor Law Board. It was concerned with sanitary arrangements, with the public health, with highways, municipal improvements, and the like. It comprised a president appointed by the Crown, the president of the council, the principal secretaries of state, the lord privy seal, and the chancellor of the exchequer; but it was a board only in name, and the work was done by the president and his staff. The president was responsible to parliament for all its acts.

The Local Government Board for Scotland consisted of the secretary for Scotland, the solicitor-general for Scotland, the permanent under-secretary for Scotland, and several appointed members. The powers of the board, though not so extensive, were similar to those of the English Local Government Board, and involved a complete control of poor law administration and the poor law authorities, and a supervision of the local government and public health authorities.

The Local Government Board for Ireland was composed of several members of the staff of the lord-lieutenant. The duties of the board were in the main similar to those of the English and Scottish boards, but the lord-lieutenant exercised certain powers which in England belonged to the Local Government Board.

In 1919 all the powers and duties of the Local Government Board were transferred to the Ministry of Health (q.v.).

Locarno, The TREATIES OF (December 1, 1925), which opened in post-War Europe a new period of diplomacy dominated by the question of security, were signed in London. They originated in the offer of a guarantee pact by the German ambassador in Paris to M. Herriot on February 9, 1925; a pact by which the powers interested in the Rhine entered into an undertaking "not to wage war against a contracting state." The proposal was discussed throughout Europe during the summer, and on June 19 a reply concerted between the French and British governments was sent to Germany and circulated also to the governments of Belgium, Italy, Poland, and Czechoslovakia. In August and September this draft was examined by a meeting of legal experts appointed by the powers concerned, and a resolution in sympathy with its principles was moved during the sixth assembly of the League of Nations at Geneva on September 13. The Locarno Conference on the security pact opened eventually on October 4, attended by representatives from Great Britain, France, Belgium, Germany, Italy, Poland, and Czechoslovakia. It did its work by formal meetings and informal conversations, entirely in the spirit of Mr. Austen Chamberlain's "Let the dead past bury its dead." Germany let it be known that she would not object to her future entry into the League of Nations being made a condition of the pact; the warnings of Tchitcherin, the Soviet commissioner for foreign affairs, were not allowed to prejudice the discussion; the two thorny problems of security for Poland and Czechoslovakia and of Germany's entry into the League were thrashed out; and on October 16 the Locarno Pacts (approved on the 10th) were initialled. The British representatives were the foreign secretary (Mr. Austen Chamberlain) and Sir Cecil Hurst. The pacts comprised a treaty of mutual guarantee between the five major powers and arbitration treaties and conventions signed by Germany with France, Belgium, Poland, and Czechoslovakia. They were finally signed at the Foreign Office in London on December 1, and ratified on September 14, 1926. Mr. Chamberlain's work for peace was rewarded with a knighthood of the Garter.

The Treaty of Mutual Guarantee between the five powers, championed by the Baldwin government in preference to the Geneva Protocol of 1924 (q.v.), comprised ten articles, in which (1) the German-Belgian and German-French frontiers fixed by the Treaty of Versailles (1919—q.v.) were guaranteed inviolable; (2) France, Belgium, and Germany abjured recourse to war except for purposes of defence against attack or under Articles 15 or 16 of the Covenant of the League of Nations (q.v.); (3) disputes between the three powers were to be submitted to judicial decisions, and (4) questions touching the frontiers to the council of the League; (5) Article 3 was guaranteed by all the contracting parties, but (6) without prejudice to the Treaty of Versailles and supplementary arrangements, or (7) to the duty of the League to safeguard world peace; (8) the treaty was to be registered at the League of Nations and to remain in force until the League council decided by a two-thirds majority that the League itself offered sufficient protection to the contracting parties; (9) it imposed no obligation on the British Dominions or India without their individual ratification; and (10) it was to be ratified and preserved in the archives of the League. The treaty was thus negotiated outside the League of Nations, but its arbitral machinery provided for League intervention.

The hoped-for result, however—Germany's entry into the League—was not secured immediately. It was delayed until September 1926 by the conflicting claims of several powers—Brazil, Spain, Poland, and China—to permanent seats on the council simultaneously with Germany. Spain and Brazil ultimately notified their withdrawal from the League. [LEAGUE OF NATIONS.]

Locke, JOHN (1632–1704), though of primary importance as a psychologist and metaphysician, wrote political and economic treatises of great historical significance. A student on the foundation of Christ Church, Oxford, he became associated with the 1st Lord Shaftesbury, and was one of his secretaries in 1672–3. For some years he resided on the continent for his health; but being suspected (without good reason) by his colleagues at Christ Church of treasonable designs, he was deprived of his studentship by a royal order in 1684. He retired to Holland soon afterwards, and was included among those English refugees whose surrender was asked for by the government from the States-General. He lived in retirement there till 1689, when the Revolution enabled him to return; and from 1696 to 1700 he was one of a commission charged with the function of inquiring into the best means of improving the state of trade and of the colonies, and setting the unemployed to remunerative work. His two "Treatises on Civil Government" (1690) are respectively a refutation of the "Patriarcha" of Sir Robert Filmer (q.v.), and a statement of the theory on which the Revolution and the Act of Settlement were justified—viz., that civil society arises out of a contract between individuals to set up a government and transfer to it their own right of self-defence, on condition that its powers shall only be used for the general welfare, and that the transfer implies a contract, "the original contract between king and people," which the people can declare void if the head of the state violates it. His "Letters on Toleration" (1689–90) urged that the civil authority should check the profession only of such creeds as were dangerous to the state. His "Considerations on Raising the Value of Money" had great influence in forwarding the reform of the currency on sound principles in 1695. Though he was a sincere Christian, his philosophical and religious teaching to some extent exhibited the rationalistic tendencies which afterwards culminated in English deism.

Lollards, THE, is the name given to the followers of Wyclif (q.v.), though the derivation of it is somewhat doubtful. The generally received etymology is from a German word, lollen, to sing, from their habit of singing hymns, but it has also been derived from lolia, tares, and from the old English word loller, an idler. Wyclif himself organized no band of followers, but only sent out preachers known as "Poor Priests," who at first seem to have recognized him as their head, though before long all kinds of men joined the new movement, from the sincere honest reformer to the wild socialist visionary. The relation of Lollardy to the Peasants' Revolt of 1381 (q.v.) has been much debated. That it was a direct cause of the rising is scarcely conceivable, since by that date the "Poor Priests" had scarcely begun their ministrations; but it is certain that it had social as well as religious implications. The first act against the Lollards was passed in 1381, but was merely the work of the Lords and the king. By this statute all Lollards were to be arrested and held in strong prisons till they should justify themselves according to the law and reason of Holy Church. In 1382, and again in 1394, the Lollards addressed a remonstrance to parliament, in which, among other points, they asserted that no civil lord or bishop had any power so long as he was in mortal sin, and that human laws not founded on the Scriptures ought not to be obeyed. Still there was very little persecution under Richard II, whose opposition to Lollardy was not consistent, and whose court during the lifetime of Anne of Bohemia was even thought to be infected with the heresy. It was not until 1401 that the act De Hæretico Comburendo (q.v.)

was passed, and even after the passing of that statute, and notwithstanding the close alliance between the Lancastrian dynasty and the Church, only two persons were executed for heresy in Henry IV's reign, though the Lollards boasted that they numbered 100,000. It is probable that they intended a rising under the leadership of Sir John Oldcastle (q.v.), at the beginning of Henry V's reign, but the vigilance of the government prevented it, and for complicity in the projected revolt some forty persons were put to death. In 1414 an act was passed extending the provisions of the De Hæretico Comburendo statute, and several Lollards were executed in the early years of Henry VI's reign. By the time of Jack Cade's rebellion (1450) (q.v.) the old Lollard idea seems very largely to have died out, as in the complaints of the insurgents at that time we do not find any mention of religious grievances. The Lancastrian persecution of Lollardy had driven it underground; but it was not completely extinguished. Isolated executions for Lollard principles occur all through the fifteenth century and down to the very eve of the Reformation. The initial success of Lollardy as a popular movement was due to the general discontent which prevailed at the end of the fourteenth century, while the corruptions of the Church gave it a great stimulus. But the gradual emancipation of the villeins prevented its continuance, and the lack of any great leader and of any effective organization was sufficient to prevent the union of the various bodies of religious, social, and political malcontents.

London owes its importance to its position on the Thames, and the continuity of its history to the abiding effects of the Roman occupation. The earliest settlements were possibly Celtic pile-dwellings along the Fleet River from its junction with the Thames, and a Celtic stronghold on the height now occupied by St. Paul's. It is possible too that London was the stronghold to which Cassivellaunus fled before the advance of Cæsar—a settlement occupied by a tribal community bound by ties of blood and religion, and perpetuated in memory by the god-names Lud and Belinus, round which much controversy has raged. But according to recent research Celtic London was entirely superseded by Roman London, and it is to a Roman rather than a Celtic beginning that we must look for the continuity of London history. Roman London (43–409) flourished as an outpost of the empire; acquiring the name Augusta and later resuming its older name of Londinium, suffering in Boudicca's rising of 61 until later repaired and fortified by a wall, witnessing the collapse of the revolt of Allectus in 293, and developing as a centre of commerce. It extended from the Tower to St. Paul's and from the river to the present London Wall, with the forum probably somewhere near Leadenhall Market. Recent investigation refutes the theory that the city fell into decay and desolation after the departure of the Romans. The last definite mention of Londinium as a Romano-British city refers to the year 457, after which date there is silence until 604. But London probably lived on as a city-state, maintaining its independent existence throughout the Saxon conquest until the time of Alfred. It was administered on principles of Roman commercial and property law until late in the Middle Ages; it used Roman ecclesiastical buildings for Christian worship and preserved them intact from the Saxon ravages. The Saxons settled outside the city in their Paddingtons and Kensingtons; and even in after-days the folkmoor of London was not the real governing assembly. Bæda's reference to London as the capital of the East Saxons at the time when Mellitus became its first bishop (604) must be taken in an ecclesiastical rather than a political sense. Saxon London began with Alfred the Great, who, realizing its importance as a position for defence against the Danes, repaired its fortifications (886–98) and entrusted it to the care of his son-in-law, Ethelred of Mercia. With Alfred London passed from a Roman imperial city to an English imperial city. Refortified, it successfully withstood the attacks of the Danes and was never once captured (the alleged sack of London in 851 is without foundation). The Danes formed their own settlements outside the walls and lived under their own laws, symbolized in the "stone cross" in the Strand. In 1016 the witan of London elected Edmund Ironside, while the witan outside elected Canute. London, with the rest of England, accepted Canute later.

The advent of the Normans, however, brought about the welding of London into the state. To the Normans London meant constitutionally as much as to the Saxons and Danes it had meant little. William I established his hold on the city partly by the Tower built outside, and partly by his charter to the Londoners, which, though it gave nothing that they had not long possessed, arrogated to the king supreme control. At the same time architectural developments began with the rebuilding of the cathedral of St. Paul (1083). Westminster Abbey had already been founded by Edward the Confessor. The Plantagenets extended both the constitutional grip and the municipal development. The charter of Henry I was granted in 1100, London was recognized as a communa by Richard I in 1191, obtained under John the right to elect its own mayor, and had its rights and liberties confirmed in 1215 by chapter 13 of Magna Carta. The second London Bridge (of stone) was begun in 1176 and finished in 1209. (It remained until 1832, when the present bridge was begun.) Westminster Hall and Lambeth Palace were products of Plantagenet workmanship, and the Guildhall was restored in 1411. The fourteenth century was remarkable for the victory of the craft-gilds over the merchant-gilds, and for Edward II's charter of 1327 (temporarily abrogated by Richard II in 1392). In the Wars of the Roses London was strongly Yorkist.

In the Tudor period, dominantly commercial, the city became "modern London in all essentials," with a vigorous commercial and industrial life typified in the May Day Riots of 1517 and in the formation of the London Merchant Adventurers. This again was an age of building—notably the Tudor additions to York House (Whitehall), the bishops' houses in the Strand, and the Henry VII chapel in Westminster Abbey. During the Stuart period London was the centre of Presbyterianism in the Civil War, opposing the king at first and the army later. It was occupied in 1648 by the army and in 1660 by Monck. In 1665 and 1666 it suffered from the Plague and Fire (q.v.), which were followed by a period of rebuilding under Sir Christopher Wren, whose monumental work is St. Paul's Cathedral. This was also the age of river journeys in preference to road travel, and of gorgeous river pageants immortalized by Pepys. The reign of James II was a stormy one for the city, which resisted the royal Catholic policy, experienced violent riots in 1688, and regained the charters which had been annulled by Charles II in 1683. During the next century London was the centre of advanced Whig principles and the scene of the Wilkes riots of 1768 and the Gordon riots of 1780 (q.v.). It extended meanwhile to Hyde Park and Limehouse by 1745, and to Marylebone and Camden Town by 1800.

The greatest feature of nineteenth-century London was expansion and consolidation, beginning with the foundation of the University. The building era opened in 1832 and soon carried the suburbs far into Middlesex, Surrey, Kent, and Essex. The Metropolitan Board of Works, created in 1855, functioned unsatisfactorily until 1888, when the London County Council was created by statute. Until 1900 the city was governed by upwards of a hundred local bodies, since it had not been included within the operation of the Municipal Reform Act of 1835 (q.v.); but in 1894 a royal commission reported in favour of the unification of London government, and in 1900 the administrative county (exclusive of the City) was divided into twenty-eight municipal boroughs each under a mayor, aldermen, and corporation.

London, CONFERENCE OF (December 4, 1908—February 26, 1909), was attended by representatives of Great Britain, France, Germany, the United States, Italy, Austria-Hungary, Russia, Japan, Holland, and Spain. It met to draw up a code of international maritime law in time of war. The rules it adopted were concerned chiefly with blockades during war, contraband, and the destruction of neutral prizes.

—, CONVENTION OF (October 22, 1832), between Great Britain and France for the purpose of coercing Holland. It declared that unless the Dutch troops evacuated Belgian territory before November 12, 1832, the two contracting parties would place an embargo on Dutch shipping in their ports, station a squadron off the coast of Holland, move a French army into Belgium, and expel the Dutch garrison from Antwerp. Holland refused to comply: whereupon the French troops entered and captured Antwerp on December 23. A treaty was finally concluded in May 1833 satisfactory to the powers and the Belgians. Holland accepted it in February 1838.

—, TREATY OF (July 6, 1827), was concluded between Great Britain, France, and Russia in an endeavour to end the War of Greek Independence which had been raging since 1821. It bound the three powers to offer their joint mediation to the Ottoman Porte in order to settle Greece on a basis of self-government under Turkish suzerainty, each contracting party disavowing any designs of aggrandizement for itself. A secret article provided that should the Porte not have accepted the proffered mediation within a month, the three powers would take steps to approximate with the Greeks (by exchanging consular agents, etc.), and their admirals would be instructed to intercept all supplies of men and stores coming to the Turkish and Egyptian armies in Greece—though without entering into hostilities. The importance of the treaty for British history is (a) the fact that Canning united Russia to Britain and France and so sundered the "Neo-Holy Alliance" of Russia, Prussia, and Austria, (b) the fact that it resulted in the battle of Navarino (October 20, 1827), of which the new Wellington administration disapproved, (c) the fact that Wellington endeavoured to restrict the advantages which the treaty foreshadowed for Greece, and pursued a pro-Turkish policy which ultimately restricted the territorial limits of the Greek state (February 3, 1830) and lowered British prestige among both Greeks and Turks.

—, TREATY OF (October 15, 1811), was concluded between Great Britain, France, Russia, Prussia, and Austria for the settlement of Belgium, which had revolted from Holland on August 25, 1830. It prescribed that Luxemburg should be divided, the eastern part being given to the Germanic Confederation and the western part to the Belgians; that Limburg should be similarly divided; that the Belgians should have a right of way through Maestricht and free navigation in the Scheldt and all waters between it and the Rhine; and that the Belgian share of the public debt of the Netherlands since 1815 should be assessed at 8,400,000 florins.

The Belgians accepted the treaty grudgingly: Holland refused it. The ensuing period of difficult negotiation led to the Convention of London, 1832 (q.v.).

London, TREATY OF (1832), between Great Britain, France, Russia, and Bavaria, finally settled the future of the young Greek kingdom by conferring its sovereignty on Frederick Otto, son of the King of Bavaria, and according to the limits fixed by the London protocol of September 26, 1831. The Ottoman government ratified this settlement on December 26.

—, TREATY OF (July 13, 1841), concluded between Great Britain, France, Russia, Prussia, Austria, and Turkey, marked the re-entry of France into the European Concert after a period in which the foreign policy of Thiers had threatened to provoke war with Great Britain, and gave a new lease of life to the Ottoman Empire by bringing that empire into the European system. It restored to the Porte Syria, Arabia, and Crete, confined Mehmet Ali to Egypt, and closed the Dardanelles to foreign warships while Turkey was at peace. It represents Palmerston's victory over Russian ambitions in Turkey and French ambitions in Egypt.

—, TREATY OF (January 17, 1871), was signed between the signatory powers of the Treaty of Paris of 1856 (q.v.), the clause of which treaty relative to the neutralization of the Black Sea it abrogated. Russia had repudiated the Black Sea clause of the Treaty of Paris in 1870, taking advantage of Europe's preoccupation in the Franco-Prussian War. The Conference of London met at Bismarck's suggestion, and it was unable to do more than make a virtue of necessity and confirm the abrogation, declaring, however, that "contracting powers could rid themselves of their treaty engagements only by an understanding with their co-signatories."

London Company, THE, formed 1606, obtained a charter from James I to colonize Virginia. It was to have the southern half of the territories between the thirty-fourth and forty-fifth degrees north latitude. The government of the new colony was to be vested in a council resident in England, appointed by the king, another council in the colony being charged with the duties of administration. In 1609 a new charter was obtained, vesting the appointment of the council in the shareholders, and of the governor in the council. In 1625 the company, which had been commercially a failure, was dissolved.

"London Gazette," THE, is said to be the oldest English newspaper, and is the official channel of all public announcements. A Gazette was first published in 1642, but the first of the existing series (written by Henry Muddiman) was issued at Oxford, November 16, 1665, whither the court had gone to escape the Great Plague. On February 5, 1666, the London series began. Until after the Revolution its meagre two pages, published twice a week (Tuesday and Friday), formed the only newspaper.

Londonderry. The town of Derry, in Ulster, was the seat of a monastery founded by Columba about 546. It was made a bishopric in 1158. During Tyrone's rebellion of 1566 it was garrisoned by the English. It was surprised by Hugh O'Neill, and burnt to the ground during his rebellion (1608). The corporation of London rebuilt it, getting a grant of the town and 6,000 acres adjoining (1613-30). In the rebellion of 1646 it held out against the insurgents, though in 1649 it was only owing to Owen Roe O'Neill's assistance that it was able to do so. In December 1688 Lord Antrim, with a regiment of 1,200 men, was sent by James II to garrison the town. Though the corporation and bishop were willing to admit them, thirteen young apprentices closed the gates before the eyes of the troops, and they had to retire. The citizens, however, were induced to admit a small Protestant garrison, under Lieutenant-Colonel Lundy. That officer was, however, unable to prevent the proclamation of William and Mary in 1689. By this time some 30,000 Protestants of Ulster had fled to Derry for refuge. Lundy also sent to James, who was now approaching (April 1689), and promised to surrender. But when James himself, on April 17, had got to within a hundred yards of the gate, the inhabitants rose, and shouting "No surrender!" manned the walls. James and his escort fled for their lives. Lundy was now deposed, and in the night fled from the town. Major Henry Baker and George Walker, a Protestant clergyman, were appointed governors. Presbyterians and Anglicans uniting heartily against the common foe, 7,000 men were soon under arms. On the 19th all terms were finally refused, and the siege began. It was destined to last for 105 days—till July 30. In order to prevent any help reaching the town from the sea a boom was placed by the besiegers at the mouth of the river leading into Lough Foyle, and batteries were erected to protect it. On June 15, Kirke was sent by William to try to raise the siege. He hesitated for some time to force his way through the works of the besiegers. Meanwhile the town was in a state of famine, and its surrender was a question of days. But at length Kirke, having received positive orders to force the boom on July 30, sent off the Dartmouth frigate, with two transports laden with provisions, with this purpose. They succeeded without much difficulty, and by ten in the evening the town was saved. On August 1 the besiegers withdrew after burning their camp. The garrison had been reduced by famine and by the sword to 3,000 men; the loss of the besiegers is said to have exceeded 5,000.

Long Parliament, THE. This name is that which has been commonly applied to the parliament which met on November 3, 1640. Out of a total of 493 members, 294 had sat in the "Short Parliament" of the previous April. They came together now with the determination to remove all grievances, and "pull up the causes of them by the roots." The first few months were occupied by the trial of Strafford (March 1641) and the impeachment of Laud and other delinquents. The attempt which was made to use the army to save Strafford caused an appeal to the people called the Protestation, and was followed by a bill preventing the king from dissolving the present parliament. The meeting of future parliaments had already been secured by the Triennial Bill (February 16, 1641). The Star Chamber (q.v.) and other special courts were abolished, and by the votes on ship-money, and the Tunnage and Poundage Bill, the levy of taxes without consent of parliament was made impossible. On these purely political questions parliament was united, and its work was permanent and became part of the constitution. But on ecclesiastical questions a division arose which made the Civil War possible. One party wished to abolish the bishops, the other merely to limit their power; but Presbyterians and Episcopalians both strove to realize their ideal of a church, and neither was prepared to accept the solution of toleration. The Episcopalian party under the leadership of Hyde and Falkland rallied round the king, and formed a constitutional Royalist party. One bill for removing the bishops from the House of Lords had been rejected by the Lords in June. A second bill for the same purpose was sent up from the Commons at the end of October (1641), and a protest on the part of twelve bishops that parliament was not free, directed against the mobs which flocked to Westminster, was used to suspend them from sitting, and commit them to custody. At the same time the Commons, by the Grand Remonstrance (q.v.), passed a vote of no confidence in the king, and appealed to the people for support. The king replied by impeaching and attempting to arrest five of the parliamentary leaders (January 3, 1642), but this only brought about the closer union of the two Houses. The House of Lords passed the Bishops Exclusion Bill, and united with the Commons in the demand that the king should entrust the command of the militia and fortresses to persons in whom they could confide (February 1, 1642). The king's attempt to get possession of Hull (April 23), and the intolerant treatment of the Kentish petitioners by the House of Commons (March 28), embittered the quarrel. Parliament summed up the guarantees it demanded in the Nineteen Propositions (June 2), and after their refusal by the king prepared for war. The parliament put in force its ordinance among the militia, and the king his commissions of array. Thus the Civil War began even before the king set up his standard at Nottingham. Some thirty or forty peers took part for the parliament, and about sixty sided with the king. Of the House of Commons less than a hundred at first joined the king, and though their number increased in the next two years it never reached two hundred. Parliament entrusted the conduct of the war to a Committee of Safety of ten commoners and five lords sitting at Derby House. It also commenced the nomination of an assembly of divines to be consulted on the proposed ecclesiastical reforms. The ill-success of the first year's war led to the formation of a peace party, and negotiations were opened at Oxford in February 1643; but an agreement proved impossible. Again in August the House of Lords brought forward a number of peace propositions, which passed the Commons by a small majority, but the tumults which the news of these terms caused in the city obliged parliament to abandon them (August 7). The Parliamentary leaders turned to Scotland for aid, and in September the parliament signed the Solemn League and Covenant as the price of a Scottish army. Representatives of Scotland entered the Committee of Safety (which now took the name of the Committee of the Two Kingdoms), and joined the English divines in the Westminster Assembly. In spite of their reverses the Parliamentary leaders remained firm, and refused to treat as equals with the assembly of Royalist members which the king gathered round him at Oxford, and dignified with the name of a parliament (February to April 1644). In the spring of 1645 the position of the Parliament was entirely altered by the Self-denying Ordinance, which obliged all members of either House holding military commands to resign them, whilst at the same time the reorganization of the army produced what soon claimed to be a rival authority (April 1645). During the autumn of 1645 and during 1646 the composition of the House of Commons was seriously changed by the election of 230 new members to supply the place of those who had deserted or been expelled. Thus a strong independent party was formed in the House sympathizing with the army outside. The vain negotiations carried on with the king during the winter of 1645-6, and during his presence in the Scottish camp, ended in January 1647, with his delivery to the commissioners of the parliament. Whilst the king still delayed to come to terms with the Presbyterian majority in parliament, the conflict between the army and that assembly broke out. The army demanded its arrears of pay before it disbanded, toleration for its religious views, and a voice in the settlement of the country. It required also the suspension of eleven leading Presbyterian members charged with causing the misunderstanding between the parliament and the army. The eleven members withdrew voluntarily to save the dignity of the House (June 26), but a few weeks later a riot took place, and the Londoners restored the eleven members to their seats. Indignant at mob-dictation, the Speaker, with 100 members of the Lower House and fourteen of the Upper, took refuge with the army (August 3). The soldiers occupied London, and the eleven members fled or were impeached. Seven of the Lords shared the same fate, and a large number of Presbyterians seceded from the House. Thus the army secured in parliament a majority favourable to its own views, which, after the king had refused to accept the Four Bills in which the terms of peace were comprised, declared that no more addresses should be made to him (January 3, 1648). Three months later the second Civil War began; the seceding members took advantage of it to return to their places, the eleven members were recalled, a persecuting ordinance was passed against sectarians, and negotiations reopened with the king. On December 5 the House, by 129 to 83, voted that the king's answers were sufficient ground to proceed upon for the settlement of the kingdom. A second time the army interfered to put an end to Presbyterian rule, and prevent an unsatisfactory settlement. On December 6 and 7 a couple of regiments, directed by Colonel Pride, surrounded the House, excluded ninety-six of the leading Presbyterians, and arrested forty-seven others. The attendance in the House of Lords dwindled to six or seven, that in the Commons to fewer than sixty members, but the remainder were all bound to work in accordance with the army. On January 1, 1649, the Commons passed a resolution defining it as treason for the king to levy war against the parliament and kingdom, and an ordinance appointing a High Court of Justice to try Charles. The king's trial lasted from January 20 to 27, and his execution took place on the 30th. On February 6 the Commons proceeded to vote that "the House of Peers in parliament is useless, dangerous, and ought to be abolished." The next day they resolved "that it hath been found by experience, and that this House doth declare that the office of the king in this realm, and to have the power thereof in any single person is unnecessary, burdensome, and dangerous to the liberty, safety, and public interest of this nation, and therefore ought to be abolished." These resolutions were followed by acts giving effect to them, and crowned on May 19 by an act declaring and constituting the people of England to be a Commonwealth and free state. At the same time a resolution was passed to consider the constitution of future parliaments, and this question occupied the House more or less for the next six years. The executive power was in the hands of the council of state containing all the important members of parliament, but the committees of the House, and the House itself, still retained great power. After the consolidation of the republic by Cromwell's victories, the members present in the House increased considerably, rising on some occasions in 1652-3 to as many as 120 members. After Worcester Cromwell succeeded in persuading the House to fix November 1654 as the period of their own dissolution, and urged on the question of the Reform Bill. But when he found that the bill they proposed would perpetuate the powers of the Rump, as it was called, by providing that they should keep their places without re-election, and be sole judges of the election of new members, he endeavoured to stop the progress of the measure by a private arrangement. When that failed he expelled them from the House by force (April 20). They did not reassemble till six years later, when the republicans, who had allied themselves with the army to overthrow Richard Cromwell, procured the restoration of the Rump (May 8, 1659). The members expelled as Royalists and those excluded by Pride's Purge were still, in spite of their protests, kept out of the House. This assembly consisted of sixty or seventy members, and continued to sit till October 13, when it was expelled by Lambert in consequence of the attempt to exercise control over the army. On December 26 it was restored again in consequence of the divisions in the army and the advance of Monck. Monck entered London on February 3, 1660, just as the Rump was preparing to carry out the scheme for enlarging its numbers, frustrated by Cromwell in 1653. After a moment's hesitation, the resistance of the city emboldened him to declare for a free parliament (February 10), and to reinstate the members excluded (February 21). According to their agreement with Monck, these members resolved that a new parliament should be summoned (February 22), and proceeded to pass a bill summoning it for April 25, and dissolving themselves. The last sitting of the Long Parliament took place on March 16, 1660. The Restoration swept away most of its work, but the abolition of the extraordinary courts, and of the king's claim to levy taxes without the consent of parliament, were solid and lasting gains. Two of its later measures also, the institution of an excise (1643), and the abolition of feudal tenures (1646), were maintained and re-enacted.

Longchamp, WILLIAM DE (d. 1197), was a Norman of low origin, who managed to ingratiate himself with Richard I before his father's death. On his patron's accession to the throne Longchamp was at once made chancellor and Bishop of Ely, and on the king's departure on crusade he was appointed co-justiciar of England with Hugh de Pudsey. He soon quarrelled with Hugh, and early in 1190 succeeded in concentrating all power in his own hands. His subsequent appointment as papal legate made him supreme in both Church and State. His arrest of Geoffrey, Archbishop of York, and his oppressive taxation, combined with a haughty demeanour and unattractive manners to render him unpopular; and in 1191 John, whose treasonable pretensions Longchamp had consistently opposed, was able to unite the baronage against him and to secure his deposition. Longchamp fled to the continent, and early in 1193 he joined the captive Richard in Germany, where he participated in the negotiations leading to the king's release. He enjoyed throughout Richard's confidence, and although his unpopularity in England did not abate, he retained the chancellorship till his death. In spite of his arrogance and tyrannical conduct Longchamp was by no means devoid of ability. Stubbs says of him that "his public policy as distinct from his personal favour was intelligent and energetic."

Longsword (or, LONGESPÉE), WILLIAM (d. 1226), was the natural son of Henry II, by an unknown mother (traditionally Rosamund Clifford, q.v.). He married Ela, heiress to the earldom of Salisbury, and received the title of earl himself. He supported John against the barons and the French king, and was taken prisoner at Bouvines (1214). After temporarily deserting to Louis of France in 1216, he espoused the cause of Henry III and the "national" party. He died at Salisbury in 1226. There is no evidence to support the assertion of Matthew Paris that he went on crusade in 1219.

Longsword, WILLIAM (d. 1250), was the eldest son of the preceding. For some unknown reason he did not receive his father's earldom, although he is sometimes styled Earl of Salisbury. In 1240 he accompanied Richard of Cornwall on crusade; and in 1249 himself led a force of English knights to the assistance of Louis IX of France at Damietta. He was slain at the battle of Mansourah in 1250.

Loos, THE BATTLE OF (September 25-8, 1915), was fought on the Western front during the Great War, between the British and German armies, the British attack being intended, in conjunction with a French attack on Vimy Ridge, to relieve the situation on the Russian front. The four-day offensive, preceded by four days of artillery bombardment, resulted in the capture of a stretch of the German front line, but it was found impossible to effect a break-through. The French attack in Artois similarly failed to take Vimy Ridge.

Lopes, SIR MANASSEH (1755-1831), was a baronet of Jewish extraction, who was elected to parliament for Barnstaple (1818). The election, however, was petitioned against on the ground of gross bribery. The committee found that he had expended £3,000 on the election; that out of 300 resident electors 63 had received £5 each; and that the out-voters had been given £20 apiece. The House of Commons thereupon unseated Sir Manasseh (1819). He was also indicted the same year for bribery at a previous election at Grampound. The case was tried at Exeter, and it was found that Sir Manasseh had regularly bargained with one of the electors to be returned for the borough for the sum of £2,000, which was, of course, distributed among the voters. He was sentenced to pay a fine of £1,000, and to be imprisoned for two years.

Lopez, RODERIGO (d. 1594), a Jewish physician in the service of Elizabeth, was charged by the Earl of Essex with being in the pay of Spain. He was acquitted once, but Essex pursued his investigations, and obtained his conviction on the evidence of two Portuguese, and he was executed. It must still remain a question whether Lopez was really guilty.

"Lord Collingwood," THE, was a British merchant vessel seized in 1821 by a Spanish cruiser and condemned in the Spanish courts on the ground that she was found trading with Buenos Ayres, one of the revolted Spanish colonies, which had already practically obtained independence. The owners complained to their government, and the latter remonstrated at Madrid. In October 1822 Canning, who had succeeded Castlereagh at the foreign office, immediately sent a firm note to the Spanish government. The latter was now informed that Great Britain would take steps to secure her commerce, and that for this purpose a squadron would be ordered to Cuba to destroy the strongholds of these pirates. The Spanish government, which was anxious for British support at the Congress of Verona, at once gave way. A decree was issued recognizing the right of other governments to trade with the former Spanish colonies, and compensation was awarded to the plundered British merchants.

Lords, HOUSE OF. The existing constitution of the Lords dates from the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. At that time their status and their office in the state became actually fixed, and their order received that impress which has ever since distinguished it from the rest of the community. But the Lords may be traced in an unbroken descent to the witenagemot, which indeed in character and function they still resemble. They are in theory the noble and wise of the kingdom, are counsellors of the sovereign, are legislators in a personal or official capacity, and are an august court of justice. The Conquest converted the witenagemot into, at least potentially, a general gathering of feudatories holding their lands immediately from the king, and thus brought the institution a step nearer to its modern character. This, however, was a large and unwieldy body; a process of selection inevitably set in, and the tenants-in-chief of larger holdings became recognized as a special class more closely attached to the king, and entitled to certain peculiar marks of consideration, of which the personal summons addressed to them by the king when their services were required was the most significant. The final stage of their development was reached when this personal summons had given the person summoned and his heirs a distinctive title to a place in the order, independent of any other qualification. Neither tenure of land nor nobility of birth, however extensive the one or unblemished the other, now availed to bestow rank in the favoured class, though the vast majority were great feudal landowners and of noble birth; it was henceforward simply the will of the sovereign, expressed at first in a personal writ of summons, that alone had this virtue. And this writ afterwards was taken to have such efficacy as to extend the rights and functions that were its outcome to the representatives of the person to whom it had originally been sent, for ever. In the later Middle Ages, however, patent took its place as the regular manner of expressing the will of the sovereign in the creation of a peer. Thus the historic House of Lords was developed, consisting "of the hereditary counsellors of the Crown, the right to give counsel being involved at one time in the tenure of land, at another in the fact of summons, at another in the terms of a patent. . . . The nobleman is the person who, for his life, holds the hereditary office denoted or implied in the title" (Stubbs). But the position had no legal value for any but the actual holder; all his children were commoners. These formed the lay element in the Lords when the parliamentary system split into separately-acting Houses; and with them were associated as a spiritual element the archbishops, bishops, and summoned abbots and priors. These were included in the baronial body, either because they held their lands on the baronial tenure, or from the reverence naturally due to their offices and learning. Since the falling away of the clerical estate from parliament, these spiritual peers have been its only representatives in the legislature. Among the members of this composite body there were several degrees of title and honorary rank, but equal rights and powers. The judges also were called to the assembly, but never became full peers; it was their part to guide it by their counsel, not to vote. The House has still a right to their advice.

During mediæval times the Lords were the more powerful division of parliament, and generally took the lead in and directed all constitutional struggles. They were the one effective check on the will of the king, and could carry most points that they deemed vital. Yet their numbers dwindled. The decrease was mainly among the abbots and priors; these soon sank from 80 to about 27, while the bishops were constant at 20, and the temporal lords never varied much from 50. It was in Henry VI's reign that the practice of making peers of any dignity by patent, hitherto occasionally used, became general. The Wars of the Roses, by thinning the ranks, greatly diminished the political weight of the Lords; and their order was of comparatively small account in Tudor times; and the fall of the monasteries struck nearly 30 peers off their roll at a time when it contained barely 90 names in all. But 50 temporal peers were summoned to the last parliament of Elizabeth. The rule of the Stuarts added to both their numbers and consideration, though the advancing pretensions of the Commons checked the growth of the latter. More than 120 temporal lords sat in the Long Parliament, of whom a third took the Roundhead side in the great conflict. Between the Restoration and the union with Scotland their history is marked by many disputes with the Commons, and a small increase in numbers and importance. In Charles II's reign they established their right to act as a supreme court of appeal in all civil causes, though they had to abandon their claim to any kind of original jurisdiction. Their judicial function, which they inherit from the old concilium regis, involved them in an embittered quarrel with the Commons in Anne's reign, when a disputed question regarding the rights of electors at Aylesbury came before them for a final decision. In 1707 the union with Scotland added 16 representative temporal peers to their numbers, in 1801 that with Ireland 24 temporal and 4 spiritual. These last, however, were taken away by the Irish Church Act, while the temporal peers have since vanished as a result of the grant of Dominion status to southern Ireland. The Lords escaped a great danger by the failure of the Peerage Bill in 1719, which would have limited their numbers to about 200, and thus kindled against them vehement envy and jealousy. Their political importance reached its highest point in the eighteenth century, in the last years of which they began to increase rapidly by new creations. This numerical expansion has gone on steadily since; they are now many times as numerous as they were under the Tudors. Recent years have, however, witnessed a grave decline in the powers of the Upper House. In 1909 the Lords, who had long since lost any right to initiate money bills, endeavoured to assert their control in financial matters by refusing to pass the budget before it had been submitted for approval to the country. The response of the Liberal administration to this challenge was the Parliament Act of 1911 (q.v.), which divested the Upper House of all remaining influence in purely financial questions, and limited its legislative powers by providing that any measure passing the Commons on three successive occasions should automatically become law. This radical measure was intended merely to bridge over the time which must necessarily elapse before the long overdue reform of the Lords could be undertaken. The outbreak of the Great War in 1914, however, led necessarily to a postponement of this question, which was revived by the Conservative administration of Mr.

Stanley Baldwin (1927). Some modifications of the constitution and powers of the British House of Lords will, it may be confidently predicted, be effected in the near future. [BARONS; PEERAGE.]

Lose-coat Field, THE BATTLE OF (1470), was the name given to a battle fought near Empingham between the forces of Edward IV and the Lincolnshire insurgents under Sir Robert Welles. The royal troops were victorious, and the rebels, in their anxiety to escape, threw off their tabards, whence the battle got its name.

Louth, JOHN BIRMINGHAM, EARL OF (d. 1329). [BIRMINGHAM.]

Lovat, SIMON FRASER, BARON (1667?-1747). [FRASER.]

Lovell, FRANCIS, VISCOUNT (d. 1487?), was one of Richard III's chief supporters and advisers, and was made lord chamberlain of the household. He fought in the battle of Bosworth; raised a rebellion in the north in 1485-6; supported the claims of Lambert Simnel (q.v.), and fought in the battle of Stoke in 1487, where he was supposed to have been slain. But the discovery of a skeleton in a secret chamber at Minster Lovel makes it probable that he escaped to his house, where he died, perhaps of starvation.

Lowe, ROBERT, VISCOUNT SHERBROOKE (1811-92), was educated at Winchester and University College, Oxford. He became M.P. for Kidderminster in 1852, and vice-president of the board of trade in 1855, and was vice-president of the committee of council on education from 1859 to 1864. In this capacity he was instrumental in establishing the Revised Code [EDUCATION IN ENGLAND]. In 1866 he headed the "Adullamite" (q.v.) schism in the Liberal party. Later he was elected member for the University of London (1868), and became chancellor of the exchequer in the Gladstone ministry of December 1868. Here he made considerable reforms of and reductions in taxation; but his proposal for a match-tax (1871) excited violent hostility, and was abandoned. He was home secretary 1873-4; but after 1876, partly through failure of his sight, he practically retired into private life. After the general election of 1880 he was created Viscount Sherbrooke.

Lucan, PATRICK SARSFIELD, TITULAR EARL OF (d. 1693). [SARSFIELD.]

Lucaycos, THE, an alternative name for the Bahamas (q.v.).

Lucius (or LUD) was a second-century potentate who sent an embassy to Rome during the pontificate of Eleutherius, entreating that he might be made a Christian. An early legend, which is repeated by Nennius and Bæda, makes him a king of the Britons, and relates that through him Britain first received the Faith. Actually Lucius appears to have been king of Edessa, which he ruled from the centre of Bithra (Britium)—a name easily confused with Britain. The confusion first occurs in the "Liber Pontificalis," which was probably compiled about A.D. 530.

Lucknow, THE DEFENCE OF (1857), was one of the most remarkable episodes in the Indian Mutiny. Owing to the foresight of Sir Henry Lawrence, the Residency at Lucknow was armed and provisioned to stand a siege. On July 1 the enemy appeared before Lucknow, and the British withdrew to the Residency. On July 2 they lost their gallant leader. For three months, however, they held out. At the end of July they hoped to be relieved by Havelock, but the hope proved to be false. But on September 19 and 20, 2,500 British soldiers, under Sir James Outram, Havelock, and Neill, crossed the Ganges. On the 25th, Neill leading, the defences of Lucknow were attacked. The fire poured upon the assailants was tremendous, but they succeeded in making their way into the Residency. Outram now assumed the command of the garrison. The rebel forces now pressed the siege more closely with augmented numbers. On November 9 Sir Colin Campbell advanced to the relief of Lucknow, and on the 19th the position was evacuated.

—, SIEGE OF (January 1—March 21, 1858). The operations for the recovery of Lucknow from the rebels began early in the new year. On January 1 Brigadier Hope was sent forward by Campbell to prevent the destruction of the iron suspension bridge over the Kalli Middi. This was done successfully, and the bridge repaired. Campbell entrenched himself strongly in the Dilkusha Palace, March 2. Heavy guns were brought up and Outram attacked the rebels in their strong position in the Kaiser Bagh on the 9th, and drove them before him till he could plant his batteries so as to enfilade the works on the canal and the iron and stone bridges. On the 11th Sir Edward Lingard inflicted heavy loss on the enemy. Brigadier-General Franks on the 14th successfully stormed the Imambarrah. The enemy now began to evacuate the city, and on the 19th a combined movement inflicted great loss upon them. On the 21st Lingard successfully stormed the last rebel stronghold in the heart of the city; Campbell drove the retreating rebels six miles from the city with heavy loss, and Lucknow was won.

Lucy, RICHARD DE (d. 1179), was a supporter of Stephen against Maud, who won the confidence of Henry II and became one of his most trusted ministers. He was appointed justiciar conjointly with Robert de Beaumont either before or immediately after Henry's accession, and on his colleague's death he continued to hold office alone. He helped to draw up the Constitutions of Clarendon (q.v.), for which he was excommunicated by Becket. In 1173 he defeated the forces of Henry's rebel sons at Fornham, and was most energetic in suppressing the revolt. In 1179 he resigned the justiciarship and retired to his abbey of Westwood to die.

Luddite Riots, THE (1811-16), were the expression of an ignorant notion among the workpeople, especially of Yorkshire, Lancashire, and Nottinghamshire, that the prevailing distress, which was terrible and almost universal among the poor, was caused by the introduction of machinery. A quarter of a century before, one Ned Ludd, a half-witted boy in a Leicester-shire village, made himself notorious by destroying two stocking-frames. The Yorkshire rioters chose to take a name from this poor creature. The distress was widespread; there was little work to be done; prices were very high; the continental war was still draining the resources of the country. The causes of the trouble were not far to seek; yet the use of machinery, which alone kept some few people in work, was set down as the cause of all the mischief: and the poor, ignorant half-starved crowds set to work busily to destroy all the machinery they could reach. During 1811-12 the northern counties were in a perpetual state of disturbance; the army was busily employed in the Peninsula; and except where here and there a resolute mill-owner overawed the rioters, no machinery was safe from the marauding bands. In 1816 the riots broke out again. The conclusion of peace was expected to bring back prosperity immediately, but the expectation was not fulfilled; and disappointment developed quickly into exasperation, producing constant disturbances. The government of Lord Liverpool was not of a kind to deal with such conditions; they made no attempt to go to the root of the evil—which was the utter misery of the poor—but, on the contrary, thought only of coercion. If the riots were quelled in one place, they broke out in another; and the repressive policy of the government only had the effect of manifesting to the people the necessity of union among themselves by means of secret societies. With the return of prosperity the riots gradually died out.

"State Trials," vol. xxxi.

Ludford, THE ROUT OF, is the name applied to the sudden dissolution of the Yorkist forces in October 1459, on the approach of the king's army. Margaret of Anjou had taken the offensive against Richard, Duke of York, in May, and although Salisbury had defeated a Royalist detachment at Blore Heath, the Yorkists became demoralized on the approach of the main army led by Henry himself. Eventually, when confronted across Ludford Bridge by the Lancastrian host, York's men broke up in confusion, and the leaders were compelled to seek safety in precipitate flight. The duke himself escaped to Wales, while Warwick, Salisbury, and the young Edward, Earl of March, fled to Calais.

R. B. Mowat, "Wars of the Roses," 1914.

Ludlow, in Shropshire, was the most important stronghold of the Middle March of Wales. The castle, built in the twelfth century, was besieged by Stephen in 1138. It was taken by de Montfort in 1264. In 1459 it was occupied by Henry VI, and subsequently became the residence of Prince Edward, son of Edward IV, and of Arthur, son of Henry VII. In 1646 it was captured by the Parliamentarians. From the reign of Edward IV to 1685 the lord president of the Council of the Marches officially occupied Ludlow, when the office was abolished, and the castle allowed to decay. The holding of the Council of the Marches there made the town in a sense the capital of nearly all South Wales.

Ludlow, EDMUND (1617?-92), member of a good family in Wiltshire, was, at the outbreak of the Civil War, a student in the Inner Temple, entered Essex's Guards, and served under Waller and Fairfax. In May 1646 he was elected member for Wiltshire, and took his seat amongst the Republicans. He sat in the High Court which judged the king, and became a member of the council of state of the Commonwealth. In 1651 he was sent to Ireland as lieutenant-general of the horse, and after Ireton's death held for six months the supreme command until superseded by Fleetwood (November 1651—July 1652). He remained at his post in spite of Cromwell's expulsion of the Long Parliament, but opposed the proclamation of the Protectorate, and resigned his share in the civil government of the country in order not to recognize the new authority. In Richard Cromwell's parliament he vigorously opposed the government, and urged on the army leaders the restoration of the Rump. In July 1659 he was sent again to Ireland to succeed Henry Cromwell as head of the government, with the title of lieutenant-general of the horse. In October, having returned to England, he was nominated by Lambert one of the Committee of Safety established by the army, but steered a middle course between army and parliament, and wished for the restoration of the Rump. After Monck restored the excluded members, Ludlow ceased to attend the House, but still continued his vain attempts to unite the remains of the Republican party. He was a member of the Convention parliament, took his seat, and surrendered under the proclamation ordering the regicides to deliver themselves up as prisoners, but remained at large on security. Thus, when he found his life in danger, he was able to fly to France (August 1660). He fixed his residence first at Geneva, then at Vevey, where he remained till the Revolution. Then he ventured to return to England, but the House of Commons presented an address to the king requesting his arrest, and he was obliged again to fly. He died at Vevey in 1692.

Ludlow's "Memoirs," 3 vols. 1698-9, ed. C. H. Firth, 1894, describe his experiences from 1640 to 1668, and are particularly valuable for the history of the Civil War in Wiltshire, his personal relations with Cromwell, and the events of the year 1659.

Lulach was the son of Gilcomgan, mor-maer of Moray. On the death of Macbeth (1057) he was declared King of Scotland by the supporters of Macbeth. After a reign of a few months he was slain at Essil, in Strathbogie (March 17, 1058).

Lumley, JOHN, LORD (d. 1609), was restored in blood by an act of parliament, 1547, his father, George, Lord Lumley, having been implicated in the treason of Sir Thomas Percy and Lord Darcy. In 1569 he was arrested and placed in confinement on suspicion of being favourable to the Catholic lords in the north. After the collapse of the rebellion Lumley resumed his treasonable correspondence with Spain, and speedily became involved in the Ridolfi conspiracy, on the discovery of which he was sent to the Marshalsea (1571). He was subsequently pardoned, and acted as a commissioner at the trials of Mary, Queen of Scots, and the Earl of Essex.

Lundy's Lane, THE BATTLE OF (July 24, 1814), during the American War of 1812 was fought near Fort George, on Lake Ontario, between the British troops, under Sir G. Drummond and General Riall, and an American force under General Brown. Both sides claimed a victory.

Luxemburg Question. In 1830, at the Conference of London, the Belgian question (q.v.) was complicated by the Luxemburg question. Luxemburg was really part of the Germanic Confederation, and though it had been ceded to the King of the Netherlands in 1814, it formed no part of Holland. Palmerston wished it to be united with Belgium; Talleyrand wished it to be handed over to France. The conference decided that it should remain part of the Germanic Confederation, but that its western part should be ceded to Belgium [LONDON, TREATY OF, 1831]. The conference eventually separated without having effected anything, but the provisions of the Treaty of London (November 1831) were enforced by Great Britain and France (1832).

Lynedoch, THOMAS GRAHAM, BARON (1748-1843). [GRAHAM.]

Lyons, EDMUND, 1ST BARON (1790-1858), was the fourth son of John Lyons, of St. Austen's, Hants. He went to sea in 1803. In 1828 he became captain of the Blonde, in which he co-operated with the French in expelling the Turks from the Morea. In 1835 he was appointed minister at the new court of Athens. From 1849 to 1851 he was minister at Berne; from 1851 to 1853 minister at Stockholm. In 1853 he was appointed second in command of the Mediterranean fleet. In the Agamemnon he arranged, superintended, and made possible the embarkation of the allied forces at Varna and the Isle of Serpents, and their landing near Eupatoria. He served all through the Crimean War. In June 1855 he became commander-in-chief, and next year was created Baron Lyons.

Lyttelton, EDWARD, LORD (1589-1645), was a member of a distinguished family of lawyers, and the son of Sir Edward Lyttelton, chief justice of North Wales. He entered parliament in 1625, and at once joined the popular side, taking a leading part against Buckingham. In the parliament of 1628 he was one of the chief advocates of redress of grievances, but by 1631 he had made his peace with the king, and in 1634 was appointed solicitor-general, in which capacity he conducted with great ability the case against Hampden. In 1641 he was made lord keeper and received a peerage. During the debates with the Long Parliament Lyttelton had a difficult part to play, and at length, finding that moderate counsels were unavailing, he fled to the king at York, taking the great seal with him. On the outbreak of the war he raised a regiment consisting of gentlemen of the Inns of Court and others, and acted himself as colonel. But being unused to military service, his exertions were too much for his strength, and he died before very long. "He was a man of great reputation in the profession of the law," says Clarendon, "for learning and all other advantages which attend the most eminent men . . . and was not only very ready and expert in books, but exceedingly versed in records."

Lyttelton (or, LITTLETON), THOMAS (d. 1481), was a distinguished lawyer, appointed one of the judges of the Common Pleas from 1466 to 1481. He is famous chiefly for his "Treatise on Tenures."

The "Treatise on Tenures" was printed (in Norman-French) at Rouen, probably about 1481, and translated into English in 1638. It was edited by H. Roscoe, 1825. Coke's "Commentary," called "Coke upon Littleton, or the First Institute," appeared in 1628.

Macartney, GEORGE, EARL (1737-1806), after a distinguished diplomatic and political career, was sent out in 1775 as governor of the Caribbee Islands. In 1779 he was taken prisoner by Count d'Estaing, and sent to France until exchanged. From 1780 to 1785 he was governor of Madras, and in 1792 was sent to Peking as ambassador. In 1796 he was made governor of the Cape of Good Hope, where his first act was to attempt to check the aggression of the colonists by the proclamation of exact boundaries. During his tenure of this office (1796-8) he managed to restrain in a great degree the turbulence of the Boers.

Macaulay, THOMAS BABINGTON, LORD (1800-59), the historian, was the eldest son of Zachary Macaulay, an African merchant, and a leading mover in the agitation against the slave trade. He was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where, in 1824, he obtained a fellowship. He was called to the bar in 1826, and in 1830 entered parliament as member for Calne. He joined the Whigs and took a prominent part in the debates on the Reform Bill, making some brilliant speeches. Lord Grey appointed him secretary to the board of control. In 1834 he went to India as legal member of council, and assisted to draw up the Indian penal code. On his return he was appointed secretary at war (1839-41), and was paymaster of the forces from 1846 to 1848. In 1857 he was raised to the peerage, but his health would not allow him to take any further part in public affairs. He died December 28, 1859, and was buried in Westminster Abbey.

Macbeth, son of Finlay or Finel, Thane of Glamis, was mormaer of Ross and Moray, and the general of King Duncan against the Norwegians Thorfinn and Thorkell. In 1040 he went over to the enemy, slew Duncan, whether by treachery or in battle is uncertain, at Bothnagowan, near Elgin, and divided the kingdom with Thorfinn, taking to himself the districts south and west of the Tay, with the central district in which Seone is situated. It is somewhat difficult to separate the Macbeth of history from the Macbeth of Shakespeare and tradition, but he appears to have ruled Scotland well, and to have benefited the Church in no small degree. Although he had married Gruach, the granddaughter of Kenneth IV, Macbeth was always regarded as a usurper, and in 1045 we find Crinan, abbot of Dunkeld, making an unsuccessful effort to reinstate his grandchildren on the throne. In 1050 Macbeth made a journey to Rome, but on his return he was attacked by Siward, Earl of Northumbria, and defeated at Dunsinane in 1054. Siward succeeded in establishing Malcolm, son of Duncan, as king in the southern districts of Scotland. In 1057, on the death of his powerful ally Thorfinn, Macbeth was again attacked by Malcolm, and slain at Lumphanan. From this time hereditary, instead of collateral, succession became the rule in Scotland. The reign of Macbeth is shrouded in the mysteries of legend and romance. It must be remembered that the well-known stories of Banquo, the march of Birnam Wood, and the like, are mere inventions of the chroniclers.

Macdonald, FLORA (d. 1790), was a lady of South Uist, who is famous for the help she gave the Young Pretender, Charles Edward Stuart, in escaping after the battle of Culloden. She caused the prince to be dressed in woman's clothes, and to pass as her maidservant, and by her courage and resource succeeded in bringing him safely to the Isle of Skye, where he escaped to France. Flora Macdonald was arrested and imprisoned in the Tower till July 1747. She married a relation, also named Macdonald, and went with him to America, but subsequently returned to Scotland.

Biography by A. Macgregor, 1901.

MacDonald, JAMES RAMSAY (b. 1866), was born at Lossiemouth and educated at Drainie board school. As a journalist in London he became a Socialist, joined the Independent Labour Party in 1894, and unsuccessfully contested Southampton in 1895. In 1899 he became secretary of the Labour Representation Committee established as a result of the Trade Union Congress of that year, and in 1906, when the committee succeeded in returning 29 members to parliament, he became member for Leicester, and in 1911 leader of his party. On the outbreak of the Great War in 1914 he dissented from the government view that there was an "obligation of honour" to declare war. This attitude brought him into great unpopularity. He was out of parliament during the years 1918-22. But in 1922 he became leader of the opposition at the head of 140 Labour members, and on January 22, 1924, he formed the first Labour ministry in British history, himself taking the posts of prime minister and foreign secretary. The problem of the Ruhr he mitigated by the London Settlement of August 16 dealing with reparations, and he contributed (with M. Herriot, the prime minister of France) the Geneva Protocol (q.v.) of September towards the cause of disarmament and security. Simultaneously he dealt with the problems of unemployment and housing, and improved the relations existing between Great Britain and Russia by recognizing the Soviet Republics. But in October 1924 his ministry was defeated on its Russian policy after nine months of office, and resigned.

Macdonald, JOHN, 4th and last LORD OF THE ISLES, and 11th EARL OF ROSS (d. 1498), took up arms against the king (James II) in 1453 to avenge the murder of Douglas and his own private wrongs. He was defeated at Strathfleet and came to terms with James. He fought on the Scottish side at the siege of Roxburgh (1460), for which service he was appointed a warden of the Marches. In 1462, however, he entered into a treaty with Edward IV of England and declared himself King of the Hebrides. He remained unmolested until 1475, when, on the news of his dealings with England becoming known, he was attainted and his estate was declared forfeit. Next year, however, John made his submission. His former earldom of Ross was vested in the Crown, but the bulk of his lands were restored and he was created a lord of parliament as John de Isla, Lord of the Isles. An attempt of his natural son Alexander to recover Ross again brought John into disgrace, but in 1494 he once more submitted and lived in peaceful retirement till his death.

Macdonald of the Isles, ALEXANDER (d. 1449), was one of the rebellious Highland chieftains summoned by James I to appear at Inverness in 1427. He was there thrown into prison, but, having made his submission, was released in 1429. His first act was to burn Inverness, and to invade Lochaber, where, however, he was defeated and compelled to surrender. He was imprisoned at Tantallon Castle; but was later pardoned, and thenceforward remained loyal.

Macdonnell, ALEXANDER, 3RD EARL OF ANTRIM (1615-99), was a Roman Catholic, and an active supporter in Ireland of James II after the Revolution. He was sent with 1,200 men to occupy Londonderry, but the inhabitants shut the gates in his face, and he thought it prudent to retire to Coleraine. At the battle of the Boyne his cavalry fled without striking a blow. He was attainted of high treason, but was subsequently included in the provisions of the Treaty of Limerick (q.v.), and his honours and estates were restored to him.

Macdonnell, RANDAL, MARQUIS OF ANTRIM (d. 1683), was employed in 1641 to gain over the Irish army, and he greatly ingratiated himself with the Catholics. Though a Catholic and a Cavalier, he was eager to fight the Ulster rebels, and offered his aid to Monro, who, however, treacherously seized him, and kept him a prisoner for eight months, when he escaped, joined Owen O'Neill, and became one of the Kilkenny Council, pretending that he would bring 10,000 men over to England. The 1,500 men under Kolkitto who joined Montrose in 1644 were sent by him. Clarendon says of him that he was a narrow-minded and vain man, and aspired to supplant Ormonde as a commander, though wholly unfit for the post.

Clarendon, "History of the Rebellion," 1702-4.

MacGregor, ROBERT (1671-1734), better known as Rob Roy, was at first a grazier, but entering upon large speculations in cattle-breeding had ill-luck, and finally absconded in 1711 with money borrowed from the Duke of Montrose, who thereupon seized his small estate. Rob Roy gained the patronage of the Duke of Argyll, and proceeded to wage a predatory warfare against Montrose, and also against all who favoured the union with England. He took part in the rising of 1715 and was attainted, but evaded capture. He submitted to General Wade in 1722, and spent some time in Newgate, until pardoned in 1727 on the eve of being transported to Barbados.

Macheth, MALCOLM, son of Angus, Earl of Moray, maintained his father's cause after the battle of Stracathro, causing great trouble to King David, who, however, at length took him prisoner (1137), and confined him in the castle of Roxburgh. He was finally liberated by Malcolm IV (1157), after twenty-three years of captivity.

Mackay, GENERAL HUGH (1640-92), of Scourie, in Sutherlandshire, having served abroad for thirty years, was sent by William III to Scotland in 1689, where he endeavoured to bring Claverhouse to bay, fixing his headquarters at Inverness. For some time he was unsuccessful, but at length forced an engagement at Killiecrankie (q.v.—July 27, 1689), where, although he suffered defeat, he had a more than counterbalancing gain in the death of his great opponent. The following year Mackay built Fort William (q.v.). He then went to Ireland, where he served under Ginkel (q.v.), and was present at Aghrim. He was killed at the battle of Steinkirk, July 24, 1692.

Biography by J. Mackay, 1836.

Mackintosh, SIR JAMES (1765-1832), was born at Aldourie, Inverness-shire, and educated at King's College, Aberdeen. He became a member of the Royal Medical Society and also of the Speculative Society. In 1789 he published a pamphlet on the Regency question, in which he supported the views of the Whigs. In 1791 he became known to the world as the antagonist of Burke in his "Vindiciæ Gallicæ." The talent he displayed made him many illustrious friends in the opposition, but he was soon converted by Burke himself. In 1795 he was called to the bar. In 1803 he defended the French journalist Peltier. He held for some time the appointment of professor of General Polity and of Law in the East India College at Haileybury and the office of recorder of Bombay. He was knighted in 1803. He returned in 1811, and was elected member for Nairn (1813), and Knaresborough (1818). He devoted himself during his parliamentary career to the improvement of the penal code.

M'Leod Affair, THE (1841). During the Canadian rebellion an American steamer called the Caroline, which had been engaged in carrying arms to the rebels, was boarded in the night by a party of loyalists, set on fire, and driven over the Falls of Niagara. She was lying at that time within the territorial jurisdiction of the State of New York, and an American citizen lost his life in the struggle. The matter caused some excitement in the United States; and in January 1841 Alexander M'Leod, a British subject, was arrested in the State of New York on a charge of murder, for being concerned in the attack on the Caroline. The British government at once demanded his release, asserting that he was acting under and within his orders, and that in consequence the responsibility rested solely with them. The United States government replied that they could not interfere with the internal affairs of the State of New York. Palmerston retorted that the execution of M'Leod would be followed by war. M'Leod was tried at Utica in October, and was declared not guilty. This was a simple solution of what seemed likely to prove a very disastrous affair.

Macnaghten, SIR WILLIAM HAY (1793–1841), was for several years a member of the Madras army before he entered the Bengal civil service in 1814. He gained great distinction at the college of Fort William, and in the judicial branch of the service. He entered the political department during the administration of Lord William Bentinck, and in 1837 was secretary to Lord Auckland. In 1838 he was sent to Lahore to negotiate the triple alliance with Ranjit Singh (q.v.). He accompanied the Afghan expedition as political envoy. On December 23, 1841, he was assassinated at Kabul by Mohammed Akbar Khan.

Macquarie, COLONEL LACHLAN (d. 1824), was sent out as governor of New South Wales in 1809. By his amelioration of the condition of the discharged convicts he did much to develop the colony, whilst his employment of convict labour in the construction of roads had the effect of opening out the country to an extent hitherto unknown. On his return to England in 1822 he left New South Wales "four times as populous and twenty times as large as when he went out."

Marion Phillips, "A Colonial Autocracy: New South Wales Under Governor Macquarie, 1810–21," 1909.

Mad Parliament. [HENRY III.]

Madras was granted to the English as a site for a trading factory, with a small adjacent factory, by the Raja of Bijnagar, in 1639. A fort, called Fort St. George, was erected here. In 1654 it was created a presidency. It speedily grew in importance, and became almost the largest trading station of the English in India. In 1702 the fort was strong enough to hold out successfully against the besieging army of the Emperor Aurungzeb. In 1746, however, it was captured by the French general, La Bourdonnais (September 1), and remained in the hands of the French till restored to the British by the Peace of Aix-la-Chapelle (1748). In the Seven Years' War it was besieged (December, 1758) by Lally, till relieved by Admiral Pococke (February 1759). In 1769 and 1780 it was threatened, though not actually attacked, by Hyder Ali. In 1809 a mutiny of the officers took place. In 1817 the town was besieged by the Pindaris. In 1833 a bishopric was established there.

W. Foster, "Founding of Fort St. George," 1902; H. Dodwell, "Nabobs of Madras," 1926.

Madras Mutiny, THE (1809), was a serious disturbance among the European officers of the East India Company's army. The retrenching theories of the directors induced them to reduce some of the perquisites of the officers. The whole army mutinied. One hundred and fifty-eight officers signed an address to government demanding the repeal of the obnoxious order and the restoration of the officers. Supported by the new commander-in-chief and the king's regiments, Sir George Barlow appealed to the sepoys against their officers. This was done so successfully that only in Seringapatam was there any disturbance, where 150 native troops were killed and wounded. Lord Minto succeeded in conciliating the disaffected officers.

Magasætas (or HECANAS), THE, were a group of Anglian settlers occupying an area rather larger than the present county of Hereford. The region was apparently annexed by Wulfhere of Mercia in the latter half of the seventh century. It was, a little later, given a bishop of its own.

Magdalen College, OXFORD, CASE OF (1687–8), was one of the causes leading to the downfall of James II. In 1687 the presidency of Magdalen College fell vacant, when James II issued a letter ordering the election of one Anthony Farmer, a Roman Catholic, as president. Farmer was not only disqualified technically from holding the appointment, but was a man of notoriously immoral life and bad reputation. In spite of the royal injunction, the fellows elected one of their number, Dr. Hough, to the presidency, whereupon they were cited before the Ecclesiastical Commission. The proofs of Farmer's disgraceful conduct were indisputable, and the commission cancelled his nomination; but James insisted on the election of Parker, Bishop of Oxford, another Catholic, to the presidency. Again the fellows refused, and for this all except two, who yielded to the king's wishes, were suspended and eventually deprived of their fellowships. On the death of Parker, early in 1688, James gave the presidency to Bonaventura Giffard, one of the vicars apostolic sent to England by the pope, and the college was transformed into a Catholic seminary. But by the end of the year James, being anxious to conciliate his subjects, restored the ejected fellows, and accepted Hough as president.

Magedauc, THE BATTLE OF (750), was a victory for the Britons of Strathclyde over the Picts. Magedauc is Mugdoch, in Dumbartonshire.

Magna Carta. The Charter that is called Great, to mark its prominent value among the charters granted by the Norman and Angevin kings, was "given under our hand," that is, sealed by King John with the royal seal, on June 15, 1215. It has been variously described as a formally enacted law, a treaty, the royal answer to a petition, and a declaration of rights. Its precise juridical nature is, in point of fact, difficult to determine. It was the result of a bargain between the Crown and the rebel magnates, and took when committed to writing the form natural to the age—viz., that of a charter duly authenticated by the seal of the grantor. W. S. McKechnie has described it as "a treaty or contract which enacts or proclaims a number of rules and customs as binding in England, and reduces them to writing in the unsuitable form of a feudal charter granted by King John to the freemen of England and their heirs." But it had to undergo several changes before reaching a final form. As originally granted, it contained sixty-three clauses, which, among other provisions, set limits to the usuries of the Jews, pledged the king to raise no scutage or aid save through the "common council" of the realm ("per commune consilium regni"), or on the three ordinary feudal occasions, prescribed the forms of summoning this council, forbade any increase of the customary farms, empowered everyone to go away from and come back to the realm unhindered, mitigated the oppressiveness of the Forest Laws, and banished the royal mercenaries. When first confirmed, in 1216, by the Earl of Pembroke, for the boy-king Henry III, it had lost all these and some other concessions; and thus its clauses were abridged to forty-two. At its second confirmation, made in 1217, these forty-two had grown to forty-seven, one of which settled the times of holding the county court and view of frankpledge, while another restricted grants in mortmain. The fifth confirmation, made in 1225, reduced the clauses once more, to thirty-seven this time, and these proved the final and accepted legal version. Even in this form it is a sufficiently comprehensive document. To the Church it guaranteed the freedom that mainly meant liberty to choose its prelates; to tenants-in-chief relief from the oppressive enforcement of feudal obligations; from disparagement of heirs and spoliation of widows; to mesne tenants it promised in general terms similar securities against mesne lords; to London and other cities and towns all their ancient franchises; to merchants full licence to go about buying and selling from, to, or through England unfleeced; to villeins that their wainage should not be distrained to pay fines; to the collective community that Common Pleas should be held in a fixed place; that fines should be assessed on oath, by upright men of the venue, and be proportioned to the offence; that weights and measures should be uniform, and that the sheriffs should be curbed in the exercise of their manifold authority. But the most famous clauses of the Charter are those which assure to every freeman in his person and property security from every kind of damaging process, "save through the lawful judgment of his peers or the law of the land," and pledge the king not to sell, refuse, or postpone the doing of justice to anyone. The later confirmations are almost beyond reckoning; fifteen are found in Edward III's reign alone. Never has law been held in higher esteem; the very day that Charles II entered London as a restored king, the Commons asked him to confirm the Charter. The extrinsic importance of Magna Carta is, however, greater than its intrinsic importance. The unhistorical view which made it the source of our modern liberties, the foundation of the principle of "no taxation without representation," and of trial by jury, and which saw in it a great national achievement, has in recent years been much discredited. It has been pointed out that Magna Carta was in origin and in essence a feudal document, concerned primarily with the rights and privileges of the feudal classes, and that it is the foundation of our liberties only in the sense that it marked the first successful limitation of the royal authority and supplied for posterity a symbol of the triumph of "lex" over "rex." The Magna Carta of popular legend was, it may be said, as much an invention of the seventeenth-century lawyers as was the "feudal system."

Magnus Maximus, a Spanish officer who had seen much service in Britain, rebelled in 383 against Gratian, and was proclaimed emperor by the legionaries. He established his power in Britain, Gaul, and Spain, and in 387 invaded Italy with an army largely composed of British troops. He expelled the new emperor, Valentinian, but in 388 he was himself defeated and slain by Theodosius.

Maharajpur, THE BATTLE OF (December 29, 1843), took place during the Gwalior War. The impossibility of restoring order to the Gwalior state belonging to Sindhia, except by an appeal to arms, determined Lord Ellenborough to dispatch an army to effect this. On December 20 the army under Sir Hugh Gough advanced on Gwalior. Sindhia's troops had taken up a strong position, and during the night seven battalions of infantry entrenched themselves with 20 guns of heavy calibre in the village of Maharajpur. The discharge of the masked batteries gave the first notice to Gough of the proximity of Sindhia's army. The heavy guns had been left behind, and so the British commander at once launched his troops on the Mahratta batteries, which were served till all the gunners were shot down at their posts. After the guns were captured, the infantry maintained their ground with great determination, and the victory was not gained till 1,000 British fell, killed and wounded.

Mahratta Ditch, THE, was an entrenchment cut around Calcutta in 1742, on the occasion of a Mahratta invasion of Bengal. The work was suspended, however, on the withdrawal of the invaders.

Mahrattas, THE, consisted of several tribes of Hindu mountaineers whose origin and early history are obscure. They were brought into prominence towards the end of the seventeenth century by the chief Sivaji, who took advantage of the weakness of the Moguls, and the wars of Aurungzeb, to extend his dominions. Plundering hordes sallied forth from Satara in every direction, until the whole surface of India was studded with their possessions. The break-up of the Mogul empire enabled them to extend their dominions from Delhi in the north to the Tumbuddra, and from the Bay of Bengal to Gujarat on the west. During the reigns of Sivaji's weak successors all authority was usurped by the principal officers of state. Two powerful kingdoms were formed, the one under the Peshwa, or prime minister, whose capital was at Poona, and the other under the commander-in-chief, who fixed his capital at Nagpur, and was known as the Raja of Berar. The authority of the Raja of Satara became merely nominal, and all power resided in the Peshwa, who became head of the Mahratta Confederacy. A herdsman founded a sovereignty in Gujarat, fixing his court at Baroda, and was known by the title of the Gaekwar. Another band sallying south founded the state of Tanjore; all these chieftains, including the Raja of Berar, or the Bhonslah, acknowledged the supremacy of the Peshwa, and marched to battle under his standard. This ill-cemented confederacy tended to split up owing to the weakness of successive peshwas and the rise of other chieftains, such as Sindhia and Holkar, who waged almost independent wars in Rajputana and Malwa. This disintegrating tendency was shown at the Peace of Salbhye, when Mahdaji Sindhia assumed an almost independent position as mediator between the Poona state and the British government. The confederacy, however, still held together, and in 1795, for the last time, the whole Mahratta army assembled under the banner of the Peshwa, to crush the Nizam. The civil wars and disturbances which attended the accession of Baji Rao II, and the rivalry between the various chiefs, especially Dowlat Rao Sindhia, and Jeswunt Rao Holkar, caused the total break-up of the confederacy by the Treaty of Bassein. The result of the wars which followed was to reduce the Peshwa to the position of a dependent on the British government, and to establish Sindhia, Holkar, and the Raja of Berar as independent sovereigns. Tanjore had already fallen to the British, and the Gaekwar was bound by a defensive alliance to the conquerors of India. The dissatisfaction of the Peshwa at his dependent state, and his attempts to recover independence, in which he was aided by the Raja of Berar, Appa Sahib, caused the deposition of the former, the annexation of his territories, and the final dissolution of the Mahratta Confederacy (1818).

The chief members of the Mahratta Confederacy were:

The Raja of Satara, the descendant of Sivaji. The authority of this prince, long obsolete, was revived in 1819. This reorganization was dangerous as supplying a fresh nucleus for Mahratta intrigue. In 1839 it was discovered that the raja was in correspondence with Portuguese and other enemies of the British government with the object of exciting a confederacy against his benefactors. Lord Auckland deposed him and elevated his brother to the throne on the same conditions of dependence. The latter governed the country with great vigour and beneficence for ten years. As he left no legitimate heirs and had not obtained the consent of the British to adopt a son, Lord Dalhousie held that the Satara state had now fairly lapsed to the company. It was therefore annexed (1848).

The Peshwa, resident at Poona; ruling in Poona, Khandeish, the Konkan, and Gujarat, with a nominal supremacy over the whole confederation. His territory and power were greatly diminished by the Treaty of Bassein, and the rise of the other chieftains. His dominions were finally annexed by the treaties of 1817 and 1818.

The Raja of Berar, resident at Nagpur; ruling what now constitutes the Central Provinces. The Berar state was annexed in 1853 on the same principle as the annexation of Satara.

The Raja of Tanjore, ruling at Tanjore. [TANJORE.]

The Gaekwar, ruling at Baroda. [GAEKWAR.]

Sindhia, ruling at Gwalior. [SINDHIA.]

Holkar, ruling at Indore. [HOLKAR.]

The Raja of Bundelkhand. In 1786 two Mahratta chiefs had established an insecure throne in Bundelkhand. In 1803 the Peshwa Baji Rao, as head of the Mahratta state, ceded his claims on Bundelkhand to the British. The province was definitely annexed, and in 1817 the Peshwa formally gave up all claims on it.

The Raja of Kolhapur was the possessor of a jaghire in the Poona state.

Maintenance is defined in the law books as "the act of assisting the plaintiff in any legal proceeding in which the person giving the assistance has no valuable interest, or in which he acts from an improper motive"; or, less technically, it is simply "interference with the due course of justice." It was often found easier in the England of the Middle Ages for a man to have recourse to some powerful neighbour who would "maintain" his cause, than to seek, on his own motion, for the expensive, uncertain, and cumbrous remedies of the law courts. In return for help, which might be warrantable, but which was more commonly a gross perversion of the course of justice, the person assisted became the dependent or client of the baron who supported him. In other cases, lawyers were guilty of similar acts of "maintenance." Allied with maintenance was the custom of giving livery, which, besides its more direct political result in exciting and stimulating dynastic factions, was commonly resorted to as giving a colourable excuse for maintenance. In conjunction the customs of livery and maintenance produced a "chronic organized anarchy, striking at all law and government whatsoever." Associations were formed to maintain the suits of their members. Great lords conferred with lavish profusion their liveries on all who would wear them, and regarded it as a point of honour to "maintain" the causes of their clients. A long series of statutes and proclamations were directed against these evils, but to very little purpose. By the Statute of Westminster the First it was ordered that no sheriff or officer of justice should maintain parties in quarrels. Two other enactments of Edward I's reign, in 1285 and 1305, were to the same effect. In 1327 and 1346 stronger measures, which in themselves were evidences of the development of the custom, were passed. By forbidding the return to parliament of maintainers of false suits, an indirect but effectual blow was aimed against the practice. But maintenance was never more flagrant than when Alice Perrers, the mistress of Edward III's dotage, took her seat in the courts of law to maintain the causes of her friends, or when John of Gaunt and Percy "maintained" Wyclif when attacked for heresy by the Bishop of London. A series of statutes in the reign of Richard II had little effect, and maintenance flourished during the weak government of the fifteenth century. Meanwhile the practice of livery had increased also, and the importance laid on heraldry during the later Middle Ages largely brought this about. During the period 1377-1468 a long series of acts of parliament limited the right of nobles to confer liveries as well as strengthened the laws against maintenance. But their weakness for good lay in the fact that there was no efficient court to carry them out, since the law courts were themselves brought into contempt by the custom of maintenance. A famous act of Henry VII (the Statute of Livery and Maintenance, 3 Hen. VII, c. 1) remedied this defect of previous legislation by constituting a court of royal officials, who were by their position free from the fear of violence and corruption that beset the assizes. This measure, in conjunction with the stricter government of the Tudors, soon brought an end to maintenance. An act of Henry VIII passed in 1540 was indeed directed against maintenance, but its provisions show that fraud, not force, was the means then sought to pervert the course of justice; and the offence of maintenance in subsequent periods has consisted of fraudulent rather than forcible attempts to interfere with the due course of justice.

Maitland, SIR JOHN (1545 ?-95), brother of Maitland of Lethington, was made lord privy seal (1567), though in 1571 he was deprived of his office by act of parliament for favouring the queen. In 1584 James VI made him secretary of state, and in 1587 chancellor. He was a great enemy of the 2nd Earl of Bothwell, who in 1591 attacked Holyrood House with a view to seizing him. In 1589 he accompanied James to Norway to fetch his bride, Anne of Denmark, and in 1590 was created Lord Maitland of Thirlestean.

Maitland, JOHN, DUKE OF LAUDERDALE (1616-82), born at Lethington, took part with the Covenanters against the king, became one of the Scottish representatives in the Westminster Assembly, and commanded a Scottish infantry regiment at the battle of Marston Moor. In December 1647 he was one of the Scottish commissioners who signed the secret treaty with the king at Carisbrooke, and took up arms with Hamilton and the Engagers. Obligated to fly from Scotland when Argyll regained power, he returned with Charles II in 1650, was taken prisoner at the battle of Worcester, and remained in confinement till March 1660, when he was rewarded for his services by being made secretary of state for Scotland. He opposed the re-establishment of Episcopalianism in that country, and by his skilful intrigues finally succeeded in overthrowing his rival Middleton (1663). From this moment he was virtually governor of Scotland, which he ruled through Lord Rothes and Archbishop Sharpe. "His great experience in affairs," says Burnet, "his ready compliance with everything that he thought would please the king, and his bold offering at the most desperate counsels, gained him such an interest with the king, that no attempt against him, nor complaint of him, could ever shake it, till a decay of strength and understanding forced him to let go his hold. He was in his principles much against popery and arbitrary government, and yet, by a fatal train of passions and interests, he made way for the former, and had almost established the latter. Whereas some by a smooth deportment made the first beginnings of tyranny less discernible and unacceptable, he by the fury of his behaviour heightened the severity of his ministry, which was liker the cruelty of an inquisition than the legality of justice." His great object was to exalt the power of the Crown, and though he did not scruple to use the greatest severity against the zealous Presbyterians of the north and the south-west, he aimed at preventing the Episcopalians from becoming too strong, and maintaining for the king the preponderance over both parties. He instigated the decree of 1669, by which a large number of expelled Presbyterian ministers were reinstated. He obtained for the king from the parliament of 1669 the fullest possible recognition of the royal supremacy, and the control of the militia. In England he exercised a great influence as a member of the privy council, and was one of the persons to whom the king's Treaty of Dover against Holland was confided (1670). He was credited with advising the king to use the forces of Scotland against the English parliament, which, with other causes, led the Commons to demand his removal from the king's service (1674). The king created him Duke of Lauderdale in the Scottish and Earl of Guildford in the English peerage (1672). In spite of all attacks he retained his power until the Scottish insurrection of 1679. According to Burnet, "the king found his memory failing him, and so he resolved to let him fall gently, and bring all the Scotch affairs into the Duke of Monmouth's hands." He died on August 20 or 24, 1682.

Maitland, WILLIAM, OF LETHINGTON (1528 ?-73), eldest son of Sir Richard Maitland, well known as an able and inscrutable politician at an early age, for some years played an almost continuous part in the history of Scottish politics, and in 1558 was appointed secretary of state to Queen Mary, who continually employed him as her envoy to the English court. He played a prominent part in the Treaty of Edinburgh (q.v.—1560). Although he joined the Lords of Congregation, he was nevertheless in favour of extending toleration to the queen as to her religion. In 1565 he supported the marriage with Darnley, but a year later persuaded the queen to sue for a divorce. After Darnley's murder he accompanied Mary to Seton in Haddingtonshire, but deserted her on symptoms of danger appearing in 1567, and joined the Confederate Lords on Mary's captivity in England. However, he openly joined her party, and in 1569 was arrested and sent to Edinburgh as one of Darnley's murderers, but was acquitted, and resumed his office of secretary of state, and remained faithful to Mary until the surrender of Edinburgh Castle placed him in the hands of his enemies. He is alleged to have poisoned himself, June 1573. His policy was characterized by a craft and depth that made him no bad match for the astute Cecil, but his whole course of action is steeped in mystery as to its motive and its end.

Major-Generals (or MAJORS-GENERAL). In 1655, after the disagreement with his first parliament, and the rising under Penruddock, Cromwell devised the plan of dividing England into military districts, to be governed each by a major-general, responsible only to the protector and council. The major-generals were entrusted with the command of the militia, with the duties of putting down all attempted insurrections, carrying out the protector's police regulations, and raising the 10 per cent. income tax imposed on Royalists. The first appointed was Desborough, in May 1655, for the six south-western counties; but the whole organization was officially announced in October. Including Wales, there were, in all, twelve districts. When Cromwell's second parliament met, after a vigorous defence of his "poor little invention," he was obliged to abandon it. The House of Commons, on January 29, 1657, rejected, by 121 to 78, the second reading of a "bill for the continuing and assessing of a tax for the paying and maintaining of the Militia forces in England and Wales," and thus deprived the protector of the machinery by which the system of major-generals was maintained. The period of rule by the major-generals has been regarded as the most frankly militarist of the Cromwellian regime. Oliver's apologists have, however, pointed out that the breakdown of the traditional scheme of local government necessitated some measure of reconstruction, and that the appointment of the major-generals was only a first step towards the creation of such a new system of local administration.

Malacca. [MALAYA, BRITISH.]

Malaun, THE SIEGE OF (April 15, 1815), occurred during the Gurkha War. General Ochterlony succeeded in confining Amir Singh, the Gurkha general, to the fort of Malaun, which was situated on a mountain ridge. On April 16 a sally was made upon the British works, but the Gurkhas were obliged to retire, with the loss of 500 men. The majority of them soon deserted to the British. When the British batteries were about to open, Amir Singh felt unwilling to sacrifice in a forlorn conflict the lives of the men who had adhered to him, and accepted the terms offered, thus ceding the whole of the conquests which the Nepalese had made west of the Kali. Ochterlony allowed him to march out with his arms, colours, and personal property. [GURKHA WAR.]

Malaya, British, consists of the Straits Settlements, the Federated Malay States, the Non-Federated Malay States and the Protected State of Johore.

STRAITS SETTLEMENTS, THE, consist of the island of Singapore with its dependencies of Penang, Malacca, the Cocos or Keeling Islands, Christmas Island, and Labuan, governed by a governor, an executive council of ten, and a nominated legislative council of twenty-six, half of whom are unofficial. Singapore was occupied in 1819, ceded in 1824, and is now a free port. Labuan was ceded by the sultan of Brunei in 1846. Malacca was occupied by the Portuguese from 1511 until they were expelled by the Dutch in 1640. It was captured by the British in 1795 and restored in 1818, but changed hands again in 1829, British possessions in Sumatra being given to the Dutch in exchange.

FEDERATED MALAY STATES are controlled under treaty (1895) by Great Britain, viz. Perak, Selangor, Negri Sembilan, and Pehang. They are ruled by native rulers who use European officers for their police. The other Malay States of Kedah, Perlis, Kelantan, and Trengganu virtually surrendered their sovereignty in 1909, when, by the Anglo-Siamese Treaty, Great Britain became suzerain and protector and was given administration and control. Johore has been ruled by the sultan, acting on the advice of the British resident, since 1885.

Malcolm I, KING OF SCOTLAND (943-54). son of Donald, succeeded to the throne of Alban on the resignation of Constantine II (943). One of his first acts was to attack and slay Cellach, the provincial King of Moray. In 945 Edmund of England made over to him the province of Cumberland, on condition that he should "be his fellow-worker both by land and sea," a compact which was renewed by Edmund's successor, Edred. Whether this transaction implied that Malcolm became the vassal of the West Saxon king is a controversial question. In 949, however, Malcolm, having broken the condition, ravaged Northumbria as far as the Tees. He was slain (954), perhaps at Alwin, near Forres, by the men of Moray, or at Fetteresso, by the men of the Mearns.

Malcolm II, KING OF SCOTLAND (1005-1034), son of Kenneth II, came to the throne of Scotland as the successor of Kenneth III (1005), and at once attacked Northumbria, besieging Durham with a large army. He was, however, defeated by Uchtred, son-in-law of Aldun, Bishop of Durham. Unsuccessful in his attempts to wrest Caithness from the Norwegian earls, he concluded an alliance with Sigurd, Earl of Orkney, in 1008, giving him his daughter in marriage. Their son, Thorfinn, he made Earl of Sutherland and Caithness (1014). In 1018 Malcolm retrieved his former defeat by a brilliant victory at Carham over Eadulf, brother of Earl Uchtred, who was forced to cede Lothian to the Scottish king as the price of peace. In 1031 Malcolm submitted to Canute and became "his man," in return for his confirmation in possession of Lothian. He died in 1034. In him the direct male line of Kenneth MacAlpin came to an end. During his reign Strathclyde finally became part of the Scottish kingdom. Malcolm was the first king to be called King of Scotia. Under him the union of the four kingdoms—of the Picts, of Strathclyde, of Dalriada, and of Bernicia—was completed, and modern Scotland came into being.

Malcolm III, KING OF SCOTLAND (1057-1093), surnamed Canmore (Great Head), was the eldest son of King Duncan, slain by Macbeth in 1040. On their father's death, Malcolm and his brother Donaldbane, who were mere infants, found refuge in England. In 1054 Malcolm secured the aid of Earl Siward of Northumbria, who defeated Macbeth near Dunsinane, and on his death, of Tostig, son of Earl Godwin. The cause of the young prince was also espoused by Edward the Confessor, with the result that Macbeth was slain at Lumphanan (1057), and that Malcolm obtained undisputed possession of the throne a few months later, being crowned at Scone (April 25, 1058). In 1061 the king broke his alliance with Tostig, and ravaged Northumbria, but became reconciled to him, and gave him shelter on his defeat by Morcar (1065). About 1068 Edgar the Atheling, his mother and two sisters, with a number of Saxon exiles, took refuge at the Scottish court, and were well received by Malcolm, out of gratitude for the aid formerly received from the Confessor. Shortly afterwards the Scottish king married Margaret, Edgar's sister, as his second wife (his first having been Ingibiorga, widow of Thorfinn of Caithness), a marriage which, in conjunction with the asylum granted to Saxon refugees, had a most important effect in improving the condition of the country, by promoting both civilization and education. Malcolm, in 1070, bound by his alliance with Edgar, harried the northern districts of England, upon which William retaliated by penetrating as far as Fife, in 1072, where, at Abernethy, the Scottish king swore fealty to him, and surrendered his son Duncan as a hostage, receiving in return the grant of certain lands in England. These obligations, however, sat but lightly on Malcolm. In 1079, during William's absence in Normandy, Malcolm ravaged England as far as the Tyne, drawing down by this act a fruitless invasion of Scotland by Robert in the following year. In 1091 Malcolm again espoused the cause of Edgar the Atheling, and invaded England, meeting William Rufus in Lothian; here, however, a peace was concluded by the exertions of Robert and Edgar, Malcolm renewing the conditions of Abernethy (1092). Next year Rufus reduced Cumberland, and re fortified Carlisle to guard the west end of the border as Newcastle guarded the east end. Malcolm protested against this action, and in August 1093 was summoned to Gloucester; but was there treated with so much arrogance by William that he asserted his independence and hurried back to Scotland, where he collected an army with which he invaded England. He was surprised on the banks of the Alne, near Alnwick Castle, and slain by the hand of Morel of Bamburgh (November 13, 1093), and buried at Tynemouth. His son Edward perished at the same time. Malcolm had six sons and two daughters, the elder of whom, Maud, married Henry I of England; the younger, Mary, Eustace, Count of Boulogne. The reign of Malcolm, from its effects in civilizing and consolidating Scotland, forms a most important epoch in the history of that country; but many of its consequences must be ascribed to the direct and subtle influence of the king's strong, saintly Saxon wife.

Malcolm IV ("the Maiden"), KING OF SCOTLAND (1153-65), son of Prince Henry and Ada de Warenne, succeeded his grandfather, David I (1153). A few months after his succession a revolt occurred under the leadership of Somerled of Argyll and Donald, son of Malcolm MacHeth, which lasted for three years. In 1156 Malcolm was forced to surrender to his cousin, Henry II of England, the counties of Northumberland and Cumberland, although he was granted the earldom of Huntingdon, for which he performed homage at Chester. Malcolm attended Henry in France, on the Toulouse expedition, 1159. This recognition of his vassal-dom seems to have provoked a rising in Scotland against him in 1160, but Malcolm successfully quelled it. He also subjected Galloway and Moray in the same year. In 1164 Malcolm defeated and slew Somerled, who was invading his territory. He died at Jedburgh at the early age of twenty-four (December 1165). The permanent absorption of turbulent Galloway gives to Malcolm's reign its chief importance.

Malcolm, natural son of Alexander I, conceived the idea of making himself king of the country north of the Forth and Clyde, in place of David I. In this project he was aided by Angus of Moray. He was, however, defeated in 1130, and finally reduced to subjection (1134).

Malcolm, SIR JOHN (1769-1833), was born at Burnfoot, in Dumfriesshire. In 1783 he went to India as a cadet. He served during the second Mysore War and was appointed Persian interpreter in the camp of the Nizam. In 1798 he became assistant to the resident at Hyderabad. He served during the third Mysore War, and at its termination was appointed secretary to the commission which was to arrange the settlement of Mysore. When the commission had done its work Malcolm was sent to the Persian court (1799), where he successfully concluded a treaty of alliance against the French. He acted as private secretary to Lord Wellesley in 1801-2 and as political agent in Lord Lake's camp during the Holkar War, and negotiated the Treaty of Raipur Ghaut (1806) (q.v.). In 1807 he returned to Mysore, to act as resident. In 1808 he was dispatched on a second mission to Persia, in which he was totally unsuccessful; but in 1810, on his third visit, he was well received. In 1811 his "History of Persia" was published. He was present as Madras political agent and general during the Mahratta War (1817-18). He fought with great courage at Mehidpur, and negotiated the treaties with Holkar and Baji Rao. He was prominent in the settlement of Central India (1818-19), and was appointed political agent. In 1822 he returned to England and was created G.C.B. In 1827 he returned to India as governor of Bombay till 1830. He died in 1833.

Maldon, THE BATTLE OF (991), was fought between the English, under Brihtnoth, alderman of Essex, and the Danes, led by Guthmund, and Olaf Tryggvason. The invaders were boldly resisted, but proved victorious, and Brihtnoth and a large number of the English fell. This battle owes prominence in English history to the grand song which was written in commemoration of it.

The story of Maldon may be read in Sweet's "Anglo-Saxon Reader." A translation by W. P. Ker is given in R. W. Chambers, "England Before the Norman Conquest," 1926.

Maletote, or MALATOLTA, meaning literally "an evil tax," was the term generally applied to the levies upon wool arbitrarily imposed by Edward I and other kings, notably Edward III. It was renounced by Art. vii of the Confirmatio Cartarum (q.v.) of Edward I (1297), but was revived again during the early years of the Hundred Years' War. After a protracted conflict between king and parliament the practice was condemned by statute in 1340, and the prohibition was renewed in 1348, 1362, and 1371.

"Malignants," THE, was the name used by the Parliament to describe the king's evil advisers. It occurs frequently in the Grand Remonstrance (q.v.—1640). "All the fault is laid upon ill ministers, who are there called a malignant party" (May). The Commons began by saying that for the previous twelve months they had laboured to reform the evils which afflicted the kingdom, and "do yet find an abounding malignity and opposition in those parties and factions, who have been the cause of those evils." They went on to say that "the root of all this mischief" was "a malignant and pernicious design of subverting the fundamental laws and principles of government, upon which the religion and justice of this kingdom are firmly established." Strafford and Laud were the heads of this "malignant party," who were "the actors and promoters of all our misery." This party the Commons declared to be still in existence, thwarting the work of reformation and sowing discord between king and parliament, and between parliament and people. The name came to be applied afterwards to all who supported the king against the Parliament. The lord mayor of London, Sir Richard Gurney, says Clarendon, "grew to be reckoned in the first form of the malignants, which was the term they imposed upon all those they meant to render odious to the people."

Malplaquet, THE BATTLE OF (September 11, 1709), was fought during the War of the Spanish Succession, between the British and the troops of the Empire, under the Duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene, and the French, under Marshal Villars. The battle was the most bloody and obstinately contested of the whole war. The French fought with a determination such as they had not shown in the earlier battles, and their desperate resistance made the conflict a slaughter. Twelve thousand of the French were slain, and not fewer than 20,000 of the allies fell. The object of Marlborough and Eugene was gained, however, and the strong town of Mons was forced to surrender.

Malsnechtan, "King of Moray," was the son of Lulach (q.v.). In 1077 he rebelled against, and was defeated by, Malcolm Canmore. He died in 1085, having obtained a partial independence.

Malta, the largest of the Maltese Islands, is a British possession whose internal affairs are governed by a senate of sixteen and a legislative council of from thirty-two to forty, elected by proportional representation and controlling its ministers, while reserved matters are left to the governor (who is also commander) in council assisted by a nominated council of five officers. Originally Malta was a colony of the Phœnicians. Carthaginians arrived in the sixth century, and the island later surrendered to Rome. On the division of the Empire (395) it was included in the eastern half, against the central authority of which it joined the Arabs in attacking (870). In 1090 suzerainty was transferred to Roger of Sicily and in 1194 to Constance, wife of the Emperor Henry IV. In 1265 Pope Alexander IV conferred it upon Charles of Anjou, and after the "Sicilian Vespers" it lapsed to Peter of Aragon. It was raided by the Turks in 1427. In 1530, however, it was granted by the Emperor Charles V to the Order of the Knights of St. John which had been expelled by the Turks from Rhodes. Soliman II was repulsed in 1565 after the siege, and Malta became the centre of naval raids against the Turks. In 1774 it defied the Rebellion of the Priests against the government, and in 1790 it was captured by Napoleon, who reorganized the government. Nelson's blockade was helped by international law, and the island fell to the British, who took it in 1802 to the knights, only to receive it again in 1814, the Maltese having vigorously protested against the surrender. Self-government was granted by the British, trial by jury introduced in 1829, and a nominated council granted in 1835. In 1849 eight out of the eighteen composing the council were made elective. Italian refugees and the Crimean War brought prosperity, but from 1858 to 1881 Malta was ruled by a military governor. In 1881 an executive council was appointed. In 1883 the franchise was extended, and in 1887 the "Mizzi" constitution, granted under Strickland, allowed for an elective majority in the legislative council and three elected members in the executive council. In 1909 two of the elected legislative councillors were given seats on the executive, and in 1921 the new constitution of senate, council, and governor was granted.

Man, THE ISLE OF, was in early times inhabited by a Celtic population belonging to the Goidelic stock. According to Bæda, it was included in the empire of Edwin of Northumbria. Subsequently it was settled by Norse pirates, and its political institutions have since been mainly of the Norse type, the bulk of the population and the language remaining Celtic. On its conversion to Christianity it became the seat of a bishopric called the Bishopric of Sodor (i.e., the Southern Isles, Sudreyjar) and Man, which first depended on Trondhjem, but ultimately on York. In 1266 Alexander III of Scotland acquired the Southern Isles by purchase from Magnus of Norway, and in 1275 finally subdued the Manx men. Shortly afterwards the island came into the hands of the English, and in 1290 was granted by Edward I to John Baliol. In 1307 Piers Gaveston (q.v.) was made lord of the island by Edward II, though he did not retain his territory for long. Man now passed successfully through the hands of the Montacutes, Scropes, and Percys until it was given in 1406 to Sir John Stanley, who became Lord or King of Man; the island remained in the possession of the Stanley family (Earls of Derby) until 1736, when it became the property of the Dukes of Atholl. They sold their sovereign rights, together with the customs revenue, to the Crown in 1765, and their remaining rights and perquisites in 1818. In 1651 Castle Rushen, at Castletown the capital, was bravely defended by Charlotte de la Trémouille, Countess of Derby, against the Parliamentary forces, and was only surrendered at last owing to the treachery of the governor, Christian. The island was given back to the Stanleys at the Restoration. During the eighteenth century it was notorious as the resort of smugglers. The government of the island is independent, and is administered by a lieutenant-governor and the Tynwald, which is composed of two houses—namely, the Upper House, or Council, consisting of certain officials (usually ten in number), and the House of Keys, which consists of twenty-four of the principal islanders, elected by male and female owners or occupiers of property. There are two deemsters, or judges, who try civil and criminal cases; there are courts of Exchequer and Chancery besides Common Law courts.

Manchester was a Roman settlement and was in occupation during the Anglo-Saxon period, although little is known of its history. One of Edward the Elder's fortresses was built there in 923. A market and fair were granted to Manchester in 1227, and it was an important seat of the woollen manufacture early in the fourteenth century. In the Civil War of the seventeenth century Manchester declared for the Parliament. It was besieged by the Earl of Derby, September 1642, but was successfully defended by Colonel Rosworm. In the rebellion of 1745 it was occupied for a few days by Prince Charles Edward, and raised a contingent for his service. During the American War the citizens of Manchester (where by this time a cotton manufacture was flourishing) were very hostile to the colonists, and equipped a volunteer regiment to serve against them (1777). During the industrial revolution Manchester was the scene of much unrest and distress. Serious riots against the introduction of machinery took place on October 9, 1779. In March 1817 a meeting of the "Blanketeer" (q.v.) rioters took place, and preparations were made for a march on London. In 1819 (August 16) occurred the so-called "Peterloo" Massacre (q.v.), when a large meeting of reformers was dispersed by the yeomanry. Manchester was made a parliamentary borough by the Reform Bill of 1832, with two members, received three in 1869, six under the acts of 1884-5, and now returns ten under the act of 1918. In 1847 Manchester was made the seat of a bishopric, the collegiate church built in 1421 being constituted the cathedral.

Mandeville, WILLIAM DE (d. 1189), EARL OF ESSEX AND AUMALE, was one of the commanders in Henry II's French wars, and was frequently employed by that king on diplomatic business. On Richard's accession Mandeville was appointed justiciar and regent of the kingdom in the king's absence on the Crusade, conjointly with Hugh de Pudsey, but he held this office only two months, when he suddenly died.

Mangalore, TREATY OF (May 11, 1784), was concluded between the British and Tippoo. It was based on a mutual restitution of conquests; Tippoo was recognized sovereign of the Carnatic Balaghaut, which he had conquered from the Nizam. The kingdom of Travancore was declared to be under British protection.

Manners, CHARLES, 4TH DUKE OF RUTLAND (1754-87), was appointed viceroy of Ireland by Pitt in 1784. He found Ireland in a state bordering on open rebellion. His firmness, however, prevented a proposed congress from meeting (1784); and, though unable to carry the commercial treaty by reason of the alterations which it suffered in the English parliament after passing the Irish parliament, he put down the Whiteboy insurrection, and restored internal quiet.

Manners, HENRY, 2ND EARL OF RUTLAND (d. 1563), was instrumental in procuring the condemnation of Lord Seymour of Sudeley in 1549. In the same year he was employed in the relief of Haddington, besieged by the French; and in 1553 was imprisoned as a supporter of Lady Jane Grey. In 1558 he collected a small fleet for the relief of Calais, but arrived too late to save the town. In 1560 he became lord president of the Council of the North.

Manners, JOHN, MARQUIS OF GRANBY (1721-70), British general, was the eldest son of John, 3rd Duke of Rutland. In 1759 he went to Germany as second in command to Lord George Sackville. After the battle of Minden, for his conduct in which he was thanked, he was made commander-in-chief, and greatly distinguished himself at Gravenstein and Homburg (1762). He resigned in 1770.

Biography by W. E. Manners, 1899.

Manners, JOHN JAMES ROBERT, 7TH DUKE OF RUTLAND (1818-1906), Conservative statesman, was second son of John Henry, 5th duke. In his youth he was an enthusiastic member of the Young England party (q.v.). He entered parliament for Newark in 1841. In Lord Derby's ministry of 1852 he was first commissioner of works, which office he held again in 1858-9 and 1866-8, when he had a seat in the cabinet. From 1874 to 1880, and in 1885-6, he was postmaster-general, and from 1886 to 1892 was chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster. He succeeded to the dukedom in 1888.

Manners-Sutton, CHARLES, 1ST VISCOUNT OF RUTLAND (1780-1845), the elder son of O. Manners-Sutton, Archbishop of Canterbury, was called to the bar, 1806, and first saw parliament for Scarborough, 1806. In 1818 he succeeded Abbot as Speaker of the House of Commons, which office he held till 1834. His activity of commercial enterprise which followed the re-establishment of peace led to a rush of private business in the House of Commons, and Manners-Sutton showed great skill in dealing with it. When Earl Grey resigned in 1832 Manners-Sutton assisted Wellington to form his temporary ministry; this was apparently to oblige the king, who rewarded him with the order of the Bath. In 1834, when Melbourne was suddenly dismissed from office, a rumour was started that Manners-Sutton was to be the Tory premier; and in consequence of this, and of his active negotiations in forming the Peel ministry, the Whigs threw him out, and elected Abercromby Speaker in his place. In the same year (1835) he was called to the Upper House.

Manny (OF DE MAUNY), SIR WALTER (d. 1372), was a native of Hainault, and came over to England in the train of Queen Philippa. He took a very prominent part in the French wars of Edward III's reign. Shortly before his death he founded the Charterhouse in London.

Manor, THE MEDÆVAL. A manor, in the words of a sixteenth-century manuscript, "is a thinge compounded of demesnes and services by long continuance. . . . It seemeth that this name manor began with the Normans, and that it was not heere before thare Arryvall." The term manor does not appear until Domesday, and then it seems to mean a rural estate, sometimes of great extent, sometimes of little more than 100 acres. There are nearly always two elements, a lord and, dependent on him, a group of lesser land-holders and others who have rights in common. We know from the Domesday survey that at the time of the Conquest the village groups of large sections of the old Danelagh consisted of free, economically independent, men. These had perforce to be regarded as manorial groups by the Domesday compilers, whose terminology, though curiously unreal from some points of view, yet seems to be employed with a careful accuracy if Danegeld assessment is to be regarded as the chief end of the survey. During the reign of the Conqueror we may watch these Danelagh manors approximating more closely in character to the manors of Mercia and Wessex, and at the end of the eleventh century, although we cannot say that England was sown from end to end with manors standing edge to edge, the form is so common a feature of rural organization that it must be regarded as the predominant type of agrarian and social relationship. Between the tenth and the fourteenth centuries the lord, the villen, and the small free tenant on the manor play the three landowning parts. It is the manorial organization which binds them together, and the usual mode of rent payment is by labour services. Investigators of the early history of the manor have not yet reached complete agreement as to its origin. The manorial system was found already more than half developed by the Normans. Of its growth before this time we know very little. The village community may have had a continuous history as an organization of servile workers from Romano-Celtic times, its character being only slightly modified by Teutonic custom after the Anglo-Saxon invasion, when a new English owner took the place of the old proprietor of the villa. It is more generally believed, however, that the Domesday manor was of comparatively recent growth, the pressure of circumstances forcing the members of what were originally free settlements of English villagers, farming in association, into subjection to a local lord. This view holds that the movement was one from independence to servitude. The process, it is argued, must have been quickened during the period of Danish attacks when every circumstance conspired to reduce the free smallholder to dependence upon the powerful. Danegeld forced him to borrow or to lend his services; the weakness of the government compelled him to seek protection nearer home, and so commendation and seigneurial jurisdiction were developed. At the same time the ecclesiastical landowners were experimenting with a system of lending land for a number of lives. The wars led to the formation of a class of fighters, freed from direct contact with the processes of farming, and these military men became the territorial lords of those who remained at home to till the soil. In the "Rectitudines Singularum Personarum," a document of the end of the tenth century, we see the different social classes with their duties and obligations set out as the compiler of the document conceived them to be. The services of the thegn, the late Anglo-Saxon "manorial lord," are mainly military, but he has other local duties as well. Corresponding to the free tenant of the later manor are the cottar and the gebur. On a much lower level is the humble class of bond slaves, people who served the thegn or his tenants, and whose status was below that of their successors, the tenants in villenage. In addition to these mutually exclusive classes are various orders of workers with special functions, herdsman, bee-keepers, woodwards, and others, some of whom were clearly slaves, others probably freemen.

After the Conquest a number of changes in the character of the manorial unit are to be observed. We must generalize only with great care, since local conditions varied greatly and there was never a period of rest in manorial development. We notice a greater uniformity with the implantation of continental notions of rural organization by the Norman ruling class. Every manor now has its court and scheme of jurisdiction. The free village disappears in all but remote districts. The freemen of the time of Edward the Confessor are found to be depressed in the scale; some remain free still, though they are bound to render suit and service and to pay a fixed rent in money, or labour service [SOCAGE]. The eastern counties are still the area of their thickest survival. Those who have lost their freedom have become villeins, a numerous class of land-holding servile tenants recruited from above and below. The slave class dissolves and its members become serfs, some, it would seem, rising to be villeins. Others who are called bondars and cottars hold a cottage, a few acres of land, and do manual work for their lord. The villein class was the backbone of the mediæval manor; it was the most numerous; its interests were involved in almost all the functions of the common machinery of the unit. [VILLEINAGE.]

Since the manor is not always the same in area as the vill (village or hamlet), and since, even where the two coincide, they are not one and the same thing, it is possible to distinguish some of the purely manorial activities of the lord and the villagers against the background of their daily lives. [Systems of co-operation in the common fields are described in the article on COMMON LANDS.] The lord stood at the head of the community both as landowner and as the holder of a local jurisdictional franchise. As landowner he was tenant of the king or of some intermediate tenant, and he owed service to his lords, just as he expected it from his manorial tenants [FEUDALISM]. In return for their lands the latter provided him with labour services on his demesne—of a fixed and determined amount in the case of the free tenants—did special boon-work for him in his harvest season, and made a contribution to his stock when they entered on a new tenancy. He had other claims upon his villeins as well. He would, for example, exact a special payment when the daughter of an unfree tenant was married. As head of the manorial jurisdiction he held courts for both criminal and administrative purposes. We cannot be certain, in most cases, how these judicial powers came into his possession. They may have been granted by higher authority as a local franchise; they may have been an assumption by him of the authority of the original court of the old free village. We may be able to trace it back to an old looser sac and soc (q.v.) jurisdiction in the lands of his Anglo-Saxon predecessor. The Norman manorial lord's jurisdiction was at all events established on a strong footing. The Court Baron (baron = freeman) dealt with the free tenants; a corresponding customary court dealt with the villein tenants; a Court Leet had jurisdiction in small criminal cases. The distinction between these was not yet clearly drawn, but it was afterwards to become so. If the Court Baron was legally the most important of these (the essence of a manor is said to be the existence of this court), yet from every local point of view the Customary Court was the central feature of manorial life. It dealt with the domestic and financial affairs of the community, confirmed permission given for absence, apprenticeship, and marriage, and imposed the customary fines. It was the place of decision for some of the arrangements in the co-operative working of the village farm. It dealt with the transference of land, sales from an old tenant to a new one, and it arranged leases. View of frankpledge (q.v.) was also undertaken by the lord's representative in the manorial court, where it was part of the former's franchise. Civil proceedings between the lord and his free tenant were taken in the common-law courts when these became organized under Angevin rule. The villein on the other hand could only seek redress against his lord in the manorial court, and this formed one of the great distinctions between the free and unfree forms of tenure. It was only to be expected that, as national jurisdiction went on its way picking out for itself the powers of the local courts, the manorial lord should lose many of the civil and criminal privileges of his courts. In some cases there were few powers to lose, in others a criminal jurisdiction existed which in the early twelfth century fell short only of the powers of life and death. We should notice these differences and remember that the manor was a complex structure built up around two elements, (1) the political, and (2) the economic predominance of the local magnate. In each case local history determined whether one aspect or the other or both should be fundamental in the growth of that manor. This dubiety only serves to emphasize the warning against the hasty formation of too general conclusions upon the character of the manorial unit throughout England.

The next survey on a big scale after Domesday that the historian obtains of the manorial organization is furnished by the Hundred Rolls (q.v.), compiled early in the reign of Edward I. "In the thirteenth century the system may be said to have been at its zenith." This may be another way of saying that this is the period of the manor of which we know most, and that the variations from our standard which are indicated in earlier and later centuries spoil the completeness of the traditional picture. At all events, these were years of comparative agricultural prosperity. The villein tenant, whose condition had been depressed after the Conquest, had now consolidated his position, which was so strongly supported by a network of custom that, although in legal theory he still held land at the will of his lord, it was extremely difficult for the manorial officials to interfere with his normal habits of life or with his privileges. Improvement in the methods of husbandry had bettered the position of all the members of the village community, and especially of the free tenants, whose numbers had grown, on some manors with the leasing of part of the lord's "inland" or demesne, and on others with the extension of the boundaries of the common, cultivated farm outwards, as the reclamation of the surrounding waste proceeded. Manorial accounts had been worked up into an efficient and complex system, every minute detail of the works and obligations of the tenants being scrupulously recorded from year to year. The great monastic houses, which depended on the work of a large number of manors, developed a system of visiting officials to check and co-ordinate returns. A seneschal, or steward, was given the task of general supervision, where a group of manors was involved. The bailiff on each estate would be responsible for the closer management of the farm, protecting the lord's property from damage, seeing that the customary services of the tenants were performed, superintending harvesting and thrashing, and marketing the unused produce. On the large manor the work of management was divided between the bailiff and his subordinate, the reeve (q.v.), a kind of foreman of the working villagers, elected by them and being responsible, to some extent at least, for their shortcomings.

One of the most important sources for manorial history is the Minister's Account, which presents us with the actual book-keeping of the manor year by year. It is by patient work on this type of record that most of our accurate knowledge of the economic life of the manor has been obtained. The Court Rolls have been less carefully explored. They enable us to approach the daily life of the villager from the legal side. Surveys give us a wider view. Beginning with Domesday Book, this succession of mediæval documents, in which the "Hundred Rolls" of Edward the First's Quo Warranto inquiry stand out as the most valuable, throw light on the development and decay of manorial customs and institutions. Among these may be mentioned the "Baldon Book" (for the See of Durham) and the "Domesday of St. Paul's." Finally there are the technical treatises on husbandry and estate management. These, too, are of value particularly for the thirteenth century, since the best of them all, by a writer of extraordinary competence, Walter of Henley, described methods and conditions in the middle of it, and was drawn upon by the anonymous author of "Fleta" (q.v.), which was compiled between 1290 and 1293, perhaps in the Fleet prison.

It is commonly said that the manor, having passed through its period of highest achievement as a social institution in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, went into decline in the fourteenth century, while the first half of the fifteenth saw its final decay. This is a correct view if it is regarded as a coherent economic unit, the essence of which was the cultivation of the lord's demesne by bondmen. But if it is viewed simply as the organized village farm from a special angle, it is more correct to hold that it underwent transformation rather than decay in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. Mediæval systems of co-aration and co-tenancy of the meadows and waste were hardly less important than the relations of lord and villein in determining manorial structure. These prevailed longer in that large area of England in which the fourteenth-century manor was still true to type, and the agrarian history of later years is largely concerned with the further break-up of "manorial" methods of husbandry. [COMMON LANDS.] What the end of the Middle Ages saw was the disappearance of the bondman and, with him, the decline of demesne farming by the lord. The process was one of steady transformation lasting over a period of quite two hundred years. In fact, three processes were manifesting themselves side by side. (1) The growth of commutation, by the use of which the villein tenant holding his land by labour service exchanged his liabilities for a money rent, is discussed elsewhere. [VILLEINAGE; COMMUTATION.] (2) Where the lord decided to retain his demesne in spite of the changes in his relations with his tenants, he could employ his new income from money rents in living wage labour, and cultivate his strips as before. (3) Frequently he would prefer to entrust the employment of the demesne lands to a "farmer," who would often take over the stock as well as the land and buildings and hold them for a term of years, either for a rent in kind (in which case the conservative instincts of the lord could still persuade him that no more than a temporary alienation of control had been effected), or for a money rent. The manor still had its lord, and still retained some part of the old official organization with its stewards and bailiffs; it still had its tenants, holding at the will of the landlord, according to local custom. But the classes of tenants were no longer the same. The free tenant was free-er than before; the tenant in villenage was now a copyholder; the cottagers and lesser folk of the village were supplemented by hired labourers from the outside world, who had settled on the manor, and whose relations with their master were fundamentally those of employee to employer, and no longer those of bondservant to manorial lord. Maori Wars. After the transfer of the sovereignty of New Zealand to the Crown by the Treaty of Waitangi, 1840, the settlers were engaged in constant disputes with the natives respecting land. The first Maori War took place 1843-7, and resulted in the definition of boundaries. In 1863, in consequence of the encroachments of the whites, war broke out again, and was ended by the submission of the natives, August 1864. In 1868 there were renewed disturbances, and a massacre of the settlers at Poverty Bay and Mohaka. The third war broke out in consequence in July 1869, and lasted till January 1870, when the natives submitted. [NEW ZEALAND, DOMINION OF.]

Mar, DONALD, 12TH EARL OF, was the son of Christian, sister of Robert Bruce. He spent most of his youth in captivity at the English court, only returning to Scotland in 1327. In 1332 he was chosen regent on the death of Randolph; but ten days later he was routed and slain at Dupplin (q.v.) by Edward Baliol.

Mar, EARLS OF. [ERSKINE; STEWART.]

March, AGNES, COUNTESS OF, was a daughter of Randolph, Earl of Moray, and from her dark complexion was known as "Black Agnes of Dunbar." In 1337-8, in the absence of her husband, Patrick, Earl of March, she gallantly and successfully defended the castle of Dunbar against an English force under the Earl of Salisbury.

(2) Scottish: In 1619 James I created Esmé Stuart, afterwards Duke of Lennox, Earl of March; but this creation became extinct at the death of his grandson Charles, 3rd Duke of Richmond, in 1672. Three years afterwards the Lennox titles were granted to Charles Lennox, natural son of Charles II, by whose descendants they have been since held.

Margaret, QUEEN (b. 1282?-1318), second wife of Edward I, was the daughter of Philip III of France, and was married to Edward I in 1298. Her character is highly praised by contemporary writers: "she was good withouten lack," says Peter Langtoft; and she seems to have been a worthy successor to Eleanor of Castile. After her husband's death she lived in retirement, and devoted her time and her wealth to acts of charity.

Margaret OF ANJOU, QUEEN (b. March 23, 1430, d. August 25, 1482), wife of Henry VI, was the daughter of René, Count of Guise, afterwards Duke of Lorraine and Anjou, and titular King of Naples, Sicily, and Jerusalem. It was her relationship to the French king whom her father's sister, Mary of Anjou, had married, that caused her to be selected by Suffolk and Beaufort as the wife of Henry VI. Her marriage, which took place on April 22, 1445, was to be accompanied by the cession of Anjou and Maine to King René, and it was hoped to found on it a permanent peace. The queen became a violent political partisan, a strong supporter of Suffolk and Somerset, and a bitter enemy to Gloucester (whose death has been with very little evidence attributed to her) and to the Duke of York. Margaret's first child, Edward, was born on October 13, 1453, during the king's insanity, and this event placed her in immediate competition with the Duke of York for the regency. The death of the Duke of Somerset, at the first battle of St. Albans, deprived her of her most trusted counsellor, and forced her still more into the foreground. Her preponderance helped to ruin the cause of her son and her husband. From the beginning she represented an unpopular policy, and her strong partisanship in domestic affairs and her foreign connexion increased that unpopularity. She had no scruples about intriguing with the native Irish, the Scots, or the French to damage the Duke of York, nor did she shrink from making Calais the price of French aid. When the three earls landed in Kent in 1460 she was in the north of England, and their victory at Northampton (June 1460) obliged her to take refuge in Scotland. She raised in the north a new army, defeated and slew the Duke of York at Wakefield (December 1460), and marched south to beat Warwick at St. Albans. But the battle of Towton (March 1461) forced her to fly again to Scotland. She contrived by French and Scottish help to maintain war on the Border until in 1464 the battles of Hedgeley and Hexham put an end to the struggle. For the next six years she lived in exile, mainly at Bar, in Lorraine. In 1470 Warwick was forced to fly from England, and Louis XI brought about a reconciliation between the earl and Margaret, and an interview took place at Angers, in which it was agreed that Prince Edward should be restored by Warwick's arms and marry his daughter Anne. But the queen and the prince did not land at Weymouth till the day on which the battle of Barnet had destroyed all hopes of their restoration (April 14, 1471). The prince was taken and killed at the battle of Tewkesbury (May 4, 1471), and the queen herself remained in prison till 1476. Louis XI ransomed her by the payment of 50,000 crowns of gold, but she was obliged to renounce in favour of Edward IV all her claims to the English throne, and to cede to Louis her rights in the inheritance of her father and mother (Bar, Lorraine, Anjou, and Provence). She was handed over to the officers of Louis on January 29, 1476, and spent the remainder of her life in poverty and retirement.

Marlborough, THE STATUTE OF (1267), re-enacted in more formal fashion the Provisions of Westminster (q.v.) of 1259. Very few alterations were made, the most important being that the appointment of the royal ministers, and the sheriffs was now left in the hands of the king.

Marne, BATTLES OF THE, were fought on the western front during the Great War of 1914-18.

The first battle (September 1914) marked the first successful resistance by the allies against the German advance, and resulted in the German armies being driven back to the Aisne. The allied plan was to attack northwards from Meaux towards Château-Thierry and from Nancy towards Metz, and endeavour to envelop the Germans. The battle opened on September 5, and soon involved the loss of Mauberge for the allies, and for the Germans a Franco-British wedge between the Ist and IInd Armies. On September 9 the British crossed the Marne and the French VIth Army (left wing) occupied Château-Thierry, while slight confusion in the German plans increased the isolation of the Ist and IInd German armies from the main body and their separation from each other. Von Bülow therefore caused the German IInd and IIIrd Armies to retreat (September 9), and the Crown Prince on the right followed suit when his attack on the Verdun area failed (September 11). The Germans have dubbed the first battle of the Marne the turning-point of the war.

The second battle (July-August 1918) opened the allied offensive which finally closed the war on November 11. It was known to Marshal Foch that the German command had planned an offensive in Champagne to open about July 10 and be followed by an offensive in Flanders. He resolved to reply by means of a defensive movement in Champagne and a simultaneous counter-offensive in the region of Soissons, utilizing 112 divisions comprising British, French, and American troops. The German attack opened about 5 a.m. on July 15, from Château-Thierry to Massiges, but degenerated next day into a series of separate actions, though it contrived to cross the Marne at Dormans. Foch pushed on his preparations, and on July 18 launched his counter-offensive. The allied reserves broke the German position on July 18-19; the centre recaptured Château-Thierry by the 21st; an advance was made along the River Oureq on July 23-4; and after a lull during the last two days of July the French armies entered Soissons on August 2, and the Germans fell back to the Vesle. The battle secured for the allies 30,000 prisoners, 3,700 guns, a front shortened by over 40 miles, and the safety of Paris. It turned the tide of the final German offensive and ushered in the closing stages of the war.

Marprelate Tracts, THE, were a series of printed pamphlets, issued in 1588 and 1589, containing scurrilous attacks against Archbishop Whitgift and the bishops. The first tract was issued from Waldegrave's secret press at Kingston in October 1588, and subsequent issues were produced at Fawsley (Northants), Coventry, Wolston, and Warrington. When the press was seized at Warrington (in August 1589) Knightley, Hales, and Wigston were put on trial for issuing the tracts from their houses (February 1590). But although it is known that John Perry and Job Throckmorton were probably the persons most responsible, the authorship of the tracts was never discovered. At the time John Udall and John Field were suspected. The purpose of the tracts, however, was very largely thwarted by their revolting scurrility.

Marquis [MARQUESS] was in early times used to denote the Marchers or lords of the borders. It was first used in its later sense as a title of nobility in England by Richard II, who created his favourite, Robert de Vere, Marquis of Dublin (1385). The etymology of the word was entirely forgotten, and it was simply used as a title of honour, superior to that of earl, and inferior to that of duke. It has always been sparingly given in England.

Marriage, THE RIGHT OF, is usually bracketed with that of wardship as one of the incidents of tenure by knight service and by sergeantry. In the case of an infant heir the lord had not merely the custody of his lands and person during his nonage, but also the right to dispose of him in marriage. This right extended in England, somewhat illogically, to male as well as to female tenants; and was regarded as a source of considerable profit to the lord, who, subject to the proviso that he should not "disparage" his ward, was free to dispose of his hand to the highest bidder. If the heir were a tenant-in-chief his marriage belonged to the king in virtue of his prerogative; if he were a sub-tenant it was awarded, with the custody of his person, to the lord of whom he held by the oldest feoffment. The right, which was liable to grave abuse, was eventually abolished by 12 Car. II, c. 24. [WARDSHIP.]

Marriage Laws. In the Middle Ages the marriage fines exacted by the king and other lords from wards, and widows of their tenants, formed one of the most oppressive of feudal incidents. This is shown by the fact that though a lord could bestow his female—and, by the time of Henry III, his male—ward in marriage, yet the king's licence was necessary; and that the abuse of giving widows in marriage against their will had to be guarded against in Henry I's Charter of Liberties (clause 3) and in Magna Carta (clause 6). The civil disabilities of marriage were for the most part incorporated into the common law from the canonical law, the prohibited degrees being regulated by 32 Hen. VIII, c. 38; and 2 & 3 Ed. VI, c. 23. Gradually the law drifted into an uncertain state. The number of forms which constituted a pre-contract multiplied, so that subsequent marriages were liable to be suddenly dissolved; and the consent of parents and guardians was evaded by the aid of Fleet parsons. The act 26 Geo. II, c. 33, commonly called Lord Hardwicke's Act (1753), provided therefore that marriages must be performed in the parish church (those of Jews and Quakers alone being excepted) after the publication of banns, or by special licence granted by the archbishop. Any clergyman breaking these restrictions was liable to transportation for seven years. Further regulations for marriages within the Church of England were provided by the act of 4 Geo. IV, c. 76. The hardships inflicted upon Dissenters under these acts occupied for some time the attention both of Lord John Russell and of Sir Robert Peel. In 1836 the latter carried the Dissenters' Marriage Act, by which marriage by notice to the registrar of a district was legalized, as well as the publication of banns or licence, and marriages of Dissenters might be solemnized in their own chapels; or, if they preferred it, they might enter into a civil contract before the superintendent-registrar. In the previous year all marriages thereafter celebrated between persons within the prohibited degrees were made absolutely void instead of being valid until annulled by sentence of the ecclesiastical court. The marriages of members of the royal family were regulated by 12 Geo. III, c. 11, the Royal Marriage Act of 1772 (amended by the act 3 & 4 Vict. c. 2), by which the consent of the sovereign was required for the marriage of the heir to the throne. In Scotland the law is considerably more lax with regard to the recognition of irregular marriages, and in other respects remains in the state in which it was in England before Lord Hardwicke's act. In Ireland cruel and unnecessary restrictions were imposed under the penal laws on the marriages between Protestants and Catholics. These, however, have since been repealed, and in 1844 the law relating to marriages in Ireland was practically assimilated to that existing in England and Wales. [Marriages are now regulated wholly by statute; in particular, by the acts of 1823, 1836, 1886, 1898, 1915, 1921. The British divorce law was modified by the Matrimonial Causes Act of 1923.]

Marshal, THE, was one of the great officers of the household of the Norman and Plantagenet kings, and appears to have ranked next in dignity to the constable, with whom he was intimately associated. His original function was that of master of the horse; but the importance of cavalry in mediæval warfare led to the association of his office with military command, and he came to share with the constable the leadership of the feudal host. From this again arose his judicial and executive functions. He was responsible for the maintenance of order in court and camp, and for the decision of questions relating to the practice of chivalry. With the constable he acted as a judge of the court of arms and honour. The office of Chief Marshal, which emerges in the reign of Henry I, became hereditary in the family of John FitzGilbert. His most famous descendant was William Marshal (q.v.), who became, in right of his wife, Earl of Pembroke. From him the marshalship passed by female descent to the Bigods, Earls of Norfolk, and was later held by the Mowbrays, the Howards, and the Arundels. The term "Earl Marshal" first began to be loosely used in the early fourteenth century, but the first formal grant of the style of Earl Marshal in addition to the office of Marshal of England was made in 1386 in favour of Thomas Mowbray, Earl of Nottingham. The Earl Marshal is still head of the Heralds' College and appoints officers of arms. In Scotland the office of Great Marischal early became hereditary in the family of Keith, for whom the dignity of Earl Marshal was created in or about 1485.

The office of Marshal of Ireland was created in 1207 for John Marshal, nephew of the great Earl of Pembroke; and passed in 1317 by female descent to the house of Morley.

Marshal, RICHARD (d. 1234), was the second son of the great William Marshal, Earl of Pembroke and Striguil. He succeeded to the earldom on his brother's death in 1231, and soon came forward as the champion of the English against Peter des Roches and the foreign courtiers. He was declared a traitor, and the king marched against him (1233). The earl allied himself with the Welsh, and defeated the royal troops (1234). Des Roches now had recourse to treachery. He stirred up Pembroke's rivals to attack his Irish estates; and, having thus induced him to go over to Ireland to defend his possessions, took care that he should be betrayed. He fell mortally wounded at Kildare, having been drawn into a battle against overwhelming odds by the agents of des Roches.

Marshal, or MARESCHAL, WILLIAM, EARL OF PEMBROKE AND STRIGUIL (d. 1219), was trained to arms in the French wars of Henry II. In 1170 he was placed by the king in charge of his eldest son Henry, whose loyal friend and supporter he remained until his death in 1182. After serving with great distinction in Syria from 1183 to 1187, he was taken into high favour by Henry II, whom he served faithfully for the rest of his reign. On the accession of Richard I, Marshal offered the same unswerving loyalty to the new king, who rewarded him with the hand of the heiress of Strongbow, Earl of Pembroke, and appointed him one of the subordinate justiciars on his departure for Palestine. In 1199 Pembroke upheld the claim of John to the throne, and during the conflict with the baronage he was foremost among the king's advisers and supporters. On John's death he was at once appointed regent for the young Henry III, whom his wisdom and ability securely established on the throne. He defeated Louis of France and compelled him to quit England in 1217; confirmed the Great Charter; and restored the unruly baronage to order. His chief characteristic was an uncompromising fidelity, and he has been called, not unjustly, "one of the noblest of mediæval soldier-statesmen."

Marston Moor, THE BATTLE OF (July 2, 1644), was fought during the Civil War. York was besieged on May 20, 1644, by the Scottish army under the Earl of Leven, and the Yorkshire army under the command of the Fairfaxes. They were joined on June 3 by the army of the Eastern Association under the Earl of Manchester. On July 1 the combined armies raised the siege at the news of the approach of Prince Rupert, who by skilful manœuvring contrived to enter the city without a battle. Against the advice of the Marquis of Newcastle he determined to offer battle, and pursued the Parliamentary army for that purpose. The allied army, numbering in all about 15,000 foot and 9,000 horse, was posted between the villages of Long Marston and Tockwith. The Royalists, about 22,000 strong, were ranged on Marston Moor itself. The battle began about seven in the evening with a general attack on the part of the allies. On the left Cromwell and David Leslie routed Prince Rupert's horse, and, aided by the Earl of Manchester's foot, put to flight a portion of the Royalist infantry. Meanwhile the whole right wing was utterly defeated, with the exception of Fairfax's own regiment, which succeeded in joining Manchester's horse on the left. A desperate struggle now took place in the centre. The Scottish infantry were attacked in front by Newcastle's foot, on the flank by Goring's victorious cavalry, and at the third charge the regiments of the reserve broke and fled. But the greater part maintained their ground, and their resistance gave time for Manchester's foot, and the cavalry of the left wing under Cromwell and David Leslie, to come to their help. This decided the day. Goring's horse were driven from the field, the Royalist foot scattered, and Newcastle's own regiment of white-coats, which made the most desperate resistance, cut to pieces. The pursuit was continued by moonlight to within three miles of York. The losses on both sides were heavy. The killed alone numbered 4,150, of whom 3,000 were Royalists. The whole of the artillery and baggage of the conquered army was captured, with 100 colours and 10,000 arms. [C. H. F.]

Mary I, QUEEN (b. February 18, 1516; s. July 19, 1553; d. November 17, 1558), was the daughter of Henry VIII and Katharine of Aragon. Several marriage alliances were arranged for her in childhood. In 1518 a treaty was concluded for her marriage with the Dauphin Francis, and when this was broken off it was arranged that she should marry Charles V (1522), and the project of marrying her to Francis I of France was also discussed (1527). She was carefully educated, and was an accomplished and precocious child. On the rise of Anne Boleyn the young princess was treated with great harshness. By an act of 1534 she was declared illegitimate, and she was refused permission to see her mother. She was compelled to subscribe a document in which she declared her own illegitimacy and the invalidity of her mother's marriage. She was again declared illegitimate in 1536, but by an act of 1544 the succession was settled on her after Edward VI. In the reign of Edward VI she refused to obey the Act of Uniformity; but the council, though they threatened her, were afraid to proceed to violent measures with her because of her popularity with the people; and though she felt in such danger that she attempted to escape to the continent, she was nevertheless able to resist all the attempts of the council to compel her to accept the New Service Book (1551). On the death of Edward she laid claim to the crown (July 9, 1553). Lady Jane Grey was proclaimed queen in London on the following day. But she was absolutely destitute of support; and Mary, advancing from the eastern counties, was joined by considerable numbers of the gentry and nobles, and found herself at the head of a large body of followers. The Duke of Northumberland's forces melted away, and Mary was proclaimed in London (July 19). On August 3 she entered London, and her reign began. She was a firm and sincere Roman Catholic, and to her cousin, Charles V, she looked for assistance and support. Her first act was to liberate the Catholic bishops imprisoned during her brother's reign, and to prohibit preaching without a licence; while some of the prominent reformers, Hooper, Cranmer, and Latimer, were imprisoned. She was declared legitimate by act of parliament, and crowned by Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester (October 1553). In January 1554, much to the disappointment of her subjects, she concluded a marriage treaty with Philip of Spain, son of Charles V. Henceforward her reign, which had opened well, was unhappy and disastrous. The insurrection of Wyatt in Kent followed, and though this was put down without much difficulty, it led to the execution of Lady Jane Grey (February 12, 1554), who had been tried and found guilty in the previous November, together with her husband and father. In July the Spanish marriage took place. Cardinal Pole came to England, and the Catholic reaction advanced. All statutes passed against the pope since the twentieth year of Henry VIII were repealed, though the monastic lands were not resumed. The following year the persecuting statutes of Henry IV and Henry V were revived, and under them Hooper and many other eminent reformers were burnt. Under the investigation of Pole and the Spanish court the persecution continued during 1556, and Cranmer, with Latimer, Ridley, and a large number of clergymen and others, were put to death as heretics. In the midst of the gloom and distress caused by this persecution Philip persuaded Mary to declare war against the French. The Spaniards and English won a brilliant victory at St. Quentin (1557); but the campaign was disastrous to England, since it resulted in the capture of Calais by the Duke of Guise (January 1558). The queen, who had long been sinking under the perplexity and strain of public affairs, and the failure of her measures, never recovered from this last blow. She died a few months after it (November 17). Mary's character has been indelibly stained in popular opinion by the sanguinary persecution of her reign. Yet it is probable that the full extent of the martyrdom was hardly known to her, for during a great part of the time she was in a state of depression and inaction owing to mental and bodily ill-health. She seems to have been by no means harsh or cruel in her disposition, and conscientiously anxious for the welfare of her country, as well as for the good of the Church to which she was devotedly attached. The unfortunate Spanish marriage was responsible for the worst evils of her reign.

Mary II, QUEEN (b. 1662, s. 1688, d. 1694), wife of William III, was the daughter of the Duke of York, afterwards James II, and Anne Hyde. By the command of Charles II she was educated in the Protestant religion. At the age of fifteen she was betrothed to William of Orange, and married to him in 1677. In 1687 they sent a joint expression of their opinion to James, condemnatory of the Declaration of Indulgence. Mary approved of William's expedition to England. She probably never cared for her father, who had established a system of espionage at The Hague, and had refused her pecuniary assistance. In company with the rest of the world, she believed the Prince of Wales to be supposititious. A large section of English statesmen determined, on the flight of James II, to proclaim her as queen. She might, they thought, make her husband prime minister, or even give him the title of king. The leader of the party was Danby, while Halifax was the chief supporter of William's interests. At length, in February

1689, Burnet thought it right to declare her determination to surrender her power, with the consent of parliament, into the hands of her husband. At the same time she wrote an earnest letter to the same effect to Danby. She arrived that month in London. Before her arrival the dispute had been settled. The crown was tendered to William and Mary jointly, and accepted by them. They were proclaimed in London on February 13, 1689. Mary immediately, from her amiable qualities, gained deserved popularity. The court, owing to William's infirmities, was removed from Whitehall to Hampton Court, and thence to Holland House, Kensington. On April 11, 1689, Mary was crowned with her husband. In the same month they received the crown of Scotland. During William's campaign in Ireland, Mary, aided by the steady friendship of Burnet, acted with admirable decision. Clarendon, her uncle, and several other suspected Jacobites, were lodged in the Tower. On receiving the news of the battle of the Boyne, she wrote to William, imploring that no harm should happen to her father. In 1692 the treachery of Marlborough was discovered, and he was dismissed from his employments, much to the anger of Princess Anne. The quarrel between the two sisters was final. The guard of honour previously allotted to the princess was taken away; the king and queen went to unjustifiable lengths in their resentment. But Mary soon regained her lost popularity. Once more William left England, and the French fleet was known to be about to escort a French invading army across the Channel. The English navy was understood to be disaffected. The queen sent a dispatch, written by Nottingham, in which she refused to believe the reports in circulation, and placed her entire confidence in her naval officers. All disaffection was checked at once, and the battle of La Hogue (1692) resulted in a glorious victory over the enemy. By the queen's order, those wounded in the engagement were relieved at public charge. In 1694 she sickened of the smallpox, and it was evident that her end was near. William remained day and night at her bedside. Before she died she received a letter of reconciliation from the Princess Anne. Her death took place on December 28.

Mary, QUEEN OF SCOTS (b. December 7, 1542; s. December 14, 1542; d. February 8, 1587), was the daughter of James V and Mary of Guise, and was born at Linlithgow, a week only before her father's death. In 1543 a treaty with England arranged for a marriage between the young princess and Prince Edward of England. In August 1548 Mary was taken to France for greater security, a marriage being arranged between her and the dauphin. This marriage took place on April 24, 1558, the dauphin receiving the title of King of Scots from the Scottish Commissioners. The following year, on the death of Henry II of France, Mary became Queen of France and was also declared Queen of England by the French and Spanish courts (being the granddaughter of Margaret, daughter of Henry VII). In December 1560 her husband, Francis II, died, an event which seems to have caused the young queen deep grief, and the following year (August 1561) she returned to Scotland. Here her devotion to the Romish Church at once brought her into collision with Knox and the reformers. But the lavish splendour of Mary's court, her beauty, and her accomplished wit, soon rendered her exceedingly popular amongst her people. The first years of her rule in Scotland were taken up with overcoming the disaffection of the Catholic lords of the north, finding a modus vivendi with the reformers, and discussing various projects for her marriage; in all which transactions Mary's adroitness and courage were conspicuous. In 1563 a marriage with Don Carlos, son of Philip II, was proposed by the Guises, and in 1564 fruitless negotiations took place for her marriage with Elizabeth's favourite, Robert Dudley. In July 1565, however, she married Henry Darnley, to the great disgust of most of her friends. A force quickly collected by the discontented lords was scattered at the approach of Mary and her husband at the head of the loyal army, the confederates taking refuge at the court of Elizabeth, who, in consideration of their efforts to restore Protestantism in Scotland, aided them with money. Meanwhile the vice and folly of her husband rendered it impossible for Mary's domestic life to be a happy one. The murder of her favourite, Rizzio (March 9, 1566), in her presence at Darnley's instigation, is only one of the many insults she endured at his hands. This murder was, however, followed by a feigned reconciliation, the queen escaping from the Confederate Lords in her husband's company to Dunbar Castle. Here a force raised for her protection by Bothwell caused her enemies to fall back. After the birth of her son (afterwards James VI) on July 19, 1566, Mary became reconciled to many of the rebellious lords, reserving all her resentment for her husband, to whose murder at Kirk o' Field she was almost certainly privy. After the acquittal of Bothwell for the murder, Mary was carried off by him to Dunbar Castle, and on his obtaining a divorce from his wife, Catherine Gordon, married him (May 15, 1567). She was not, however, destined to remain undisturbed for long. A month later a combination of discontented lords against Bothwell and the queen led to his flight and to her surrender to Kirkcaldy of Grange at Carberry Hill (June 1567). Insulted at Edinburgh by the people, she was removed to Lochleven Castle, where, on July 23, 1567, she was forced to sign a deed of abdication and to appoint Moray regent of the kingdom during the minority of her son.

Queen Elizabeth's interference on her behalf was of no avail, but by degrees the remnants of her party collected, and on her escape in May 1568 she found herself under the protection of the Hamiltons and other nobles, and at the head of 6,000 men. Her abdication was at once revoked, and aid sought from England and France; but on the defeat of her army at Langside (May 13, 1568), she was compelled to take refuge in England. Having landed at Workington, in Cumberland, she was escorted to Carlisle, and thence to Bolton Castle. Elizabeth, however, refused to grant her a personal interview, and also refused to allow her to return to Scotland, alleging the danger to which she would be exposed as the excuse for detaining her. On October 4, 1568, a commission sat at York to settle the differences between Mary and her subjects; to consider the charges brought against her; to pronounce on the authenticity of the Casket Letters (q.v.), and to provide for the abandonment on the part of the Scottish queen of all claim to the English crown "during the life of Queen Elizabeth or her descendants." This commission was afterwards removed to London, where, on November 26, the charge of murder was sprung upon the Queen of Scots. Thereupon her commissioners, acting under Mary's instructions, demanded instant admittance to Elizabeth's presence, and on this being refused, withdrew from the proceedings. On January 10, 1569, judgment was given to the effect that Moray had not been proved guilty of disloyalty, and that there had been nothing produced or shown against Mary "whereby the Queen of England should conceive or take any evil opinion of the queen, her good sister, for anything yet seen." Elizabeth, however, still kept possession of her rival. Plots against the English queen, proposed rebellions, and the papal bull which excommunicated Elizabeth followed, and it is certain that England was in considerable danger from France, Spain, and Rome. In 1570 Mary, having been removed to Tutbury and Chatsworth, was imprisoned in Sheffield Castle till 1585, when she was taken back to Tutbury, and thence to Chartley. For participation in Babington's conspiracy (q.v.) against the queen's life (September 1566) she was tried and sentenced to death (October 1586), and beheaded at Fotheringhay (February 8, 1587).

Works on Mary, Queen of Scots, are legion. The most recent are the biographies by Andrew Lang, 1901; S. Cowan, 1901; T. F. Henderson, 1905; Martin Hume, 1908; R. H. Mahon, 1924; A. H. Millar, 1927; see also F. A. Mumby, "Fall of Mary Stuart," 1921; the older works of Hosack, Labanoff, Miquet, and Gauthier; Buchanan's "Indictment of Mary, Queen of Scots," 1923 edn.

MARY, QUEEN OF ENGLAND (b. May 26, 1867), daughter of the Duke and Duchess of Teck, great-granddaughter of George III, married George Frederick Ernest Albert, Duke of York, afterwards George V, on July 6, 1893; became Princess of Wales 1902, and Queen Consort 1910.

Mary of Modena, QUEEN (1658-1718), wife of James II, was the daughter of Alfonso, Duke of Modena, and was married to James in 1673. She was unpopular in England owing to her religion. By James she had six sons, of whom James Edward, the "Old Pretender," was one. After her husband's death she lived in retirement at St. Germain's or at the nunnery of Chaillot.

Maserfield, THE BATTLE OF (642), was fought between Oswald of Northumbria and Penda of Mercia, and resulted in the defeat and death of the former and the temporary disruption of Northumbria. Its site was almost certainly Oswestry, a town which takes its name from Oswald, of whose death many miraculous stories survive in local tradition.

Masham, ABIGAIL (d. 1734), Lady Masham, was a favourite of Queen Anne. Her father was a London merchant who became a bankrupt; her mother was the aunt of Sarah Jennings, Duchess of Marlborough. Mrs. Hill entered the house of Lady Rivers, and afterwards that of Lady Marlborough, who obtained for her the post of bedchamber woman to the queen. In 1707 she was privately married to Samuel Masham, one of Prince George's gentlemen. This roused the suspicions of the duchess, who soon discovered that Mrs. Masham's cousin Robert Harley, afterwards Earl of Oxford, was using her as a means of furthering his interests with the queen. It was thought to be owing to the influence of Harley and Mrs. Masham that Anne created two new bishops without consulting the minister Godolphin. In spite of her violence the duchess found herself gradually supplanted by her former dependent. On the downfall of Godolphin's ministry (1710), Mrs. Masham introduced Harley, now virtually prime minister, to the queen. She received the privy purse after her rival the duchess had been dismissed, and her husband was raised to the peerage, apparently against the wish of Anne. Harley quarrelled with her, probably about some money he had promised her out of the Asiento contract (q.v.), and now relied on the rival favourite, the Duchess of Somerset. Lady Masham joined the Bolingbroke faction, although Swift attempted a reconciliation between the two ministers at her house. There is some reason to believe that it was through her and Ormonde that the Jacobites at St. Germain's induced the queen to dismiss Harley, and she had certainly reproached him for his uselessness shortly before the dismissal occurred (July 1714). Of the remainder of her life nothing is known. Her influence over Queen Anne is to be ascribed first to her political and Church principles, and secondly to her "suppleness of temper."

Mason, SIR JOHN (1503-66), distinguished himself during the reigns of Henry VIII,

Edward VI, Mary, and Elizabeth as a statesman and diplomatist. He was sent in 1550 to France to discuss the possession of Boulogne with the French commissioners. He subsequently sided with Northumberland, but was employed on various missions under Mary. After the accession of Elizabeth he opposed Cecil, and warmly advocated a pro-Spanish policy. Mason was said to have brought back from his various embassies "the Italian's quickness, the Spaniard's staidness, the Frenchman's air, the German's resolution, and the Dutchman's industry." Mason himself accounts for his success in gaining the favour of four sovereigns by his "speaking little, and writing less," and by "attaining to something which each party esteemed serviceable to them, and being so moderate that all thought him their own."

Massue de Ruvigny, HENRY DE, EARL OF GALWAY (1648-1720), originally bore the title of the Marquis de Ruvigny. A French Protestant general, he was sent over by Louis XIV to intrigue with the opposition leaders, Buckingham, Russell, and Holles (1678). On the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, he followed his father into England. Soon after the accession of William III he was placed in command of a regiment of Huguenot cavalry, raised by the energy of his father, who died in 1689. He served in Ireland, and, after the departure of William, became major-general. During the siege of Limerick he was chosen to hold a conference with Sarsfield (q.v.). For his services he was created Baron Portarlington, and a property given him from the forfeited Irish lands. In 1693 he took part in the abortive expedition commanded by Meinhard Schomberg (q.v.) and was taken prisoner at the battle of Landen, but his captors allowed him to escape. He was sent to Piedmont as English envoy, but could not prevent the Duke of Savoy from deserting the coalition (1696). He was created Earl of Galway in 1697. After the outbreak of the War of the Spanish Succession he was sent to Portugal as second in command, on the recall of Schomberg (1704). He met with many reverses, and on his return the Tories, urged on by the angry Peterborough, instituted a severe examination into the conduct of the war (1711). His reply was complete, and his conduct was defended by the Duke of Marlborough. But the Commons passed a resolution that he had acted contrary to the honour of the Imperial crown by allowing the Portuguese regiments to take precedence of the English. The rest of his life was spent in retirement.

Matilda (d. 1083), wife of William the Conqueror, was the daughter of Baldwin V, Count of Flanders. She was married to William probably in 1053, but, as she was related to him and no papal dispensation for the marriage had been obtained, the royal couple were placed under excommunication. By Lanfranc's intercession this ban was removed subsequently. Matilda built the nunnery of the Holy Trinity at Caen as her share of the atonement required from her and her husband. Of her personal character little is known, but the story of her having vindictively deprived Brihtic—a Saxon noble who rejected her advances in the days when she was at her father's court—of all his lands, if true, is unfavourable to her character. The theory that the Bayeux tapestry was executed under her direction is now generally discredited.

Matilda, or Maud (d. 1118), the first wife of Henry I, was the daughter of Malcolm III of Scotland and Margaret, sister of Edgar Atheling. Her original name was Edith, but on her marriage the Saxon appellation was discarded for the Norman one of Matilda or Maud. She was brought up in the convent of Romsey by her aunt Christine, but never took the veil. Her title, "Good Queen Maud," seems to have been well deserved. She ministered to the poor with her own hands, and was a great supporter of Anselm, and the Church. Her later years were passed in pious seclusion.

Matilda, or Maud (1102-67), was the only daughter of Henry I. In 1114 she was married to the Emperor Henry V, by whom she had no issue. Her husband died in 1125, and, her brother William having been drowned, Maud was summoned to England, and homage was done to her as the future queen (1126). In 1128, contrary to the wishes of many of the barons, she was married to Geoffrey of Anjou. The unpopularity of this match gave an opportunity to Stephen to seize the crown of England on the death of Henry I, but his misgovernment quickly alienated a large number of his subjects, and in 1139 Maud (or the Empress, as she was usually styled) landed in England, and the country was practically divided, Stephen being in possession of the eastern part, Maud of the western. A period of civil war ensued with varying success till 1147, when the death of Robert of Gloucester, her great partisan, induced Maud to quit the country and content herself with attempting to establish her authority in Normandy. Her lack of success is to be attributed partly to her own overbearing and tyrannical conduct, and partly to the inveterate dislike of the Normans for the Angevins. She lived to see her son Henry crowned King of England.

Matilda, or Maud (d. 1152), wife of King Stephen, was the daughter and heiress of Eustace, Count of Boulogne, and the niece of Henry I's queen. She was extremely popular, and deservedly so, as she followed in the footsteps of her aunt, the "Good Queen Maud." She energetically supported her husband in his wars with the empress.

Mauritius (or the ISLE OF FRANCE), an island in the Indian Ocean, lying to the east of Madagascar, was discovered in 1505 by a Portuguese navigator named Pedro Mascarenhas, who named his discovery Cerné. In 1598 the island was occupied by a Dutch expedition under Van Neck, and called Mauritius in honour of Maurice, Prince of Orange; but no settlement was made until 1644. In 1712 the island was abandoned by the Dutch only to be occupied three years later by the French, by whom it was held until 1810, when it was taken by a British expedition under Sir Ralph Abercromby. Mauritius has ever since remained under British rule, having been finally ceded by the Treaty of Paris (1814). In 1825 a reduction of ten shillings per cwt. on Mauritian sugar caused the island to make rapid progress in civilization; and at the present day the exports of sugar, rum, and vanilla are very considerable. The government is vested in a governor, assisted by an executive council which includes the colonial secretary, the procureur-general, and the receiver-general. There is also a legislative council, consisting of twenty-seven members, ten of them elective. The Rodriguez and Diego Garcia Islands are dependencies of Mauritius.

Maxima Cæsariensis was one of the districts into which Roman Britain was divided under the administrative scheme of Diocletian and Constantine. Of its situation nothing is known. [BRITANNIA, THE ROMAN DIVISIONS OF.]

Maxwell, Sir John, 4TH BARON HERRIES (1512?-83), though at first an adherent of the Lords of Congregation, became a supporter of Mary, Queen of Scots, whom he warned in solemn terms against marrying Bothwell. On the queen's escape from Lochleven he joined her at Hamilton, and, in company with Lord Fleming, was sent as her ambassador to Elizabeth, and subsequently acted as one of her commissioners at the inquiry in York. He was accused of aiding the Hamiltons against the Regent Moray, but obtained an indemnity. Lord Herries was a subtle diplomatist, and no mean rival to such men as Lethington and Cecil.

Maynard, Sir John (1602-90), was born at Tavistock, educated at Exeter College, Oxford, entered the Middle Temple in 1619, and represented Chippenham in the first parliament of Charles I. He speedily obtained eminence as a lawyer, and was in consequence appointed by the Long Parliament one of the managers in the prosecution of Strafford, and also of Laud. In 1648 he vehemently opposed the vote of no-addresses, and when it passed in spite of his opposition, for a time seceded from parliament. Thus he took no part in the measures which led to the king's execution and the foundation of the republic; nor did he again sit in a parliament until 1656. During the Protectorate Maynard was committed to the Tower by Cromwell for his argument in Cony's case, showing the illegality of the customs duties levied by the protector. To obtain his release he was compelled to sign a submission acknowledging his fault. In spite of this incident he was offered and consented to accept from Cromwell in May 1658 the post of serjeant to the Commonwealth. In 1659 he steered his course with great skill; he did not take his seat in the first restoration of the Rump, but waited till the second, and then used his influence to pave the way for the return of the king. Thus he easily made his peace, was knighted, and appointed one of the king's serjeants. In that capacity he frequently took part in the State trials, and also acted as principal manager for the Commons in the trial of Lord Stafford (1680). In the solitary parliament of James II he opposed the encroachment of the king, and refused to appear for the Crown against the Seven Bishops (q.v.). In the Convention Parliament Maynard took a prominent part, conducted the conference with the Lords on the question of the "abdication" of James, and was nominated the first of the commissioners of the great seal.

Mayne, CUTHBERT, a Catholic priest, was executed in November 1577 for having denied the queen's supremacy, and celebrated Mass. The trial is remarkable for the fact that no proof was obtained, and the prisoner was actually convicted on the ground of strong presumption only.

Mayo, RICHARD SOUTHWELL BOURKE, 6TH EARL OF (1822-72). [BOURKE.]

Mayor. The title "Mayor" symbolizes municipal self-government—the possession of those rights which were implied in the recognition of a town as a "communa." The first certain instance of its use appears to be in London. Here the concession of the communa by Earl John and Walter of Rouen in 1191 is followed at once by the appearance of a mayor, Henry Fitz-Alwyn. Three years after the death of Fitz-Alwyn, who had retained the office for life, John in 1215, in order to win the support of the citizens, conceded to the barons of London by charter the right of annually choosing their mayor. The person elected was, however, to be approved by the king. Though chosen only for a year, it was usual until 1319 to re-elect the same person for several years; from that year dates the practice of an annual election. According to the evidence of the Rolls, it is to the reign of John that the possession of a mayor in the other great towns, such as Bristol, York, Norwich, Lincoln, and Winchester, is due. Local lists of mayors giving earlier dates are scarcely trustworthy. During the thirteenth century town politics turn chiefly on the question who was to elect the mayor—the aldermen, representing the propertied class, or the populace. This struggle was particularly important in London during the Barons' War, when the commons sided with de Montfort's party, the magnates with the king. The popular party were successful, and secured the election of their own candidate in 1263-5, but the royal victory in 1265 brought with it a suspension of the city constitution altogether, and the town remained under a "custos," and not a mayor, till 1270. The contest was renewed in 1272, but in 1273 the aldermen, supported by the royal council, regained their power. The suspension of the town constitution was the penalty not only for popular violence, but also for attempts of the magistracy to extend its power. Thus London was without a mayor, and under a custos, from 1285 to 1298, because the mayor had endeavoured to gain exemption for the city from the jurisdiction of the justices in eyre. The fourteenth century saw the rise of the craft gilds, and their efforts to gain control of the administration, including the election of the mayor. In these efforts they were entirely successful in the reign of Edward IV. The same general lines of development are seen in the other great towns; the struggle of the magnates against the commons for the election of the mayor, against royal interference, the occasional nomination of a custos, and the increasing importance of the trade societies. The struggle between the aldermen and the people of York happened curiously enough in 1381; whether it had any connexion with the Peasant Rising has not been ascertained. In conferring a new charter in 1389 Richard II gave the mayor his own sword: after this he assumes the title of Lord Mayor, hitherto only borne by the mayor of London. Another point of interest is offered in the conflicts between the mayors, representing town self-government, and the lords of such towns as were in the demesnes of prelates. The most notable instance is that of Reading, when in the thirteenth century mayor and abbot struggled concerning the merchant gild, and in the fourteenth concerning the nomination of constables, and when as late as the fifteenth century the abbots claimed a voice in the choice of the mayor. [W. J. A.]

Meal-Tub Plot, THE (1679), was a pretended conspiracy fabricated by the informer Thomas Dangerfield (q.v.), who hoped thereby to emulate Oates and Bedloe. He declared that the Presbyterians were conspiring to raise an army and establish a republic. At first he was believed, but his imposture being discovered, he was committed to Newgate, when he suddenly turned round and declared that the pretended conspiracy was an imposture concocted by the papists to hide a real popish plot, which had for its object the murder of the king. The papers relating to this plot were, he declared, concealed in a meal-tub in the house of Mrs. Cellier, a Roman Catholic lady, who was tried with Lady Powys for the alleged plot, but acquitted.

Measures, THE ASSIZE OF (1197), was issued for the purpose of securing the uniformity of weights and measures throughout the kingdom. But it was found impossible to break down local custom, and even Magna Carta (Art. 35) was not obeyed in this respect. Indeed, it is only in recent times that any serious attempt has been made to secure that uniformity which would be so beneficial.

Meath, THE KINGDOM OF, is said to have been formed about A.D. 150, by Tuathal Techmar, as the demesne land of the ard ri, or overking of Ireland. For this purpose he took pieces of land from each of the four kingdoms; from Connacht the hill of Usnech, the old religious centre of the Irish, from Munster the mound of Tlachtga, from Ulster, Tailti (Teltown), and from Leinster the hill of Tara. The last became his principal residence, and the place of assembly of the under-kings of Ireland, while each of those places became a religious centre where great festivals were held. Meath now comprised the present county of Meath, Westmeath, and parts of Longford and King's County. Tuathal made Leinster completely subservient, and is said to have created a standing army, which afterwards became celebrated as the Fenians. The power of the ard ri was soon menaced by that of the rival kingdom of Munster, and Tuathal's grandson, Conn, "of the hundred battles," was, it is said, forced by Mogh of Munster to divide Ireland into two parts, the north being Conn's half, the south Mogh's half. The power of the ard ri seems to have been precarious, and the over-kings were chosen from various branches of the Milesian race, until in the fifth century Niall, "of the nine hostages" founded the Hui-Neill dynasty, which from 483—when Lugaid, the son of Laeghairé, established himself upon the throne—was dominant in Ireland for five hundred years, the sovereignty alternating between the two branches. In 559 the ard ri deserted Tara in consequence of a curse pronounced upon it by St. Rodanus, or Ruadan, because of the violation of his sanctuary by King Diarmaid (Dermot), and their residence became unsettled, the kings of the southern Hui-Neill dynasty, whose settlements were in Meath, living in Westmeath, those of the northern race, whose possessions were in Ulster, establishing themselves in Derry. There was therefore no central power, and hence the weak resistance offered to the Teutonic invaders of whom the Fingals, or Norsemen, founded a considerable colony in Meath, and by whom a tribute was imposed upon the southern Hui-Neills. In 980, however, Malaughlan II, King of Meath, became ard ri, on the extinction of the direct branches of the Hui-Neills, or O'Neills as they now called themselves, and he was the last of his race who held that dignity without dispute. During his lifetime it was usurped by Brian Boru (q.v.), and remained for over a century to his descendants, the O'Briens.

In fact, from the beginning of the eleventh century, the power of the O'Melachlins of Meath was, as a rule, at a low ebb, and after the Anglo-Norman invasion the province was bestowed on Hugh de Lacy, through whose great-granddaughters it passed into the families of de Geynville, lords of Trim, and of de Verdun, barons of Dundalk. The lordships of Trim passed by marriage into the hands of the Mortimers, Earls of March, and finally vested in the Crown, while the de Verdun property went to the Talbots, Earls of Shrewsbury, by whom it was forfeited to the Crown under the statute against absentees. In the reign of Elizabeth, Meath, now reduced to its present dimensions, was added to the province of Leinster. It received a large English colony during James I's later plantations, and again during the Cromwellian settlement. The ancient tumuli with which Meath is covered have been thought to be relics of the Tuatha dé Danann, one of the early invading tribes.

[L. C. S.]

Meeting, THE RIGHT OF PUBLIC, as opposed to rioting, first became important in 1768, when the Middlesex electors, supported by the most prominent politicians of the day, assembled to protest against the infringement of their rights by the House of Commons. Meetings were also held in their support in no fewer than seventeen counties. The question, which became intimately connected with that of petition, was again raised in 1779-80, when an agitation began in Yorkshire and spread over England, in favour of economic and parliamentary reform. The House of Commons at this time protested against the practice of sending delegates to London with petitions, but were unable to prevent it. The right of meeting was grievously abused by the Protestant associations which led to the Lord George Gordon riots of 1780 (q.v.); but the Anti-Slave Trade Association of 1787 carefully kept within the law. The terror caused by the French Revolution at length determined ministers to have recourse to repressive measures. Several societies already established, chief among which were the Revolution Society, the Society for Constitutional Information, and the London Corresponding Society, had received a fresh impulse from events occurring on the other side of the Channel, and members of the last especially had indulged in violent language. This was met by several trials for sedition both in England and Scotland, in which the sentences imposed, particularly in the northern country, were of terrible severity, and the cases invariably prejudged. The acquittal of Horne Tooke (q.v.), Thomas Hardy, and other members of the great societies on the charge of treason in 1794 was, however, a severe blow to the government, which nevertheless continued the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act (q.v.), and procured the conviction of Henry Redhead Yorke on a charge of conspiracy. The London Corresponding Society continued to hold meetings, one of which, being followed by an attack on the person of the king (1795), resulted in the passing, in company with a Treason Practices Act, of a Seditious Meetings Act (q.v.), which provided that no political meeting of more than fifty persons could be held without previous notice to a magistrate, who was to attend in person, and might disperse them according to the Riot Act (q.v.), if he thought them dangerous. In spite of the vehement opposition of Fox and his friends, these bills became law by large majorities. The only result was that the societies had resort to secret conspiracy in conjunction with the French clubs and the United Irishmen, and were in consequence suppressed by the stringent Corresponding Societies Act (1799). In 1817, when discontent, want, and zeal for reform had caused riots in various parts of the country and an attack on the Prince Regent, the acts of 1795 and 1799 against corresponding societies were extended to other associations, such as the Hampden and Spencean clubs. Meetings, however, only became larger and more revolutionary, especially in the manufacturing districts; and the rash action of the military resulted in the "Peterloo Massacre" (q.v.) of 1819. That criminal blunder was followed by the "Six Acts" (q.v.), one of which placed rigorous restrictions on all meetings of more than fifty persons, and entrusted magistrates with the amplest powers for their suppression and adjournment. In the following year "Orator" Hunt (q.v.), Sir C. Wolseley, the Rev. Joseph Harrison, and others were tried for unlawfully meeting together, and sentenced to various periods of imprisonment. From that time onwards the right of meeting has been generally recognized by the government, and lawful agitation is no longer confounded with riotous and disorderly assemblies. The Catholic Association (q.v.) in Ireland was allowed to continue, restrictions being placed alone on the proposal to appoint managers of petitions as being a violation of the Irish Convention Act of 1793, until it threatened to supersede parliament. It was thereupon suppressed (1825), but continued in another form; and, being revived on the expiration of the act, was again suppressed, but not until its objects had been completely gained (1829). The First Reform Bill was ushered in by the agitation of political unions throughout the country; and on its rejection by the House of Lords, these organizations exceeded their lawful limits by sending delegates to a national union in London. They were in consequence proclaimed, but continued nevertheless; and the surrender of the Lords alone prevented much violence and consequent coercion. The agitation for the repeal of the Irish Union produced some monster meetings, such as that on the hill of Tara (1843), which were so dangerous to the peace that the government had to repress them. A similar fate attended the Orange lodges, which, established about 1795 in opposition to the Catholic Association, spread into England, especially into the army, and dabbled in plots for placing the Duke of Cumberland on the throne (1835). The trades unions' procession, the object of which was the release of the Dorchester labourers, dispersed upon the refusal of Lord Melbourne to receive a deputation which relied to some extent on the exhibition of physical force (1834). A similar attitude was adopted towards the Chartists, who were not allowed to appear in large numbers at Westminster under pretence of presenting their huge petition, but whose meetings were tolerated as long as they were orderly. In Ireland the land agitation of 1880 and the subsequent years compelled the government to place restrictions on the right of public meeting. The Land League was suppressed in October 1881, and the Prevention of Crimes Act of the following year empowered the lord-lieutenant to disperse assemblies calculated to disturb the peace; which power was frequently exercised in the case of Land League, Nationalist, and Orange assemblies. By the Crimes Act of 1887 the lord-lieutenant was empowered to suppress any association which, in his judgment, was engaged in the commission of crimes, or in incitement to violence or intimidation. [Riot Act.] [The right of public meeting was made liable to restriction under the Defence of the Realm Acts (August 8, 1914, etc.) during the Great War. These defence regulations were superseded in 1920 by the Emergency Powers Act (10 Geo. V, c. 55). It was under this act that the Emergency Regulations of April-November 1926 (No. 22 of which dealt with public meetings) were issued on the outbreak of the General Strike.]

Mehidpar, THE BATTLE OF (December 21, 1817), was fought during the war against Holkar, whose army was protected by a river lined with a formidable battery of 70 guns. Sir Thomas Hislop launched his men across the river by a single ferry, in the face of a terrific fire, to seize the guns. Holkar's artillerymen were struck down at their guns; a general rout took place and the victory was complete, though at the expense of 778 killed and wounded.

Melbourne, WILLIAM LAMB, 2ND VISCOUNT (1779-1848). [LAMB.]

Mellitus, Archbishop of Canterbury (619-624), was sent over by Gregory in 601 to assist Augustine in the conversion of the English. He preached the gospel in Essex, and was appointed by Augustine the first Bishop of London. After the death of Ethelbert of Kent Essex relapsed into paganism, and Mellitus fled to the continent (617). On the death of Lawrence he became the third Archbishop of Canterbury.

Melun, TREATY OF (1593), was concluded between Elizabeth and Henry IV of France, and bound both sovereigns to maintain war against Philip II of Spain as long as he should remain in hostility to either England or France.

Melville, ANDREW (1545-1622), was appointed principal of Glasgow University in 1574, and subsequently principal of St. Mary's College, St. Andrews (1580), and rector of the University in 1590. He was moderator of the general assembly, 1587-94. In 1606 he was summoned to London in company with seven other of the leading Scottish ministers to discuss the question at issue between the king and the Scottish Church. A conference took place, which ended in an explosion of rage on Melville's part against the primate. He was ordered to be imprisoned in the Tower, and kept there for four years. He was released at the request of the Duc de Bouillon, and passed the remaining years of his life as professor of divinity at Sedan.

Members of Parliament. The House of Commons has no right to decide the eligibility of members; it can merely insist on the performance of those conditions under which alone it is lawful to sit and vote. In 1769 Wilkes (q.v.), having been expelled the House, was declared "incapable of being elected a member to serve in this present parliament," and Colonel Luttrell, though defeated by him at the poll, was admitted as member for Middlesex, but in 1782 the resolution against Wilkes was, on his own motion, expunged from the journals of the House as subversive of the rights of the whole body of electors. This principle was not acknowledged in earlier times, for in 1711 Sir Robert Walpole was declared ineligible in consequence of a previous expulsion. Nevertheless, a member though duly returned could not sit and vote until he had taken the oath provided by 31 and 32 Vict. c. 72, though Quakers, Moravians, and Separatists were allowed to affirm instead. On May 3, 1880, Charles Bradlaugh (q.v.) claimed to affirm, and his claim being rejected by a select committee, offered to take the oath. As he had declared that an oath was not binding on his conscience, the House refused to allow him to do so. His claim to affirm was referred to the law courts, and the High Court of Justice decided that it was invalid. In 1888, however, a statute was passed giving to members the right of choice between the oath and the affirmation. Any member sitting or voting before taking the oath or affirming incurs a penalty of £500 for each offence besides vacating his seat. But though a member in this case may not take his seat, he does not cease to be a member of the House; he may even sit within its walls, though he must take care that his seat is below the bar, which for this purpose is held to be without the House; and he may, like Baron Rothschild in 1858, be called on to serve on committees. A member having been sworn, or made affirmation, as he may prefer, is presented to the Speaker by the clerk of the House. The personal privilege of members formerly extended to freedom from arrest or molestation for themselves, their servants, and their goods. This privilege was of great antiquity. In Atwyl's case in 1477 the Commons affirmed that it had existed "whereof time that man's mind is not the contrary." For the reign of George III the privilege was dropped as regards servants, and now extends only to the person of members for forty days before, during, and for forty days after a session. It never covered treason, murder, felony, or breach of the peace, and since the House in 1753 took a less liberal view of its own privileges—by refusing in Wilkes's case to extend them to seditious libel—than was held by the Court of Commons Pleas, it has not covered any indictable offence. It is the duty of a judge on committing a member to prison to inform the House of the fact, that it may satisfy itself as to the question of privilege. A member is not exempted from punishment for contempt of court, for in 1831 Lord Chancellor Brougham committed Long Wellesley for contempt, and the House refused to interfere in his behalf. Later, in 1882, Mr. Gray, member for Dublin, was imprisoned for contempt at the end of the session. His imprisonment ended before the next meeting of parliament, and a select committee reported that the case did not demand the attention of the House. A member may be expelled, and expulsion may be said to follow such ill-conduct as would render a man unfit to sit in the House, while it is also inflicted on any member absconding from justice, as in the case of Sadleir in 1857. By a standing order of 1880 suspension is incurred by wilful obstruction of the business of the House. All members are bound by 5 Rich. II, c. 4, to render personal service in parliament, and their attendance may be enforced by a call of the House, though there has been no instance of such a proceeding since 1836. A member vacates his seat by elevation to the peerage, and since 6 Anne, c. 7, by the acceptance of a lucrative office under the Crown. No member can relinquish his seat, and since 1750 the custom has obtained that a member wishing to retire from parliament should apply to the Crown for a nominal office, such as the Stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds. Merchant Adventurers, THE, were an association of English merchants, composed of groups trading from various of the port towns, especially London. Their principal trade was in English cloth, and their most important area of activity stretched from the Low Countries across northern Europe to the Baltic. The origins of the fellowship are hidden in obscurity. It was claimed by members that their history went back into the thirteenth century, but it is only in the fifteenth century that we can distinguish any definite organization and not till the granting of their English charter in 1505 that they assumed the form and aspect under which they became famous throughout Europe in the two centuries which followed. Their staple, or head-quarters, was always overseas and generally in the Low Countries. The great commercial activity of Bruges in the early fifteenth century may be partly traced to their presence there, and when they transferred their staple to Antwerp the world's trade moved with them. Under the Tudors they built up a huge vested interest in the cloth trade, practically monopolizing the export trade in white and fine coloured cloths. During this time they overthrew the power of their old rivals, the Merchant Staplers, who attempted to abandon the decaying export trade in wool for the more lucrative business of selling woollen cloth. At the same time they were challenged by the Hanse League, and after a long and desperate struggle succeeded again, in the later years of Elizabeth, in asserting their power. For a time the staple town was Hamburg, a German port which was always friendly to the fellowship. Early in the seventeenth century they were firmly consolidated in the United Provinces, and there the principal centre was fixed when the association was at the height of its power. Under parliamentary attack their power was shaken, and they lost influence and security when they suffered damage from James I's ill-fated dyeing and dressing scheme in the second decade of his reign. But until the Civil War they remained the largest and richest of the English trading associations, their loose organization and efficient trading machinery often challenging a favourable comparison with the new model of close financial association with which such bodies as the East India Company were experimenting. After the Restoration their power declined, although their rights and privileges continued to be exercised until the reign of William and Mary, when their monopoly of cloth export to North and Central Europe was taken away. But there is evidence to suggest that during the eighteenth century the Adventurers were still active and powerful in Hamburg, and as late as 1805 they were still in existence there.

Merchants, THE CHARTER OF THE (1303), was granted by Edward I to the foreign merchants, and gave them certain important privileges, in return for which he received from them a considerable sum of money in the shape of duties on wool, etc.

Mercia was the great Anglian kingdom of central England. Originally the term seems to have been confined to that particular Anglian settlement which occupied the district round Tamworth and Lichfield, and the Upper Trent valley. West of this a range of moorlands checked the progress of the invaders for a considerable period. Their proximity to the unconquered Welsh gave them the title of Mercians, or Men of the March. Nothing definite can be determined as to the date of this original Mercian settlement, but it must have been later than that of the more eastern Anglian settlements in mid-England. It was, however, probably made in the latter half of the sixth century. Nothing is known of its first king, Creoda, who died in 593?; Pybba (593?–606?) and Cearl (606?–626?) were of equal insignificance. But in 626 a great king, Penda, began to reign. He found Middle England split up into a large number of independent Anglian settlements. These had, perhaps, been already dependent on Ethelbert of Kent and Rædwald of East Anglia. Penda reduced them to a permanent dependence on the men of the March. Henceforth Lindiswaras and Gyrwas, Middle English and South English, Pecsætan, Hwiccas, Hecanas, and Megasætas were but under-kingdoms of the Mercian monarch. They were still centres of local feeling. Lines of subreguli, or hereditary ealdormen, continued to reign in them. But for great political purposes Mercia is henceforth synonymous with Middle England. Penda, the creator of this greater Mercia, was also the representative of the heathen reaction which followed Augustine's mission. He was, moreover, the uncompromising foe of the rising power of Northumbria. In alliance with the Welshmen he defeated and slew Edwin the Bretwalda. Oswald, the sainted king, was equally unable to withstand him. But at last Oswy, his successor, destroyed the power of Mercia at the battle of Winwæd (655). Penda fell on the field. Oswy gave law to all England. The greater Mercia began to break up, and some parts were even conquered by Oswy. But in 659, after the death of Peada, the next king, the Mercians seized arms in despair, and led by Wulfhere, nephew of Penda, drove out the Northumbrians, and effectually consolidated the greater Mercia. It may have been now that the Mercian boundary was pushed southward to the Thames. Meanwhile Christianity had silently become the religion of Mercia, and Theodore of Tarsus found in Wulfhere and his brother and successor, Ethelred (675-704), active and powerful auxiliaries. In 704 Ethelred withdrew to a monastery. His nephew Cenred, son of Wulfhere, reigned over the Mercians till 709, when Ceolred, son of Ethelred, succeeded, and in 715 sustained the great defeat of Wanborough from Ine of Wessex. He died in 716. His successor, Ethelbald, son of Alweo, brother of Penda (716-57), took advantage of Ine's abdication, and the growing anarchy of Northumbria, to establish that Mercian overlordship that was to endure for fully a century. A series of successful wars subdued all the neighbouring states, and Ethelbald with good reason claimed to be rex non solum Mercensium sed et omnium populorum qui generali nomine Sutangli dicuntur. But the end of his reign was unfortunate. In 754 the revolt of the conquered people was followed by the defeat and flight of Ethelbald at Burford. Next year he died, and even the genius of Offa (757-96), who, after a year of anarchy, became King of the Mercians, could not wholly undo this great disaster. Yet Offa became the greatest king of his day. He put his dependents in the neighbouring kingdoms, and established a series of alliances that made his power irresistible; conquered eastern Powis from the Welsh, and built the dyke that goes by his name to protect his western frontier; established at Lichfield a short-lived archbishopric that made Mercia ecclesiastically independent, and corresponded on equal terms with Charles the Great himself. Cenwulf, a successor (796-821), was hardly less powerful. But soon after his death the collapse of the Mercian power at Ellandune (q.v.)—where Beornwulf was defeated by Ecgbert—handed over the supremacy of Britain to Wessex. The power of Mercia had been based on nothing but the prowess of its kings. It retained that want of centralization which flowed naturally from its origin; and if remarkable for military ability, was behindhand in culture and civilization. The failure of the royal house, combined with the great invasion of the Danes, completed the Mercian overthrow. Ludecan and Wiglaf were mere puppet kings. When the struggle was over, half Mercia was regularly settled by Norse Vikings; the other half, that to the west and south of Watling Street, was a mere ealdormanship under the West Saxon kings. Ethelred, the new ealdorman of the Mercians, and after his death his wife Ethelfleda, "Lady of the Mercians," the daughter of Alfred the Great, were strong and vigorous rulers; but they ruled in the West Saxon interest. On the latter's death Mercia, enlarged by the gradual reconquest of the Danish portion, ceased to have a ruler of its own. Yet it retained for many generations its local patriotism. The policy of Dunstan may have conciliated it; the policy of Edwy led to its revolt and the setting up a king for itself in Edgar. But on Edwy's death conquered Mercia gave a king to the victorious West Saxons. The establishment of the great earldoms revived local Mercian feeling. Elfgar, Leofric, Edwin, and Morcar became in a sense new rulers of Mercia. Had not the Norman Conquest intervened they might have re-established Mercian independence. But the Norman administrative system for ever put an end to dreams of particularism. Despite the schemes of Earls Ralph and Roger to revive the Heptarchy in the interests of feudalism, despite the distinction of law that survived down to the days of the Dialogus De Scaccario (q.v.), Mercia ended its political existence with the Norman Conquest. Merciless, or WONDERFUL PARLIAMENT,

THE (1388), was summoned by the lords appellant after the defeat of de Vere and the royalist party, for the purpose of obtaining a sanction to their acts. Gloucester declared his innocence of any attempt to depose the king; the judges who in the previous year had declared the commission of regency illegal were arrested and banished to Ireland; the royal ministers, including Suffolk, de Vere, Tressilian, and Bramber, were "appealed" and sentenced to death, and other offenders were punished, while £20,000 was voted to the lords appellant, among whom all the principal offices of the realm were distributed. The acts of this parliament fully establish its right to the title of "merciless" and stamp with infamy the men who, whether their political crimes were or were not salutary to the constitution, disgraced their cause by excessive and vindictive cruelty.

Merton, THE STATUTE OF (1236), was enacted in a great council assembled at Merton, January 23, 1236, shortly after the marriage of Henry III and Eleanor of Provence. It dealt with a number of questions relating to the land law, the feudal incidents, and the administration of justice; and recorded the famous reply of the magnates to the attempt of the clergy to alter the law of bastardy: "nolumus leges Anglie mutare."

Metcalf, CHARLES THEOPHILUS, BARON (1785-1846), entered the East India Company's service, and in 1808 was selected by Lord Minto to negotiate the alliance with Ranjit Singh. He carried out his mission successfully, and succeeded in concluding the Treaty of Amritsar (1809) (q.v.). Subsequently he negotiated the treaty with Amir Khan (q.v.) in 1817 during the Mahratta War. In 1820 he was appointed resident at Hyderabad, and in 1825 resident at Delhi for Rajputana. In 1834 he was appointed governor of the newly-created presidency of the North-West Provinces, and in 1835, in consequence of the premature departure of Lord William Bentinck, he was obliged to return to Calcutta and assume the provisional governor-generalship, which he continued to hold for a year. On the arrival of Lord Auckland he proceeded to Agra. Soon after his arrival (1836) he learned that the press law carried by him during his governor-generalship had exasperated the India House, and that in consequence his name had not even been mentioned in connexion with the vacant governorship of Madras. He resigned his appointment. His services were fully appreciated by the Crown. He was appointed governor of Jamaica (1839-41) and Canada (1842-5), and was raised to the peerage as Lord Metcalfe in 1845. The difficulties which he experienced from factious opposition, and his own ill-health, produced his resignation (1845), and he returned to England to die in 1846.

Methodists. The name was first given in derision to the society formed for religious study and conversation by John and Charles Wesley at Oxford in 1729. Wesley began to hold great evangelical meetings in London and elsewhere in 1739, and in the same year he formed the first regular Wesleyan Methodist society. The society was divided into "classes" with "leaders" and "stewards." Two years before, Wesley had begun to institute lay preachers in his various local societies. In 1744 the first conference was held; but it was not till 1784 that Wesley constituted the conference the supreme authority of the sect, and vested the property of the society in trustees, under its jurisdiction. In 1784 he gave letters of ordination to Dr. Coke, and constituted him "bishop" of the American Methodist body, thus beginning the American Episcopal Methodist Church. It was not, however, till 1788 that Wesley ordained preachers to assist him in administering the sacraments to the societies in England. He died in 1791. After his death the Connexion was distracted by disputes, which ended in the "plan of pacification" in 1795. In 1797 Alexander Kilham founded the "New Connexion," the government of which was more republican than that of the older body. There have been several secessions since—notably those of the "Protestant Methodists" in 1798 (who subsequently were joined by other bodies of seceders and became the "United Methodist Free Churches"). The "Primitive Methodists" were formed in 1810. In 1907 the "New Connexion," the "United Methodist Free Churches," and the "Bible Christians" (formed in 1815) were united into one body known as the "United Methodist Church." [WESLEY.]

Methuen Treaty, THE (1703), was a commercial convention between England and Portugal, concluded on December 27, 1703, by Paul Methuen. Portugal bound herself to admit English woollen manufacturers on the same terms as before the late prohibition of them. England agreed to admit Portuguese wines on payment of two-thirds of the duty imposed on French wines. The treaty was superseded by the treaty of 1835.

Military System. In the earliest times the military system of the Teutonic races appears to have reposed on the broadest basis. Ruled over by elective duces, encouraged to valour by the presence of kindred and neighbours, the old Teutonic host, according to Tacitus, was in a very intimate sense the army of the people. Yet even in those days the comitatus of the princeps, which, by devoting its whole energies to fighting, was probably the most efficient military force, was of other than popular origin. It was the body-guard, the personal following of the king or leader. After the migration to England the same system seems to have continued. It was a primary principle of Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence that every landholder was obliged to serve in the fyrd (q.v.), as the popular host was now called. Fyrdbot was part of the trinoda necessitas. In the monarchical period the fyrd, arranged by the shire-reeve, was simply the shire in arms. But want of cohesion between various localities made its operations uncertain, and the lack of discipline in a citizen militia frequently rendered it ineffective. The glorious fight of Brihtnoth and the East-Anglian fyrd against the Danes at Maldon (q.v.) shows what the fyrd of a limited district could do; but attempts to aggregate the national militia of the whole nation in a single body were in those early times nearly impossible. Yet, when well led, the fyrd fought well, and its national character was of great political importance as keeping alive national feeling. Still the West Saxon kings would hardly have attained to their imperial position if, in addition to the forces of the allodial system, they had not also to rely upon the services of their gesiths and *thegn*s. These personal retainers of the monarch, the comites in a developed form, formed a body-guard of trained soldiers, always at hand. But as time went on, the thegn became more of a feudal noble, dwelling on his estate, and only serving his lord on occasion. Thus the *thegn*hood became untrustworthy also, until its revival in a more primitive form, in the huscarls of Canute, gave the king again the services of a standing body-guard of highly-trained professional soldiers.

Such was the outline of the old English military system. In it we have the germ of most of the later developments of the English army, the national militia, the feudal levies, and even permanent mercenary troops. The Norman Conquest developed the feudal element by the introduction of tenure by knight service on the Norman model and resulted in the early division of the land of England into "knights' fees," held by the tenure of providing and equipping a heavy-armed horseman to serve his lord for forty days in the year. William the Conqueror himself saw clearly the constitutional danger and the military worthlessness of the feudal army. In lack of discipline, irregularity, and incapacity for development, it surpassed the fyrd. It was, moreover, largely composed of the disloyal party of the feudal baronage, ever anxious to destroy the royal power, and consequently a source of weakness more than of strength. The military characteristics of the lesser tenants-in-chief and sub-tenants tended, however, rapidly to disappear, and the development in the twelfth century of the institution of the scutage (q.v.) hastened the decay of the feudal military system. The Angevins, partly from necessity and partly from choice, carried out still farther the policy of the Norman kings, and depended to an increasing extent on Flemish or Brabant mercenaries, who, bound to their lord by no tie but good pay and the rough loyalty of a soldier to his general, and often composed of the very scum of society, were yet efficient military instruments. But mercenaries were expensive, unpopular, and frequently treacherous. The Norman and Angevin monarchs consequently sought, by the maintenance of the fyrd-system, to retain the services of a third body which could be counted upon to support the Crown against the feudal party. The history of the national militia subsequent to the Conquest strongly illustrates the continuity of English constitutional development. William I exacted from every freeman the old national oath to join in defending the king, his lands and his honour, both at home and beyond sea. In 1073 the fyrd took a prominent share in the conquest of Maine. William II cheated the fyrd out of the ten shillings apiece which the shires had given them for their maintenance. Yet it was always faithful to the Crown in its struggle against the feudalists. The defeat of Robert of Belesme, the repulse of David of Scotland at Northallerton, the suppression of the feudal revolt of 1173, were largely due to its valour and patriotism.

Still, the heavy cavalry of the barons was, from the military point of view, a necessary supplement to the infantry of the fyrd, and with the political importance of feudalism annihilated, there was less danger in the feudal array. Yet Henry II, while relying for foreign service mainly on mercenaries, trusted to the fyrd for home defence. His Assize of Arms (1181)(q.v.) revived and reorganized that ancient body, and devised an excellent machinery for compelling every citizen (tota communia liberorum hominum) to possess the arms appropriate to his station in life. The increased dread of mercenaries, through their misuse by John, and their attempts to control the destinies of the kingdom during his son's minority, gave an increased importance to the reissue of the Assize of Arms by Henry III in close connexion with the system of Watch and Ward. In the Statute of Winchester (1285) Edward I still further developed the same system, which a series of later measures of Henry IV, Philip and Mary, and James I has brought down to our own days.

The vague power, never perhaps formally taken away from the sheriff, of summoning the posse comitatus, was from the fourteenth to the sixteenth century supplemented by more definite commissions of array, empowering those addressed to muster and train all men able to bear arms within the counties included in the commission: while in the Tudor period the institution of lord-lieutenants in every county practically deprived the sheriff of his command of the national forces. Henceforth, the lord-lieutenant was the deputy of the Crown for all military matters, and the ultimate custodian of law and order. But the act of 1 James I, c. 25, had to some extent repealed the long series of statutes which enforced the obligation of keeping sufficient arms on each citizen. The Artillery Company of London, which still continues to exist, sprang from a voluntary association during Henry VIII's reign; and the "train bands" of the seventeenth century, which took the place of the mediæval system, though in a sense the continuation of the fyrd, were also largely of voluntary origin. The difficulties caused by the militia question in 1642, between Charles I and his parliament, and the prominent part taken by the train bands in the Civil War, rendered it necessary for the Restoration parliament to reorganize the national forces and reconstitute the militia under the headship of the Crown. Up to 1757 this force was, however, quite neglected, when the absence of the regular army on the continent caused it to be revived as a local organization for internal defence. Its importance as a recruiting ground for the army was also a great reason for its revival. Under George III and Victoria a series of acts of parliament modified the militia laws. During these reigns army reforms were effected that brought the militia into organic relation with the standing army, without destroying its local basis. Previous to these reforms, service was nominally compulsory, though a Militia Ballot Suspension Act made it practically voluntary. As a means of national defence, the militia has been at various times supplemented by a volunteer system, self-supporting and unpaid. The Honourable Artillery Company is an early example of such a force. In 1803 the fear of French invasion caused nearly half a million of men to enrol themselves into volunteer regiments; but the cessation of the panic led to the gradual dying out of the movement. In 1859 a more permanent volunteer organization was started, and an act of 1863 gave this organization a legal status. By an act passed in 1907 great changes were made with regard to the volunteers and the militia. The former were transferred to the territorial army, and the latter to the special contingent of the army reserve, which consists of non-regulars who have undertaken to serve abroad.

Thus far the non-professional and irregular military forces have mainly been dealt with. But even in mediæval times the national militia became gradually both unfit and unwilling for foreign service, for which the shortness of the service of the feudal levies still more disqualified them. The mercenary system of the Normans and Angevins became impossible with the development of constitutional government. The need of regular forces became greater with the development of the political power of England. During the Middle Ages the feudal tenants, or the militia of the neighbouring shires, were enough to repel the Scottish or Welsh inroad; but the systematic wars with France which the fourteenth century witnessed required more systematic forces. The national professional army of modern times has its germ in the reign of Edward I, who developed in his Welsh-Scottish wars the system of employing paid native troops. After a temporary setback under Edward II, the principle triumphed under Edward III. The armies which fought in the Hundred Years' War, though to a small extent composed of forced levies of pressed men, were mainly raised by indentures or contracts made with some great noble or experienced general, who agreed to serve the king abroad with a certain number of men at a fixed rate. The pay was very high, and there was never any difficulty in raising the men. The contract generally ended with the war, so that these armies, though composed of trained troops, were not permanent. Penalties for desertion and disobedience were inflicted by statutes which anticipated the later Mutiny Acts. The germ of a standing army is found in the Yeomen of the Guard instituted by Henry VII, and in the small garrisons of Calais, Berwick, and Dover. In the reign of Elizabeth there were anticipations, in the reign of Charles I the beginnings, of a larger standing force. The complaints of martial law and illegal impressment now became general. The struggle of the Crown for the right of maintaining a standing army had now begun. It was to last until the principle was unwillingly accepted at the end of the seventeenth century. The abortive armies of Charles I and the commencement of a military law that marked his reign were soon eclipsed by the great army levied by parliament [NEW MODEL], which the genius of Cromwell moulded into the most efficient fighting machine known in English history. Under the Restoration several regiments of Cromwell's army were still maintained. At first these numbered only 3,000 men, but during Charles II's reign not only were temporary armies levied for emergencies, but several new regiments added to the permanent forces. The abolition of the feudal levies by the act 12 Car. II, long after they had ceased to be of any actual value (though they were summoned so late as 1640), made a standing army the more necessary. James II largely increased these troops, and the French war, which the Revolution involved, prevented their disbandment. But a standing army was very unpopular with all parties. To the Whigs it suggested tyranny and popery, to the Tories the military despotism of Cromwell. Only after a great struggle was an army of 7,000 men retained after the Peace of Ryswick. But those debates practically decided the question. Henceforth Great Britain has always had a standing army. The constitutional difficulty had been got over by passing an annual Mutiny Act (q.v.), which alone empowered the sovereign to govern the troops by martial law. Despite popular jealousy the numbers of the army have steadily risen. After the Peace of Utrecht the army numbered 8,000. In 1750 it was nearly 19,000. In 1792 it had decreased to 17,000 in time of peace, though in 1777 it had been 90,000; and in 1812 nearly a quarter of a million of men were under arms. The East India Company had been allowed to levy a separate army for the defence of the Indies. After the Indian Mutiny it was incorporated with the royal forces. In the years 1871 and 1872 important changes were made which had the effect of joining together all the various branches of the English military system into a single whole. [CARDWELL.] In 1871 the purchase of commissions by officers was abolished by royal warrant.

The modern standing army of England has always been mainly raised by voluntary enlistment. But so late as the American War "idle and disorderly persons" were impressed for the army as well as for the navy. Difficulties in the way of recruiting were often felt. Perhaps this partly accounts for the survival of the contract system of the Edwards as late as the eighteenth century. So great was the constitutional difficulty suggested by the standing army that only 5,000 men were allowed to live in barracks at the beginning of the nineteenth century. Up to the Crimean War the military system was cumbersome. The commander-in-chief, responsible to the Crown; the "secretary of state for war and the colonies," whose power was limited to war time; the "secretary at war," the parliamentary representative of the army; the treasury, which controlled the commissariat; the home office, which governed the militia—all exercised clashing jurisdictions.

Many reforms have since been made, notably in 1904, when the office of commander-in-chief ceased to exist, a new post, inspector-general, being created, and a council of war framed on the model of the board of admiralty; and again in 1907 by the passing of the Territorial and Reserve Forces Act.

The Great War of 1914 to 1918 produced few permanent changes in the organization of the British army, and its system of command and of administration has undergone little alteration. The territorial army is now, subject to parliamentary sanction, liable for service overseas, and two entirely new corps—the Royal Corps of Signallers and the Royal Tank Corps—have been constituted. The Air Force of the United Kingdom is completely divorced from the army. The compulsory service which was introduced in 1916 was a war-time expedient, and recruiting is now once more on a voluntary basis.

MILL, JAMES (1773-1836), received an appointment in the India office, and rose to be head of the revenue department. Mill was one of the most prominent of those who understood and developed the views of Bentham (q.v.) on government and legislation. He wrote numerous works on metaphysics, economics, and political theory, which exerted great influence on the thought of the nineteenth century, and a "History of British India," 1817-18.

MILL, JOHN STUART (1806-73), son of the preceding, entered the India House in 1823, and in 1856 became head of the examiner's department, from which he retired in 1858. In 1865 he was elected member for Westminster, but was defeated in 1868. In parliament he was an advanced Liberal, and supported with much earnestness woman's suffrage. Mill wrote numerous works, chief of which were his "Political Economy," 1848, "Liberty," 1859, and "Representative Government," 1861. In almost all departments of political, social, and moral philosophy Mill's influence has been very great. As the thinker who attempted to develop and adapt the utilitarianism of Bentham to the complicated needs of modern society his place is specially important; while as a political economist he forms one in the line of succession of great English writers on the subject which began with Adam Smith.

Millenary Petition, THE (1603), so called because it pretended to represent the views of a thousand Puritan clergy, was presented to James I on his way to London shortly after his accession. Its aim was to convert the bare tolerance in which the Puritan clergy had lived under Elizabeth into security. It suggested that clergymen should be left to choose for themselves whether or not to wear cap and surplice; that the use of the sign of the cross in baptism, and bowing at the name of Jesus, should be abolished; that services should be abridged and their music simplified; that proper observance should be given to Sunday; that saints' days on the contrary should not be observed; and that pluralities and sinecures should be abolished. The Petition was discussed and rejected early in 1604 at the Hampton Court Conference (q.v.).

MILNER, ALFRED, 1ST VISCOUNT MILNER (1854-1925), was from 1887 to 1889 private secretary to G. J. Goschen, from 1889 to 1892 under-secretary for finance in Egypt, and chairman of the board of inland revenue from 1892 to 1897. In 1897 he succeeded Lord Rosmead as governor of Cape Colony and high commissioner of South Africa. He was first governor of the Transvaal and Orange River Colonies (1901-5), and in 1906 the House of Lords voted their high appreciation of his services in South Africa. He was created Baron Milner in 1901, and a viscount in 1902. During the Great War he was a member of the war cabinet of Mr. Lloyd George (1916), and became secretary of state for war in 1918 and colonial secretary in 1919. In 1920-1 he was sent on a special mission to Egypt, which resulted in his memorandum advocating Egyptian independence. He died on May 13, 1925.

MILTON, JOHN (1608-74), the poet, came forward in May 1641 as one of the literary champions of the Puritan party, in a pamphlet "Of Reformation touching Church Discipline in England," followed by four others directed against the moderate Episcopalians. The most important is "The Reason of Church Government" (1641). In 1644 he published his famous "Areopagitica." Within a fortnight of the king's execution he published "The Tenure of Kings and Magistrates," justifying the act. In March 1649 he was made secretary for foreign tongues to the council of state. In this year he published his "Eikonoklastes" (in reply to "Eikon Basilike") and "Pro Populo Anglicano Defensio." In 1652 he became quite blind, and practically gave up the work of his secretaryship. In May 1654 he published his "Pro Populo Anglicano Defensio Secunda." He continued to assist in the foreign correspondence of the republic till the Restoration, and tried by a series of vehement pamphlets to prevent that event. After May 1660 he lived for some months in hiding, but he was not molested by the new government, and passed the remainder of his life in peace.

Minden, THE BATTLE OF (August 1, 1759), was fought during the Seven Years' War (q.v.). Ferdinand of Brunswick, the commander of the allies, had under him 10,000 or 12,000 British soldiers under Lord George Sackville. He had previously made an unsuccessful attempt to recapture Frankfort from the French. The French commanders, de Broglie and Contades, pushed after him, and rapidly took Cassel, Münster, and Minden. Ferdinand maintained his position on the right bank of the Weser, and left a detachment of 5,000 men, seemingly unguarded, to lure Contades from his strong position at Minden. The Duc de Broglie was dispatched to attack this body of men, but he was compelled to summon Contades to his assistance. The French generals, thus obliged to accept battle on unfavourable ground, were defeated.

Ministerial Responsibility. As now understood, this phrase expresses the grand working and motive principle of parliamentary and party government. That every holder of a ministerial office should have at any moment to give an account of his stewardship, not to the power that nominally appoints and dismisses him, but to the Commons and the country, who can withdraw from him the confidence that is essential to his staying in office, is a practical doctrine that has turned the nobler parts of government into a self-acting machinery of rare efficiency hitherto. This is now the outcome and function of ministerial responsibility, when the great officers of state have come to be clothed with the whole prerogative of the Crown. Once it was something different, and served another purpose. It was once a device for reconciling the inviolability of the sovereign with the rights of the subject, and the legal saw, "the king can do no wrong," with the fact that the subject was often wronged by the Crown, and the rule of law that every wrong has a remedy. Officers of the king were answerable for the king's measures to the courts of justice and to the High Court of Parliament, and might have to smart for them. This principle was early admitted; it was already an essential check on the royal authority, though somewhat halting in its operation, in 1485; and it was ruled to be the law on a most solemn occasion—the trial of the regicides in 1660. "The law in all cases," said Bridgman, "preserves the person of the king, but what is done by his ministers unlawfully, there is a remedy against his ministers for it." The higher action of the principle, that which has brought the entire ministerial system into subjection to the Commons and the country, has only recently reached its final development. Its germs, however, were sown with the rise of parliament, and attempts to reduce it to practice were made from time to time as parliament became strong. In 1341 a pledge was exacted from Edward III that the chancellor and other great officers should be appointed in parliament, and their work tested by parliament; thus implying "that it is to the nation, not to the king only, that ministers are accountable." In 1378 another was given, that during Richard II's minority the great ministers should be chosen by parliament. But neither of these engagements stood; parliament has never succeeded in permanently enforcing its will by the direct method. In the invention of impeachment the right path towards the indirect and smoother way of working the principle was hit upon; but even impeachment was premature. Under the house of Lancaster signs that this first of constitutional powers was among the births of time are easily discoverable; but under the Tudors there is not a trace of such a promise. With the Stuarts it reappears. The parliamentary prosecutions of Bacon and Cranfield, the proceedings against Buckingham, Strafford, and others, were all manifestations of the instinct that was pushing the Commons towards the momentous issue; and when Charles I thought of admitting Pym and Hampden to important office, and actually bestowed such on Essex and Falkland, he gave a hint, the earliest in history, of what proved to be the true manner of working the principle. But Pym had no perception of this; his aim was to make parliament immediate master of the administration. After the Restoration the movement began in earnest, and on the right line; in the fall of Clarendon, of the Cabal (q.v.), and of Danby, we see one thing clearly, that the Commons had learned the secret of turning out ministers. The incidents of Danby's overthrow are specially instructive; they show that the responsibility of ministers was becoming a reality, and was on its way to great ends. When the Revolution had been consummated the triumph of the doctrine was merely a matter of time. With the development of the party system the earlier idea of a criminal responsibility enforceable by impeachment gave place to the idea of moral responsibility enforceable by loss of office. Under William III and Anne the rule was gradually established that the sovereign should choose the ministers, but parliament should decide whether his choice should hold good. By one power office was given, to another the men who held it were responsible; gained by favour of one, it could be kept only by favour of the other. The voting power in the country could take away but not give. By getting the control of this voting power, at one time the great families, at another King George III, contrived to intercept the effect of the principle, and for more than a century it operated only in seasons of unusual excitement. But the first Reform Bill brought into play its logical consequence. Since 1832 the Commons and voting power of the country have virtually indicated to the sovereign the men who must compose the ministry, as well as dismissed it when so minded. However, since a ministry is now a solid mass, usually entering on and resigning power with unbroken ranks, it would be more accurate to name the doctrine the responsibility of ministries.

Minorca was taken (1708) by the British during the War of the Succession in Spain, and ceded to Great Britain by the Treaty of Utrecht. In 1756 it was recaptured by the French; and Admiral Byng, after a feeble attempt to relieve the town, left it to its fate. The island was restored to Great Britain by the Treaty of Paris (1763). In February 1782 it was again recaptured by 12,000 French and Spaniards, although General Murray and his men, reduced by sickness to 600, made a resolute defence. In the following year it was ceded to Spain, and in 1783 formally given up to her by the Treaty of Versailles. In 1798, in the midst of the struggle with Napoleon, it was retaken by General Stuart, but finally restored to Spain by the Treaty of Amiens (1802).

Mir Jafar was appointed Nawab of Murshidabad, or Bengal, by Clive after Plassey (1757), and granted the zemindary of Calcutta to the British. On the death of his son Meerun, during the Mogul invasion, he lost his reason, and his affairs fell into anarchy. His son-in-law, Mir Kasim, took advantage of this to obtain the throne from Vansittart, governor of Bengal, at the price of the cession of Midnapur, Chittagong, and Burdwan, to the company, and a gratuity of twenty lacs to his benefactors.

Mir Kasim was the son-in-law of Mir Jafar. Raised to the musnud of Murshidabad by Vansittart on the deposition of Mir Jafar (1767), he quarrelled with the British about the revenue laws, and murdered an embassy sent to effect a pacification. War was declared; Murshidabad was taken, and the nawab was compelled to fly. Before he fled he caused the whole of the British residents in the Patna factory (150 in number) to be imprisoned, shot down, and cut to pieces, their mangled remains being thrown into wells. Mir Kasim fled to Oudh. Shuja-ud-Dowlah (q.v.), the vizir, received him with favour; but the terrible defeat of Buxar, and the return of Clive to India, so alarmed the vizir that he compelled Mir Kasim to leave the country (1765).

Mitchel, JOHN (1815-75), was one of the leaders of the Young Ireland party in 1848, and in his journal, the United Irishman, supported open rebellion, for which he was tried, but found not guilty. When the Treason Felony Act was passed, however, he was again arrested, and his newspaper suppressed. He was finally sentenced to fourteen years' transportation, and sent to Bermuda. By breaking his parole he escaped to the United States, where he became an ardent partisan of the Confederates. In 1874 he went to Ireland, and next year was returned to parliament unopposed for Tipperary county. On Disraeli's motion, however, he was declared incapable of sitting. A new writ being issued, he was again elected; but Stephen Moore, a Conservative, who was next on the poll, claimed the seat, and it was adjudged to him by the Irish Court of Common Pleas. Mitchel thereupon resolved to stand for every Irish county in turn, but died before he could carry out his plan.

Biography by W. Dillon, 1888.

Mogul, THE GREAT, was the name commonly given to the Indian prince who was the descendant of Timur the Tartar, "the fire-brand of the universe." Baber, one of his successors, established himself as Emperor of India at Delhi, and transmitted his dignity to his posterity. The invasion of Nadir Shah, and the sack of Delhi, 1739, struck a fatal blow at the grandeur of the Mogul empire. Already the Deccan had split off under a powerful chief, the Nizam-ul-Mulk. The government of Oudh was usurped by another; and the conquests of the Mahrattas tended to reduce the imperial authority to a shadow. In 1788 Delhi was sacked again; the wretched emperor was blinded by a ruffian, and his wives and daughters exposed and dishonoured. After the battle of Patun (1790), the emperor fell wholly into the power of Sindhia. After the battle of Delhi he became a British pensioner, with a large and liberal pension and his residence in Delhi. On the outbreak of the Indian Mutiny in 1857, after a bloody massacre, the descendant of Timur was proclaimed King of Delhi. But after the siege and capture of Delhi by Archdale Wilson he surrendered, and his two murderous sons were shot in the midst of their attendants by Captain Hodson. The Mogul himself was tried, found guilty of treason and murder, and transported to Tunghu in Burma, with his favourite wife and son.

Mohammed Ali (d. 1795) was the son of Anwar-ud-Din, Nawab of the Carnatic. In 1749 he was placed on the throne after the recapture of Arcot from the French and Chanda Sahib. He was shortly, however, attacked in his camp, and with difficulty escaped to Nazir Jung (q.v.). He now made overtures to the French, but Clive's success at Arcot (1751) confirmed him to the British. He now entered into an alliance with Mysore and Tanjore, and raised an army of Mahrattas under Morari Rao. The Carnatic was gradually reduced by the British and native armies. In 1756 a suspension of arms was agreed to, and Mohammed Ali was acknowledged Nawab of the Carnatic. He was beset with difficulties, and in 1757 required the aid of a British detachment to put down the rebellion of his brothers and collect his revenue. During the war he was compelled to pay tribute to the Mahratta Baji Rao (q.v.). His rebellious subjects gave him considerable trouble. In 1769 he quarrelled with Tanjore. The result of the war which followed was the conquest of Tanjore, which was given to Mohammed Ali by the British. In 1776 he was compelled to disgorge it again. He was an object of peculiar aversion to Hyder Ali, owing to the malign influence he was supposed to exercise on the British counsels. The Carnatic became the scene of the war again on the outbreak of hostilities in 1778. During the reign of Mohammed Ali the Carnatic gradually assumed a position of complete dependence on Great Britain.

Mohamrah, THE, a strong Persian fortress on the River Karoon, a branch of the Euphrates, was stormed by the British during the Persian campaign (March 26, 1857).

Mohun, CHARLES, 4TH BARON (1675?–1712), “the Whig bully,” was a nobleman of bad character, conspicuous at intervals during the reigns of William III and Anne. In 1692 he was tried before the Court of the Lord High Steward for aiding his friend Captain Richard Hill in the murder of the actor William Mountford. Although palpably guilty, he was acquitted. He behaved with great bravery while serving as a volunteer in the expedition against Brest (1694). In Anne’s reign he was chiefly conspicuous for his uncompromising Whiggism. He spoke against Nottingham’s Occasional Conformity Bill, and wished to have him sent to the Tower for an imputation on the memory of King William. He warmly defended the Godolphin ministry after its fall (1710). Marlborough chose him as his second in a duel arranged with Lord Powlett, which was stopped, however, by royal authority. Mohun was himself slain in a duel with the 4th Duke of Hamilton (James Douglas), not, however, before he had mortally wounded his adversary (November 15, 1712). The quarrel was of a private nature; but as Hamilton was about to be sent to France, it was believed with favourable messages to the Pretender, his death was regarded by the Tories as a political murder.

Moleyns, or MOLYNEUX, ADAM (d. 1450), Bishop of Chichester, was one of the negotiators of the marriage between Henry VI and Margaret of Anjou (1444), and also assisted in arranging a truce with France, both of which acts made him very unpopular. He was one of the victims of Jack Cade’s rebellion, being murdered by the insurgents as he was on the point of escaping to France.

Monasticism. Monks were bodies of men living together apart from the world, for the purpose of leading a religious life. Monasticism first sprang up in the East, where it assumed a solitary and contemplative character; as it spread in the West its organization became more practical. The first monks who exercised any influence on Britain were the Celtic monks of Ireland, where Christianity early assumed a monastic and tribal character. The Irish Church was not so much organized round the bishops as round the monastery. The tribe was reproduced in the monastic brotherhood, of which the abbot was father and head. Celtic Christianity was poetical and imaginative. It sent forth missionaries amongst the Britons and the Picts. In the fourth century Ninian established a monastery at Candida Casa, or Whithorn, in Galloway. Soon afterwards two bishops of Gaul dotted settlements along the Wye which rapidly spread. Columba’s monastery at Iona was the source whence Christianity was carried into the Northumbrian kingdom (635), and Lindisfarne became the great missionary station whence the conversion of the north of England was carried on. When the Roman monk Augustine converted the Kentish kingdom he likewise established a monastery at Canterbury (598). The Roman and the Celtic Church advanced in their work of conversion till they came into collision. When in 664 it was agreed at the Synod of Whitby (q.v.) that the Roman use should prevail in the Northumbrian kingdom, the downfall of Celtic monasticism followed. Such monks as remained conformed to the Roman, i.e., the Benedictine rule; those who refused returned to Iona. Before the end of the eleventh century Celtic monasticism died away, and the more vigorous system of Rome had taken its place. There was no great difference between the objects which the two systems proposed. Prayer, work, and reading were alike the aims of the communities. The monks settled on unoccupied lands, and by their labour brought them under cultivation. They taught the neighbouring folk, and by their active lives gave a standing protest against the prevalent sensuality of a rude people. The monasteries were the homes of peace and learning, and were the means of spreading civilization. The Northumbrian thegn, Benedict Biscop, founded his monasteries of Wearmouth (674) and Jarrow (682), where rose a band of English scholars, of whom Bæda is the chief. But even before his death Bæda saw the decline of the great days of monasticism. His letter to Egbert, Archbishop of York, complains of the excessive number of monasteries founded from a desire to obtain from the king grants of land. The monks were the mere creatures of the thegns who put them there; they lived idle and useless lives; they set a bad example, and impoverished the state. Bæda’s warnings were unheeded, and punishment was not long in coming. The Northmen attacked the monasteries, which were near the sea, and whose treasures offered them a rich booty. The ninth century saw the overthrow by the heathen of most of the renowned monasteries of England. The rule of life, such as it was, seems after this to have fallen into disuse, and they were mostly left in the possession of secular clerks. In the middle of the tenth century a monastic revival spread from the abbeys of Glastonbury and Abingdon. Dunstan (q.v.) and Ethelwulf laboured to restore a system which alone could repair in English society the ravages wrought by the Danes. They pursued two objects, the substitution of monks for secular clerks, and of the rule of St. Benedict for the vaguer and less organized rules which had been previously adopted. Their efforts met with great temporary success. Kings and nobles again endowed monasteries, and monasticism became once more a great influence in the progress of English society.

The Norman Conquest brought still stronger and more definite organization. The great monastic reform on the continent, which had begun at Cluny, was steadily pursued in Normandy at Bec. From Bec came the two archbishops, Lanfranc (q.v.) and Anselm (q.v.). Not only were the English monasteries more rigidly ruled by Norman abbots, but in cases where cathedrals had been originally of monastic foundation Lanfranc replaced the secular canons by regulars. [CATHEDRAL.] By means of the monasteries especially the superior civilization of the Normans was spread through England. But the institution of monasticism itself had well-nigh spent its strength. The eleventh and twelfth centuries witnessed the formation of a number of new orders, all following the Benedictine rule in its main features, but each striving to give it greater reality.

Each of the monastic movements which led to the formation of the Carthusians (q.v.), Premonstratensians, Austin Canons, and, above all, Cistercians (q.v.), found its echo in England. Amongst the founders of the Cistercian order was an Englishman, Stephen Harding, and the Cistercians were a favourite order in England, as the remains of their great abbeys in Yorkshire sufficiently show. The Crusades created a new kind of monasticism—the military orders of the Knights Templars and the Knights of St. John. One order only was specially English, the Gilbertines, founded by Gilbert of Sempringham [SEMPRINGHAM, ORDER OF]; an order remarkable for double monasteries of men and women side by side. This feverish growth of new orders was a sign of weakness rather than of strength. Monasticism could not save itself from degeneracy, and in the beginning of the thirteenth century a new effort was made by St. Francis and St. Dominic, who established the mendicant orders. [FRIARS.] The friars rapidly increased in numbers and in popular estimation, and the glory of the old orders paled before them; but in spite of their greater activity, the friars also rapidly ran their course. The fourteenth century saw the gradual growth of a feeling against religious orders. The Templars, through their pride and wealth, and the mystery which surrounded their doings, were the first to fall. They were finally dissolved in 1312. In England the royal power showed great jealousy of "alien priories," or houses depending on foreign monasteries. Edward I and Edward III both confiscated their lands and possessions. Finally, in 1416, parliament dissolved these "alien priories," and vested their lands in the Crown.

The feeling against monastic institutions was largely increased by the Lollard movement; but on many sides it was felt that their usefulness had really gone. In early times the monks had been settlers and reclaimers of barren land; later they had been good farmers, who had not dealt hardly with those who worked under them. The Cistercians in Yorkshire especially were the chief merchants in the wool trade with Flanders. But monasteries, like all corporations, though easy masters, were tenacious of their rights. They were often involved in quarrels with the rising spirit of municipal freedom. At St. Albans, for instance, the monks and the burghers were in constant strife about trifling matters. The enfranchisement of villeins, and the gradual extinction of villenage in the fourteenth century, brought economic changes which were unfavourable to the tenure of lands by corporations. The land was more and more let to tenants, and not worked by the monks themselves. Luxury and idleness went hand in hand. It became clear that any reform in the Church must begin with the monasteries. In 1523 Wolsey obtained bulls from the pope suppressing forty of the smaller monasteries, and authorizing the application of their revenues to educational purposes. The Renaissance had made men feel that a learned clergy was necessary, instead of indolent monks. The example set by Wolsey was rapidly followed when Henry VIII threw off from the Church of England the papal headship. The monasteries were particularly obnoxious to the king as harbouring those who were discontented with his changes. Their weakness and their wealth made them a tempting object of attack. A visitation of the monasteries was followed by an act of parliament authorizing the suppression of the smaller monasteries whose incomes were below £200 a year (1536). Their fall was quickly followed by that of the larger monasteries also (1539). The monastic system was swept out of England. The monasteries themselves were cast down. Their vast lands were granted to nobles, or were sold, and the result was to give an additional impetus to the social and agrarian revolution which was already in progress. The easy-going monks were replaced by the capitalists, who were buying up an increasing amount of English land. The old-fashioned farming of the monks was superseded. Arable land was turned into pasture for the more profitable purpose of growing wool. Many peasants were thrown out of work, and the doors of the monasteries no longer stood open for the relief of destitution. Thus the dissolution of the monasteries added materially to the distress and discontent already prevalent, and helped to cause the popular risings under the Tudors, and to necessitate the legislation of Henry VIII against "sturdy beggars." Ultimately the Poor Law of Elizabeth adopted the principle of distributing alms to those in want, and replaced the charity of the monks by the legal contributions of the community. In constitutional matters the suppression of the monasteries largely diminished the members of the House of Lords. The abbots ceased to exist, and the character of the Upper House was changed by the loss of the preponderance of spiritual peers. [ABBOT.]

The general character of English religious orders may be shown by the number of their houses at the time of the dissolution. There were at the date of the dissolution some 186 Benedictine houses, 173 Augustinian, 101 Cistercian, 33 of the four orders of friars, 32 Premonstratensian, 28 of the Knights Hospitallers, 25 Gilbertine, 20 Cluniac, 9 Carthusian, and a few of other orders. The total number of monasteries was 616, and their revenues were approximately valued at £142,914 yearly.

Monck, GEORGE, DUKE OF ALBEMARLE (1608-70), the second son of a Devonshire baronet, entered the army as a volunteer, and took part in the expedition to the Isle of Rhé in 1628; and after peace was made with France he joined the Earl of Oxford's regiment, which had been raised for the support of the Protestants in Germany and Holland. He remained abroad for ten years, returning to England in 1639 in time to take part in the Scottish war. After hesitating for some time between king and parliament, Monck decided on joining the forces which had been sent over from Ireland by Ormonde to Charles's assistance. As major-general of these troops, Monck took part in the battle of Nantwich, where he was taken prisoner and committed to the Tower. Here he remained for more than two years, but in 1647 he was liberated and placed in command of the English forces in Ulster. He was so badly supported that he was forced to make terms with the rebels under Owen Roe O'Neill, for which he was censured by parliament, although the Independent leaders had advised the treaty. But Monck had convinced Cromwell of his ability, and on the latter being appointed, in 1650, to the command of the Parliamentary forces in Scotland, he made Monck lieutenant-general of artillery. At the battle of Dunbar Monck showed great bravery, and on Cromwell's return to England he was left to complete the reduction of Scotland, which he speedily effected, though not without considerable cruelty. In 1653, on the outbreak of the Dutch war, Monck was appointed one of the admirals of the fleet, and had a share in the great victory off the Texel. He returned to his command in Scotland in 1654, and remained there till the death of Oliver Cromwell, when he acknowledged Richard, and advised him to rely on the Presbyterian party, and endeavour to gather the old nobility and the country gentlemen round him. But during Richard's short reign anarchy prevailed in England. The parliament had been forcibly dissolved by the army, and the Rump restored, only to be dispersed a few months afterwards by the soldiers. Having obtained a grant of money from the Scottish Estates, on New Year's Day, 1660, Monck crossed the border, and on February 3 entered London. All opposition to him proved fruitless, and the Rump, who had been hurriedly resuscitated, hailed him as their deliverer. Perceiving the strength of the Royalist reaction he determined to restore the monarchy, and sent an invitation to Charles II to return. In taking this step he had the majority of a free parliament at his back, for he had compelled the Rump to dissolve itself, and the new House of Commons, though largely Presbyterian, contained a vast number of members who regarded the royal family with favour. At the same time he showed his prudence by counselling Charles to promise a general pardon, freedom of conscience, payment of the soldiers' arrears, and the confirmation of confiscated estates. He also took into account the probability of his plans being upset by resistance on the part of the army. He did his best to mollify the temper of such regiments as were within his reach by promises and rewards; and in order, if necessary, to confront force with force, he called out and organized the militia. So skilfully did he arrange matters that only one slight outbreak occurred. Lambert, who had opposed Monck on his southward march, and had been taken, escaped from prison and raised a small army in the centre of England. The attempt was easily quashed, Lambert was again made prisoner, and Charles, on landing, was received with general satisfaction. Monck reaped the highest rewards. He was created Duke of Albemarle and lieutenant-general of the forces, and a perpetual pension of £7,000 a year was granted to him. On the renewal of the Dutch war in 1664 he was appointed joint admiral with Prince Rupert, and behaved with his usual bravery. During the plague of 1665 he was invested by the king with the government of London, and by his energy greatly alleviated the general misery, and preserved order. He took no prominent part in politics during the few remaining years of his life.

Monmouth, JAMES SCOTT, DUKE OF (1649-85). [SCOTT.]

Monopolies. The first attack upon the power of the Crown to issue patents conferring exclusive rights of carrying on certain trades was made in 1597. According to the common law every man was entitled freely to exercise his trade, but the principle was generally recognized that exceptions might be made to this rule in the case of any process newly invented or introduced from abroad. Anxious to gain a control over the increasing commerce of the country, the government was likely to stretch this principle farther than it would bear, and the grant of patents to courtiers was among the readiest means of satisfying their demands. In 1597 the Commons sent up an address to Elizabeth against the abuse of monopolies, but an evasive reply was given, and in 1601 a bitter debate of four days took place on the subject. The queen thought it wise to yield, promised that all injurious grants should be repealed, and caused most of the patents to be revoked. Their number increased again under James I: "whereas, at the king's coming in," says a contemporary, "there were complaints of some eight or nine monopolies then in being, they are now said to be multiplied by so many scores." A detailed examination of the most important cases was made by S. R. Gardiner, who declared that they were not open to the usual charges brought against them. "They were not made with the object of filling the Exchequer. They were not made, primarily at least, with the object of filling the pockets of the courtiers. They were, it is impossible to doubt, the result of a desire on the part of official persons to encourage commerce, and to promote the welfare of the State, though it cannot be denied that their zeal was often greater than their knowledge, and that their best efforts were not unfrequently tainted by . . . favouritism and corruption. Take, for example, the commission for gold and silver thread. Such thread had been made before in England, but on a small scale; in 1611 and 1616 patents were granted to certain persons, including several courtiers, on two grounds: first, that they would establish a manufacture large enough to compete with the continent; and secondly, that they would import bullion, and not use English coin, the sinews and strength of our state." In 1618 the monopoly was taken into the king's hands, and a proclamation issued forbidding the manufacture of gold and silver thread by private persons, while a commission was issued for the punishment of offenders. The commissioners caused disobedient workmen to be arrested, tools seized, and goldsmiths and silkmens imprisoned upon refusal to enter into bonds not to sell to unlicensed persons. The harshness with which the monopolies were enforced, together with the fact that the chief monopolists were also profiting by patents for the control of alehouses and inns, and shamefully abusing their power, caused a storm of indignation which broke in the parliament of 1621. On February 19 Noy moved for an inquiry, and his proposal was seconded by Coke. A committee of the whole House investigated the patents for inns, and also those conferring monopolies. The king yielded to the storm, and Buckingham, on the advice of Dean Williams, declared he would not even protect his brother. Sir Giles Mompesson and Sir Francis Mitchell were accused by the Commons before the Lords (a measure usually regarded as the revival of the power of impeachment, though not technically such), and heavy penalties were imposed. Finally, in the parliament of 1624, an act was passed abolishing most of the monopolies. Some few, however, were specially retained as for the public advantage. A few years later Lord Treasurer Weston endeavoured to raise money by creating chartered companies, which escaped the act of 1624 by being open to all merchants who cared to pay certain fees. Much discontent was caused among those traders who were unable to join, and the grants were all revoked in 1639. [W. J. A.]

Monroe Doctrine, THE, promulgated on December 3, 1823, by President James Monroe, was a declaration of United States policy towards both Europe and the continent of America, prompted by the political situation in Europe and the revolted Spanish-American colonies. During the forty years following the Declaration of Independence the prestige of the United States in America had grown, and with it a desire on the part of the United States government to watch and to safeguard the future of the New World. This double process received an impetus in the acquisition of Louisiana (1803) and Florida (1811). But the immediate cause of President Monroe's action was the danger of French, and to a less extent of Russian, interference in the New World, revealed in the Tsar Alexander I's ukase of 1821 and in the French invasion of Spain in April 1823. Great Britain was moved by an equally insistent fear of French and Russian designs, in Spain and in the Near East respectively. To combat the former, Castlereagh had already (1822) appointed consuls to the South American republics as a step towards recognition, resolved that a war between France and Spain should not result in French interference in the revolted Spanish colonies. This policy was continued by Canning, who interviewed Rush, the United States minister in London, in August and September 1823, and outlined the British attitude. Canning renounced any ulterior design of his own in Spanish America, declared that recognition of the republics could not be long delayed, and denounced any intervention in Spanish America by foreign powers. In the following month (October 3) he interviewed Polignac, the French ambassador, and secured a similar self-denying ordinance on the part of France in the form of the "Polignac Memorandum." Canning, however, was not disposed to recognize the independence of the American States at once. And his unwillingness, combined with the fact that the Polignac Memorandum did not arrive at Washington before the close of the cabinet sittings on November 26, resulted in the proclamation by Monroe of the famous Doctrine on December 3.

The Doctrine, of which the authorship is attributed by modern scholars more to the foreign secretary, John Adams, than to the president, claimed the right of self-determination for the continent of America, together with separation from and equality with Europe. It declared that "the American continents, by the free and independent position which they have assumed and maintained, are henceforth not to be considered as future subjects for colonization by any European powers," and that the two continents were to preserve an attitude of non-interference towards each other. The Doctrine was denounced in France and Russia, but welcomed by Spanish America and by Great Britain, though Canning was chagrined that the United States had outstripped him in his policy of benevolence towards the new republics. Subsequent appeals were made to the Monroe Doctrine (which in time became extended in significance until it was regarded in Europe as militant and aggressive) in the Texas dispute of 1845, the Panama dispute of 1850, the Cuba question of 1853, and the Nicaragua question of 1895.

Montacute, JOHN DE, EARL OF SALISBURY (d. 1400), nephew of the 2nd earl, was one of Richard II's chief friends. He took part in the proceedings against Gloucester in 1397, and in 1400 joined the conspiracy against Henry IV. He was seized by the people at Cirencester, and beheaded without trial.

Montacute, WILLIAM, 1ST EARL OF SALISBURY, was, as Baron Montacute, one of Edward III's chief friends and advisers, and inspired and participated in the arrest of Mortimer (1330). For his services he was made Lord of Man, which he conquered between 1340 and 1342, and in 1337 Earl of Salisbury. He was admiral of the fleet and took a prominent part in the Scottish and French wars. He died in 1344.

Montagu, CHARLES, EARL OF HALIFAX (1661-1715), was educated at Westminster and Cambridge. In 1687 he gained himself a wide reputation by the happy parody of the "Town and Country Mouse," written in conjunction with his friend Prior. In 1689 he entered the Convention Parliament for Maldon. The new king soon granted him a pension of £500 a year; and in 1691 he was appointed chairman of a committee of the House of Commons, and one of the commissioners of the treasury. He bore a prominent part in the debates for regulating the trials for treason. He took up Pater-son's scheme for establishing a national bank, and hence may be regarded as one of the founders of the Bank of England (1694). In the same year he was appointed chancellor of the exchequer, and in the next was actively concerned in the measures taken to restore the currency, and became a privy councillor. It was at his suggestion that a window-tax was levied for the purposes of meeting the expenses incidental to the new coinage. In 1697 he was appointed first lord of the treasury, and in the next two years was one of the members of the regency during the king's absence. About the same time he was attacked in parliament, but was acquitted on all points, and even received the thanks of the House for his services. He now proposed to reorganize the East India Company by combining the new and the old companies (1698). After this time he began to lose his popularity; public feeling was against him, and even the men of letters, despite his patronage of the greatest literary characters of his day, were unsparing in abuse. Stung by this treatment he resigned the chancellorship of the exchequer, and fell back upon a very lucrative sinecure (the auditorship of the exchequer) which his brother had been nursing for him since the previous year. In 1701 he was called to the Upper House by the title of Lord Halifax; and the same year was impeached, though without success, for his share in the Partition Treaty of 1698. In 1714 he was made Earl of Halifax, and died the next year. Halifax's character was most mercilessly assailed by the writers of his time; and even Pope, who was but a boy when Montagu retired from the House of Commons, has attacked him in some of his bitterest and most pungent verses. Halifax is said to have been the Bufo of the "Epistle to Arbuthnot," where even his patronage of men of letters is turned into scorn, and the whole charge summed up with the couplet accusing him of neglecting Dryden when alive—

"But still the great have kindness in reserve;—
He helped to bury whom he helped to starve."

Montagu, CHARLES, EARL AND 1ST DUKE OF MANCHESTER (1660?-1722), succeeded to his father's earldom in 1682. At the Revolution he joined the northern rising in favour of the Prince of Orange, and accompanied William III to Ireland. In 1697 he was sent as ambassador to Venice, and in the following year to Paris, where he was informed that Louis XIV had accepted the Spanish crown for his grandson. He sent news to William of the proclamation of James III as King of England, and was at once recalled. His correspondence at the time reveals feelings of despondency. He became secretary of state, but on the accession of Anne was dismissed from office. In 1707 he was again sent as ambassador to Venice, but was instructed to halt at Vienna in order to try to dissuade the emperor from sending troops to Naples. On the death of Anne he declared for the house of Hanover. He was created Duke of Manchester in 1719.

Montagu, EDWARD, 2ND EARL OF MANCHESTER (1602-71), eldest son of Henry, 1st earl, educated at Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, accompanied Prince Charles to Spain, represented Huntingdonshire in the first two parliaments of Charles I, and was summoned to the Upper House in May 1626 as Baron Montagu of Kimbolton. He succeeded his father as Earl of Manchester, November 7, 1642. In 1640 Lord Kimbolton was one of the peers who urged Charles to call a parliament; he also acted as one of the commissioners to treat with the Scots, and his name was amongst those used by Lord Saville in the forged invitation to the Scots. In the Long Parliament he was one of the leaders of the Puritans in the House of Lords, and his importance was shown by his being the only peer joined with the five members impeached by the king. He raised a regiment and fought under Essex at Edgehill. In August 1643 Manchester was appointed serjeant-major-general of the Associated Counties (q.v.), in which capacity he reconquered Lincolnshire, and took part in the battle of Marston Moor. His subordinate, Cromwell, to whom most of these successes were due, blamed him for the slowness of his movements after that battle, and the little use he made of the victory. Manchester, with the army of the Association, was summoned south to oppose the king after his victory over Essex in Cornwall. But he showed at the second battle of Newbury, and after it, the same hesitation to make use of a success or an opportunity. Cromwell accused him to the House of Commons, and a lively quarrel took place. A committee of the Commons was appointed which heard witnesses, and collected evidence against the earl; but the charge was dropped when Manchester had been removed from command by the Self-denying Ordinance (q.v.). The earl remained, however, one of the Derby House Committee, and became Speaker of the House of Lords, and one of the keepers of the great seal. He also became chancellor of the University of Cambridge, and conducted the visitation and reform of that university. Manchester resisted the trial of the king and the foundation of the Commonwealth, refused to sit in Cromwell's House of Lords, and helped to bring about the Restoration. Charles II appointed him lord chamberlain in order to prove his reconciliation with the Presbyterians.

Montagu, EDWARD, 1ST EARL OF SANDWICH (1625-72), son of Sir Sidney Montagu, took the popular side in the Civil Wars, fought at Marston Moor, and commanded a regiment in the New Model (q.v.). In 1645 he entered the House of Commons as knight of the shire for Huntingdon, and acted with the Independents till 1648. In the years from 1648 to 1653 he took no part in political life, but in 1653 he was appointed one of the commissioners of the admiralty, and joined Blake in the command of the fleet. He was appointed to Cromwell's House of Lords in 1657. In 1659 he communicated with Charles II, and used his command of the fleet, charged to arbitrate between Denmark and Sweden, to forward the Restoration. For this service he was made Earl of Sandwich. In the first Dutch War he commanded a squadron at the battle off Lowestoft (June 3, 1665), and commanded at the attack on the Dutch fleet at Bergen (August). Obligated by attacks in parliament to give up the command of the fleet, he was appointed ambassador to Spain, and succeeded in 1668 in bringing about the treaty which secured the independence of Portugal. He was killed in the battle of Southwold Bay (May 28, 1672) (q.v.).

Biography by Frank R. Harris, 1912.

Montagu, JOHN, 4TH EARL OF SANDWICH (1718-92), early in life obtained public offices of importance. As plenipotentiary to the States-General he signed in 1748 the preliminaries of the Treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle. He was made first lord of the admiralty on his return to England, and became so intimately connected with the Bedford faction that, when Pelham wished in 1751 to rid himself of that faction, he began by the dismissal of Lord Sandwich. During the next twelve years Lord Sandwich was out of office, and was much more congenially employed with the gay brotherhood of Medmenham, of which he was a conspicuous member. In 1763 he became first lord of the admiralty, and the same year was made one of the secretaries of state as a colleague of Lord Halifax. In this post he signalized himself by his violent denunciation of Wilkes, of whom he had but lately been a boon companion. This obtained for him the nickname of "Jemmy Twitcher." As the head of a department he was in his proper sphere, for his industry, as Walpole says, was so remarkable that the world mistook it for abilities. In 1765 he was guilty of using the meanest misrepresentation to the king in order to induce him to strike out the name of the Princess of Wales from the Regency Bill. The king was furiously indignant; and within two months dismissed the ministry. In 1768, when the Duke of Grafton made an alliance with the Bedford faction, Lord Sandwich "took over the salary and the patronage of the Post Office." He remained in that office until the Grafton ministry gave way to Lord North's administration, in which Sandwich returned to the admiralty. He failed signally both in the general conduct of business and in reducing the revolted colonies. In April 1779 Fox attacked him fiercely. Narrowly escaping a direct vote of censure, Sandwich fell with Lord North in 1782, and thenceforth lived in retirement, unrespected and unloved.

Montagu, JOHN NEVILLE, MARQUIS OF (d. 1471). [NEVILLE.]

Montague, ANTHONY BROWNE, 1ST VISCOUNT (1526-92). [BROWNE.]

Montfort, ALMERIC DE, was the fourth (?) son of Simon de Montfort. Destined for holy orders he was appointed treasurer of York, but after his father's death was deprived of his office and fled abroad. He was supposed to have been privy to the Viterbo murder, but was cleared by a declaration of the whole University of Padua, where he had spent several years in study. He was taken prisoner by Edward I in 1276 while escorting his sister Eleanor to Wales, but in 1282, at the pope's intercession, he was released. He died in 1292 (?), the last male survivor of his family.

Montfort, GUY DE, was the third (?) son of Simon de Montfort, and took part with his father in the Barons' War, commanding the van at the battle of Lewes. Wounded and captured at the battle of Evesham, he escaped to France and thence to Italy, where in 1271 he murdered Henry of Almayne at Viterbo. For this he was excommunicated (1273), but was eventually pardoned, and fought in the papal army. In 1287 he was taken prisoner by the Sicilians, and ended his days in prison (1288 ?).

Montfort, HENRY DE (d. 1265), was the eldest son of Simon de Montfort. He took part with his father in his opposition to Henry III, and with his brother Guy commanded the van of the baronial army at Lewes, and, after the victory, took charge of Prince Edward. The irresponsible conduct of Henry and his brothers during the period between the battles of Lewes and Evesham was one of the chief causes of their father's fate. Henry was killed at the battle of Evesham.

Montfort, SIMON DE (1208 ?-65). The marriage of Simon, lord of Montfort and Evreux, with the sister and co-heiress of the Earl of Leicester, in the reign of Henry II, was the origin of the connexion of the Montforts with England. Their second son, Simon, the leader of the Albigensian crusade, to whom fell the title and half the estates of the earldom of Leicester, married Alice de Montmorency, and of this marriage, Simon, the great Earl of Leicester, was apparently the fourth and youngest son. His father seems never to have enjoyed the actual possession of his English estates, and died in 1218 leaving to his sons—of whom only two, Almeric or Amaury, and Simon, survived—nothing more than his ancestral territories and his claims in England. Amaury resigned his rights to his younger brother, who came to England in 1230 to try his fortune. He was favourably received by Henry III, and in 1231 obtained seisin to his lands. In 1238, to the intense indignation of the baronage, he was secretly married to the king's sister, Eleanor, widow of William Marshal. Next year he was formally invested with the earldom of Leicester, and soon after acted as godfather at Prince Edward's christening. Up to this date there had been nothing to distinguish de Montfort from the crowd of foreign adventurers who haunted the court of Henry III. In 1239, however, the first signs of a breach between the king and Leicester became apparent. A dispute occurred over a debt for which the earl vouched Henry as his surety, and Henry, after loading his erstwhile friend with abuse, ordered him from his presence. De Montfort escaped with his wife to France, cheered in his exile by a letter from Bishop Grosseteste of Lincoln, whom he had made his friend. In less than a year the king was reconciled, but Simon was glad to take refuge from the annoyances of the English court in the excitement of a crusade (1240-1). In Palestine he could do little, though his ability so impressed the barons of the kingdom of Jerusalem that they begged the emperor to appoint him governor of the land. In 1242-3 Henry's miserable campaign in Poitou engaged him. For the next five years no incident of importance is recorded in connexion with his career, although he appears on several occasions to have mediated between the Crown and the baronage. In 1248 he was appointed by the king lieutenant of Gascony. Into the details of his five years' administration it is not necessary to enter. There can be no doubt that he acted occasionally with ill-timed severity, and that the pleasure which a strong man has in the sense of mastery led him sometimes into indiscretions; but it is clear that his administration was on the whole successful, and that he was sadly handicapped by the vacillation and bad faith of the king. He returned to England in 1254, his grievances unforgotten, and on the meeting of the Mad Parliament in 1258 he definitely emerged as the king's opponent. From this time to his death he was the foremost figure in the opposition; and it was during this period that he made so powerful an impression upon the popular mind by his political measures and personal qualities. He was, with the Earl of Gloucester, one of the twenty-four who drew up the Provisions of Oxford (q.v.), and a member of the permanent council of fifteen; and in 1259 he took a prominent part in the negotiation of the Peace of Paris with Louis IX of France. In that same year, however, he quarrelled with Gloucester, with whose narrowly oligarchical ideas he had little sympathy, and associated himself with Prince Edward and the lesser tenants-in-chief in the demand for further reform which bore fruit in the Provisions of Westminster. In 1261 Henry's reconciliation with Edward, and his repudiation of the Provisions of Oxford, drove de Montfort and Gloucester once more to concerted action; and, in the hope of enlisting more general support, they summoned three knights from every shire to attend an assembly at St. Albans. Their alliance proved short-lived, and in December de Montfort crossed to France, leaving Gloucester master of the situation. His return early next year was shortly followed by the death of his rival, whose successor, the young Earl Gilbert, was Simon's devoted follower. This accession to the baronial cause was, however, neutralized by the success of Edward in building up a royal party, and in 1263 both sides agreed to submit to the arbitration of St. Louis. But the Mise of Amiens (q.v.) was too one-sided to be accepted by the barons, and de Montfort determined to appeal to arms. His victory at Lewes in 1264 gave both the king and Prince Edward into his hands, and in the Mise of Lewes (q.v.) a new settlement of the realm was drawn up. A council of nine persons was elected by the Earls of Leicester and Gloucester and the Bishop of Worcester, to control the administration; but the real power was vested in de Montfort alone. To win support for the new government, he convened the famous parliament of January 1265, to which were summoned not only knights of the shire, but also representatives of certain selected cities and boroughs. The assembly did not, however, achieve its purpose. The old cleavage in the baronial ranks reappeared. Earl Gilbert, following the example set by his father, broke with de Montfort at the crisis of his fortunes. He fled to his estates on the Welsh Marches, where he was joined in May 1265 by Edward, who had succeeded in escaping from his custodians at Hereford. De Montfort's army was caught and overwhelmed by the royal forces at Evesham; and the great earl himself was among the slain (August 4 1265).

Simon long enjoyed the reputation of being the creator of the English House of Commons, but modern research has demonstrated the futility of this view. There were abundant precedents for the addition of a popular element of one type or another to the baronial parliaments of the thirteenth century. What was new was the combination of the two types of representative, from borough and from shire, in a simple assembly, and for a specifically political purpose. Even so, the gulf dividing the parliament of de Montfort from the parliaments of the Edwardian period was a wide one. De Montfort's assembly was merely the isolated experiment of a baronial leader. It remained for his rival and disciple Edward to establish the popular element in our parliament on a permanent basis. "The true successor of the martyred earl was the future Edward I."

Montfort, SIMON DE (d. 1271), second son of Simon de Montfort, first distinguished himself in the year 1264 by defending Northampton against the royalists. He was, however, defeated, taken prisoner, and his life only saved by the personal intervention of Prince Edward. He was not released till after the battle of Lewes, when he was appointed by his father warden of Surrey and Sussex. After the battle of Evesham he held out in the castle of Kenilworth, and through his intercession the lives of the King of the Romans and his son, who were in his custody, were spared. After the surrender of the castle he escaped to France, whence he moved to Italy. There, in conjunction with his brother Guy, he murdered Henry of Almayne, at Viterbo (1271). For this crime he was excommunicated, and shortly afterwards died.

Montrose, JAMES GRAHAM, 5TH EARL OF (1612-50). [GRAHAM.]

Montserrat, one of the Leeward Islands presidencies discovered and named by Columbus in 1493 after a mountain in Spain, was colonized from St. Kitt's in 1632, mainly by Roman Catholics, captured by the French and recaptured in 1667, and restored to Great Britain by the Peace of Breda. It capitulated to France in 1782, but was restored again to Great Britain next year by the Peace of Versailles. It is governed by a governor assisted by a nominated legislative council of three ex-officio and three unofficial members, and sends representatives to the legislative council of the Leeward Islands.

Moodkee, THE BATTLE OF (December 18, 1845), was fought during the Sikh War. After a fatiguing march of twenty-one miles over an arid plain Sir Hugh Gough found himself face to face with the army of Lal Singh. He was taken completely by surprise. The enemy's horse endeavoured to outflank him, but were repulsed. In this first conflict between the British and the Khalsa soldiers the superiority of the latter in discipline and musketry was very apparent. The commander-in-chief had himself to rally a flying native regiment, and in the confusion one British regiment fired into another. Lal Singh was the first to fly, with his cavalry, and he was at length followed by the infantry, who withdrew under cover of night, leaving 17 guns in the hands of the victors. The British loss amounted to 872 killed and wounded.

Moore, SIR JOHN (1761-1809), was the son of a Glasgow physician. His education was acquired chiefly on the continent, till in 1776 he entered the army. Two years later he was ordered to Nova Scotia, where he remained almost inactive during the American War. On the conclusion of peace in 1783 he was placed on half pay, and was returned to parliament in 1784 for the group of Selkirk burghs. In 1790 he became lieutenant-colonel of the 51s.

Regiment. Four years later he saw almost his first active service at the siege of Calvi, in Corsica, where he led the storming party of grenadiers into the chief fort. He was appointed adjutant-general of the island, but he soon gave up the post, and, returning to England, was ordered to the West Indies under Sir Ralph Abercromby. In the expedition against St. Lucia he distinguished himself by his courage and energy, and was rewarded by being appointed governor of the island. In this position his continuous exertions, combined with the malarious character of the climate, twice disabled him, and in the summer of 1797 he returned to England with Abercromby, whom he followed to Ireland. He was engaged against the rebels at New Ross and defeated them at Wexford. In 1799 he was sent to Holland, whence he returned severely wounded. In 1800 he was again employed under Abercromby in the expedition to Egypt. At the landing of the troops Moore signalized himself by his prompt decision in bringing up the reserves at the crisis of the battle, and so gaining the victory. At Aboukir he was again conspicuous, and again wounded. While the Peace of Amiens lasted, he remained at home on staff employment, but on the renewal of the war was placed as second in command of the troops in the Mediterranean. In 1808 he was sent to Sweden in command of 10,000 men to help the king. Some difference occurring between them, Moore was placed under arrest, and on freeing himself he returned at once with his troops to England. He had no sooner arrived than he was sent off to the Peninsula to act under Burrard and Dalrymple; but on their recall after the Convention of Cintra (q.v.) he was appointed to the command in chief (October 6, 1808). At last he had an opportunity of displaying his great military talents, and he did not throw the chance away. He advanced into Spain, but was compelled to retreat to Corunna (q.v.) under terrible difficulties, before Soult. On January 16, 1809, he won a great victory at Corunna, and covered the embarkation of his army, but was himself killed in the action.

Moray, James Stewart, Earl of (1531?-1570). [STEWART.]

Mordaunt, Charles, 3rd Earl of Peterborough (1658-1735), succeeded to his father's estates in 1675. In his youth he served under Admirals Torrington and Marlborough in the Mediterranean. For his bold opposition to the designs of James II he was compelled to betake himself to The Hague, where he strongly recommended the Prince of Orange to invade England. When William had landed at Torbay, Mordaunt went on before him, and occupied Exeter. He became first commissioner of the treasury, a post to which he was unsuited, and in which he quarrelled with Godolphin, who was an excellent financier. He was created Earl of Monmouth (April 1689). In 1690 Carmarthen procured his retirement from office. In 1696 he attempted to ruin his opponents by the help of Sir John Fenwick's confessions. But the attempt failed, and Monmouth, now hated by both parties, was stripped of his employments. In 1697 he succeeded to his uncle's fortunes and earldom. On the accession of Anne he was offered and refused the command of the forces in the West Indies. In 1705 he was sent to command in Spain. He captured the fortresses of Montjuich, and Barcelona fell. Though he had but a handful of men, he at once pushed on to relieve San Mattheo, whence he drove the Spanish army before him into Valencia. From Valencia he set out in the night and defeated a reinforcement of 4,000 men. A French army under Marshal Tessé, and a fleet under the Count of Toulouse, were sent to blockade Barcelona. He ultimately succeeded in raising the siege, but he quarrelled with the Archduke Charles, who disapproved of his design of marching at once on Madrid. Unable to endure a command divided between himself and Galway, he left the army for Genoa. In 1707 he returned as a volunteer; but Sunderland, a warm supporter of Galway, roughly recalled him. He visited Vienna, the camp of Charles XII at Alt-Rastadt, and that of Marlborough in Flanders. In 1711 he was sent to Vienna in order to reconcile the emperor and the Duke of Savoy. In 1714 he was made governor of Minorca. On the accession of George I he was made general of the marine forces of Great Britain, an office continued under George II. In 1717 he was suddenly arrested at Bologna on the groundless charge of plotting against the Pretender's life. In 1719 he conducted, on his own responsibility, an intrigue with the French court through the Duke of Parma, uncle of the Queen of Spain, which resulted in the dismissal of the minister Alberoni. He died on October 25, 1735, at Lisbon.

More, Sir Thomas (1478-1535), was the son of Sir John More, a judge of the King's Bench. At an early age he entered the household of Cardinal Morton. About 1492 he went to Oxford, and in 1496 entered Lincoln's Inn; already before this time he had become acquainted with Erasmus and other eminent scholars. In 1504 he entered the House of Commons, and speedily became a prominent member of what may be called the popular party, opposing Henry VII's demand for subsidies. In 1510 he became under-sheriff of London. In 1514 and 1515 he was employed as envoy to the Low Countries, and soon after he was made a member of the privy council, and in 1521 knighted. He became closely attached to Henry VIII, and assisted the king in his book against Luther. In 1523 he was appointed Speaker of the House of Commons at Wolsey's request, but he nevertheless opposed the grant which the cardinal tried to obtain from the House. He was reconciled to Wolsey, however, and in 1527 accompanied him on a mission to France. In 1525 he had been made chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster, and in October 1529 he became lord chancellor on the fall of Wolsey. Conspicuous as he had been all his life as one of the party of Church reform, More was altogether opposed to the assumption of supremacy by Henry VIII. In May 1532 he resigned the seals, and in 1534 (April 17) was sent to the Tower. He declined to take the oath of supremacy, and was indicted for misprision of treason, November 1534, convicted on the evidence of an alleged conversation in prison with Rich, and beheaded July 5, 1535. More's noble and beautiful character was acknowledged by all his contemporaries. As the most distinguished of the English exponents of the "New Learning," he has an interest beyond that of his historical position. In addition to a "History of Richard III," and other works, he wrote the "Utopia" (1515-16), one of the most remarkable political romances in any language.

Morgan, Sir Henry (1635?-88), one of the chief buccaneers of Jamaica, was frequently employed by Charles II to harass the shipping of the Spaniards in the West Indies. In 1670 he plundered and burnt Panama, and as a reward was created a knight, and governor of Jamaica. [BUCCANEERS.]

Morgan, Thomas (1543-1606?), a Welshman, and a devoted adherent of the Queen of Scots, was imprisoned on a charge of complicity in the Ridolfi conspiracy (1572) (q.v.). On his release he went abroad, and became Mary's chief agent in corresponding with her friends. He was declared by Dr. Parry to have instigated him to assassinate Elizabeth, and his arrest was accordingly demanded from Henry III of France, but refused. In 1585 he formed a fresh plot against the life of the queen, and was implicated in the Babington conspiracy (q.v.).

Morice, James (d. 1596), attorney of the Court of Wards, moved in the parliament of 1593 that the abuses of the bishops' courts should be reformed. On this the queen forbade the House to consider "any bill touching matters of state or reformation in causes ecclesiastical," and Morice himself was kept in confinement for some years.

Morice, Sir William (1602-76), played an important part in the Restoration. He was the first person to whom Monck entrusted the secret of his design to restore Charles II, and he was used as a go-between by Monck and Sir John Grenville, who was sent over to Charles.

Morley, John, Viscount Morley of Blackburn (1838-1923), was born at Blackburn. After acquiring great distinction as a man of letters and a journalist, he entered parliament in 1883. In 1886 he became secretary for Ireland in the first Home Rule ministry, and held the same office from 1892 to 1895. In 1898, with Sir William Harcourt, he resigned the duty of "leading the councils of the Liberal party," but in 1905 he took office as secretary of state for India. He was created a viscount in 1908. In 1910 he became lord president of the council, but on the outbreak of the Great War he retired into private life.

Mortimer, The Family of (from Mortemer-en-Brai in Normandy), was founded by Ralph I, who received from the Conqueror many of the forfeited estates of Earl Roger of Hereford, among them being the township and castle of Wigmore, henceforward the centre of the Mortimer power. The family became one of the most important in the middle Marches of Wales; but attained the height of its political influence in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries.

Mortimer, Anne, sister and heiress of Edmund Mortimer, 5th Earl of March, married Richard, Earl of Cambridge, younger son of Edmund of Langley, Duke of York, fifth son of Edward III. The offspring of this marriage was Richard, Duke of York (q.v.), who, as a result of the death without heirs of both his paternal uncle Edmund, Duke of York (1415), and his maternal uncle Edmund, Earl of March (1424), united the claim to the throne of the houses of York and Mortimer. [YORK, HOUSE OF.]

Mortimer, Edmund, 3rd Earl of March, and 1st Earl of Ulster (d. 1381), son of Roger, 2nd Earl of March, married Philippa, daughter and heiress of Lionel, Duke of Clarence, third son of Edward III. In his own and her right he inherited great estates in Wales and on the Welsh border and in Ireland, of which latter country he was appointed lieutenant in 1379.

Mortimer, Edmund, 5th Earl of March and Ulster (1391-1425), son of Roger Mortimer, 4th Earl of March, was the heir to the throne on the abdication of Richard II, but was superseded by Henry Bolingbroke, son of John of Gaunt, the fourth son of Edward III. His claims were unsuccessfully advanced by the Earl of Northumberland and Archbishop Scrope in 1405, and again by Richard of Cambridge in 1415. Mortimer, however, remained loyal to Henry V, and fought in the French wars. In 1423 he was appointed lieutenant of Ireland. He married Anne, daughter of the Earl of Stafford, and died of the plague at Trim in 1425, leaving no issue.

Mortimer, ROGER, 8TH BARON OF WIGMORE and 1ST EARL OF MARCH, (1287 ?-1330), was a ward of Piers Gaveston (q.v.) and held many important offices in the reign of Edward II. By his marriage with Joan de Geneville he acquired vast new Irish and Welsh estates, and in 1316 was appointed lieutenant of Ireland. In the baronial conflict he appears at first to have attached himself to the middle party under the Earl of Pembroke, but later private rivalries induced him to take up arms against the king and the Despensers. Submitting in 1322, he was condemned to perpetual imprisonment, but in 1324 he escaped and fled to France. In 1325 Queen Isabella being sent over to the French court, Mortimer formed an intrigue with her, and in the next year accompanied her and the young Prince Edward to England. The king fled, but was captured and subsequently deposed (January 1327) in favour of his son. For the next four years the queen and Mortimer reigned supreme. All attempts to upset or curtail their power were defeated; the Earl of Lancaster, who endeavoured to overthrow the favourite, was compelled to submit in 1329, and next year the king's uncle, Edmund, Earl of Kent, was implicated in a plot to restore Edward II, of whose survival he had been persuaded, and was executed for treason. In the meantime offices and emoluments of all kinds had been showered upon Mortimer, whose barony had in 1328 been raised to an earldom bearing the title of March. In 1330, however, his triumphant career was abruptly checked. In October the young king, determined to escape from his humiliating subjection to Isabella and her lover, surprised and captured the earl at Nottingham Castle. Mortimer was carried to London, arraigned before parliament as a traitor and murderer, and finally hanged at Tyburn like a common malefactor. His estates and honours were forfeited to the Crown, but in 1354 the attainder was reversed in favour of his grandson Roger, who thus became the 2nd Earl of March.

Mortimer, ROGER, 4TH EARL OF MARCH and ULSTER (d. 1398), son of Edmund Mortimer, 3rd Earl of March, married Eleanor, daughter of Thomas Holland, Earl of Kent, the half-brother of Richard II. In 1385 he was declared heir-presumptive to the throne of England by Richard. He was appointed lieutenant of Ireland, where he was killed in a skirmish at Kells (1398).

Mortimer's Cross, THE BATTLE OF (1461), was fought between Edward, Duke of York (Edward IV), and the Lancastrians, under the Earl of Pembroke. In 1460, while Richard, Duke of York, marched to the north against Queen Margaret, Edward was dispatched to raise forces in the Welsh Marches. With these troops he marched to Shrewsbury, where news reached him of his father's defeat and death at Wakefield (q.v.), and he prepared to march against Queen Margaret, when he learnt that the Earls of Wiltshire and Pembroke had assembled a large army of Welsh and Irish in order to attack him. Accordingly he turned upon them, and at Mortimer's Cross, in Herefordshire, between Leominster and Wigmore, totally routed them. Pembroke and Wiltshire escaped, but Owen Tudor was captured and beheaded. Edward then proceeded with his army to join the Earl of Warwick, who had just been defeated by the Lancastrians at the second battle of St. Albans. They effected a junction at Chipping Norton (or Burford) in Oxfordshire, and, with their united armies, marched towards London, where Edward was proclaimed king.

Mortmain. The abuse which the Statute of Mortmain (De Religiosis) (November 15, 1279) was designed to remedy was by no means one of late origin at the time of the passing of this act. Five hundred and fifty years earlier Bæda had complained of the way in which pretended monks secured to themselves large grants of the public land, and on their produce, which ought to have supported the king's warriors, lived a life of ease and debauchery. But however great this evil may have been in the intervening centuries, it does not seem to have called for legal interference till the beginning of the thirteenth century. By chapter 36 of Magna Carta as reissued in 1217 and 1225 it was ordained that it should not for the future be lawful for anyone to give his land to a religious house and to take the same land again to hold of that house. The object of this enactment was to prevent any more of the land from passing into the hands of the Church, and so ceasing to owe military service to the king, while at the same time the overlord lost all prospects of such valuable incidents as wardship, marriage, and relief, and all chance of ever recovering an estate so alienated by escheat; for by feudal law on the failure of the heirs of the grantee lands lapsed back to the grantor, and of course there could be no failure of heirs when lands were held by a corporation such as an abbey or church. At the famous Oxford Parliament of 1258 the petitions of the barons included a request that henceforward no men of religion should enter into any man's fee without the licence of the chief lord; and the Provisions of Westminster in the next year embodied a clause to that effect. But this may well have been treated as a dead letter, for it was not re-enacted in the Statute of Marlborough (1267). Edward I, the whole bent of whose mind seems to have been towards definiteness and order, soon saw with disgust how much of the land was steadily freeing itself from the duty of military service, and securing itself against ever lapsing into the royal hands. To remedy this defect he issued the famous Statute of Mortmain, or "Statutum de Religiosis" (1279). This enactment forbids "any person whatsoever, religious or other, to buy or sell, or under colour of any gift, term, or other title, to receive from anyone any lands or tenements in such a way that such lands and tenements should come into mort main." The penalty affixed to breaking this enactment was forfeiture to the next superior lord, and if he failed to insist on this forfeiture within a year, the right lapsed to his overlord, and so on to the king. But it was not long before a way was found of evading, by means of the system of "common recoveries," even this law, and some six years later a clause (c. 32) was included in the Statute of Westminster II to check this new abuse. As might be expected, the great body of the clergy strongly disapproved of the king's measures. In 1294, when Edward demanded half their revenue for the year, they offered to grant it only if he would repeal the statute "De Religiosis," but this Edward was by no means prepared to do. We must not, however, suppose that all gifts of landed property to ecclesiastical foundations were cut short by the Statute of Mortmain. The system of "Uses," whereby land was granted not to religious houses directly, but to feoffees to their use, afforded a new means of evading the statute, while another device was to bring land into the possession of the Church under the pretence of purchasing it as a burial-ground. Both these expedients were forbidden by a new Statute of Mortmain under Richard II (1391), a statute which at the same time specially declares the provisions and penalties of Edward's act to extend to gilds and fraternities, and even to the "Mayors, Bailiffs, and Commons of Cities, Boroughs, and other Towns, which have a perpetual Commonalty," and so could hold land in perpetuity without any chance of its lapsing. During all this time, however, it was in the power of the Crown, by granting a licence in mortmain, to suspend the operation of the statute so far as its own rights were concerned; and "the kings never withheld their licence from the endowment of any valuable new foundation."

Of later acts dealing with the alienation of land in mortmain, we may notice 7 & 8 Will. III, c. 37, which (the rights of mesne lords having by now been reduced within a very small compass) empowered the king "to grant any person or persons, corporate or not, licence to alien in mortmain without rendering the lands liable to forfeiture." Again, statute 9, George II, c. 36, specified the conditions under which alone lands, etc., could be devised for charitable purposes. Oxford and Cambridge, Eton, Winchester, and Westminster were excepted from the operation of this act, and by 5 Geo. IV the British Museum was likewise excepted from the Statutes of Mortmain, as other religious, educational, and charitable bodies have been since. The present law on the subject is chiefly contained in the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Acts of 1888 and 1891; of which the latter provides that land may be left by will to charitable uses, but (with certain exceptions) must be sold within a year after the testator's death.

Mortmain (Lat. mortua, dead; manus, hand) has been defined as such a state of possession as makes property inalienable; whence it is said to be in a dead hand, in a hand that cannot shift away the property. In the statute of 1279 and later the phrase runs "per quod terre deveniant ad manum mortuam;" and the French equivalent is "devenir à mortmain."

Morton, JOHN, CARDINAL (1420–1500), studied at Balliol College, Oxford. In 1474 he was appointed archdeacon of Winchester, and in 1479 was made Bishop of Ely and chancellor by Edward IV. He was regarded with suspicion by Richard III, and given into the custody of the Duke of Buckingham. He escaped to Henry Tudor, on the continent, and became one of his chief advisers. When Henry came to the throne Morton became one of the privy council, and, on the death of Bourchier in 1486, Archbishop of Canterbury; and next year he again became chancellor. In 1493 he was created a cardinal. During the remainder of his life he was Henry VII's chief minister, and incurred much of the odium of the king's measures. But he seems to have been a wise and enlightened prelate, and a friend to learning and education.

Morton, JAMES DOUGLAS, 4TH EARL OF (1525 ?–81). [DOUGLAS.]

Morville, HUGH DE, one of the murderers of Becket (q.v.), had been attached to the court from the accession of Henry II, under whom he acted as an itinerant justice. After the murder he fled to his castle of Knaresborough, and is said to have undertaken a pilgrimage to Jerusalem in expiation of his crime. He appears soon to have regained the royal favour, and survived until the reign of John, dying in 1204.

Mountjoy, WILLIAM STEWART, VISCOUNT (1653–92). [STEWART.]

Mowbray, THOMAS, DUKE OF NORFOLK (d. 1399), was the son of John Mowbray and Elizabeth, granddaughter and heiress of Thomas of Brotherton, Earl of Norfolk. He was created Earl of Nottingham in 1383 and earl marshal in 1386. He was one of the lords appellants of 1387, but afterwards joined the king and helped to execute his father-in-law, the Earl of Arundel (1397). He was governor of Calais, and to his charge Gloucester was entrusted in the same year. There the latter died, probably, but not certainly, murdered by Mowbray, who in the same year was created Duke of Norfolk. In 1398 he quarrelled with the Duke of Hereford, and each accused the other of treason. It was decided that the matter should be fought out at Coventry, on September 16, but before the duel commenced the king stopped the proceedings and banished both the combatants, Norfolk for life, and Hereford for six years. Norfolk set out on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, but died at Venice, September 1399.

Mowbray, THOMAS, EARL OF NOTTINGHAM (d. 1405), was the son of Thomas Mowbray, Duke of Norfolk, the adversary of Henry Bolingbroke. In 1399, on Henry IV's accession to the throne, he was a page in the household of Richard II's queen, Isabella. He was not allowed to assume the title of Duke of Norfolk, and the office of marshal, which had been hereditary in his family, was granted away to the Earl of Westmorland. In 1405, a dispute with the Earl of Warwick being decided against him, Mowbray left the court in chagrin, and joined Scrope and others in a conspiracy against Henry IV. Through the treachery of Westmorland he was seized and beheaded.

Mulgrave, EDMUND SHEFFIELD, 1ST EARL OF (1564?-1646). [SHEFFIELD.]

Mulraj, INSURRECTION OF (1848). Mulraj, the governor of Multan, a strong fort in the Punjab, was the son of Sawan Mull, whom he succeeded in 1844. In March 1848, after some differences with the durbar, he offered to resign the fort and government. This was accepted, and Khan Singh was sent to assume the government, accompanied by Vans Agnew, as political agent, and an escort of 350 Sikh troops. On the morning of April 19 there was a stormy interview with Mulraj, who was ordered to produce the accounts of the last six years. On the 20th an attempt was made to assassinate Agnew. On the 21st a brisk fire was opened on the encampment from the citadel. The Sikh escort proved treacherous, and deserted to the enemy; a crew of howling savages rushed in and murdered Agnew and his companion, Lieutenant Anderson, with the greatest brutality. On the 22nd Mulraj issued a proclamation of a religious war against the British. Lieutenant Edwardes, who was employed in the revenue settlement at Bunnoo, across the Indus, without waiting for orders, crossed the river with 1,200 infantry, 350 horse, and two guns. The Nawab of Bhawalpur was requested by the resident to advance. Lieutenant Edwardes joined him at Kineyri. Timely reinforcements enabled him to win the battles of Kineyri and Sadusam and to shut Mulraj up in Multan, when the outbreak of Shere Singh (q.v.) merged these operations in the second Sikh War.

Multan, SIEGE OF (1848), was begun in July 1848 by Lieutenant Edwardes with a British force, supported by one troop of the friendly Nawab of Bhawalpur. The investment continued till September 12, when the town was ineffectually bombarded. The siege was raised September 22. General Whish, with 17,000 men and 64 heavy guns, reopened the siege (December 27), and pushed it with great vigour. On January 2, 1849, the town was carried by assault. The siege of the citadel was now pushed on. After a continuous fire from the British batteries for several days, Mulraj (q.v.) endeavoured to treat, but was informed that no terms would be granted short of unconditional surrender. He therefore continued to defend the fort till his garrison insisted on surrender or an attempt to cut their way out. On January 22 he surrendered and the fort was placed in charge of Lieutenant Edwardes.

Municipal Corporations Act, THE (1835), put an end to the uncertainty in which the legal status of the offices and practices of many municipalities had been veiled since the confiscation of municipal charters by Charles II and James II. The act "provided a uniform constitution for all boroughs to which it applied, based on the model of the best municipal corporations." It established a council composed of (a) a mayor elected annually by the council from among the aldermen and councillors, (b) councillors (the number fixed at the time of incorporation) elected for three years by all ratepaying residents of both sexes, a third of the councillors retiring annually, (c) aldermen appointed by the councillors for six years, one-third retiring triennially by rotation and the total number one-third the number of councillors. (The Municipal Corporations Act of 1882 made these provisions compulsory.) The act also abolished the judicial authority of the aldermen and the elected justices of the peace.

Munro, SIR THOMAS (1761-1827), entered the military service of the East India Company in 1780. He was present at the first march on Seringapatam and the battle of Arikera, and subsequently took part in the more successful march of 1792. In 1799 he was included in the commission appointed to complete the organization of Mysore after the fall of the Mohammedan dynasty. In 1813, having seen the disadvantages of the zemindary system of land settlement in Bengal and Mysore, he instituted the ryotwary system. From 1819 until his death he was governor of Madras.

Biography by J. Bradshaw, 1894.

Munster, THE KINGDOM AND PROVINCE OF. The Irish legends represent Munster as having been divided between the Milesian chiefs Eber and his brother Lugaid, of whom the former prevailed, and drove the latter into the south-western corner. The tribes of Eber were in turn subdued by the tribe of Degaid, but the former, under the famous Mogh of Munster, having recovered their strength, drove out the Degaidian tribe. Mogh further defeated the ard ri, or over-king, Conn "of the hundred battles," and compelled him to consent to a division of Ireland, by which the former received the southern part, Loth Moga or Mogh's half (c. A.D. 130). Munster now comprised the modern counties of Tipperary, Waterford, Cork, Kerry, Limerick, part of Kilkenny, and Clare, which had originally belonged to Connacht. It was divided into the districts of Thomond, Desmond, and Ormonde. The kings of these districts formed a confederacy under the King of Cashel, who, according to the old Irish custom, was chosen alternately from the Eoghanacts (afterwards the O'Donovans and the MacCarthys) of Desmond, and the Dalcassans (the O'Briens) of Thomond. It seems certain that Munster was partially converted to Christianity before the arrival of St. Patrick in 433, but even after the coming of that saint it would seem, from the fact that Queen Ethne the Terrible was still a heathen, that the new faith gained ground but slowly. The Munster kings were throughout this period the rivals of the high-kings of the Hui-Neill dynasty, and disputed the supremacy of Ireland with them, often not without success. They seized the opportunity of the Scandinavian invasions (795-1014) to revive their claim to the over-kingship, and unpatriotically ravaged the territories of the Hui-Neills. Towards the end of the ninth century, however, there began an interval of comparative peace throughout Ireland which lasted for forty years. During this time Cormac MacCullinan, the king-bishop of Cashel, is a prominent figure in Irish history, one of his feats being the defeat of the joint forces of the King of Connacht and of Flann, the ard ri, in battle. Later the famous Brian Boru made Munster as powerful as it had been in the days of the legendary Mogh, and seized the kingship of Tara from Maelsechlain II himself. Brian's name and fame practically entailed the high-kingship to his descendants for the next century and it was not till the death of Murchertach O'Brien in 1119 that "kings with opposition" began. After the Anglo-Norman invasion the kings and chiefs of Munster, headed by MacCarthy of Desmond, "came in" readily to Henry I and surrendered their strongholds. The English king retained the cities of Cork and Limerick for himself, but gave the greater part of Cork county to Fitz-Stephen and de Cogan, while Limerick went to de Braose, and Waterford to de la Poer. Their families were, however, speedily supplanted by the Munster Fitzgeralds, who founded the Desmond line together with the younger branches of the Knights of Kerry and the Knights of Glyn. The Fitzgeralds, after a prolonged struggle with the MacCarthys and O'Briens, intermarried with them, and established a generally recognized authority. Ormonde, or East Munster, was occupied by the Butlers, who spread thence over Kilkenny and Tipperary. During the invasion of Ireland by Edward Bruce (1315) the Geraldines and Butlers suffered severely at the hands of the

O'Briens, and Edward III, in order to strengthen their power, created the great earldoms of Desmond and Ormonde. These two houses were weakened further by the Wars of the Roses; the Butlers, moreover, becoming involved in a deadly feud with the Kildares, which lasted for generations. Through these dissensions the O'Briens and MacCarthys again obtained power, though the cautious policy of the Tudors kept them under. Thomond became county Clare, and was added to Connacht. In the reign of Elizabeth occurred the Desmond rebellions. Wishing to put a stop to the anarchy in Desmond, Elizabeth and her governor, Sir Henry Sidney, in 1564, determined to colonize Munster with gentlemen from the west of England, headed by Sir Peter Carew, who claimed the old Fitz-Stephen estates. However, the barbarities of Sir Peter Carew soon drove the whole country into a wild and bloody rebellion, the MacCarthys, and even Ormonde's brothers, joining the Desmonds in the revolt, which was led by Sir Maurice Fitzgerald, a cousin of the earl. Ormonde, however, pacified his brothers, and Sir Henry Sidney crushed the rebels, being succeeded after his recall by Sir John Perrot (1570), who, through the most brutal measures, succeeded in reducing the district to order. Munster became an English presidency. The English government was, however, exhausted by the effort, and thought it necessary to have recourse to the most terrible severity, Sir William Drury hanging four hundred persons in one year. Thereupon the second Desmond rebellion broke out (1579), which, however, was broken without much difficulty by the loyal Duke of Ormonde. The estates of the Fitzgeralds and their allies were confiscated and granted to English adventurers. In 1598 James Fitzthomas Fitzgerald assumed the title of Earl of Desmond, and in conjunction with O'Neill, Earl of Tyrone, raised the last of the Munster rebellions. After Essex had failed to cope with it, Sir George Carew suppressed it in 1600, and but little more is heard of the Geraldines. Munster, except Kerry, which was reserved for the government, was finally colonized by Cromwell with soldiers and adventurers; these were promptly absorbed by the Irish population, and though the Catholic gentry received back small portions of their estates at the Restoration, they lost most of them again under the "broken treaty of Limerick." From that settlement the history of Munster has varied but little from that of the rest of Catholic Ireland.

Murphy, FATHER JOHN (1753 ?-98), Irish rebel, was educated for the priesthood at Seville. In 1794 he took the oath of allegiance, but was the first to rise at the head of his parishioners in south-east Ireland on May 26, 1798. He soon gathered several thousand men around him, and committed fearful cruelties. He was victorious over the English troops, and occupied Wexford on May 31. He attacked Arklow on June 9, but was driven back with heavy loss. On June 21 he was again beaten at Vinegar Hill. He fled to Wexford, but was captured and hanged on June 26.

Murray, WILLIAM, 1ST EARL OF MANSFIELD (1705-93), was the fourth son of David, 5th Viscount of Stormont, and was born at Scone, near Perth. He was educated at Westminster and Oxford, and was called to the bar in 1730. In 1740 he was made a king's counsel, and two years later solicitor-general, with a seat in parliament for Boroughbridge. In the following year he increased his reputation by his defence of the city of Edinburgh against the proceedings taken in parliament with reference to the Porteous mob. In 1754 he succeeded to the office of attorney-general, and two years later he became lord chief justice of England, with the title of Baron Mansfield. In his new position he at once proceeded to reform the slow and tedious practice of the court. In 1757 he was induced to accept the office of chancellor of the exchequer, which he held for only three months, and in the same year he was for the second time offered the great seal, and again refused to take it. Unfortunately Lord Mansfield accepted a seat in the cabinet, and so assumed the character of a political judge; and popular suspicion was not reassured by his growing coldness to Chatham on the death of George II and the rise of Lord Bute. On the question of general warrants, though still a member of the cabinet, he supported Pratt's judgment and affirmed their illegality. On the fall of the Grenville ministry Lord Mansfield retired from the cabinet, and now for the first time encountered Lord Camden in the House of Lords. On the subject of America the two great judges were opposed, Lord Mansfield holding the absolute dominion of Great Britain over the colonies. When Chatham resigned in 1768 the Duke of Grafton called in the advice of Lord Mansfield; but when it became necessary to appoint a successor to Camden he again refused the great seal. On York's death the seal was put into commission, and Lord Mansfield virtually acted as lord chancellor. On Lord North's accession to power began a series of encounters between Mansfield and Chatham on the subject of Wilkes's election for Middlesex; the cause of the former was thoroughly bad, and he came but feebly out of the fray. Nor did the chief justice add to his reputation by his charges to the jury on the law of libel, which so often occupied the courts in consequence of the prosecution of Woodfall and other printers; charges which exposed him to the attacks of Junius. On October 1776 he was raised to the dignity of an earl. During the later years of his career he confined himself almost entirely to the exercise of his judicial functions, and took but little part in politics. In 1788 "the increasing infirmities of Lord Mansfield induced him to retire from his office, after having presided with distinguished lustre as head of the common law for upwards of thirty-two years." After this he lived almost entirely in retirement, taking little or no part in politics, until his death, in March 1793, at the venerable age of eighty-nine. His reputation has been established beyond all dispute; and he lives for posterity as one of the greatest common-law judges of modern times, and as the founder of our commercial law.

Mutiny Act, THE, was first enacted in 1689. Hitherto a person guilty of desertion or other military crimes had ranked as an ordinary felon; now, such offences were to be subject to special penalties, inflicted by military tribunals. The act was to be in force for six months only, but was continued on its expiry, and annually thereafter. The bill was frequently attacked by the Tory party. Since the reign of George I, however, it was usual to pass it without discussion, and like its successor, the Army (Annual) Act, it was annually brought in and read as a matter of form. From 1713 to 1715 the court-martial had no power to award capital punishment. Since 1748 it has been provided that no sentence touching life or limb could be imposed except for offences enumerated in the act; and in the same year members of the court-martial were forbidden to divulge the sentence until approved, or the votes of any member unless required by parliament. In 1754 the operation of the act was extended to troops serving in India and North America. In 1756 the militia were brought under its provisions, and in 1785 half-pay officers were exempted from it. In 1803 it was extended to troops outside the Dominions, and all Articles of War (q.v.) were made statutory for all troops, and no longer an act of the royal prerogative. In 1879 the military code was embodied in an Army Discipline and Regulation Act, which directly enacts the code of military law. This was put in force by an annual Army Act, and replaced in 1881 by another permanent Army Act, which is now similarly continued from year to year by the Army (Annual) Act, replacing the old Mutiny Act. [MILITARY SYSTEM.] The Mutiny Act and Army (Annual) Act well exemplify the British custom of meeting new political requirements without openly altering the constitution.

Mysore, the Mohammedan kingdom of the Deccan, was founded by Hyder Ali on the wrecks of the southern principalities. It included, when at its greatest power, not only Mysore proper, but also the whole of Malabar, Cochin, and Calicut, and extended north into the Poona and Hyderabad states; while the east and south it included the Carnatic Balaghaut, the Baramahal, and the provinces of Coimbatour and Dendigul. These outlying possessions were gradually shorn off by British conquest, and in 1799 the Mohammedan state of Mysore came to an end at the second siege of Seringapatam and the death of Tipoo. The Hindu state of Mysore was thereupon created, deprived of all the outlying provinces and Seringapatam, for the descendants of the old Hindu rajas. A strictly personal settlement was made with the raja, leaving the company the right of assuming the management if necessary. The insufferable rule of the raja, culminating in rebellion, compelled Lord William Bentinck, in 1831, to assume the entire management. But in 1867 the native sovereignty was re-established, and orders were issued by the secretary for India that the country should be surrendered to the raja's adopted son on his coming of age. This was done in 1881.

Nagpur, THE TOWN OF, was captured by the British, November 26, 1807, after a severe defeat inflicted on the raja's troops. In 1853, on the death of the raja, the town and territory of Nagpur were annexed by the British.

Nana Sahib. Dandu Panth, a Maharratta Brahmin, was the adopted son of Baji Rao (q.v.), the last of the Peshwas. On the death of the latter the Nana petitioned the lieutenant-governor of Agra to continue the Peshwa's pension to him. The petition was rejected by Lord Dalhousie and the directors, though the jaghire of Bithur was granted him rent free for life (1853). In revenge he devoted himself to plots against the British government. His agents were employed in all the discontented portions of India, and on the outbreak of the Indian Mutiny he became the chief instigator of the carnage. It was his object at once to revive the old empire of the Peshwas in his own person, and to sacrifice as many Europeans as possible to his revenge. It was by his orders that the sepoys fired on the garrison of Cawnpore after they had surrendered, and that the final massacre of Cawnpore was perpetrated. At the end of the mutiny the Nana escaped to the Terrai jungles of Nepal, where he is supposed to have died. In 1874, however, the Maharaja Sindhia delivered up to the British government a prisoner who represented that he was the Nana. He turned out to be an impostor; the reason for this imposture has never been discovered, nor is it certain whether the maharaja was himself deceived.

Napier, VICE-ADMIRAL SIR CHARLES (1786-1860), was the cousin of the three Napier brothers, Charles, Henry, and William. He went to sea in 1799, and was employed all through the French War in the colonies and the Mediterranean. He served on shore in the Peninsula, and was present at Busaco. At the close of the war he had a long interval of rest, but on his return in 1829 he was employed off the coast of Portugal in the Galatea. He supported the Constitutionalists; defeated the fleet of Dom Miguel, and settled Donna Maria on the throne. Dom Pedro was unbounded in his gratitude; created him Viscount of Cape St. Vincent; gave him all the Portuguese orders, and named him admiral-in-chief. He proceeded to remodel the corrupt Portuguese navy; was thwarted by the officials, and threw up the appointment. In 1840 he was employed in the Mediterranean against Mehemet Ali, and concluded a convention with him. For his services he was made K.C.B., and received the thanks of both Houses. In 1841 he was elected to parliament for Marylebone. In 1847 he received the command of the Channel fleet, and compelled the Emperor of Morocco to make compensation for injuries done to British commerce. During the Crimean War he was nominated to the command of the Baltic fleet, but had little opportunity of earning distinction. On his return he quarrelled with the government on the subject, and mutual recriminations were interchanged. In 1855 he was returned for Southwark, and cleared himself in the eyes of parliament and the nation. From this time he devoted himself to attacking abuses in the navy, until his failing health required him to withdraw from public life.

Napier, SIR CHARLES JAMES (1782-1853), eldest son of Colonel George Napier, was educated at home, and sent into the army (1794). He was employed in Ireland during the insurrection of 1798. He was at Corunna with Sir John Moore, and fought under the Duke of Wellington at Fuentes d'Onoro and Badajoz. Later he was employed in a fighting cruise off the Chesapeake, and returned in time to accompany the British army to Paris, though he was not present at Waterloo. A period of military inactivity followed; but in 1841 he was appointed commander-in-chief of the army of Bombay. His first and greatest exploit was the conquest and annexation of Sind, of which he was constituted governor by Lord Ellenborough. He proceeded to subjugate the hill tribes and all the warlike population, completely reorganizing the whole physical and moral condition of the district, and gaining the respect and reverence of the inhabitants—even of the Baluchis. His proceedings, however, highly offended the directors, and a quarrel ensued, in which Sir Charles treated them with very slight ceremony. His plans for the termination of the Sikh War (q.v.) were not ripe when the battle of Sobraon ended it. Before leaving Sind he succeeded in changing the feudal system of land-holding into a landlord-and-tenant system, which he considered the best means of forming loyal subjects, by raising a race of independent farmers attached to the government. In 1847 he returned to England and lived in semi-retirement until the disasters of the second Sikh War (q.v.) made everyone look around for a general. Sir Charles set out (March 1849), but found on his arrival at Bombay that the Sikhs had been finally routed. He now devoted himself to military reform; but after two years returned to England, where he died.

Napier, ROBERT CORNELIS, 1ST BARON NAPIER OF MAGDALA (1810-90), son of Major C. F. Napier, was educated at the Military College, Addiscombe. He entered the corps of Bengal Engineers (1826), and served with distinction in the Sutlej campaign, at the conclusion of which he was appointed engineer to the durbar of Lahore. He was present at the siege of Multan and the battle of Gujarat (q.v.). He was named chief engineer under the new Punjab administration, and for some time was engaged in building roads and cutting canals to open up that province. In 1857 he served as chief engineer in the army of Sir Colin Campbell, and the part he played in the suppression of the rebellion greatly enhanced his reputation. He also distinguished himself in China as second to Sir Hope Grant, and was rewarded by being made a K.C.B., a major-general, and a member of the council of India. In 1865 he became commander-in-chief at Bombay. In 1867 he received the appointment to command the Abyssinian expedition (q.v.), and was made a K.G.C. of the Star of India. While he was in Abyssinia he achieved a brilliant success. King Theodore on his defeat committed suicide, the captives were restored, and Magdala was besieged and burnt. On his return Sir Robert received the thanks of parliament; the sum of £2,000 per annum was settled on him and his next heir, and he was created Baron Napier of Magdala.

Napierville, THE BATTLE OF (November 10, 1838), was fought near Montreal between the British troops under Sir James McDonnell and the Canadian rebels, who were completely defeated.

Napoleonic War. [FRENCH REVOLUTION, WAR OF THE.]

Naseby, THE BATTLE OF (June 14, 1645), was fought during the Civil War. Both armies took the field in May 1645. Charles I marched northwards, and, whilst Fairfax was besieging Oxford, the king stormed Leicester. Leaving Leicester, Charles established himself at Daventry, collecting provisions to revictual Oxford, and threatening to attack the eastern counties. Fairfax, who left Oxford on June 5, overtook the king on the 12th. The king resolved to give battle, and took up his position on an eminence called Dust Hill, about two miles north of the village of Naseby, in Northamptonshire. The army of Fairfax was drawn up on Red Pitt Hill, about a mile from Naseby. The Parliamentary army was about 13,000 strong, the Royalists about 7,500, though the stronger in cavalry. The Royalist right, commanded by Rupert, commenced the attack, and, after a hard fight, routed the Parliamentary left, under Ireton, and attacked the baggage of the Parliamentary army behind the line of battle. Meanwhile the Parliamentary right wing, led by Fairfax and Cromwell, charged and broke the division commanded by Sir Marmaduke Langdale, which formed the left of the king's army. Fairfax and his guards returned from this charge to take part in the struggle between the foot of the two armies in the centre. For this decisive struggle Fairfax brought up all his reserves, and was aided by part of Cromwell's horse and what remained of Ireton's division. Under their combined attack the Royalist centre was utterly routed. Rupert returned too late to the field to turn the fortune of the battle. The king, at the head of his reserve of horse, was resolved to charge in the hope of recovering the day, when a courtier seizing his bridle caused a confusion, which effectually prevented an attack. The Parliamentary cavalry pursued the flying Royalists to within two miles of Leicester, and the slaughter during the flight was very great. The Royalists lost all their guns and baggage and the king's private correspondence.

National Debt, THE. The kings of the Middle Ages, and notably the later Plantagenets, had frequently borrowed large sums of money on their own credit on the security of the Crown property and estates: but the modern national debt was originated in the reign of William III by Montagu in 1692, when chancellor of the exchequer. At the Revolution the acknowledged debt was between £600,000 and £700,000. In order to defray part of the military expenses, Montagu borrowed a million sterling, the interest of which—at first at 10, and after the year 1700 at 7 per cent.—was secured on new duties on liquors. These duties were to form a fund, and on the credit of this fund the loan was to be raised by life annuities, which were to be extinguished when the survivors were reduced to seven. In 1694 another loan was obtained, in the shape of the capital of the newly-created Bank of England, which amounted to £1,200,000. By the date of the Treaty of Ryswick (1697) (q.v.) the national debt exceeded 20 millions; by that of the Treaty of Utrecht (q.v.) it was more than 50 millions. This rapid increase was the cause of great alarm to the Tory party, and it was the fear of the Whigs that the Pretender would come "with a sponge" and wipe out the national debt. Its gradual extinction was one of the objects of statesmen.

In 1711 the South Sea Company (q.v.) was founded with a capital consisting of various Government securities, the nominal amount being over 9 millions. In return for its services the company was allowed the monopoly of trading in the South Seas and the privileges of the Asiento contract (q.v.) with Spain. In addition to trading profits the stockholders received 6 per cent. interest on their securities from the government. In 1717 Walpole established the first sinking fund, borrowing £600,000 at 4 per cent. only, to extinguish liabilities bearing a higher rate of interest. The high rate of interest, and the confusion caused by the fact that some of the annuities by which the various loans had been raised were redeemable and others irredeemable, induced the government in 1720 to accept the proposal of the South Sea Company that they should add the national debt to their capital, and should in return make the fund uniform and redeemable, paying at first 5, and after 1727 4 per cent.; but the failure of the company caused the plan to fall to the ground. Pelham was more successful in his measures, carrying out in 1750 a uniform arrangement, called the Consolidated Fund, and reducing the interest to 3 per cent., paying off those who were unwilling to accept the terms. Meanwhile the debt increased by leaps and bounds. At the Peace of Aix-la-Chapelle (1748) it was over 78 millions; at the Peace of Paris (1763), over 138 millions; and at the conclusion of the American War (1784), 249 millions. In 1786 the younger Pitt proposed a new sinking fund, by which scheme the sum of one million was annually set apart from the income of the country for the reduction of the debt. The fallacy of the system became evident when times of difficulty arose; and the nation was forced to borrow, often at a higher interest than it gained, in order to meet current expenses. It was finally laid aside by Lord Grenville in 1828. The struggle with Napoleon was a fearful strain on the national resources, and in 1817, when the English and Irish exchequers were consolidated; the capital was over 880 millions, and the annual charge exceeded 32 millions. Since that date it has been gradually reduced, partly by arrangements of economy, such as that by which, under the Bank Charter Act of 1833, the Bank of England was to receive £120,000 less than before for the management of the debt; partly, as in 1868 and onwards, by the conversion of stock into terminable annuities. [Between 1816 and 1900 about 367 millions were added to the debt; but meanwhile conversion and redemption were proceeding, and altogether a gross reduction of 633 millions was made during these 85 years, being a net reduction of 266 millions on the total for 1816.] [SINKING FUND.] In 1875 a new and permanent sinking fund was established, which was to be maintained by annual votes of the legislature. The national debt in 1884 amounted to £756,376,519, in which year Mr. Childers carried an act by which a portion of the debt was to be converted from 3 per cent. to 2½ per cent. stock. [This was a complete failure. Much more important was the conversion undertaken by Goschen, Salisbury's chancellor of the exchequer, in 1888. He offered all the holders of the 3 per cent. stock the opportunity of redemption or, alternatively, conversion to the new stock bearing interest at 3 per cent. on the first year, at 2½ per cent. until 1903, and at 2¼ per cent. until 1923. Nearly all the holders accepted the new terms, and interest to the annual amount of £1,400,000 was saved. In 1894 the debt stood at 667 millions. By 1899 it had fallen to 635 millions. In 1903, in consequence of the borrowing made necessary by the war in South Africa, it had risen to 798 millions. In the ten years of peace which followed, a reduction of nearly 100 millions was again effected. The Great War led to the raising of a number of enormous loans at rates of interest which appear incredible beside Goschen's 2½ per cent. In 1916 the National Debt had trebled itself in two years. In 1918 it had risen to six thousand million pounds. Since then the aggregate has increased further, but certain allowances may be set off for claims on allies which will eventually be liquidated. The gross debt in 1926 was £7,634,000,000.] [SINKING FUND; BANKING; SOUTH SEA COMPANY.]

National Insurance Act, THE (1911), marked an advance in the system of social insurance begun by the Workmen's Compensation Acts of 1897 and 1906, the Employers' Liability Acts of 1880, and the Old Age Pensions Act of 1908, by establishing a contributory insurance conveying "a legal right to a definite amount." It provided health insurance, compulsory on all manual workers between the ages of 16 and 70 and non-manual workers earning less than £250 a year, in the form of sick, disablement, maternity, and medical benefits, for which the contribution is (since January 1926) 9d. per man and 8½d. per woman employed, the employer paying 4½d. in each case and the employee the rest, the administration of the scheme being performed by approved societies (trade unions, etc.) and insurance committees. The act also provided insurance against unemployment in certain trades, and was thus the beginning of the unemployment insurance system enshrined in the act of 1920, which established a contributory insurance against unemployment for all persons aged 16 and over, with certain exceptions. Conditions of benefit were revised in 1924 and 1926.

Navarrete, or NAJARA, THE BATTLE OF (April 3, 1367), was fought during the alliance between the Black Prince and Pedro the Cruel, King of Castile. Pedro had been expelled from his kingdom by his natural brother, Henry of Trastámara, who was supported by a considerable French force, commanded by the Breton hero, du Guesclin. Pedro applied for assistance to the Black Prince, who after some hesitation agreed to march into Spain to his aid, on condition that the expenses of the campaign should be defrayed by Pedro, and certain Spanish towns ceded to England. Accordingly he crossed the Pyrenees with a large army, and met the combined force of the French and Spanish on the plain of Navarrete just beyond the Ebro near the town of Logrono. This victory was almost equal in importance to Crécy and Poitiers. The English archers won the day, the loss of the enemy being very considerable; and among the prisoners was du Guesclin himself. Pedro was restored with little difficulty to the Castilian throne. The Black Prince's victorious campaign ended, however, in disaster. Pedro proved treacherous and ungrateful, the prince's army was decimated by disease, and he himself contracted the illness which ultimately proved fatal. He returned to Gascony burdened with debt and broken in health, only to plunge into a new war with France, in which the fortunes of England suffered a complete reverse.

Navarino, THE BATTLE OF (October 20, 1827), was fought in the harbour of Navarino, in the Morea. It involved the total destruction of the Turco-Egyptian fleet of Mahmud II by the combined fleets of Great Britain, France, and Russia. The three allied powers, acting under the Treaty of London (q.v.—July 6, 1827), had resolved to take steps to enforce an armistice on the Turkish and Greek belligerents in the Morea. They had accordingly instructed their three admirals (July 12 and October 15) to prevent the landing of supplies intended for the Turco-Egyptians, and to prevent any movement of the Ottoman fleet. Ibrahim Pasha's reply was a campaign of devastation in the Morea. The three fleets entered Navarino harbour to remonstrate with him—in single line but with the decks cleared for action. A Turkish vessel opened fire, and, the battle becoming general, the Ottoman fleet was destroyed in four hours. Codrington, the British admiral, justified himself by the argument that his instructions had not precluded the use of force in imposing the armistice, and by reference to a letter of September 11 from Stratford Canning corroborating his interpretation. The Wellington cabinet of January 1828, however, strongly disapproved of the battle (Wellington dubbed it an "untoward event") and pursued a pro-Turkish policy at the expense of the Greeks.

Navigation Laws, THE, regulated the privileges of British ships, and the conditions under which foreign ships were admitted to the trade of this country. Legislation of this kind was naturally of early development; we find the first instance of it in the act of 1227 made by James, King of Aragon and Count of Barcelona. The first English Navigation Act was that of 1381 (modified in 1382) by which Richard II prohibited the use of foreign vessels for importing or exporting goods to or from England. Other noteworthy examples of early Navigation Acts are those of 1485 (regarding French wines), 1489 (regarding the chartering of foreign vessels while English ships stood empty), and 1541. Elizabeth reversed this policy, and it was not till 1646 that it was reasserted by the Long Parliament. Cromwell was, however, the first to adopt the navigation system as a policy; in 1650 he excluded all foreign ships without a licence from trading with the plantations of America, and in 1651 the so-called First Navigation Act was passed, which forbade the importation of goods into England except in English ships or ships of the nation which produced the goods. This measure was levelled at the Dutch carrying trade; it forced the Dutch into war, but in the end they accepted it. The mercantile system, as it was called, was continued after the Restoration. In 1660 a Second Act was passed providing that all colonial produce should be exported in English vessels; that no man might establish himself as a factor in the colonies, and that various sorts of colonial produce could only be exported to England and her dependencies. In 1663 it was enacted that the colonies should receive no goods whatever in foreign vessels. In 1672 came the Navigation Act of Charles II, based on that of Cromwell, under which the prohibition against introducing goods, except in English ships manned by a crew of which at least three-fourths were English, applied to all the principal articles of commerce known as the "enumerated articles." This act ruined the Dutch merchant navy, and the cruel restrictions of the navigation laws were one of the main causes of the American rebellion. Public opinion in England, however, was loyal to the mercantile policy throughout the eighteenth century. After the Declaration of American Independence the United States were placed on the footing of a foreign nation, and hence came under the operation of the act of Charles II. They promptly retaliated by excluding our ships, until in 1814, by the Treaty of Ghent, discriminating duties were mutually abolished. Long since the folly of these restrictions on commerce had been pointed out by political economists who denied the view of Adam Smith that the laws were necessary for "providing for our own safety and defence, and for affording security to our enormous colonial possessions and our widely-spread commerce." Wallace and Huskisson began from 1821 and onwards to introduce a series of measures of which the object was to place England and the foreign nations with which she was at peace on the same footing. The most important of these was the Reciprocity of Duties Act of 1823, which was directed against Prussia, the Netherlands, and Portugal, all of whom had raised their duties on English vessels; and the act of 1826, by which the Navigation Act was repealed, and a new set of regulations established of a more liberal character, though the goods of Asia, Africa, and America were still restricted to English vessels or those of the producing country. The free trade legislation of 1842, 1846, and 1849-50 finally abolished a most vexatious system. Lastly, in 1854, the coasting trade of England was thrown open to foreign vessels. The ruin anticipated by the upholders of the old restrictions did not accrue.

Navy, THE. According to the strict sense of the word, the navy did not come into existence until the reign of Henry VIII. Before that period the King of England had the power of calling upon a certain part of the people to serve against his enemies at sea, and to supply ships and arms; but there was no permanent naval force, although some of the sovereigns had ships which were their personal property. It seems, however, to have been the custom to pay the crews of these ships when on active service out of the national treasury. The Cinque Ports were endowed with privileges on consideration of rendering especial service at sea, but the obligation to serve was common to the whole coast. Until the end of the thirteenth century the general control of the navy was left to officers called leaders, governors, or justices of the king's fleet. In the reign of John the office was held by an ecclesiastic, the Archdeacon of Taunton. In 1303 the title of admiral was already in use. Gervase Alard is stated to be "captain and admiral of the fleet of ships of the Cinque Ports, and of all other ports from the port of Dover, and of the whole county of Cornwall." Admirals for parts of the coast, or for different seas, were appointed on varying conditions until the office of lord high admiral grew out of the older "captain and admiral" of particular districts. [ADMIRAL, THE LORD HIGH.] From the beginning of the fifteenth century the navy has always been governed, nominally at least, by a lord high admiral, either in person or by commissioners appointed to discharge the office. Its powers were very great, including the commandership-in-chief at sea, the authority of the present lords of the admiralty, with the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court in peace, and the prize courts in war. [ADMIRALTY.] The last lord high admiral who really exercised the powers of the office was James II when Duke of York. Henry VIII began the modern navy by the appointment of a comptroller, and by setting aside a portion of his revenue every year to meet the expenses of building new vessels and of keeping his ships in fighting order. It was, however, long before an organized body of naval officers was formed. Until the reign of James II it was the custom to appoint a captain who might or might not be a seaman, and who had a master to navigate for each voyage. The captain then collected his crew by voluntary enlistment or press. When the special service for which the ship had been commissioned was performed the whole crew was paid off, and ceased to have any further necessary connexion with the royal service. The pay of the captains was largely made up by fees for convoying, etc., until the abuses of the system induced James II to abolish it, and compensate the captains by the large increase of sea-pay known as service-and-table money. James II also established the system of giving half-pay to officers not on active service. It seems to have been regarded as a species of retaining fee, and even until the beginning of the eighteenth century naval officers in the intervals of active service commanded merchant ships, and traded on their own account. There are well-known cases of merchant skippers appointed to command warships as late as the end of the seventeenth century. Captain Cook is an example of a man who worked his way to command through the rank of sailing-master from before the mast. Step by step, however, the organization has become more strict, and to-day naval officers are a highly trained professional body. The matériel of the navy has gone through a process of development very similar to that of the personnel. Under the Tudors, the first two Stuarts, and the Commonwealth the navy consisted of a nucleus of royal ships (or national, as the case might be), which was joined in war-time, or whenever the king thought fit to make an imposing demonstration in the Channel, by a crowd of merchant vessels. Scarcely a fifth of the ships collected against the Armada belonged to the queen, and the proportion in Wimbledon's fleet which sailed against Cadiz in 1625, and in Buckingham's at the Isle of Rhé, 1626, was about the same. Even the great fleet which fought the three days' fight with Tromp in the Channel contained many armed merchant ships. By that time, however, the armed merchant ships had become a mere nuisance to the fighting vessels. What had done well enough in 1588, though even then the queen's officers did not think the ships from the ports good for much except to make a show, had become completely useless fifty years later. The causes of this change were two. In the first place the heroic enthusiasm of the Elizabethan days passed away with the Elizabethan heroes. In 1625 it was found impossible to get obedience from pressed crews and merchant skippers, and the English flag was disgraced by insubordination and cowardice before the enemy. In the second place Phineas Pett, James I's builder, had begun to make the warship something far more different from the merchant vessel than it had been in the sixteenth century. The progress of the seventeenth century in shipbuilding was as rapid as anything seen in our time. When James I ascended the throne a ship of 500 tons was a match for anything; the liners of his grandsons were vessels of from 1,500 to 1,600 tons. Their superiority in build and rigging was enormous. As the warship therefore became a special instrument, it was found impossible to improvise it out of a merchant ship any longer. Accordingly the number of royal ships had to be increased very rapidly. James I left only 33, Charles raised the number to 67; under the Commonwealth it rose to 154, and at the Revolution it was 173. At one period since then it has reached upwards of 900. The beginning of the eighteenth century may be considered as the period at which the navy became fully developed.

Since then the organization of the navy has remained almost the same in form, though it has undergone innumerable modifications in points of detail. The administrative machinery, the rank and status of officers, the code of laws by which naval discipline was preserved, and the duties of the various branches of the service were fixed at the beginning of the eighteenth century; and though the changes in the construction and management of ships have been enormous, the attempt has constantly been made to adapt this organization to it, without departing from it in essentials. Great progress was made in shipbuilding and naval tactics in the eighteenth century. In 1745 "first-rates" were ordinarily ships of 2,000 tons; in the American War they were 2,100; and in 1808 there was a ship of 2,616. One result of the great war with France from 1793 to 1815 was that the navies of the chief continental states were almost annihilated, and that of Britain obtained an enormous preponderance. Great improvements in the construction of the vessels were made after the close of the war; and the British ships of the line reached their perfection between the years 1820 and 1845. But in 1838 steam was applied to war vessels, and by the time of the Crimean War many British liners were fitted with auxiliary screws. Shortly afterwards armour-plated ships were introduced, and since then change has succeeded change with bewildering rapidity. During the latter half of the nineteenth century the British navy was completely reconstructed, and ships of size far exceeding the largest vessel of the past, and carrying ordnance of enormous powers, were built. The old system of "rating" is still nominally kept up, and generally speaking the names, ranks, and duties are assigned to the fighting part of the service; but each ship now carries a large number of engineers, artificers, and scientific officers. The building of new capital ships has been controlled by the terms of the Washington Conference of 1921 to which Great Britain was a signatory.

Nazir Jung was the second son of Nizam-ul-Mulk, on whose death (1749) he seized the royal treasure and the throne, and called in the aid of the British to resist the confederation formed against him by Dupleix to support Mozuffar Jung, the grandson of Nizam-ul-Mulk. The alliance did not, however, last long, and Nazir Jung was unable to cope with the intrigues of Dupleix. In 1750 he was assassinated.

Nechtansmere (or DUNNICHEN MOSS), THE BATTLE OF (May 20, 685), was fought between Brude, the Pictish king, and Egfrid of Northumbria, who had crossed the Forth to subdue the Picts. Egfrid was slain and with him the flower of the Northumbrian army. The result of this battle was most important. The Picts at once shook off the Northumbrian yoke, and the Northumbrian empire in the north sustained a fatal blow. Thereafter the northern kingdom fell behind in the race for supremacy, and in the next generation fell into a state of faction and civil war, from which it was destined never to emerge. Nechtansmere is the modern Dunnichen, about four miles south-east of Forfar.

Nectan (d. 731), son of Derili, succeeded his brother Brude as King of the Picts in 706. In 1710 the king and nation were persuaded by Ceolfrid, Abbot of Jarrow, to conform to the Roman Church, and to adopt Roman usages instead of the Columban. Within ten years Iona itself submitted to the rival order, and the whole of Scotland, with the apparent exception of Strathclyde, ranged itself on the side of Rome. In 724 Nectan abdicated and entered a monastery, which, however, he subsequently left, and, after a victory over Alpin, the reigning king at Scone, recovered his kingdom. He was shortly afterwards defeated by Angus MacFergus (731).

Nectan Morbet (d. 481), an early king of the Picts, is said to have been banished to Ireland by his brother and predecessor, Talore, on whose death, however, he returned. According to the Pictish chronicle, he founded the church of Abernethy and gave his name to Drum-nechtan or Dunnichen in Forfarshire.

Nelson, HORATIO, VISCOUNT (1758-1805), was the son of the rector of Burnham Thorpe in Norfolk. He went to school first at Norwich, and afterwards at North Walsham. In 1770 he went to sea with his uncle in the Raisonné, but soon returned, and was commissioned to the Triumph at Chatham. In 1773 his uncle's influence obtained a place for him in Captain Phipps's expedition to the Arctic Seas. It was at one time in great danger, but eventually returned safely. He was then ordered to the East Indies, where, after serving eighteen months, he was invalided home. In 1777 he received his commission as second lieutenant of the Lowestoft, ordered to Jamaica. In the West Indies he soon became noticeable for his bravery, and in December 1778 he was appointed to command the Badger, from which he was transferred in the following June as post-captain to the Hinchinbroke. In the spring of 1780 he was appointed to command an expedition against San Juan and the isthmus of Nicaragua. The expedition ended in failure, not through any fault of Nelson's, but on account of the deadly nature of the climate, against which only 380 out of 18,000 men were proof. Nelson himself was so shattered by the exertions he had gone through that he had to go to England to recruit his health. In 1784 he was appointed to the Boreas bound for the West Indies, where he found himself senior captain. In this position he became involved in some troublesome disputes, and finally in a lawsuit, owing to his determination to enforce the Navigation Act. On the outbreak of the French War in 1793 he was appointed to the Agamemnon of 64 guns to proceed to the Mediterranean. In 1796 Sir John Jervis took command in the Mediterranean, and Nelson became at the same time commodore. After various encounters with Spanish and French ships he joined the main fleet off Cape St. Vincent, where, on February 14, 1797, he took a conspicuous part in the great battle, and contributed much to the victory. Nelson was now advanced to the rank of rear-admiral, and commanded the inner squadron at the blockade of Cadiz. In July he conducted a night attack on Santa Cruz, which failed through the darkness; Nelson himself lost his right arm. Early in the following year he rejoined Lord St. Vincent in the Vanguard, and was immediately dispatched in command of a small squadron to watch the movements of the French fleet in the Mediterranean. On August 1 he came in sight of it anchored in Aboukir Bay, near Alexandria. He at once attacked with such fury and skill that, after the battle had raged all night, the whole French fleet, with the exception of four ships, was either taken or destroyed. The victory was hailed with delight in England, and Nelson was created Baron Nelson. There was work for him next to do at Naples in trying to strengthen that kingdom to resist France. The French, however, succeeded in occupying it with the help of a republican section of the inhabitants. Nelson blockaded the coast, and a counter-revolution seemed probable when, during his absence, the officer left in charge granted terms to the republicans. Nelson annulled these terms, and had Caracciolo, one of the republican leaders, tried by court-martial and executed with undue haste—an act usually ascribed to Lady Hamilton's influence, but without sufficient reason. In 1800 Nelson returned to England, and in the following year he was sent as second in command under Sir Hyde Parker to the Baltic, and on April 2 bore the chief part in the bombardment of Copenhagen. He was made a viscount, and on the recall of Sir Hyde Parker was left in sole command. On his return to England he was at once appointed to a command extending from Orfordness to Beachy Head. He organized an attack on the flotilla lying at Boulogne, but the expedition failed in its immediate object, though it had the effect of terrifying the French. On the war breaking out afresh in 1803 he was appointed to the command of the Mediterranean fleet, and took his station off Toulon. From May 1803 to August 1805 Nelson left his ship only three times, so constant was his watch for an opportunity of engaging the enemy. But when the alliance of Spain and France was concluded Napoleon determined to carry out his long-intended invasion of England. The combined fleets put out of port. Nelson went in search of them. From January to April 1805 he beat about the Mediterranean; then pursued them to the West Indies. Here they were in advance of him; and he was baffled by conflicting accounts of their movements. At length he followed them northwards, and on July 19 anchored off Gibraltar, but could hear no tidings of them. Unrelentingly he resumed his search round the Bay of Biscay and the coast of Ireland, and returning, joined Admiral Cornwallis off Ushant on August 15, where he received orders to proceed to Portsmouth. There he learnt that Admiral Calder had fallen in with the enemy fleet off Cape Finisterre on July 22, and that they had put into Vigo to refit. He again offered his services, which were eagerly accepted; and on September 29 he was off Cadiz. Villeneuve hesitated to obey peremptory orders to put to sea; but at length he ventured out, and on October 21 gave Nelson his long-wished-for opportunity. The fleets met off Trafalgar (q.v.), and in the battle which ensued the French and Spanish fleets were utterly destroyed. The victory was, however, only obtained at the cost of Nelson's life.

Nepal. About the middle of the fourteenth century it was colonized by Rajputs, and in the middle of the last century a chief of the Gurkha tribe united all the small principalities and founded the military dynasty of Katmandu. The attempts of the Nepal princes to extend their dominions north ended in a collision with China, which resulted in their being compelled to pay tribute. Foiled in the north, they turned south. Their greatest general, Ulmur Singh, who acted almost independently, carried their arms west beyond the Kali to the Upper Sutlej, coming in contact with the rising power of Ranjit Singh (q.v.). Not content with this, they pushed their encroachments to the British frontier and beyond, until their aggressions ended in the Gurkha War (q.v.), which effectually repressed their attempts in the south and west. The treaty which ended the war has never been violated, and the Gurkhas, instead of taking advantage of our exigencies in the Mutiny of 1857, sent a large force to assist in quelling it. The barren region which was the scene of the war has proved an invaluable acquisition. It has furnished sites for sanatoria at Simla, Mussuri, Landour, and Nynithal.

Neutrality may be either perfect or conventional, independent of, or affected by, treaty. Examples of conventional neutrality are afforded by the perpetual neutrality and inviolability of the Swiss cantons declared in 1815, and by the neutrality of Belgium declared in 1833. In some cases also neutrality has been qualified by a pre-existing alliance with one of the belligerents. Thus, in the war between Russia and Sweden in 1788, Denmark, though supplying the Empress Catherine with certain aid, as arranged by previous treaty, was yet held to be neutral. Such a limited neutrality, however, would scarcely be recognized in these days. No hostilities are lawful on neutral territory, nor may troops pass through such territory for the purposes of war. Within the limits of the maritime jurisdiction of a neutral state all captures are invalid, and every belligerent act is unlawful. In 1863 the crew of the American merchantman the Chesapeake mutinied, seized the ship, and declared her a Confederate man-of-war. The United States government took the ship with three of the crew in British waters, but Mr. Seward considered the capture a violation of the law of nations, and delivered ship and men to the British authorities. Such violation of territorial right is a matter which lies between the neutral state and the captor. A neutral state is bound not to afford any kind of warlike help to either of two belligerents, and not to refuse to one what she grants to the other. Acting on these principles, Washington, on the outbreak of the European war of 1793, issued a proclamation of neutrality, with instructions to prevent the equipment of belligerent vessels in the ports of the United States. No legislative effort in this direction was made by Great Britain until the Foreign Enlistment Act of 1819 (q.v.), which followed the lines laid down in America. This act was relaxed in 1835 in respect of troops levied to uphold the claim of Queen Isabella to the throne of Spain. [FOREIGN LEGION.] During the civil war in America, 1861-5, much dispute arose concerning our duty as a neutral. Many cruisers, such as the Alabama, the Florida, and the Shenandoah, were built at Liverpool for the Confederate States, and were received in British ports. These ships did immense damage to the shipping and trade of the Federal States. Since, however, it was at least doubtful how far we had exercised due vigilance, we submitted to arbitration. [GENEVA AWARD.] As regards the rights of neutrals in trading and carrying, primitive law allows the capture of an enemy's goods in any place save the territory of a neutral state; public ships, being reckoned as such territory, are not subject to visitation or capture of goods. This does not apply to private vessels. In respect of these, however, primitive law has been modified by treaty in favour of the rule that free or neutral ships make the goods they carry free also. Treaties to this effect were made by Holland, a great trading and carrying country, with Spain in 1650, with France in 1652, and again at the Peace of Ryswick in 1697. Though the maxim "free ships, free goods," does not imply the other maxim, "enemy's ships, enemy's goods" (for the one is founded on the principle sum cuique, while neutral goods, since they belong to a friend, should not be subject to capture), yet they have often been joined together, as in the Treaty of Utrecht in 1713. The parties to the Armed Neutrality (q.v.) of the Baltic, in 1780, insisted on "free ships, free goods," which was contrary to British custom. This rule has been established by the Declaration of Paris (q.v.—1856), with the exception of contraband of war, a term including such goods as are of primary importance in war, together with such as are of doubtful use, as naval stores and coal, if they are rendered contraband by circumstances. A neutral ship is subject to capture when carrying military persons or dispatches, or contraband goods, when they belong to the owner of the ship, or when fraud is practised. The right of neutrals to carry persons was involved in the Trent affair (q.v.). Neutral rights are further limited by blockade. The right to blockade by proclamation was asserted by Bonaparte, when, in 1806, without a ship to enforce his decree, he declared the blockade of the British Isles, and the same assertion was involved in our retaliatory Orders in Council. It has now been settled by the Declaration of Paris that a blockade to be binding on a neutral must be "effective." These restraints on neutrals imply the belligerent right of search and capture, and a neutral ship resisting this right is thereby rendered subject to confiscation.

Neuve Chapelle, THE BATTLE OF (March 1915), was fought on the western front, in Artois, during the Great War, after the German failure at Ypres in October 1914. It opened with an attack by the British on March 10, in an endeavour to break the German line. But German reinforcements brought the advance to a standstill on the 13th, and Sir Douglas Haig's determination was thwarted by lack of ammunition.

Neville, THE FAMILY OF. The Nevilles were lords of Raby from the early part of the thirteenth century. In 1397 Ralph de Neville of Raby was created Earl of Westmorland. The title was forfeited in 1571. Ralph's younger sons, Richard, William, and Edward, became respectively, by marriage, Earl of Salisbury, Baron Fauconberg, and Baron Abergavenny (with the titles of Despenser and Burghersh). Another son, George, inherited the barony of Latimer. Richard, Earl of Salisbury, was the father of Richard, famous as the "King-maker," who received as a result of his marriage with Anne, sister and heiress of Henry Beauchamp, Earl and ultimately Duke of Warwick, the earldom of Warwick (1449). His daughter, Isabel, married George, Duke of Clarence, created Earl of Warwick and of Salisbury (1472). John Neville, a younger brother of the "King-maker," was created Baron and later Marquis of Montagu (1470), and his son, George, was made Duke of Bedford (1470). The latter was degraded from all his dignities in 1477, but a descendant in the female line, Anthony Browne, was created Viscount Montague (1554). Returning to the generation next subsequent to Ralph, 1st Earl of Westmorland, George Lord Latimer's title fell into abeyance in 1577, while that of Edward, Lord Abergavenny, still remains. It was raised to an earldom (with the viscounty of Neville of Birling in Kent) in 1784, and to a marquise (with the earldom of Lewes) in 1876. Between 1598, however, and 1604 there was a dispute between the heir general, Lady Fane, and the heir male, Edward Neville, which ended in the latter's retaining the barony of Abergavenny, while the former received that of Despenser. The son of the holder of the Despenser title was in 1624 raised to the barony of Burghersh (co. Sussex) and earldom of Westmorland, and the title still remains with his descendants.

Neville, ALEXANDER (d. 1392), was elected Archbishop of York in 1373, and on the accession of Richard II became one of his chief advisers and supporters. The barons, under the leadership of Thomas of Woodstock, determined to get rid of all the royal ministers, and in 1388 Neville was "appealed" of treason. The Merciless Parliament (q.v.) declared him guilty, and Pope Urban VI was induced to translate him to the see of St. Andrews. This act, since Scotland acknowledged the rival pope, was equivalent to deprivation. Neville retired to Flanders, where he obtained a benefice at Louvain which he held till his death.

Neville, CHARLES, 6TH EARL OF WEST-MORLAND (1543-1601), one of the most powerful Catholic nobles of Elizabeth's reign, though a man devoid of talent, was a leader in the Northern rebellion of 1569, and achieved the only success in the insurrection by the capture of Barnard Castle from Sir George Bowes. On the collapse of the movement he made his escape to the border, and, in spite of many attempts to seize him, managed, with better fortune than the Earl of Northumberland, to find an asylum with the Duke of Alva in the Netherlands. There he dragged out a tedious existence in poverty and obscurity, barely supplied with the necessities of life by a slender pension from the King of Spain.

C. Menmuir, "The Rising of the North, 1569," 1907.

Neville, GEORGE, Bishop of Exeter (d. 1476), was the youngest son of Richard Neville, Earl of Salisbury, and brother to Warwick, the "King-maker." In 1456, although not more than 23 or 24, he was made Bishop of Exeter, and on the triumph of the Yorkists in 1460 received the great seal. In 1465 he was appointed Archbishop of York; but on the outbreak of a quarrel between the Earl of Warwick and the king in 1467 he was deprived of the chancellorship. In 1470 he joined his brothers in their restoration of Henry VI, by whom he was appointed chancellor; but after Edward's victories at Barnet and Tewkesbury his goods were seized and he himself was imprisoned in France for three years. He took no further part in public affairs, and died not long after his release.

Neville, GEORGE, 5TH BARON ABERGAVENNY (d. 1535), was in high favour with Henry VII, and assisted in the suppression of the Cornish rebels at Blackheath in 1497. He was prominent at court in the early years of Henry VIII's reign, but was involved in 1521 in the troubles which overtook Buckingham, whose daughter he had married. He suffered a short imprisonment, and although pardoned in 1522, he was never afterwards fully trusted by the king.

Neville, HENRY, 6TH BARON ABERGAVENNY (d. 1587), was thought to favour the insurgents in 1554, but finally declared for Mary, and defeated the rebels at Wrotham Heath (q.v.). He was one of the commissioners at the trial of Mary, Queen of Scots, in 1586.

Neville, JOHN, MARQUIS OF MONTAGU AND EARL OF NORTHUMBERLAND (d. 1471), was the son of Richard, Earl of Salisbury, and the younger brother of Warwick the "King-maker." He joined his father and brother in espousing the Yorkist cause, and on the accession of Edward IV was made warden of the Eastern Marches. In 1464 he defeated the Lancastrians at Hedgeley Moor (q.v.) and Hexham (q.v.). In 1467 he was created Earl of Northumberland, and the estates of the Percys were granted to him. He resigned this position two years later, in order that Percy might be restored, and received instead the title of Marquis of Montagu. He joined Warwick in his intrigues against Edward IV, shared in Henry VI's restoration, and fell with his brother at the battle of Barnet.

Neville, RALPH, 1ST EARL OF WESTMORLAND (d. 1425), was the son of John, Baron Neville of Raby. In 1386 he was made by Richard II guardian of the West Marches, and in 1399 Earl of Westmorland. Nevertheless, he joined Bolingbroke on his landing in England, and was by him granted the office of marshal for life. He fought for Henry IV against the Percys, his great rivals for power in the north; prevented the Earl of Northumberland from joining his son Hotspur (1403); and by gross treachery got Archbishop Scrope, the Earl of Nottingham, and other partisans of the Percys into his hands (1405). For the rest of his life Westmorland was mainly occupied in the discharge of his functions as warden of the Marches. He married first Margaret, daughter of the Earl of Stafford; and secondly Joan Beaufort, daughter of John of Gaunt. He was therefore closely connected by marriage with Henry IV.

Neville, RICHARD, 1ST EARL OF SALISBURY (1400-60), was a son of Ralph Neville, Earl of Westmorland, and obtained the earldom of Salisbury (1429) by marrying Alice, heiress of Thomas de Montacute. He served in France, became warden of the Marches, and strenuously opposed the surrender of the English provinces in France. He was a strong opponent of Somerset, and a warm supporter of his brother-in-law, the Duke of York, during whose protectorate he acted as chancellor (1453-5). In 1459 Lord Audley was commissioned to arrest him, but he defeated Audley at Blore Heath (q.v.). After the rout of Ludford (q.v.) he fled with York to France, and was attainted in his absence by the Lancastrian government. In the next year he returned and participated in the Yorkist triumph that followed the battle of Northampton; but being defeated and taken prisoner at Wakefield in the next year, he was beheaded. His eldest son was the famous Earl of Warwick, the "King-maker."

Neville, RICHARD, EARL OF WARWICK (the "King-maker") (1428-71), was the son of Richard, Earl of Salisbury, and married Anne, daughter and heiress of the Earl of Warwick, with whom he received the title as well as the estates of the Beauchamp family.

He thus became the owner of enormous wealth and landed property, and by his liberality and profuse hospitality he was soon a great favourite with the people. He espoused the cause of the Duke of York, with whom he fought at the first battle of St. Albans in 1455. In the same year he was made captain of Calais. A quarrel which took place between Warwick's retainers and some of the king's servants in 1459 precipitated the renewal of the civil war. After the rout of Ludford (q.v.) he fled to Calais, and subsequently joined York in Ireland, where they arranged a plan of action, and returning to England in 1460 defeated the Lancastrians at Northampton, and took the king prisoner. After the battle of Wakefield Warwick attempted to intercept Margaret's march to London, but was defeated at St. Albans. Retreating with a considerable force, he effected a junction with Edward at Chipping-Norton, and returned to London, where Edward IV was proclaimed king. Warwick took part in the battle of Towton, and was richly rewarded by Edward, receiving the captaincy of Dover, the wardenship of the Cinque Ports and the Scottish Marches, the office of lord chamberlain, with large grants of forfeited lands. Warwick's policy was to strengthen the new dynasty by a strict and cordial alliance with the French king; and for this purpose he set on foot negotiations for marrying Edward to Bona of Savoy, sister-in-law of Louis XI. But the king preferred the alliance of Burgundy, and his marriage with Elizabeth Woodville entirely upset Warwick's plans. The ascendancy of the queen's kinsfolk completed Warwick's estrangement, and he intrigued with Clarence, who in 1469 married his daughter Isabel at Calais without the king's knowledge. The northern insurrections of Robin of Holderness and Robin of Redesdale (q.v.) gave Warwick his opportunity, and the latter at least was certainly engineered by his supporters. Warwick returned from Calais in July intent on destroying the power of the Woodvilles. The king was taken prisoner. Rivers and Sir John Woodville were beheaded, and for a time the government was completely in Warwick's hands. But in 1470 the king escaped, and the defeat of the insurgents at Lose-coat Field (q.v.) obliged Warwick once more to seek refuge at Calais. By the influence of Louis XI a reconciliation was made between Warwick and Queen Margaret, in accordance with which Warwick invaded England on behalf of Henry VI and the young Prince Edward. He was joined by his brother Montagu, and others, while Edward fled to Burgundy. Henry was released from the Tower, and Warwick was once more supreme. But in the next year (1471) Edward returned, was joined by the treacherous Clarence, and succeeded in entering London. At Barnet the two armies came into conflict, and after a hard-fought battle, Warwick was defeated and slain. The character of the "last of the barons," as Warwick has been called, was in some respects an exaggeration of the ordinary baronial type. As a politician he was not without sagacity and foresight; and in warfare his dash and energy compensated in some degree for his lack of true generalship. But his gifts were solely employed in the acquisition of power for himself and his family. His title of "King-maker" is justified. It was by the power of the Nevilles that Edward IV was established on the throne. But Warwick aspired to play the mayor of the palace to Edward's roi fainéant, and when he found his intentions defeated, did not hesitate to plunge his country once more into civil war, and to offer to Lancaster the services he had formerly rendered to York. He left two daughters: Isabella, who was married to the Duke of Clarence; and Anne, married first to Edward, son of Henry VI, and secondly to Richard, Duke of Gloucester. [ROSES, WARS OF THE.]

Biography by Sir C. Oman, 1891.

Neville, William, Lord Falconberg (d. 1463), was the son of Ralph, Earl of Westmorland, and brother of Richard, Earl of Salisbury. He distinguished himself in the siege of Orleans and other operations in France in Henry VI's reign. He espoused the Yorkist cause, and fought at Towton (q.v.). In 1461 he was made Earl of Kent.

Neville's Cross, THE BATTLE OF (October 17, 1346), was fought near Durham, between an invading army of the Scots, under David II, the Steward and the Knight of Liddesdale, and the northern levies under Henry Percy and Ralph Neville, assisted by the Archbishop of York. The Scots were completely defeated, owing to their inability to cope with the English archers; David himself was captured, together with many of the chief men in the Scottish army, and large numbers were slain.

Nevis, with Anguilla as dependency, forms one of the presidencies of the Leeward Islands. It was discovered by Columbus (1493), and colonized by English settlers from St. Kitt's (1628). The progress of the island made rapid strides until 1706, when a French invasion carried off most of the slaves; and for some time after this attack the colonists had considerable difficulty in supporting themselves. In 1871 Nevis joined the federation of the Leeward Islands. Previous to this time the government was vested in a president, a council of seven members, and a representative assembly of nine. It now shares the government of St. Kitt's.

New Guinea, THE TERRITORY OF, consists of North-east New Guinea (Kaiser Wilhelm Land), the Bismarck Archipelago, and the Solomon Islands. It was previous to 1914 a protectorate, German New Guinea, acquired by economic penetration, secured by diplomatic pressure and delimited by agreements with the Dutch and Great Britain, its boundaries being completely defined by 1909. In 1914 the acting governor surrendered to an Australian force. The military administration was replaced in 1921 by a civil administrator appointed by the Australian Commonwealth under a League of Nations mandate (1920). German law has been abolished, German nationals expatriated and their property appropriated to reparations. There are fewer than 1,500 whites to nearly 350,000 natives whose rights and customs are secured by ordinance and tribal institutions preserved.

New Model was the name given to the army of the Parliament as new modelled in April 1645. The term referred at first to the plan on which the army was reorganized, but soon came to signify the army itself. The Lords rejected the first Self-denying Ordinance (January 13, 1645), because they did not know "what shape the army would suddenly take." The Commons produced a scheme for the reconstruction of the army on the following plan. The new force was to consist of 22,000 men, divided into 6,600 horse, 1,000 dragoons, and 14,400 foot, the horse to be formed into eleven regiments of 600 men each, the dragoons into ten companies of 100 men, and the foot into twelve regiments of 1,200 men each in ten companies. The army was to cost about £56,000 a month, to be raised by assessment throughout the kingdom. On January 21 it was resolved that this force should be commanded by Sir Thomas Fairfax, with Skippon as major-general. The officers were to be nominated by the commander-in-chief, subject to the approval of the two Houses. This scheme, and these appointments, were confirmed by the House of Lords on February 15, 1645. The new army contained a large number of Independents, for Fairfax was empowered to dispense with the signature of the Covenant in the case of religious men. Several of its officers had risen from the ranks, and had originally filled very humble stations. Lieutenant-Colonels Pride and Hewson had been, the one a drayman and the other a cobbler. But the assertions made at the time by opponents of the new scheme that most of the colonels were "tradesmen, brewers, tailors, goldsmiths, shoemakers, and the like," were entirely untrue. Out of thirty-seven generals and colonels it is computed that twenty-one were commoners of good families, nine members of noble families, and only seven not gentlemen by birth. It deserves notice that a large number of these officers were Cromwell's kinsmen and connexions. Clarendon in 1660 described the army thus founded as "an army whose sobriety and manners, whose courage and success, have made it famous and terrible all over the world."

New Ross, THE BATTLE OF (June 5, 1799), was fought during the Irish rebellion between Sir Henry Johnson, with some 1,400 men, and no fewer than 30,000 rebels, under Father Roche and Bagenal Harvey (q.v.). The rebels were at first successful, and reached even the market-place; Johnson, however, rallied his men, and, charging with the bayonet, drove them out of the town with fearful carnage. The troops, enraged to frenzy, gave no quarter, and after eleven hours' fighting no fewer than 2,600 rebel corpses were left on the field. This defeat prevented the rebels from marching on Dublin.

New Zealand, THE DOMINION OF, 105,000 sq. miles, consists of three major islands, North, South, and Stewart, together with the following island groups in the South Pacific: Chatham Islands, chiefly used for sheep-farming; Campbell, Antipodes, Bounty, and Kermadec Islands, all uninhabited; Auckland Islands, Cook Islands, a group with a considerable native trade and an island council; Ross dependency proclaimed in 1923, and various islands annexed in 1901 to complete boundary lines, together with the mandated territory of Western Samoa, formerly German, and Nauru Island, jointly administered by Great Britain, the Commonwealth of Australia, and New Zealand under a League of Nations mandate. The population is over 1,400,000, of which nearly 55,000 are Maoris.

New Zealand was first discovered in 1642 by Tasman, who sailed up the west coast without landing, and was visited by Cook in his three voyages (1769-77). Cook was the real discoverer of the country; he sailed all round, accurately charting it, and took possession in the name of Great Britain. Other visitors about the same time, or shortly after, were the Frenchmen de Surville and Marion du Fresne, and the Englishman Vancouver, after which the country was frequented mainly by whalers, both deep-sea and shore, sealers, and traders in timber and flax. The whaling and sealing industries declined in the eighteenth century, though there has recently been a revival of whaling within the dominion's territorial waters. The country was noted at this time for its unruliness, the chief European settlement, Korarareka, at the Bay of Islands, being a celebrated resort for the scum of the Pacific, escaped convicts from Sydney, and more or less disreputable whalers of all nationalities. The first mission station was founded by Marsden in 1814, from which year the C.M.S. did good work, followed by the Wesleyans and Roman Catholics. The combined influence of this piety, however, was not enough to make the islands moral, and New Zealand was accordingly taken under the wing of New South Wales by act of parliament (4 Geo. IV, c. 93 and 9 Geo. IV, c. 83) by which New South Wales could impose penalties for crimes committed by British subjects in New Zealand—a somewhat empty enactment. This was followed by the appointment of a British resident at the Bay of Islands in 1832, whose influence was restricted to the exercise of moral suasion. He did, however, prevail upon a few chiefs to issue a declaration of independence. In addition to many spasmodic commercial adventures, an unsuccessful attempt was made to found a regular colony with English immigrants by a company of enthusiasts in 1825; the assets of this body were bought out by the more successful Land Company of 1839, which followed the ill-fated New Zealand Association of 1837—both children of the fertile brain of Edward Gibbon Wakefield (q.v.), who wished to give his colonizing "system" a fair chance somewhere in the empire. This company in 1840 made a settlement, unauthorized by the British government, at Port Nicholson (afterwards called Wellington). Shortly afterwards a British consul, Captain Hobson, landed at the Bay of Islands and by the much-discussed Treaty of Waitangi secured from the Maori chiefs the cession of the sovereignty of the islands, while leaving to the natives full possession of property rights over the whole country. Hobson carried a dormant commission as lieutenant-governor, subordinate to New South Wales, but shortly afterwards New Zealand was declared a separate colony and he became first governor. He set up his capital at Auckland, thus causing much acrimonious rivalry between the official and the colonizing centres, which did not cease even with the transference of the seat of government to Wellington in 1867. The New Zealand Company was also responsible for settlements at Wanganui, New Plymouth, and Nelson, where the Wairan massacre was a great setback, between the years 1840 and 1842, and later on in conjunction with Free Kirk settlers at Otago (1848), and a church body at Canterbury (1850). All these settlements were founded more or less on the lines of the Wakefield "system." Unfortunate, if inevitable, differences with the natives over the settlement of land that was supposed to have been bought from them, led to a series of desperate wars, the first of which was brought to a successful conclusion under Governor Grey (1845-53); the others lingered on for ten years from 1860 with varying fortunes, being finally ended by the surrender and pardon of Kooti in 1872. Nearly three million acres were confiscated by the government in reprisal for the outbreaks, but a great part of this was afterwards handed back and paid for. The bravery and chivalry with which the wars had been waged left very little bad feeling and an entire absence of racial jealousy. The Maoris have now judicial and political equality with the whites; their racial lassitude and peculiar land-system hindered for some time their social development, but a recent cultural and economic renaissance under the leadership of the Young Maori party has already given evidence of great and steady improvement. They are succeeding as small-holders and dairy farmers, and show about the same vital rate of increase as the whites.

The constitutional and political development of the country has been interesting. It was at first ruled by the governor and a nominated legislative council of officials. In 1846 responsible government was granted by a somewhat peculiar constitution which was shelved by Grey and, on his advice, suspended until the settlements should overcome the political disadvantages of their scattered nature. At the same time Grey and the exceedingly capable Bishop Selwyn worked out a very democratic constitution for the Church in New Zealand. A new, quasi-federal constitution was granted in 1853; the country was divided into six provinces each with a superintendent and an elected council, with a central government consisting of the governor, a legislative council nominated for life, and a lower chamber elected on a fairly liberal franchise. After considerable confusion and wire-pulling full responsible government emerged in 1856. The system lasted until 1876, when the provincial councils, the abode of parochial jealousies, having come into conflict with the public works policy of Sir Julius Vogel, were abolished and a centralized government has exercised undivided authority ever since. The Massey government passed legislation making the upper chamber elective, but it has still so far remained in abeyance, councillors being appointed for a period of seven years. The franchise is adult, male and female, while the Maoris have four representatives in the lower house and some have even achieved cabinet rank. A series of protracted ministries, Conservative up to 1891, Liberal until 1912 and then Conservative again, enabled New Zealand to consolidate her staple industries and, chiefly under the inspiration of Reeves, the minister of labour, to indulge in a series of experiments in state Socialism which have been on the whole remarkably successful. Vogel (1869-76) initiated a policy of public loans, public works, and government encouragement to the woollen and gold industries and to irrigation schemes. Grey (1877-9) introduced a land tax and an agrarian and democratic policy of Australian origin. In 1890, towards the end of a long period of economic disaster, the advent of the Radical party alarmed the farmers with the prospect of state interference, but the boards of conciliation and the central court of arbitration, set up by Reeves in 1894, have more than falsified that fear. In 1908 conciliation councils replaced the boards, which had not functioned well. The system is now being criticized by the Labour party. Land legislation went hand in hand with this industrial policy and provided lease in perpetuity in Crown lands (1892), the right to convert to freehold with conditional purchase (1907), a graduated land tax (1892), and a government office for advances to settlers in 1894, following upon the rescue and consolidation of the Bank of New Zealand (1894) by the government, which has since had a controlling share in the enterprise. Life insurance and the public trusts had been started by the government from 1869, fire insurance by 1903, while railways, the first of which was opened in 1863, came under government control in 1876, six years after the Railways Act had initiated a policy of uniformity and progress. 1895 marks the completion of governmental control of all railway communication. In 1895, too, a protective tariff was introduced, but in the Imperial Conferences (q.v.) New Zealand showed herself to be more ardently imperial than the home country, and from 1897 to 1911 her representatives were advocates of an Imperial centralization alien to the line of British Imperial growth. As early as 1900 Seddon had reported against federation with Australia, and colonial autonomy was correspondingly strengthened in spite of her imperial sympathies. In 1907 the status of New Zealand was changed from that of a colony to that of a Dominion. A governor is still appointed by the Crown, but full autonomy resides in the two chambers with a responsible ministry. The policy of New Zealand under whatever government it has had has been strongly, if somewhat complacently, Imperialist. Seddon (who succeeded the very attractive Ballance as premier in 1893) constituted himself the robust prophet of Imperialism; he was followed by Ward, who presented a battle-cruiser to the royal navy, and by Massey, who, though of an opposing party, was no less fervent in his creed and enjoyed the united support of the dominion throughout the war. At the present time New Zealand betrays no wish for the more elastic Imperial relationships which appear to be the aim of other members of the British Commonwealth of Nations and which were so fully articulated and recognized at the Imperial Conference of 1927.

THE OUTLYING ISLANDS, proclaimed as within the geographical boundaries of New Zealand in 1847, are Three Kings Islands, so named by Tasman, the Auckland Islands, discovered in 1806 by Bristow and possessed since 1807, Campbell Islands, discovered in 1810 by Hazelburgh, the Antipodes Islands, the Bounty Islands, discovered by Bligh in 1788, and the Snares Islands.

THE ANNEXED ISLANDS are the Kermadec Islands, annexed in 1887, having been discovered in 1788 and 1793 by Watts and de Bruni and inhabited for short times in 1878 and 1889, and again in 1926, the Cook and other islands, annexed in 1901. The constitution of these latter was remodelled in 1915: island councils consisting of ex-officio members and native chiefs together with nominated members. Women are eligible and vote.

WESTERN SAMOA, consisting of four large and many smaller islands, occupied in 1914 by New Zealand, are administered as a territory by a mandate from the League of Nations. Visited by the Dutch in 1721-2, by the French in 1768 and 1787, by English in 1790, and by missionaries first in 1830, they were the subject of international dispute. A British (1838) followed by an American commercial treaty (1839) with the Samoans led to the appointment of consular agents by England in 1847, by America in 1853, and by Germany in 1861. Internecine wars between rival claimants to the chieftainship led to petitions for annexation to Great Britain in 1877 and the United States of America in 1878, which were refused. All three interested European nations received naval and coaling rights, and at a conference in Berlin in 1889 they guaranteed the neutrality and independence of the islands. In 1898 the kingship was abolished, and the Anglo-German agreement of 1899, accepted by the United States in 1900, gave to Germany all rights over Western Samoa and to the United States over Eastern Samoa. Western Samoa is now administered by an administrator appointed by the governor-general of New Zealand and responsible to the ministry. He is assisted by a legislative council of four to six nominated officials and three unofficial members elected by the whites. Self-government has been largely granted to the natives, the leading chiefs of whom, appointed as a native parliament by the administrator, meet twice yearly, to discuss and present recommendations to the administrator.

NAURU. A German island until 1914, it surrendered to New Zealand, and is now administered by a mandate of the League of Nations jointly by Great Britain, Australia, and New Zealand according to the 1919 agreement. An administrator is appointed quinquennially. The three mandatory powers bought out the Pacific Phosphate Co. and arranged the allocation of phosphate between them respectively as 42, 42, 16 to coincide with their capital shares.

ROSS DEPENDENCY. In 1923 the coasts and adjacent islands and territories were proclaimed as Ross Dependency, to be administered by the governor-general of New Zealand. A Norwegian firm has a twenty-one years' whaling lease.

TOKELAU or UNION GROUP, ceded to Great Britain in 1916 and forming part of the Gilbert and Ellice Islands Colony until 1925, were transferred in 1926 to New Zealand and are now administered by the administrator of Western Samoa for New Zealand. The islanders are ruled by native chiefs assisted by native councils.

Newark, DAVID LESLIE, 1ST BARON (d. 1682). [LESLIE.]

Newburn, BATTLE OF (August 28, 1640), was fought at the opening of the second war between Charles I and the Scots. Viscount Conway, with about 12,000 men, was charged to hold the line of the Tyne. Leaving two-thirds of his forces in Newcastle, Conway, with 3,000 foot and 1,500 horse, posted himself at the ford of Newburn, four miles above the town. There he threw up some hasty entrenchments, but they were commanded by the higher ground on the opposite bank, and after a three hours' cannonade the raw levies who defended them took to flight. The Scots now crossed the river, and after a couple of charges routed the English cavalry. This defeat forced Conway to evacuate Newcastle, which the Scots occupied on the following day.

Newbury, THE FIRST BATTLE OF (September 20, 1643), was fought during the Civil War. The Earl of Essex raised the siege of Gloucester (September 5), and managed to evade pursuit during the first portion of his march back to London. But Prince Rupert, with the royal cavalry, overtook him and delayed his progress, so that the king was enabled to occupy Newbury and bar the road to London. The royal army was advantageously posted on a hill to the south of Newbury with its right resting on the River Kennet. Charles was resolved to maintain a defensive attitude, but the rash attack of some of his horse prevented this resolution being carried out. The battle was decided by the Parliamentary infantry, led by Essex in person, who stormed the hill by sheer hard fighting. The king lost many noblemen and officers, including the Earl of Carnarvon, the Earl of Sunderland, and Lord Falkland. Essex marched on to Reading, unopposed, the next morning.

—, THE SECOND BATTLE OF (October 27, 1644). After the surrender of the Earl of Essex in Cornwall (September 1644), Charles marched back towards Oxfordshire. He found that the Parliament had united a new army of about 16,000 men from the armies of Waller and Manchester, and the remains of that of Essex. The king, with little more than 8,000 men, took up his position to the north of Newbury between Shaw and Speen, with his front protected by the River Lamborn, with Donnington Castle and a house called Doleman's House serving as outworks. Here the king was attacked on October 27. On his left the Royalists lost the village of Speen and several guns, but they held their ground in the fields between Donnington and Newbury. On the right, at Shaw, the earthworks round Doleman's House were successfully defended, and the Parliamentary troops were heavily repulsed. Nevertheless the loss of ground on the left obliged the king to abandon his position, and he withdrew the same night by Donnington Castle to Wallingford. Cromwell declared that this imperfect victory might have been turned into a decisive success had the Earl of Manchester been willing. "I showed him evidently," says Cromwell, "how this success might be obtained, and only desired leave with my own brigade of horse to charge the king's army in their retreat, leaving it to the earl's choice if he thought proper to remain neutral with the rest of his forces. But he positively refused his consent." So far did the inactivity of the Parliamentary general go, that the king was allowed twelve days later to return and remove his artillery and stores from Donnington.

Newcastle, DUKES OF. [PELHAM-HOLLES; CAVENDISH.]

Newfoundland, THE COLONY OF, may be regarded as the starting-point of the British Empire, though it owes its existence to two unrelated and non-imperial factors. The first was the search for a North-west Passage to the Far East. The island was probably first discovered by the Norwegians, but was only rediscovered to Europe in 1496 by John Cabot, who was a little uncertain as to what he expected to find. Then followed a series of voyages of which Frobisher's (1576-8), Davy's (1585-7), Hudson's (1609-11), Baffin's (1615-16), are best known. This search was continued in the nineteenth century, being resumed in 1819 to end in 1906 with the actual discovery of the famous but useless passage. The second factor was the cod. From about 1500 Cabot's route became an annual trade route for fleets of fishermen, Bretons, Bristol men, Spanish Basques, Portuguese, all in "armed but innocent anarchy" with a certain rude order preserved by "admirals." Then began a series of settlements, some for purposes of colonization, others of a more commercial nature, being winter settlements to prepare for the summer fishing.

Sir Humphrey Gilbert (q.v.) was granted a patent in 1578, and on his second voyage in 1583 annexed what is now St. John's. A colonizing company was created in 1610 by London and Bristol merchants, which, however, came into conflict with the fishermen. The Star Chamber issued fishing rules in 1621 and elaborated them in the Western charter of 1634. In 1637 Kirke's patent superseded all previous grants, although Baltimore in 1623 and Falkland in 1635 had set up separate colonies on the island.

With the absorption of Portugal by Spain in 1580 and peace with Spain in 1604, only French rivals were left on the banks. Spasmodic hostilities occurred during the seventeenth century and then developed into a continuous state of hostility with three marked phases. A French colony was formed at Placentia and attacked in 1692-3, St. John's was captured by the French in 1696, but Newfoundland was ceded to Great Britain by the Treaty of Utrecht (1713), France retaining Cape Breton Island and fishing rights on the banks and drying rights on part of the coast. Then followed a period of growth. Locke's contractual government experiment (1723) was followed by the rise of capitalism, Irish immigration, and transportation of felons. War with France broke out again in 1742. St. John's was captured and recaptured, but the British title to the island was confirmed by the Treaty of Paris (1763). During the American War of Independence America secured acknowledgment of its fishing rights, and the Napoleonic Wars closed the third phase of Anglo-French rivalry with a similar acknowledgment.

Throughout this period there was no system of government, though the island had been separated from Nova Scotia in 1724 and officially recognized as a Crown colony in 1765. The first civil court was established in 1791. From 1818 to 1825 Governor Hamilton ruled without a council. From 1825 to 1832 Governor Lochrane ruled with a nominated council, and under Governor Cochrane (1832-55) legislative and executive councils of ten nominated officials were supplemented by a legislative assembly of fifteen elected representatives. From 1843 to 1847 the two houses sat together. Responsible government was granted in 1855 with a legislative assembly of 30 (now 36) and a nominated legislative council of 18 (now 24). The executive is vested in a governor and council of 10. Newfoundland refused to join the Canadian Federation in 1865 and again in 1868, and when she offered to join in 1893 her terms were rejected by the Dominion. French fishing disputes culminated in the Conventions of 1851 and 1885. Arbitration was proposed from 1889 to 1904, when the conclusion of the Entente Cordiale settled the difficulty. American rights were defined in 1854 and 1871. Inaccurate maps and treaty definitions left an unsettled claim by both Newfoundland and Canada over part of the coast of Labrador (q.v.), which was settled by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in 1927.

Newman, JOHN HENRY, CARDINAL (1801-1890), was born in London, the eldest son of John Newman, a banker. He entered Trinity College, Oxford, in 1816, and Lincoln's Inn in 1819. Two years later he became a fellow of Oriel College and began his memorable friendship with Edward Bouverie Pusey. He was ordained deacon in 1824, and became the friend of Dr. Whateley and R. H. Froude. About this time he broke with the evangelical party at Oxford in a pamphlet criticizing the constitution of the Church Missionary Society, and in 1832 he closed his public career at Oxford as a result of a quarrel with the provost of Oriel regarding his tutorship. He went to the Mediterranean with Froude, met Dr. Wiseman, and contracted fever in Sicily. He returned to England in July 1833, five days before Keble preached the sermon on national apostasy which Newman regarded as the beginning of the Oxford Movement. To this movement "Keble had given the inspiration, Froude had given the impetus, then Newman took up the work." Newman met his friends, together with William Palmer, A. P. Perceval, and H. J. Rose, at Hadleigh in July, and in September began the series of "Tracts for the Times" in defence of the doctrine of apostolic succession and the integrity of the Prayer Book. In 1837 he began, in his "Prophetical Office of the Church"—a series of works in defence of Anglo-Catholicism, the via media, which gathered to him many followers. But in 1839 he began to doubt the truth of the Anglican view put forward in his "Romanism and Popular Protestantism" (1837), and as a result of a study of the Monophysite controversy which he undertook, and of Dr. Wiseman's "Anglican Claim," he published in 1841 the famous "Tract 90," which brought the Tractarians into great disfavour. He retired to Littlemore and passed three years in seclusion, during which he became convinced that there could be "no valid objection" to joining the Roman Church, in which he found an "identity of the catholicism of to-day with the catholicism of antiquity." In September 1843 he resigned his living of St. Mary's, Oxford; and in October 1845 he was received into the Roman Church. The Oxford Movement broke up, and Newman left Oxford in 1846 until 1878. He was ordained priest in Rome in 1847. In 1851 he was fined £100 for a libel on Achilli, the Dominican monk who had become notorious during the "Papal Aggression" of 1850. He became rector of Dublin University in 1854 and held the post for four years, returning to England in 1858 and entering into a controversy with Charles Kingsley. He was elected an honorary fellow of Trinity College, Oxford, in 1877, and in the following year he was made a cardinal by Pope Leo XIII. On his return he lived at Edgbaston until his death. He had struggled all his life against the doctrine of "liberalism" in religion which had been content to regard "one creed as good as another," and had brought himself to believe in the conception of an infallible Church, which he had sought to realize in the national Church, by means of the Tractarian Movement, until the condemnation of that movement cut away his basis of external authority and forced him to seek truth elsewhere.

Newport, THE TREATY OF (1648). In spite of the vote that no more addresses should be made to the king (January 15, 1648), the Presbyterian majority in parliament seized the opportunity of the second Civil War to open fresh negotiations. On August 24 the vote of No Addresses (q.v.) was rescinded, and it was agreed that efforts should be made to enter into a general and open treaty with Charles I, and that the place of negotiation should be Newport in the Isle of Wight (August 10). The Parliamentary commissioners, five lords and ten commoners, arrived in the island on September 15, and the negotiations began three days later. They continued till November 27, as the king argued every point, and delayed to give decided answers in the hopes of escaping, or being freed by help from France or Ireland. He offered to consent to the establishment of Presbyterianism for three years, but would not agree to the abolition of bishops. His answers on the Church question, and the question of the "delinquents," were both voted unsatisfactory (October 26-30). Nevertheless on December 5 the House of Commons, by 129 to 83 voices, voted "that the answers of the king to the propositions of both houses are a ground for the House to proceed upon for the settlement of the peace of the kingdom." The immediate result of this vote was Pride's Purge (q.v.).

Nile, THE BATTLE OF THE (OR BATTLE OF ABOUKIR BAY), was fought on August 1, 1798. Nelson, who had followed and passed the French fleet which convoyed Bonaparte's army to Egypt, had arrived at Alexandria two days before the French squadron. Not finding them there, he set sail immediately for Candia, and spent the next four weeks searching the Mediterranean for them. On August 1 his fleet came in sight of that of the French under Admiral Brueys, which was lying off Alexandria. The British advanced to the attack sailing in two lines, one of which passed between the French and the shore, while the other, led by Nelson in the Vanguard, anchored outside the French line, the nine first vessels of which were thus taken between two fires. The action began about half-past six in the afternoon, and before nine five of the French ships had struck or were rendered helpless. Shortly after this the gigantic Orient caught fire and blew up. The battle continued till midnight, by which time nearly all the French ships were too shattered to reply. At daybreak it was seen that the whole French line, with the exception of two ships which cut their cables and stood out to sea, had either sunk or struck their colours. The effects of the battle were very important. Bonaparte's army was entirely isolated and the ultimate failure of the Egyptian expedition ensured.

Nisi Prius was a name given to a writ issued under the second Statute of Westminster (1285), by which the juries empanelled in any ordinary civil cause were to be presented by the sheriff at Westminster on a certain day, unless before that day (nisi prius) the justices of assize came into the county, in which case the trial was to be before the justices, and not at Westminster. Its effect was to lighten the burden of the central courts and to increase greatly the importance of the justices of assize.

Nivelle, THE PASSAGE OF THE (November 10, 1813), was one of the great successes of the closing period of the Peninsular War. The river was strongly defended by Soult, but Wellington found a weak point in his defences and introduced through it the light division into the heart of the French position. This mistake of Soult's resulted in his complete defeat, after a long and severe struggle. Soon afterwards he withdrew to Bayonne. The loss of the allies was heavy, but small compared with that of the French, who, in addition to 4,300 men, abandoned 69 guns and all the field magazines at St. Jean de Luz and Espelette.

Nizam, THE. On the break-up of the Mogul Empire the Nizam-ul-Mulk, viceroy of the Deccan and feudal lord of the Carnatic, became almost independent of the court of Delhi. He was the ruler of a vast territory between the Kistna and the Nerbada with 35,000,000 inhabitants. In 1749 an election dispute was used by both British and French, who supported rival claims, Ali, the British candidate, eventually becoming chief ruler in the Deccan. In 1765-6 the British obtained from him the Northern Circars, which had been granted to the company by the emperor. In 1786-7 he became engaged in war with Tipoo in alliance with the Mahrattas. His services during the war were not of much value, but in spite of this he gained a large accession of territory by the Treaty of Seringapatam (q.v.) In 1794, seeing a Mahratta war was inevitable, he endeavoured to get British help, which was refused by Sir John Shore. Deserted by the British, he was beaten in the Kurdlah campaign (q.v.). Defeated, he allowed a French officer, Raymond, to organize a body of troops which eventually absorbed the whole power of the country, so that the nizam himself became alarmed, and accepted with alacrity Lord Wellesley's proposal to disband them, and renew the British alliance (1798) in return for an annual tribute. In 1806 a treaty was concluded by which the districts the nizam had obtained from Mysore (1793-9) should be ceded as a commutation for subsidy, and that the British in return should guarantee the defence of his kingdom against all enemies. Thus Nizam Ali's long reign ended in making the Hyderabad state completely dependent on the British. In consequence, Hyderabad has survived the wreck of the other native principalities, and exists still as a dependent protected state.

No Addresses, VOTE OF (January 3, 1648). In December 1647, after Charles I's flight to the Isle of Wight, the Parliament summed up their demands in four bills. The king on December 28 declined to assent to these bills, having on the 26th come to an arrangement with the Scots. On the king's refusal the House of Commons resolved, by a majority of 141 to 91, that no further addresses should be made to the king by that House; that no addresses or applications to him by any person whatsoever should be made without leave of the Houses under the penalties of high treason; that no messages from the king should be received; and that no one should presume to bring or carry such messages (January 3, 1648). The Lords agreed to these resolutions, the three leading dissentients (Stamford, North, and Robartes) absenting themselves for the occasion (January 15).

Nominees, THE ASSEMBLY OF, is the name given by some historians to the parliament which met in 1653, generally known as "Barebones' Parliament" (q.v.).

Non-Compounders, THE, who gained their name about 1692, were a section of the Jacobite party who were willing to aid in the restoration of James II without imposing any conditions on him whatever. They consisted chiefly of Roman Catholics, with some Protestant Non-jurors, such as Kettlewell and Hickes. They were all-powerful in the court of St. Germans during the years that followed the Revolution, and their leader, Melfort, ruled the councils of James. We find them much disgusted by the Second Declaration which James issued in 1693 by the advice of the Earl of Middleton, the leader of the Compounders. On the dismissal of his rival, Melfort and his party guided the Jacobite councils abroad. As the parties ceased after some years to come into collision, the title was gradually dropped.

Nonconformists is a name generally given to all Protestants who refuse to conform to the doctrine, discipline, or worship imposed by law on the Church of England, and who have organized religious associations of their own on a different basis. The mediæval Church system, more intolerant of schism than even of heresy, was incompatible with the existence of Nonconformity. The Reformation necessarily gave scope for freedom of discussion and difference of opinion. At the accession of Queen Elizabeth the constitution of the English Church was definitely settled. The followers of the Continental Reformers found much in the Reformed Church to which they took very strong exception. [PURITANS.] But the early Puritans were discontented conformists, and not nonconformists. The laxness of the ecclesiastical administration during the early part of the reign of Queen Elizabeth allowed many who objected decidedly to the Act of Uniformity to retain their cures without really carrying out the act. Even Cartwright, who attempted to superimpose a presbyterial organization on the existing ecclesiastical system, was in full communion with the Church. The attempt to enforce discipline which was marked by the publication of Parker's "Advertisements" (q.v.) in 1566 was followed by the first definite secession. Thirty-seven out of one hundred and forty benefited clergy in London were driven from their cures for refusing to wear the surplice. Two deans and many country clergy were similarly deprived. Despite the exhortations of Knox, Beza, and Bullinger, a large number of these "assembled as they had opportunity, in private houses and elsewhere, to worship God in a manner which might not offend against the light of their consciences." Others took refuge in Holland. Those who remained in England formed separate congregations of the Independent type. From their leader, Robert Browne, they received the name of Brownists (q.v.). From another leader they were called the Barrowists (q.v.). [CONGREGATIONALISM.] They remained the only important nonconforming body for nearly a century. Practically the only other Nonconformists were the Anabaptists. Stray foreign members of this revolutionary sect had atoned for their opinions at the stake between the reigns of Henry VIII and James I. But neither they nor the Family of Love, a mystical branch of the same communion, were at all numerous. The constant emigration, especially of the Independents, to New England kept down their numbers; yet it is remarkable that, despite the constant irritation to which they were subjected, but few of the Puritans seceded. Down to the Civil War they continued, as a whole, members of the Church; and though the high monarchist doctrines of the Caroline bishops and the need of the Scottish alliance forced the bulk of the Parliamentary leaders to accept presbytery, the Book of Discipline, and the general assembly, the flux of opinion during the whole of the period of the Civil War makes it hard to draw the line between conformist and nonconformist. Presbyterians, Independents, and Baptists, along with the old clergy who accepted the "Engagements," could be conformists under the Established Church of Cromwell; while Quakers, Fifth Monarchists, and rigid Anglicans were united in a nonconformity which was hardly tolerated. The Restoration destroyed a system which had never been to the satisfaction of any body of Christians. The Act of Uniformity (q.v.—May 17, 1662) imposed on all the benefited clergy the duty of reading publicly the amended Book of Common Prayer, and of declaring their unfeigned assent to everything contained in it; to receive episcopal ordination if they had it not already; and to abjure the Covenant. Nearly two thousand ministers gave up their cures rather than submit to such conditions. With their secession the history of Nonconformity in England really begins. Despite the series of stringent statutes by which Clarendon and the High Church parliament made nonconformity penal, the chief dissenting Churches now revived their organization. The older bodies, the Independents and Baptists, simply returned with augmented membership to their former condition. A powerful Presbyterian Church was added to the nonconforming bodies, which included not only the zealots of the Covenant, but liberal Low Churchmen like Baxter, whom a conciliatory policy would easily have retained. The swarm of minor sects which the religious anarchy of the Commonwealth had created still continued. The Quakers were the most important of these who did not ultimately become extinct. A few Socinian congregations had already been established, despite the ban of all parties.

In 1661 the Corporation Act (q.v.) deprived the Dissenters of some of their most valued rights as citizens. In 1664 the First Conventicle Act made the meeting of five Nonconformists for religious worship an offence punishable for the first time by fine and imprisonment, and for the third by slavery in the American plantations. In 1665 the Five Mile Act strove to make it impossible for nonconforming ministers to earn a living, and hard for them to escape being sent to jail. In 1673 the Test Act imposed a sacramental qualification on all officials, which most Nonconformists could not conscientiously take. Still, even in this black period, when the jails were full of men like Baxter and Bunyan, traces of more liberal feeling, such as Dr. Wilkins's abortive attempts at comprehension, were not wanting. The politic attempt of the Crown to unite the Nonconformists with the Catholics against the Church—by means of the various Declarations of Indulgence (q.v.)—signally failed. Nearly successful with the Exclusion Bill, the Nonconformists—this time in alliance with the whole Church party—triumphed in the Revolution of 1688. Their period of direct persecution was now over. The Comprehension Bill indeed, which was to do justice to the descendants of the ejected of 1662, was a failure. But the Toleration Act (q.v.) gave “ease to scrupulous consciences” by allowing those who took new oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and a declaration against popery, to worship freely after their own manner; exempted them from the penalties for absenting themselves from church and holding illegal conventicles; and even permitted Quakers to affirm instead of swearing. But meetings were to be held with open doors, ministers were to approve the thirty-six out of the Thirty-nine Articles which concerned doctrine, and Papists and Socinians were excluded from the act. This imperfect measure of toleration, in conjunction with the practice of occasional conformity, which opened up municipal and other offices, was at the time enough for practical purposes. The attempts of the High Churchmen under Anne to revoke its benefits were not successful. The Schism Act, and the act against Occasional Conformity, were with difficulty passed. But on the accession of George I began the long reign of latitudinarian Low Churchmanship which saw in the Nonconformist a strong support of the Whig party. Though Walpole refused to stir up High Church hostility by repealing the acts of Charles II, it became the custom from the accession of George II to pass an annual Act of Indemnity to those who had broken the Test and Corporation Acts, which made the acts partially inoperative. In 1718 the repeal of the Occasional Conformity and Schism Acts, and failure to repeal part of the Test and Corporation Acts, marked the spirit of the compromise. In 1727 the Presbyterians, Independents, and Baptists were loosely organized into a body known as the Three Denominations, which enjoyed some legal recognition and exceptional privileges. But the general decay of religious fervour which marked the eighteenth century fully affected the Nonconformists. The Presbyterians gradually drifted into Unitarianism in doctrine, and almost into Congregationalism in organization. Nearly all missionary fervour had abated when the Wesleyan movement arose during the reign of George III. The ecclesiastical connexions and Arminian theology of Wesley retarded his influence upon the Nonconformist bodies for a long time; and it was not till after his death that the “people called Methodists” could be regarded as distinct from the Church from which they sprang. The influence of Whitefield (q.v.) was perhaps more direct. But before the end of the century the Evangelical movement had given new life to the Nonconformist churches. The increased interest in religious matters and the spread of the habit of churchgoing largely increased the numbers of all the great religious bodies; a process which was continued during the nineteenth century. Another remarkable feature of the religious history of the eighteenth century was the vast growth of Nonconformity in Wales, not only through the Methodist movement, which developed independently the similar movement in England, but also through the enormous increase of the older Nonconformist communions in that country. The growth of a strong body of Presbyterian Nonconformists from the Church of Scotland, as the result of a series of schisms on the question of Church patronage, must also be mentioned. In Ireland alone, where the two Protestant denominations—the Irish Church and the Presbyterians—correspond roughly to the English and Scottish settlers, was there a comparatively slight development of Nonconformity.

Side by side with the numerical increase of Nonconformity a series of remedial laws gradually removed the disabilities and inequalities which still attended Dissent, even after the days of the Toleration Act. In 1779 the subscription imposed by the Toleration Act on the Dissenting clergy was abolished. In 1792 the Scottish Episcopalians were relieved from the severe restraints in which their disloyalty had involved them. But Fox's attempt to relieve the Unitarians in the same year failed. At last, in 1828, the Test and Corporation Acts were repealed. The Dissenters' Marriage Act of 1836 allowed the solemnization of Nonconformist marriages in their own chapels. In 1868, after a long agitation, compulsory Church rates were abolished. In 1869 the Irish Church was disestablished. In 1870 the University Tests Acts opened to the whole nation the old universities. In 1880 the Burials Act allowed Nonconformist burials in the parish churchyards. It was only after so long a series of struggles that the religious liberties of the Nonconformists were finally established. [BAPTISTS; METHODISTS; PRESBYTERIANISM, ETC.]

Nonconformists' Chapels Act, THE, was carried in 1844 by Lord Lyndhurst. It provided that where the founder had not expressly defined the doctrines or form of worship to be observed, the usage of twenty-five years should give trustees a title to their endowment. Its occasion was an attack by some of the Nonconformists on the ten Presbyterian congregations which had diverged into Unitarianism during the eighteenth century, and which had in most instances considerable endowments.

Non-Intervention as a principle of British foreign policy was developed during the period 1815-30, after the Napoleonic Wars. It consisted in a rigid abstinence from interference in the internal affairs of foreign states, and a refusal to associate Great Britain with the policy of interference which, with a view to repressing revolutionary movements everywhere, was embodied in the protocol signed at Troppau by Russia, Prussia, and Austria on November 9, 1820. The greatest champions of non-intervention were Castlereagh, Canning, the Duke of Wellington, and, later, Cobden. The doctrine was enshrined in Castlereagh's State Paper of May 5, 1820, which protested against European intervention in Spain; his State Paper of December 16, 1820, against intervention in Naples; the Duke of Wellington's protest of October 30, 1822, at Verona (q.v.) against the Montmorency Memorandum; Canning's dispatch of March 31, 1823, denouncing the projected French invasion of Spain; the Polignac Memorandum of October 9, 1823, in which Great Britain and France abjured interference in the revolted Spanish-American Colonies; Canning's refusal to attend a congress of powers on the Greek and Spanish questions (November 1824 and January 1825); and the Duke of Wellington's strict policy of non-intervention towards Portugal and Brazil (1828-30) and the French Revolution of July 1830. With Cobden non-intervention went hand in hand with free trade as a means of promoting international goodwill and peace. In its formative period (1815-30) the principle was forsaken only twice: in British intervention in Greece (April 4, 1826) and in Canning's efforts to contrive the downfall of Suberra in Portugal (1824).

Non-Jurors, ТНЕ, comprised a considerable minority of the clergy of the Church of England who refused to take the oath of allegiance to William and Mary at the Revolution. They were about four hundred in number, and included the Primate Sancroft and five other bishops, Ken of Bath and Wells, White of Peterborough, Lloyd of Norwich, Turner of Ely, and Frampton of Gloucester, and several eminent divines of whom Jeremy Collier and Charles Leslie were perhaps the most celebrated. They based their objections on the doctrine of non-resistance, maintaining that by the "powers that be" St. Paul meant the powers that "ought to be"; but their writings were more numerous than solid, and Dr. Johnson entertained no unfounded contempt for their reasoning powers. Very few of the laity followed them, as the Protestant Jacobites were not required to take the oath of allegiance as a qualification for attending divine service, and, being in the position of shepherds without sheep, the non-juring clergy sank into idle habits, or took to secular professions. In 1690 the issue of a form of prayer and humiliation by the Jacobite press, at a time when a French invasion was daily expected, aroused the utmost indignation against the non-juring bishops, but they issued a reply solemnly denying any knowledge of the publication. In the following year, after Bishop Burnet had made an ineffectual attempt to conciliate them on dangerously liberal terms, the sees of these bishops were filled up, Sancroft being superseded by Tillotson. The ex-primate, who bore his deprivation with far less dignity than Bishop Ken, thereupon drew up a list of divines which he sent to James with a request that two might be nominated to keep up the succession. James chose Hickes and Wagstaffe. This hierarchy at first caused some alarm to the government, especially when the Non-jurors were found to be implicated in the various Jacobite conspiracies, and they suffered considerably both after 1715 and 1745. Soon, however, schisms broke out within the little body, some having leanings towards the Greek Church, some towards Rome, others being rigidly orthodox in their Anglicanism. By 1720 the communion had broken into two main sections, of which that headed by Spinkes dissented only on the question of the oaths and prayers for the reigning sovereign, while Collier introduced a new communion office of Roman Catholic tendencies. There were also minor divisions. Nevertheless the Non-jurors, who counted among their numbers William Law, the author of "The Serious Call," and Carte the historian, were not finally extinguished until the beginning of the nineteenth century, Gordon, the last bishop of the regular body, dying in 1779, and Borthé, the last of the Separatists, in 1805. There were also Presbyterian Non-jurors in Scotland. These declined to acknowledge William and Mary, first because they were not of their covenant, secondly because they had spared King James. Calling themselves the Reformed Presbytery, they continued to thunder against William and his successors; and, though they split up into factions, there were still in 1780 considerable numbers who resolutely declined to own the government by paying taxes or accepting municipal offices. At length they became so few as to be unable to keep up meeting-houses, and were called Non-hearers. [JACOBITES; SANCROFT.]

Norham, THE CONFERENCE OF (May 1291), took place at Norham, on the Tweed, to debate the succession to the Scottish crown. There were present the magnates of both realms together with some popular representatives and a formidable array of lawyers. Edward I offered to settle the dispute for the Scottish crown, demanding as a reward for his services the acknowledgment of his overlordship on the part of the Scots. The conference was suspended for three weeks in order that the Scottish representatives might consult on the matter, and at the end of that time it re-assembled at the same place. Edward's title to the superiority over Scotland was admitted and the competitors all acknowledged his authority. After some preliminary inquiry into their various claims, the hearing of the case was delegated by Edward to a commission appointed to sit at Berwick (August 1291). In the meantime the English king was given seisin of Scotland and of the royal castles in his capacity of feudal overlord. The decision of the conference at Berwick was published in November 1292.

Norman Conquest, THE. It might, perhaps, be more accurate to describe the passage of history that goes by this name as the conquest of the English crown by a Norman duke, whom a curious train of accidents and circumstances had tempted into the position of a candidate for the regal dignity, but who had to assert the right to offer himself, not, strictly speaking, against the men of England, but against a rival candidate who had stolen a march upon him. It was certainly an event that involved several consequences galling to the national temper, as well as ruinous to some and injurious to many of the inhabitants; but it was not a conquest of the country in the ordinary sense—the land and people were not conquered by a single alien race, and made subject to another land and people, as was Ireland in earlier and India in later times. A splendid foreign adventurer brought the country to such a pass that its chief men had no choice but to elect him king. The conditions of which this conquest was the outcome were the usual historical mixture of seeming accident and personal character; these began to combine towards the event that was to be their product about 1051. In that year the royal stock of Cerdic and of Ecgbert—from which the unforced choice of the nation had hitherto never swerved—appeared to be approaching extinction; it was as good as certain that the reigning king, the saintly Edward, would die childless, whilst the only other immediate scion of the stock that might be available, Edward, called "the Exile"—Edmund Ironside's sole surviving son—was living in Hungary. Moreover, the lately all-powerful family of Godwin, which might possibly have supplied material for a new royal house, had just, to its last male member, been disgraced and driven from the kingdom. The ordinary and extraordinary possibilities were apparently exhausted. Now, in the eleventh century such a conjuncture could hardly fail to breed ambitious thoughts in an able and enterprising kinsman—albeit by the female and alien side only—of the existing king's, a young man whose spirit was uplifted by a great achievement at home, and who knew that King Edward had, from early associations, a preference for the stranger race to which he belonged. This kinsman was William the Bastard. At the end of the second of two wars that Ethelred the Unready had waged with a Norman duke, the English king had (1002) married Emma, daughter of Duke Richard I. King Edward was an offspring of this marriage. Thus, not only did the ruling houses of England and Normandy become connected, but also the fugitive Athelings of the former found an asylum with the latter, and the one of them who lived to be chosen king learned to love the ways and men of the land of his education better than those of the land of his birth. His eye, therefore, must have fallen with favour on the foremost man of the race he cherished, the great-grandson of his Norman grandfather. And under Edward's fostering care a purely Norman interest was already fast growing up in England: Norman adventurers in considerable numbers were settling in the kingdom and reaping an abundant harvest of lands and preferments, ecclesiastical and civil. Canute's success, too, had shown that the great prize was not beyond the reach of an utter stranger. Moved doubtless by such considerations, in 1051 William seized the occasion of the expulsion of the family of Godwin to cross the Channel on a visit to his cousin Edward, who probably then gave him the assurances of support which William afterwards represented as a promise of the succession to the crown. The crown was not Edward's to bestow, but his persuasions and influence might do much towards fixing the choice of the witan after his death. Yet, if we are to take the word of the "Chronicle," when Edward came near his dying hour he recommended another candidate, Harold, the eldest living son of Godwin; for William was not long returned home when Godwin and his sons forced their restoration. The Norman interest in England was depressed, and in course of time Harold had made himself the first man of the English people. In him, too, ambitious thoughts must have arisen. What looks like an effort on Edward's part to avert the conflict, failed; in 1057 he recalled Edward the Exile only to enable him to die in England. And the

Exile's only son, Edgar, though not too young to be elected at a less critical time, appears for the moment to have been lost in the shadow of the two mighty antagonists. About 1063 or 1064 a misadventure of Harold's gave William a decided advantage over his future rival. Cast ashore on the territory of Guy of Ponthieu, Harold was delivered from the captivity that necessarily followed by the interference of William, who was Guy's immediate lord, and was obliged to share his deliverer's hospitality till he had complied with the conditions that his host exacted. These are not certainly known; but probably were that Harold should "become William's man," and support his claim to the English crown. It is said—and the story may be true—that to add a greater awfulness to Harold's oath, a heap of relics had been secreted under the sacred things on which Harold was made to swear. But the oath had no power to bind the aspiring Englishman. Within two years Edward died (January 5, 1066), and on the next day Harold, presumably after some form of election, was crowned king by Aldred, Archbishop of York, in the newly-consecrated abbey church of Westminster. A few days later tidings of this event came to William, who at once resolved to dispute the possession of the great prize with the man who had sworn to befriend him in his suit, but had now snatched it from him. He first challenged Harold to fulfil the alleged compact; and receiving either no answer at all or an answer that pleaded several excuses for non-fulfilment, he set about making extensive preparations for an expedition against the new king. At Lillebonne he won his somewhat reluctant barons to a participation in the enterprise; he gained the willing assistance of the trading class among his subjects; he denounced Harold as a perjurer over Europe; by pledging himself liberally he secured the sympathies and in a sense the apostolic benediction for his undertaking of Pope Alexander II, who even sent him a consecrated banner and a ring with a hair of St. Peter; he invited volunteers from other lands; and from Flanders, Anjou, Touraine, and Brittany men thronged to his standard. The north-western corner of Europe was awakened to an unwonted enthusiasm by his ardour and loud trumpeting of the merits of his cause. In forwarding his design, Lanfranc of Pavia, and William, the son of the self-sacrificing Osbern, were especially helpful. Forests were felled to build him innumerable ships. By these exertions a great host of mixed composition was, while it was yet summer, collected, first at the mouth of the Dive, and then at St. Valéry-en-Caux, where a transport fleet lay ready to receive them. After a long and harassing delay, due to thwarting winds, the expedition was at last allowed to lift anchor on September 27, and next day it appeared off the coast of Sussex. The moment was eminently favourable. Harold's fleet, which had lain there all the summer to guard the approaches to the land, had been forced from its post by the exhaustion of its provisions; and the Norman host disembarked at Pevensey unobstructed. Indeed, the moment was doubly favourable. Harold and the choicest defenders of his kingdom had, on the very eve of the dread hour, been called northwards to repel a fatally-timed invasion of his brother Tostig and the Norwegian king, Harold Hardrada; and two days before William left St. Valéry, had vanquished and slain them both at Stamford Bridge (q.v.). Coast and southern shires alike were thus bare of defence, and William was free to act as he thought best fitted to serve his ends. He led his host to Hastings, raised defensive works there, and proceeded, by a systematic destruction of the houses and ravage of the fields that were within his power, to provoke Harold to stake the issue on a single battle. Harold did not disappoint him. On being told of his rival's landing, he gathered round him his house-carls, and marched with a well-nigh incredible swiftness from York to London, mustered to his standard all the available strength of Wessex and the earldoms of his brothers Gyrth and Leofwine, then led his men rapidly to the hill of Senlac (now Battle); and, arriving on October 13, threw up some sort of rough fortifications, and awaited the onset of the invaders. On the following morning (Saturday, October 14) this onset was given, and after an entire day's fighting, as fierce and obstinate as any recorded in the annals of warfare, the sun set on the slaughter of Harold, his brothers, and the flower of his force, and the hopeless rout of the rest. The completeness of the result is ascribed by some to the impatience of Harold, whose eagerness to rescue the invaded soil, or close with his antagonist, made him give battle with but a fraction of his strength, and, by others, to his brothers-in-law, the Earls Edwin and Morcar, who held their levies aloof from the struggle till it was too late. But it looked as if the terrible day had merely cleared from William's path his most formidable competitor; the surviving leaders of the nation were not yet persuaded to elect him to the kingdom. They chose the boy Edgar instead, and made ready to continue the struggle. Thereupon William took his way by Romney, Dover, and Canterbury towards London, scattered a body of Londoners who tried to check his progress, and set fire to Southwark. But finding the capital still unsubmissive, he went with his army to Wallingford, crossed the river there, and moved on London from the west. This advance brought the witan that directed the resistance to their knees; they decided to offer William the crown; and meeting him at Berkhamstead with Aldred of York at their head, they announced to him the choice they had made. Yet William did not accept the proffered crown till he had consulted with his Norman nobles, and been advised by them to do so. He then dispatched a part of his army to London to begin the construction of a fortress there, and following leisurely with the main body, was, on Christmas Day, crowned in the great minster by the hands of Archbishop Aldred. An unpleasant incident marred the ceremony. The approving shouts of the English within the church, mistaken for cries of onslaught by the Normans without, made these set the neighbouring houses on fire, and a scene of wild riot and disorder ensued. The crown was now conquered; and shortly afterwards, at Barking in Essex, the full obedience of the country seemed to be conquered also. Thither came the great men of the north, Edwin, Morcar, Waltheof, Copsi, and others, and made formal acknowledgment of William as their king. The Conquest might now be thought complete. From the vast estates of Harold, his brothers, and other partisans, William rewarded his followers; but he confirmed in their possessions and offices those who had not fought against him, on condition of the payment of a fine. To outward appearance the only material change was a Norman instead of an English king, and the addition to the higher and official ranks of the population of a contingent of foreign nobles, each with a foreign following. All was quiet; and the king, having deputed the government to his half-brother Odo, now Earl of Kent, and his friend Fitz-Osbern, now Earl of Hereford, returned to Normandy in March 1067. But the work of conquest proved to be only half done. Owing, it may be, to the harsh or inefficient rule of the regents, armed risings broke out all over the country; and William came back to find that the west and north had still to be subdued. In 1068 he marched upon Exeter, which had placed itself in the hands of Harold's mother and sons, took it after an honourable resistance, and thus brought under his sway the western counties. The northern lands, which were also in rebellion, were awed into transitory obedience by a movement upon Warwick; William entered York, and a Norman force under de Commines went on to Durham. The sons of Harold, after a vain attempt on Bristol, and a defeat in Somerset, sailed away to seek refuge in Flanders. Again the prospect cleared. But again the pacification turned out to be illusive. In 1069 the north was once more in arms; the Normans in Durham were slain to a man; and York was besieged by Gospatric and Edgar the Atheling. For a moment rebellion subsided before William's arrival at York, but only to renew its fury after his departure. The west, the Welsh border, and parts of the Midlands also sprang to arms; Gospatric, Edgar, Waltheof, and Eddric the Wild took part in the outbreak; a large Danish expedition that had just landed joined the insurgents; York was stormed, and almost every man of its Norman garrison was put to the sword. Leaving the other centres of insurrection to the industry of his lieutenants, who did not fail him, William took in hand those of the north, and quelled them one by one. The Danes disappeared; Edgar fled; Gospatric and Waltheof submitted, and were replaced in their earldoms. On the rank and file of the rebels William inflicted a fearful punishment. He systematically ravaged Northumbria, till not a single inhabited village remained between York and Durham. Domesday Book, compiled sixteen years later, bears striking testimony to the completeness of the Conqueror's devastation of the north. An arduous march to Chester in the first months of 1070, and the occupation of that city, finished the campaign, and with it to all intents and purposes the process of conquest. When William dismissed his troops at Salisbury in March 1070 the work was practically done. Isolated attempts, such as that of Hereward, had still to be crushed, but the Conqueror's hold on the kingdom was now secure.

The earliest effect of the Conquest resulted from the struggle to complete it; for the fresh services therein rendered by his foreign followers to William were rewarded by the fresh forfeitures that the conflict generated. The ranks of the great landowners were thus stocked almost exclusively by foreigners; and the English titled and untitled nobility were for centuries of mainly foreign origin. The rulers of the land, the men who administered affairs in Church and State, were for some generations taken almost exclusively from the same class; William was either afraid to trust Englishmen or did not find among them the human qualities he sought. But few direct radical changes accompanied the Conquest; the laws and customs of the English remained ostensibly unaltered; the groundwork of the social and political system continued in appearance the same—compurgation, ordeal, the local organization of shire and hundred, fyrd, witenagemot, all survived. Yet actually the application to English institutions of the more advanced and coherent Norman ideas produced in time a change none the less complete because it was subtle and gradual. Thus the inchoate and formless feudalism of the Anglo-Saxon period was moulded by the Norman lawyers into accordance with continental principles; and in time a thorough revolution in the tenure of land, in the relation of the king to the land, and the relation of the landowners to the king was effected. And this process ran up into the highest grades of organization; the king's court of counsellors was composed of his feudal tenants; the ownership of land was now the qualification for the witenagemot instead of wisdom; the earldoms became fiefs instead of magistracies; and even the bishops had to accept the status of barons. Among the miscellaneous effects are prominently noticeable the ultimate union of the various divisions of the kingdom, which had not yet learnt to hold loyally together, into a single homogeneous state and people; the establishment of a strong central government with a remarkable capacity for development and for adaptation to changing needs; the separation of the ecclesiastical from the civil administration; the closer connexion of the English Church with the Roman see, and its expansion into an imposing grandeur hitherto unknown; the breaking down of the national isolation, and the final entrance of England into the family of European peoples. Great importance is given by some writers to the moral discipline that the Conquest brought; and it has been alleged that the Norman and Angevin sway was the rugged school that fitted the nation for constitutional rule and self-government; but there have not been lacking opponents of this view who point out that the Norman Conquest had its evil as well as its good results. The anarchy of Stephen's reign brought home to the English people the evils of a feudal society; while the continental interests of the Norman and Angevin kings "turned England," it has been said, "from her true line of development towards the sea and involved her in that unholy game of gambling for French provinces which was not to end till the Hundred Years' War was over."

Normans, THE. The Normans were simply Northmen or Scandinavians advanced some stages farther in civilization by a few generations of residence in the land of a more humanized people and the neighbourhood of settled states. Their marvellous efficiency in their palmy days is probably explained by their having kept their native hardness and hardihood of character—their moral muscularity, as we may call it—and their bold spirit of enterprise unimpaired by the culture, the turn for art and taste for the finer pursuits, that they acquired by living in Gaul. Their new experience merely added intellectual keenness, deftness, and brilliancy of stroke to their resources for action; the old stimulating forces, their courage and their endurance, remained. Their ferocity had become valour, and their bodily strength the mastery of circumstances. That they owed the qualities which made their practical capacity to the good fortune that planted them on French soil, is suggested by the totally different history of their kinsfolk who had taken up their abode in other lands. The marauding bands of Norwegian pirates that had been roaming about and forming settlements along the Seine in the ninth and tenth centuries were at last admitted to an authorized participation in the soil by an agreement which Charles the Simple made in 911, at St. Clair-sur-Epte, with their most formidable leader, Rollo. Thus taken within the pale of continental civilization, they rapidly profited by their advantages. They became Christian; they discarded their own and adopted the French language; they cast aside their semi-barbarous legal usages and took those of the Frank cultivators of the soil over whom they dominated; they learned or discovered improved modes and principles of fighting; they acquired new weapons—the shield, the hauberk, the lance, and the bow; they became masterly horsemen; they developed an impressive style of architecture, and built churches and monasteries; they founded bishoprics—in a word, they soon furnished themselves with the whole moral, spiritual, and practical garniture of human conduct then available, with additions and improvements of their own. Their territory had increased by taking in both kindred settlements and the lands of neighbouring peoples, till, from a vaguely described "land of the Northmen," it became historic Normandy. Yet this wonderful growth was compatible with a political condition which was often not far removed from anarchy. The aristocratic class that the free-living, hot-natured pirate leaders had founded, and the unrestrained passions of the dukes replenished from generation to generation, were ever on the watch for an opportunity to break loose from all rule, and govern themselves and the native tillers of the soil that lay beneath them at their own sole discretion. Nor did the sense of moral obligation keep pace with the other elements of progress; a connexion free from the marriage tie was held no shame; bastardy brought no taint. But, in spite of these defects, the Normans made themselves the foremost race in Europe; there are few other things in history so striking as the contrast between the smallness of their numbers and the frequency and greatness of their achievements. During the eleventh century, in the Eastern Empire and in Spain, in Italy and in England, men of the Norman race gained renown and the lordship of spacious lands, became kings and princes, and determined the course of history. "The twelve tall sons of Tancred of Hauteville" had grown into a kind of proverbial phrase suggestive of what it is in the power of man to do. Their craving for movement and adventure sought relief in pilgrimages; and as they always were armed, to enable them to resist lawless attacks, they were ready for any chance of showing their prowess they might fall in with, and they fell in with a good many. Their career in Italy and Sicily in the eleventh and twelfth centuries is even more astonishing, and in not a few of its features more honourable, than their better-known exploits in Britain.

North, FREDERICK, LORD, 2ND EARL OF GUILFORD (1732-92), was the eldest son of Francis, 1st Earl of Guilford. He entered parliament first as member for Banbury in 1754, and in 1759 was named a lord of the treasury through the influence of his relative, the Duke of Newcastle. In 1766 Chatham made him joint-paymaster of the forces with George Cooke, and it was to this singular conjunction that Burke specially alluded when he said that "it did so happen that persons had a single officé divided between them, who had never spoken to each other in their lives until they found themselves, they knew not how, pigging together, head and points, in the same truckle-bed." On the death of Charles Townshend in 1767 he accepted the office of chancellor of the exchequer, and became leader in the House of Commons. On the fall of the Grafton ministry the king at once sent for Lord North, and found him so useful a servant that he retained his services for twelve years. Those years formed a most eventful period, for during them the Wilkes question was fought out, and the American colonies were for ever lost to the empire. To Lord North cannot fairly be imputed all the mistakes of that ministry. He was essentially weak and yielding, and was constantly overruled by the king, where his own better sense would have led him to adopt a different course. As early as the spring of 1778 we find him expressing a wish to resign: a wish which he repeated at intervals during the next four years, and which he was only prevented from carrying into execution by the king's almost piteous entreaties to him to remain in office to carry out the court policy. At length the surrender at Yorktown gave the final blow to his ministry, and in the spring of 1782 he insisted on resigning. Then followed the short Rockingham ministry, which collapsed on the death of Lord Rockingham, and was succeeded by Shelburne's ministry, which in turn gave way to the celebrated coalition ministry in which North and Fox were strangely united as secretaries of state (April–December 1783). But the universal distrust which such a formation roused, and the secret influence employed by the king to thwart its measures, brought it to a conclusion at the end of 1783. When Pitt began his long tenure of office Lord North retired into private life. In 1790 he succeeded to the earldom on the death of his father, and died two years afterwards.

North, THE COUNCIL OF THE, was one of the Council Courts of the Tudors. It originated in the anarchy of the Scottish border, which mediæval kings had sought to curb by the erection of castles and by the creation of the office of Warden of the Marches in 1309; and in the anarchy of the northern counties of Yorkshire and Northumberland. Henry VIII in 1522 appointed Henry Fitzroy, Duke of Richmond, to be lieutenant-general north of the Trent and warden of the Scottish Marches, to govern with the advice of a council known as "Richmond's Council," or the "Council of the North." From this council a "King's Council in the North Parts" was separated in 1530; and it was this latter which Cromwell converted into a permanent institution as a result of the Pilgrimage of Grace (1536) (q.v.). The commission was issued in July 1537, Tunstall, Bishop of Durham, being the first president, and the councillors numbering seven. Their authority—to punish "all offences which disturbed the peace and tranquillity of the king's subjects in the counties of York, Northumberland, Westmorland, and Durham . . ."—was confirmed by the Subsidy Act of 1540 and the Tallage Act of 1571. The council was abolished by the Long Parliament, along with the courts of Star Chamber and High Commission, in 1641.

North Foreland, THE BATTLE OF THE (June 1666), was fought between the English and Dutch fleets, the former commanded by Prince Rupert and the Duke of Albemarle, the latter by De Witt and De Ruyter. The Dutch were totally routed.

North Sea Outrage, THE, took place on the night of October 21, 1904, during the Russo-Japanese War, when the Russian Baltic Fleet on its way to the Far East under Admiral Rodjestvensky, passing down the North Sea, fired upon a Hull fishing fleet under the delusion, it was alleged, that they were Japanese torpedo-boats. The steam trawler Crane was sunk. Urgent representations were at once made by the British cabinet, demanding immediate explanation and reparation. An international commission of inquiry was held, its first meeting taking place on November 22, 1904, and its final one on February 25, 1905. In the following month the Russian government paid £65,000 as an indemnity to the Hull fishermen.

North-West Frontier Province, a province of British India, constituted in 1901 separate from the Punjab, was formed out of the district of Hazara, on the eastern side of the Indus, and several districts on the western side. It has an area of 38,665 square miles. The Province was constituted in order to provide more immediate control over the frontier tribes. [CURZON, GEORGE NATHANIEL.]

North-West Provinces, THE (since 1901 the United Provinces of Agra and Oudh), were the acquisitions of Lord Wellesley, and were so named because at the time they formed the north-west frontier of India.

Northampton, THE BATTLE OF (July 10, 1460), was fought during the Wars of the Roses (q.v.). In 1459 the Yorkist lords had fled in confusion from Ludford (q.v.), and parliament had attainted them. In the summer of 1460 they returned to England, landed in Kent, and speedily raised a considerable force, with which they entered London. Henry VI was in the Midlands, and thither the confederate lords marched; the Lancastrians advanced to meet them, and took up a position on the banks of the Nen close to Northampton. Here they were attacked by the Yorkists, and, after a contest lasting only half an hour, totally routed. The Duke of Buckingham, the Earl of Shrewsbury, and many others were slain on the Lancastrian side; the king was taken prisoner, and the queen was obliged to take refuge in Scotland. Henry was subsequently compelled to acknowledge York as heir to the throne (October 1460).

Northbrook, THOMAS GEORGE BARING, EARL OF (1826-1904). [BARING.]

Northcote, SIR STAFFORD HENRY, 1ST EARL OF IDDESLEIGH (1818-87), was educated at Eton and Balliol and called to the bar at the Inner Temple in 1840. He was returned to parliament for Dudley in the Conservative interest in 1855, for Stamford in 1858, and for North Devon in 1866. He was private secretary to Gladstone when the latter was president of the board of trade, and was financial secretary to the treasury from January to June 1859. He was appointed president of the board of trade in Lord Derby's third administration (1866); secretary of state for India (1867-8); and elected governor of the Hudson's Bay Company (1869). Subsequently he was a member of the commission which arranged the Treaty of Washington. In 1874 he took office as chancellor of the exchequer under Disraeli, and when his chief retired to the House of Lords he became leader of the House of Commons. On the fall of the Beaconsfield ministry he became leader of the opposition in the House of Commons, but on the accession of Lord Salisbury's ministry, in 1885, went to the House of Lords as the Earl of Idlesleigh, and became first lord of the treasury, exchanging this office for that of foreign secretary in 1886. He died suddenly on January 12, 1887.

Northern Territory, THE, of the Commonwealth of Australia (q.v.).

Northmen. [DANES.]

Northumberland, EARLS AND DUKES OF. [DUDLEY; PERCY; NEVILLE.]

Northumbria, the most northern of the great old English states, included as its normal limits the whole of the territory between the Firth of Forth on the north and the Humber on the south. The sea bounded it on the east, while on the west the Pennine range, with its northern continuation, the Ettrick Forest, divided it from the British kingdoms of Cumbria and Strathclyde. But considerable districts to the south of the Humber were at one time included within its boundaries, while the western frontier was necessarily constantly shifting, and was gradually, although slowly, pushed farther back. Like the other so-called "Hep-tarchic" kingdoms, Northumbria consisted originally of several separate settlements, though the absence of so definite a tradition as that in the south makes it harder to ascertain their limits and history. In the north a Frisian settlement seems to have been made on the shores of the Firth of Forth, which Nennius calls the Frisian Sea (see on this subject Skene's "Celtic Scotland" and "Frisian Settlements on the Firth of Forth"), but of this state we have practically no knowledge. The rest of Northumbria was colonized by Angles. Bernicia, the district north of the Tees, had for its first king Ida, who is said to have come from the north, and to have built as his capital Bamburgh, named after his wife, Bebba. He gained many victories over the Britons, the confused tradition of which is, perhaps, preserved in the oldest Welsh poetry (see Skene's "Four Ancient Books of Wales"). He reigned twelve years (547-59), and was succeeded by several sons in succession, of whose history nothing is known. In 593 his grandson, Ethelfrith, son of Ethelric, became king. He was a man of energy and ambition. His marriage with the daughter of Ella, who in 560 had established another Anglian kingdom in Deira, the district between the Tees and the Humber, was the excuse for the expulsion of Edwin, the son of that monarch, and the union of Bernicia with Deira. Thus Ethelfrith became the first king of the Northumbrians. His defeat of the Scots at Degastan (603), and of the Welsh at Chester and Bangor-Iscod (613), gave further strength to the new kingdom. But Edwin of Deira had found a powerful protector in Redwald of East Anglia, the "Bretwalda," and in 617 Ethelfrith was slain on the banks of the Idle in an attempt to subdue his chief rival for the sovereignty of Britain. Edwin now became King of the Northumbrians. His marriage with Ethelburga, daughter of Ethelbert of Kent, led to his conversion to Christianity in 627. In a solemn witenagemot the Northumbrians accepted the new religion, and Paulinus, the queen's chaplain, became first English bishop of York, the old capital of Deira, and now of Northumbria. The victories of Ethelfrith had prepared the way for the overlordship over South Britain which Edwin seems to have assumed. He is fifth on the list of Bretwaldas, and Bæda says that "he ruled both over English and Britons," and that his dominion included the two Monas—Anglesey and Man. With him the Northumbrian supremacy, which lasted for the greater part of the century, really begins. But he found in Penda of Mercia, and in Cadwallon, the great Welsh king, formidable competitors. In 633 their combined forces defeated and slew Edwin at Heathfield. All Northumbria was for a whole year subject to the conquerors, who seem to have aimed at lessening its power by splitting it up again into its original divisions of Bernicia and Deira. But in 634 Oswald, son of Ethelfrith, returned from his refuge in Iona, drove out the Britons and Mercians, reunited the two kingdoms, and laboured for the introduction of the Columban type of Christianity with a zeal that merited his canonization. Yet in 642 he, too, was slain by Penda at the battle of Maserfield. His brother, Oswy, who succeeded him, was compelled to yield Deira to Oswin, son of Osric, his cousin. In 651 Oswy contrived to compass the death of his rival, but the jealousy of Penda provided Deira with another king in Oidilwald. But in 654 the victory of Winwaed over the Mercians, weakened by the defection of Oidilwald, Penda's dependant, led to the final triumph of Oswy. Penda perished on the field. Bernicia and Deira were again united. Oswy became undisputed lord of the English, as well as master of Strathclyde Welsh, Picts, and Scots. In alliance with Theodore of Tarsus he settled the ecclesiastical constitution of England, and his declaration in the Synod of Whitby (664) for the Roman in preference to the Scottish Churches was critical in determining the course of the future history of Britain. He was the most powerful of all the Northumbrian monarchs, but with him departed the glory of his country. His son and successor, Egfrid (671-85) wasted, in efforts to convert a real supremacy over the Picts into a thorough conquest, the resources that Oswy had used so well. The death of Egfrid on the fatal field of Nechtansmere (685) was followed by the revolt of the Picts, Scots, and Strathclyde Welsh. His long quarrel with Wilfrid of York had convulsed the internal relations of the country. The rise of Mercia now gave the English states a new master. The next king was Aldfrid (685-705), an illegitimate brother of Egfrid, who had in exile been a pupil of the Scottish monks, and was called the "learned king." He was the patron of the great literary movement which had begun with Caedmon and Benedict Biscop, and which long outlasted the political importance of Northumbria. During the eighth century Northumbria is only remembered as the home of Bæda, Alcuin, Archbishop Ecgbert, and other great scholars. Meanwhile a series of revolutions, seditions, and tumults had brought the Northumbrian monarchy to the verge of dissolution. No fewer than fourteen obscure kings ascended the throne between the death of Aldfrid and 796; of these "at least thirteen ended their reign by extraordinary means." Eardwulf (705) was dethroned after a reign of two months. Osred, son of Aldfrid, was slain by his kinsfolk (716). Cenred, after a two years' reign, came to a calamitous end (718). Osric, his successor, was slain in 729. Ceolwulf, the next king, abdicated, and became a monk (737), as did his uncle's son Edbert in 758, after an almost unprecedented reign of twenty-one years. Oswulf (758-9) was slain by his own household after a year's reign. Of his successor, Ethelwald Moll (759-65), we are only told that he "lost his kingdom." The solemn deposition of Alchred (765-74) by the witan was an important precedent for later times. Ethelred, son of Ethelwald (774-9), was driven into exile. Elfwald (779-88) was slain by conspirators. Osred II (788-90) was deposed, and exiled, but returned, and was murdered, whereupon Ethelred was restored, only to be killed by his turbulent people in 796 during a great famine that was accompanied by portents, and succeeded by a destructive Danish inroad. Osbald, a noble, became king for twenty-seven days, but Eardwulf was then called from exile to the throne. In 806 he was driven into exile, but was restored by papal influence. When he died is uncertain. The chroniclers now cease to give a regular succession of the Northumbrian kings. The Danes had reduced the kingdom to an extremity of disorder. The Mercian overlords had few difficulties with the decrepit state. In 829 the Northumbrians became the vassals of Ecgbert without so much as a battle. In 867 the Danes took advantage of the deposition of King Osbriht, and the election of a prince not of the royal blood, to take possession of York. In 875 inroads for plunder were exchanged for definite conquests, and next year Halfdane, the Danish leader, divided Deira amongst his willing followers. Thus ingloriously the kingdom of Edwin came to an end. A line of English ealdormen long continued to reign in Bamburgh over Bernicia, but they were cut off from the great West Saxon monarchy by Danish Deira. The gradual subjection of Halfdane's successors to the Basileus of Winchester, the incorporation of the Bamburgh earldom, the reassertion of Northumbrian local feeling in the great earldom of Canute, the grant of the Lothians to the King of Scots, the final conquest of Northumbria by William I, from which time alone we can date its extinction as a separate district, are the chief events of later Northumbrian history.

Norton, FLETCHER, 1ST BARON GRANTLEY (1716-89), was born at Grantley, near Ripon. After being called to the bar, he was in turn appointed king's counsel (1754), attorney-general for the county palatine of Lancaster and solicitor-general (1762). In 1763 he became attorney-general, but went out of office with the Grenville ministry in 1765. While in that office he had to encounter the difficult question of general warrants; and his impetuous recklessness did not smooth the way for his colleagues. Upon the resignation, in 1769, of the chair of the House of Commons by Sir John Cust, Norton was elected to fill the vacancy. Through the excited years of Lord North's administration he filled the office of Speaker with some ability, and with a fearless indifference to consequences. In 1780 he paid the penalty of his independence by being rejected when proposed for re-election as Speaker. When, in 1782, the Marquis of Rockingham came into power Norton was raised to the peerage as Baron Grantley.

Norton, RICHARD (1488?-1588), a zealous Catholic of the north, took part in the Pilgrimage of Grace (q.v.), and in 1569, though a very old man, was an active supporter of the rebel Earls of Northumberland and Westmorland, whom he joined with his sons. His seventh son, Christopher (d. 1570), formed a plan to carry off Mary Stuart from Bolton Castle, but was foiled in its execution; and subsequently took an active part in the northern rebellion of 1569, and was in consequence executed at Tyburn.

Norway, MAID OF, is a designation for Margaret, daughter of Eric II and Margaret of Norway. After the death of her grandfather, Alexander III, she was proclaimed Queen of Scotland, and was betrothed to Edward, son of Edward I of England, under the terms of the Treaties of Salisbury and Brigham. The Maid, however, died on her homeward voyage (1290).

Norwich has been identified with the Venta Icenorum of the Romans, but this is improbable. It is more likely an English city whose recorded history begins with the mint founded by Athelstan. It was burnt by the Danes, under Sweyn, in 1003. After the Conquest a strong castle was built there, and the city was made an episcopal see. Henry II granted a charter in 1158, and Richard I in 1194. A serious riot occurred in Norwich in 1272, and in 1381 the insurgents, headed by John Litster (q.v.), attacked the city and plundered

it. Once again, in 1549, it suffered from a popular revolt, when the city was captured by Robert Ket (q.v.) and his associates. Since 1298 it has returned two members to parliament, and after about 1330 it enjoyed two annual fairs (formally granted in 1482). Norwich cathedral was founded in 1096 by Bishop Herbert de Lozinga.

"Victoria County History: Norfolk."

Norwich, THE BRIDAL OF (1075), was the occasion of the organization of a powerful conspiracy against William the Conqueror. The refusal of the king to allow Ralph Guader, Earl of Norfolk, to marry the sister of Roger, Earl of Hereford, was disregarded, and a plot was formed at the wedding-feast to depose William and partition England between the two conspirators and Earl Waltheof, whom they sought to make a party to their schemes. Waltheof, however, betrayed the plan to Lanfranc. The rising was promptly quelled, and the conspirators either fled or were heavily punished.

Nottingham was taken by the Danes in 868, and confirmed to them by the Peace of Chippenharn (q.v.). It was restored and refortified by Edward the Elder, 922. In 1013 it submitted to Sweyn. In 1067 William the Conqueror reconstructed and strengthened the castle. It was taken and burnt twice during the wars between Stephen and Matilda. Parliaments were held at Nottingham in 1334, 1337, and 1357. The first charter was granted by Henry II. In 1461 it was the scene of the proclamation of Edward IV. In 1485 it was the headquarters of Richard III before the battle of Bosworth. In the Civil War it was at Nottingham that Charles I set up his standard, August 22, 1642. The castle was dismantled (1644) by Cromwell's orders and rebuilt in 1680. In 1811-12 Nottingham was the scene of formidable "Luddite" riots (q.v.), and of a Reform riot in October 1831.

Noy, WILLIAM (1577-1634), was born in Cornwall, and was called to the bar in 1602. He represented various Cornish boroughs in all the parliaments of James I and Charles I until 1629. Until 1631 he was a champion of constitutionalism in parliament, opposing monopolies and proposing a Habeas Corpus Act. But on his appointment as attorney-general in 1631 he became, in his own words, "one that must serve the king's turn." He showed great zeal in the prosecution of Prynne and Sherfield in 1633, and in Prynne's second prosecution in 1634. He was a great friend of Laud.

Nugent, Sir Richard, 15th Baron Delvin (1583-1642), was an Irish nobleman concerned in the rebellion of Tyrone and Tyrconnel (1605). He was imprisoned in Dublin, but succeeded in making his escape. Afterwards he was pardoned by James I, and created Earl of Westmeath in 1621.

Nuncomar (d. 1775), was a high-caste Brahmin, who intrigued for the deposition of Mohammed Reza Khan from the dewan of Bengal, hoping to obtain his place. Disappointed of this, and encouraged by the enmity of the council, he brought various charges of peculation against Warren Hastings (1775), who in return had him accused, and he was hanged for forgery.

Sir J. Stephen, "Story of Nuncomar," 1885.

Nunneries. The large majority of English nunneries before the dissolution (1536-1540) belonged to the Benedictine order. The following is a list of some of the most important: Shaftesbury (Dorset), founded, according to tradition, by Alfred, which was so wealthy that Fuller tells us it was a proverb with the country folk "if the Abbot of Glastonbury might marry the Abbess of Shaftesbury, their heirs would have more land than the King of England"; Barking (Essex), said to have been founded by Eckenwald, Bishop of London, 666, which had for its first abbess Ethelburga, afterwards canonized; Amesbury (Wilts), of Saxon foundation, but refounded by John in 1199; St. Mary (Winchester); Malling (Kent); Markyate (Bedfordshire); Catesby (Northamptonshire); Clerkenwell, founded c. 1100; Godstow (Oxfordshire), founded c. 1133; Haliwell (Middlesex); St. Helen's (London), founded at the beginning of the thirteenth century; Stratford-at-Bow (Middlesex); Chatteris (Cambridgeshire); Polesworth (Warwickshire); Sheppey (Kent); Wherwell (Hants).

The Cistercian houses were usually small; among the most important were Tarrant (Dorset) and Swine (Yorks). The great nunnery of Dartford, founded 1355, was disputed between the Augustinian and Dominican orders, but was held by the latter at the dissolution. Syon (Middlesex), founded in 1414 and almost the wealthiest house in England, was held by Brigittine nuns (a branch of the Augustinians, reformed by St. Bridget of Sweden); Syon House was, in 1604, granted to the Earl of Northumberland.

The Minoreesses, or Poor Clares (the female Franciscans), held four houses in England. The greatest was that in London, where they were placed by Blanche of Navarre, wife of Edmund of Lancaster, about 1293. This nunnery outside Aldgate has given its name to the Minories. Their only other house of importance was at Denny (Cambridgeshire).

Oakboys, THE, was the name given to the Western Protestant tenants in Ireland, who, complaining chiefly of exorbitant county cess, collected in bodies in 1764, houghed cattle, and burnt farms. They never became formidable.

Oates, Titus (1649-1705), was educated at Merchant Taylors' School and St. John's College, Cambridge. He took holy orders and was presented to a small living. A charge of perjury being brought against him, he was forced to give up this position, and was for a short time chaplain in the navy. He was soon dismissed, and then became Protestant chaplain in the Duke of Norfolk's household at Arundel. In association with a fanatical clergyman, Israel Tonge, he devised the story of the Popish Plot (q.v.—1678), which was readily accepted by the popular fears. Everywhere it was rumoured that Protestantism was in danger, and Oates communicated to the authorities that the Catholics were plotting to kill the king and massacre Protestants with the assistance of a French army. Various incidents just then happened which confirmed Oates's story, and he became a hero. He was rewarded with a monthly salary of £40, and a suite of apartments was devoted to his use at Whitehall. In 1685, however, on the accession of James II, Oates was convicted of perjury, and sentenced to stand in the pillory annually, be whipped at the cart's tail, and imprisoned for life. After the Revolution (1688) parliament declared his trial to be illegal and ordered his release, granting him a pension of £5 a week. His attempts to regain notoriety after this were unsuccessful.

Oath, THE CORONATION. [CORONATION.]

Oaths in Courts of Law are imposed both upon jurymen and witnesses. They may be traced back to a very remote date, and are intimately connected with the much-vexed question of the origin of trial by jury. The law of Ethelred II directed that the twelve senior thegns in each wapentake should be sworn not to accuse any falsely. Though this is an isolated piece of legislation, we find that in England, as among the other Germanic races, an oath was habitually imposed in the courts upon the parties to a suit and their compurgators, and upon the witnesses who were called in if it was held that the oaths of the former were inconclusive. By the system of sworn recognition introduced by the Normans, which they derived probably from the Frank capitularies, oaths were also enforced, and though first applied to civil cases, this system was extended by the Assize of Clarendon (q.v.) to criminal cases as well. It is needless to discuss here the gradual divergence of the three elements of the jury system, the grand jury, the petty jury, and the witnesses, and it is enough to say that when their separate functions became defined (c. Edward III to Henry IV) oaths were still imposed upon all three. The later aspects of the question of oaths in courts of law chiefly concern the claims to exemptions from taking the oath that have been put forward from time to time. As in the case of the parliamentary oath, the three classes of persons affected are those who believe in God but are not Christians, Quakers and kindred sects, and atheists, and the legislation concerning them falls chiefly within the reign of Victoria. In 1837 it was provided that persons not professing the Christian religion might take the oath in any form they consider binding; hence Jews employ the words "so help me, Jehovah," and Mohammedans swear by the Koran. Quakers were permitted to make an affirmation instead of taking the oath, in 1833, and this privilege was confirmed by subsequent legislation. In 1854 it was provided, chiefly for the benefit of those who belonged to no recognized religious sect, and consequently did not come under the former relief acts, that if any person called as a witness should be unwilling to be sworn from conscientious motives, he might make a solemn affirmation, and the same privilege was granted to jurors in 1867. These enactments were consolidated in the Evidence Amendment Acts of 1879 and 1880. In 1888 an Oaths Act was passed, allowing anyone to affirm who pleaded that an oath was contrary to his religious belief, or that he had no such belief. [L. C. S.]

Oaths, PARLIAMENTARY, were first imposed in the year 1679, when it was enacted that no member could sit or vote in either House until he had taken in its presence the several oaths of allegiance, supremacy, and abjuration, severe penalties being imposed on anyone who should neglect the ceremony. This measure was re-enacted in 1700 and 1760, but in 1829 the Catholic Relief Act provided an especial form of oath for Roman Catholics. In 1866 the Parliamentary Oaths Act substituted one oath for the three previously in use, which in 1868 was altered with the idea of including all religious denominations, the form being, "I, A. B., do swear that I will be faithful, and bear true allegiance to her Majesty Queen Victoria, her heirs and successors, according to law. So help me God." By the law of 1866 a penalty of £300 was imposed on members of both Houses for voting before they had taken the oath, and in the House of Commons the seat was vacated as if the member were dead. In the Upper House, however, a bill of indemnity was usually passed. Standing orders also provided at what hour the oath was to be taken. The most remarkable refusals to take the oaths were those of Sir H. Monson and Lord Fanshaw in 1688, and of Daniel O'Connell in 1829, before the Relief Act was passed, but in neither instance was the objection entertained. The case of the Jews was brought up by the claim of Baron Rothschild in 1850, to take the oaths, omitting the words "on the true faith of a Christian" in the oath of abjuration. A resolution was carried, however, that he was ineligible; nor was Alderman Salomons more successful in the following year. After the question had been discussed in several successive sessions, an act was passed in 1858 by which a Jew was allowed to omit the obnoxious words, and a resolution to that effect became a standing order in 1860. The Parliamentary Oaths Act of 1866 finally placed Jews on an equality with other members, by omitting the words altogether from the form of oath. The right of Quakers, Moravians, and Separatists to make an affirmation instead of taking the oath was first contested by John Archdale in 1693, but unsuccessfully. Several statutes were, however, passed to that effect in the reigns of Anne, George I, and George II; and upon a general construction of these statutes, Joseph Pease, a Quaker, was allowed to affirm in 1833. In the same year acts were passed allowing Quakers, Moravians, and Separatists, and those who had ceased to belong to those persuasions, to make an affirmation instead of taking the oaths; and this concession was confirmed by the Parliamentary Oaths Acts of the following reign. In 1880 Charles Bradlaugh (q.v.), who had been elected for Northampton, claimed to make an affirmation under the Evidence Amendment Act of 1869 and 1870. The report of a select committee being adverse, he presented himself to take the oath, but it was refused. In 1883 the government introduced an Affirmation Bill, but it was thrown out in the Commons. After the general election of 1885 Bradlaugh took the oath without challenge, and in 1888 an act was passed, at his instigation, giving members the choice between taking the oath and making affirmation. [L. C. S.]

O'Brien, WILLIAM SMITH (1803-64), was the second son of Sir Edward O'Brien, of Cahimoye. His eldest brother, Sir Lucas O'Brien, who was a Tory, became in 1855 Lord Inchiquin, as heir of the Marquis of Thomond. Smith O'Brien was educated at Harrow and at Cambridge, and in 1828 became the Tory representative of Ennis. He was an energetic opponent of O'Connell. From 1835 to 1849 he represented Limerick, and in 1846 he openly joined the Young Ireland party (q.v.), led by Meagher and Mitchel. His descent from Brian Boru, and the claims he imagined himself to have to the Irish crown seemed to a certain extent to have turned his brain. His idea was to establish an Irish republic with himself as president. In 1848 he opposed in parliament the Treason-Felony Bill then proposed, and he was afterwards tried under that very bill in Ireland, but the jury disagreeing, it became necessary to allow him to go free. The treasonable character of his plans was, however, becoming clear, and an attempt was made to arrest him. He now left Dublin, and began haranguing the peasantry of the south. At last, on July 25, 1848, he assembled a large body in arms, and led them on the 29th against the police at Boulah Common. O'Brien escaped after the fight, and a reward of £500 failed to lead to his apprehension. On August 5, however, he was recognized at Thurles, as he was quietly taking a ticket for Limerick, and lodged in Kilmainham Jail. On September 28 he was tried at Clonmel by a special commission, and sentenced to death, but his punishment was commuted to transportation. Unlike his fellow-conspirators, he refused a ticket-of-leave, and was sent to Maria Island. In 1856 he received a free pardon, and returned to Ireland. He died at Bangor, and the transportation of his remains thence to Ireland led to a Nationalist demonstration. In private life he was one of the most truthful and kind-hearted of men.

Hodges, "Report of the Trial of Smith O'Brien," 1849.

O'Briens, THE SEPT OF, the most powerful clan in Munster, their chief stronghold being the city of Limerick, claimed descent from Brian Boru (q.v.). In 1543 Murrough O'Brien was made Earl of Thomond for life. He became a Protestant, and displayed more than the usual eagerness for Church lands; he sent a paper to England called the "Irishman's Request," asking for Oxford and Cambridge men to convert the people. Ultimately all his dignities fell to his nephew, Donough, whom, in accordance with the Irish custom of tanistry, he had supplanted. The 4th earl (Donough, d. 1624) was a distinguished soldier, and fought against the Spaniards at Kinsale. The family became extinct in 1741.

Occasional Conformity, THE BILL AGAINST, was designed to prevent Dissenters from complying with the provisions of the Test Act (q.v.) only so far as to qualify themselves for office or membership of a corporation. It was introduced for the first time in 1702 by three Tory members, one of whom was Henry St. John, and provided that anyone who attended a dissenting meeting-house after having taken the sacrament and test for offices of trust or the magistracy of corporations should be immediately dismissed and heavily fined. This measure passed the Commons, but was rejected by the Lords, though Queen Anne put great pressure on that House to pass the bill. A similar fate attended it in the following year, and again in 1704, when the more violent Tories, led by Nottingham, proposed to carry it against their opponents by "tacking it" to the Land Tax Bill. In 1711, however, Nottingham and his "Dismals" formed an unprincipled coalition with the Whigs, the terms being that the latter should support the Occasional Conformity Bill; and it accordingly became law, the money fine being reduced from £100 to £40. This discreditable act continued in force until 1719, when General Stanhope introduced a measure under the cunning title of a "Bill for strengthening the Protestant Interest," by which the Occasional Conformity Act and the Schism Act were abolished, but from which he was forced to exclude the Test Act.

Ochterlony, SIR DAVID (1758-1825), after having served in the Carnatic under Hastings and Coote, first appeared prominently as Colonel Ochterlony in the capacity of resident at Delhi (1803), after the conquest of Sindhia's French troops. In this capacity he conducted the defence of Delhi in the most gallant manner when Holkar besieged it on his return from Malwa in 1804. In 1814 he was given the command of the division destined to act against Amar Singh in the Gurkha War (q.v.). Driving Amar Singh from point to point he at last shut him up in Malaun. He was raised to the rank of major-general, and had conferred upon him the Grand Cross of the Bath, being the first of the company's officers to attain to that honour. In 1816 he took command of the army for the second Gurkha campaign, which he brought to a successful conclusion. After the war he was appointed British resident in Malwa and Rajputana, and as such had in 1824 to deal with the disputed succession at Bharatpur. The governor-general, Lord Amherst, disapproved of Sir David's measures, and he was reprimanded. He thereupon resigned. The treatment he had received broke his heart, and he retired to Meerut, where he died within two months.

O'Connell, DANIEL (1775-1847), was the son of an Irish gentleman of very ancient family. He studied at Louvain, St. Omer, and Douai; was driven from the continent by the French Revolution; and went to London to read for the bar. In spite of the opposition of his family he came forward (January 13, 1800) as a determined opponent of the Irish Union, soon became the leader of the Catholic party, and in 1823 founded the Catholic Association. In 1825 he was prosecuted for saying that "he hoped some Bolivar would arise to vindicate Catholic rights," but the grand jury ignored the bill. It was at his instigation that, in 1826, the Catholics began to show their power at elections. In 1828 he himself stood against Vesey Fitzgerald, and by means of the forty-shilling freeholders won the Clare election, his opponent retiring after five days' polling. His influence in the same year was strong enough to prevent a collision between the Catholics and the Orangemen, which seemed impending. The Emancipation Bill followed (April 1829), but O'Connell having been elected before was still excluded from parliament. He presented himself at the bar of the House (May 15, 1829) and pleaded with great ability to be allowed to sit; his application was refused, and a new writ issued, but he was returned unopposed and allowed to take his seat. He was now called the "Liberator" in Ireland, and was adored by the people. In 1831 he was forced to plead guilty to a charge of holding illegal meetings, and although he was not punished, his influence was shaken at the time. He in vain opposed the Coercion Act of 1833, but did much service to the Whigs in promoting the cause of reform. Afterwards O'Connell and his "tail," as his followers in parliament were derisively called, were for some time able to exercise great influence in that assembly, for he held the balance between Whigs and Tories. In 1838, however, he had to submit to a reprimand from the Speaker for accusing a member of perjury. In 1840 he revived the Repeal agitation, and in 1843 uttered language that was considered treasonable at the monster meetings he convened. But when government forbade the meeting at Clontarf on October 7 he failed to make good his words, and the Young Ireland party (q.v.), among whom were the most talented of his followers, separated from him. O'Connell and his more immediate followers were arrested and prosecuted for conspiracy. A jury, composed entirely of Protestants, found him guilty, and he was sentenced to a year's imprisonment and a fine of £2,000. The English House of Lords by three to two reversed this decision (1844). This was hailed with enthusiasm, but the Repeal agitation was nevertheless crushed. O'Connell lived for some years longer, but his health was giving way. On February 8, 1847, he delivered his last speech in the Commons, and died soon after at Genoa. In England he was scarcely looked upon as a serious personage, and derisive epithets such as the "big beggarman" were constantly applied to him. But in Catholic Ireland the influence obtained by his character, his energetic championship of the cause of his co-religionists, and his powers as a popular orator, was unprecedentedly great.

O'Connell's "Speeches," edited by his son, 1846; biographies by R. Dunlop, 1900, and M. MacDonagh, 1903; A. Houston, "Daniel O'Connell, His Early Life and Letters," 1906.

O'Connor, ARTHUR (1763-1852), heir-expectant to Lord Longueville, an intimate friend of all the English Whigs, joined the United Irishmen (q.v.) in 1796. In that year he was with Lord Edward Fitzgerald in France, and concerted with Hoche for an invasion. In 1797 he was imprisoned in Dublin Castle, but was soon released. Though the government was aware of his treason, it was unable to produce its information. O'Connor now established virulent papers like the Press and the Northern Star, advocating assassination. On February 27, 1798, while on his way to the French Directory as envoy of the Irish insurrectionary party, he was arrested at Margate, and brought before the Maidstone assizes. All the most distinguished members of the opposition, however, came forward as witnesses to character, and he was acquitted. He returned to Ireland, but was arrested on another charge, and kept in prison. Lord Cornwallis gave him and his confederates a pardon on condition of a full confession of his treason. This he did in a tone of bravado before a committee of the Lords. He was then sent to Fort George, and kept there till the Peace of Amiens. The American government refused to receive him, and he went to France.

Musgrave, "History of the Rebellion."

O'Connor, FEARGUS (1794-1855), Chartist leader, was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and called to the Irish bar. In 1832 he was returned to parliament as a repealer for County Cork, and mixed with the English Radicals. On being unseated in 1835 he first contested Oldham in vain and then spent much time in travelling about the Midlands and the north. In 1837 he founded the weekly Northern Star, and became the leader of the movement which took for its cry the "People's Charter" of 1838 [CHARTISM], amid the attacks of Lovett's Working Men's Association. He was identified with the "physical force" party, and though not present at the Newport rising of November 1839 he was arrested in March 1840 on a charge of sedition and imprisoned for eighteen months. In March 1843 he was again arrested in connexion with the Plug Riots of 1842. In 1846 he founded with Ernest Jones the "Chartist's Co-operative Land Company." In 1848 he presided (April 10) at the famous meeting at Kennington Common. From this date his mind gradually gave way.

O'Connor, RODERICK (or RORY), King of Connaught (d. 1198), was the son of Turloch O'Connor. He attempted to succeed to his father's power, but was unable to recover it till 1166 when Murchertach MacLochlainn of Ulster was slain. Roderick was then recognized in the north at least as lord of Ireland. Dermot MacMurchada of Leinster, who had been the chief supporter of MacLochlainn, fled to England to solicit help, and his appeal bore fruit in 1169-70 in the Anglo-Norman invasion of Ireland. [IRELAND.] In cruelty Roderick could be the equal of his rival; thus he put to death a son and grandson of Dermot, who were his hostages. He was unequal, however, to the task of repelling the Anglo-Norman attack, and was routed in 1171 before Dublin. When Henry II went over to Ireland in person O'Connor refused to pay him homage. In 1175, however, he concluded a treaty with Henry through ambassadors at Windsor. He thereby acknowledged himself as Henry's vassal, and promised to pay tribute. In return the English king recognized him as overlord of all Ireland, which was not in the hands either of the king himself or of his Norman barons. In his later years he retired to his own abbey of Cong, where he remained in peaceful seclusion till his death in 1198. He left the title of High-king to be disputed between his grandson Cathal Carrach and his brother Cathal Crovderg.

O'Connors, THE SEPT OF THE, was long supreme in Connaught. They rose to importance in the twelfth century under Turloch (1106-56), who made himself king of all Ireland. His son Roderick (Rory) (q.v.) is famous for his connexion with Dermot of Leinster and the Anglo-Norman conquest of Ireland. The establishment of the de Burghs in Connaught by John greatly weakened the influence of the O'Connors, and a long conflict ensued, the O'Connors aiming at the restoration of their shattered authority. On the invasion of Edward Bruce, Felim O'Connor at first sided with the English, but soon after he changed sides, tempted by the promise of the undivided sovereignty of Connaught, and the slaughter of Athenry in 1316 put an end to the existence of the clan as a force in Irish politics. [CONNAUGHT.]

Octennial Bill (1768). In 1761 an agitation for a Septennial Bill had begun in Ireland, where, till then, a parliament was of necessity dissolved only by the king's death. In 1761 a bill to this effect was passed, but though returned from England, an error of the draftsman served as an excuse to the Irish parliament for rejecting it. In October 1767, however, the agitation recommenced, chiefly because the bill had not been mentioned in the speech from the throne. In 1768 it was finally introduced as an Octennial Bill, and passed.

October Club, THE (1710), was composed of a strong phalanx of Tory members, who, though by no means entirely Jacobite, were chiefly influenced by those who were such. It had long been customary for the members of a party, when some important measure was before parliament, to meet at a tavern for the purpose of concerting a plan of action. The society was termed a club. Soon after the beginning of 1710 a few of the extreme Tories began to hold a series of meetings at the "Bell," in Westminster. "The password of this club—one of easy remembrance to a country gentleman who loved his ale—was October." The October Club soon set themselves to work to undermine the power of Harley, whose moderation they scorned. It was from there that the Jacobites looked for supporters in the last years of Queen Anne's reign. The Bolingbroke faction belonged to the October Club. They took great delight in vindictive attacks on the Whigs, especially on Sunderland.

Odal, or UDAL, RIGHT, is a tenure of land which still prevails to some extent in the Orkney and Shetland Islands, and which before the growth of feudalism was the ordinary tenure of the Teutonic races. Its distinctive feature lies in the fact that land held by this right is held absolutely, and not dependent upon a superior. Odal right is thus antagonistic to feudalism, which recognized service as the only title to land.

Odo (or ODA), Archbishop of Canterbury, 942-59, was the son of one of the Danish chieftains who had taken part in the invasion of 866-7. Odo was attracted by the preaching of a Christian missionary, and embraced the Christian faith. He was adopted by Athelhelm, ealdorman of Wiltshire, and, taking orders, was in 927 made Bishop of Ramsbury. In 942 Odo was promoted to the archbishopric. The archbishop-elect at once declared his intention of becoming a monk, thus placing himself at the head of the party of reform in the Church, whose object it was to encourage monasticism, introduce the Benedictine rule, and enforce celibacy amongst the clergy. During the reign of Edred this party had the ascendancy, but his successor, Edwy, seems to have joined the party of the secular clergy. Odo and Dunstan declared that Edwy's marriage with Elgiva was uncanonical, and after a great deal of violent dispute Edwy consented to divorce her. The story of Odo's subsequent cruel persecution of Elgiva's mother, Ethelgifu, is in all probability absolutely mythical. [DUNSTAN, ST.]

Odo, Bishop of Bayeux (d. 1097), was the son of Herluin de Canteville by Herleva of Falaise, the concubine of Robert of Normandy and mother of William the Conqueror. He accompanied and greatly assisted his half-brother in his invasion of England. After his coronation William bestowed on Odo the castle of Dover and large estates in Kent and elsewhere. It is generally supposed that he was created earl about the same time; but in point of fact it is uncertain whether he ever actually bore the title, although he exercised the comital jurisdiction. In 1067, during William's absence in Normandy, he acted as regent of the kingdom in conjunction with William Fitz-Osbern. Their harsh and oppressive rule contributed to the risings of the English in various parts of the country which disquieted the early part of William I's reign. However, for the next fifteen years Odo remained second in authority only to William himself; and in 1075 he took an active part in crushing the rebellion of the Earls of Hereford and Norfolk. He now aimed at the papacy, but his ambitious projects were cut short by the king, who had him arrested as Earl of Kent, and committed to prison, where he remained till William's death. Though he was released and restored to his earldom and estates by Rufus, he inspired the feudal revolt of 1088 on behalf of Robert of Normandy. Being taken prisoner, he was compelled to quit the country, and retired to Normandy, where he acted as adviser to his nephew Robert, and accompanying him on the Crusade in 1096, died at Palermo in February of the next year.

O'Donnell, HUGH BALDEARG (d. 1704), the descendant of an ancient Celtic family, was in the service of the Spanish government when he heard that his countrymen had risen against the Revolution Settlement of 1688. The King of Spain refused him permission to join them. He thereupon made his escape, and after a circuitous journey through Portugal he landed at Kinsale in 1690. His appearance excited great enthusiasm; 8,000 Ulster men joined him, and he went to the assistance of the garrison at the first siege of Limerick. After the defeat of the Irish at Aghrim it was hoped that he would come to the defence of Galway. But he studiously held aloof. Soon afterwards he joined the English army with a few of his devoted followers, and on several occasions did valuable service for William III.

O'Donnell, HUGH ROE, called "Red Hugh" (1571?-1602), was a brother of Rory O'Donnell, 1st Earl of Tyrconnel. In 1587 he was treacherously seized by order of Sir John Perrot, and kept a prisoner at Dublin as a hostage for his brother's good behaviour. He escaped after three years' captivity, and at once joined Hugh O'Neill. In 1601 he commanded the O'Donnells, who marched with O'Neill to raise the siege of Kinsale, and their defeat there is said to have been, in part at least, due to his impetuosity. In 1602 he sailed to Spain with a long train of followers, and was received by the court with great distinction, but died soon afterwards.

O'Cleary's "Life of Hugh Roe O'Donnell," ed. D. Murphy, 1893.

O'Donnell, RORY, 1ST EARL OF TYRCONNEL (1575-1608), was brother of Hugh Roe O'Donnell. In 1604 he gave up his Irish title, and received a grant of his lands and the earldom from James I. In 1607, however, he seems to have conspired with O'Neill, Earl of Tyrone, and with him at all events he went abroad, where he died, after being attainted, in 1608.

O'Donnells, THE SEPT OF THE, were powerful in Ulster, where the O'Neills were their hereditary foes and rivals. Calvagh O'Donnell (d. 1566) was captured by Shane O'Neill, together with the Countess of Argyll, his wife, in 1560, and remained a prisoner till 1564, and even then he had to purchase his release by the loss of a large part of his lands. In James I's reign, however, the O'Donnells regained their possessions.

Offa, KING OF MERCIA (757-96), was of the royal house of Mercia, a cousin of Ethelbald, the last sovereign in the direct line of descent. He drove out the usurper Beornred, and quickly made himself master of the kingdom. Under him Mercia became the greatest power in Britain. He thoroughly subdued Kent by his victory at Otford in 774, inflicted in 777 a great defeat on Wessex at Bensington, and annexed the land of the Chilternsætas to Mercia. Henceforward all southern England was subject to his sway, and in 793 he slew Ethelbert, King of East Anglia, and annexed that region to Mercia. He defeated the Welsh in a series of campaigns, and pushed the boundaries of Mercia westward. Finally, to protect his frontiers he constructed from the Wye to the Dee a great dyke or earthwork, the remaining traces of which still bear his name. Offa was very liberal to the Church both at home and abroad, and founded many monasteries, among which was certainly the great abbey of St. Albans. He seems, however, to have resented the supremacy of Canterbury; and to assert the independence of Mercia and increase his own prestige, he secured the permission of Pope Hadrian to establish a third archbishopric at Lichfield, within his own borders (786). In return Offa promised to the pope an annual payment of 365 gold mancuses—a donation which was probably the origin of the later Peter's Pence (q.v.). The external relationships of Offa were of first-rate importance. He dealt almost on equal terms with Charlemagne, who after his victory over the Avars of Pannonia in 786 dispatched some of his trophies to the Mercian king in token of his goodwill. A double marriage alliance between the Frankish and Mercian houses was proposed, though never executed; and a commercial treaty was concluded between the two kings. The English scholar Alcuin, who resided at Charlemagne's court, was a bond of union between England and Frankland. Further testimony to the extension of commercial intercourse at this date is afforded by Offa's coinage, which included a silver penny modelled on the "denarius" of the Carolings, and a gold mancus copied from the "dirhem" of the Saracen caliphs. The code of laws which Offa drew up has unfortunately perished. Of his importance and ability there can be no doubt; in fact, were our knowledge of his reign less incomplete, we should probably rank him little below that model of Anglo-Saxon rulers—Alfred the Great.

Offaly, LORDS AND BARONS OF. [FITZGERALD, FAMILY OF.]

Oglethorpe, GENERAL JAMES EDWARD (1696-1785), after serving in the army with distinction, was returned to parliament as member for Haslemere (1722). He was celebrated for his philanthropy. In October 1732, having obtained a charter for settling the colony of Georgia in Virginia, he sailed with 120 associates from Deptford. The town of Savannah was founded before his return to England in 1734. On his second journey to Georgia in 1736 he took with him as secretary Charles Wesley. By means of alliances with the Indians Oglethorpe managed to ward off the danger threatening his settlements from Spain, notably in 1739 and 1742. He played a prominent part in 1745 in suppressing the Jacobite rebellion, though he was suspected of complicity in the plot and was court-martialled.

Biography by H. C. Cooper, 1904.

Olaf (ANLAF), HAROLDSON (or St. OLAF) (d. 1030), a cousin of Olaf Tryggvason, was chosen king by the Norwegians on the death of Sweyn, who had virtually ruled their country since 1000. Canute, as soon as he was established on the English throne, endeavoured to reassert his father's suzerainty over Norway, and demanded from Olaf the performance of homage (1022). His demand was refused, and three years later he set out with a magnificent fleet, largely manned by English, to assert his supremacy. An indecisive naval engagement was fought at the Helge river, and Canute again retired. In 1028 he renewed the attack, this time with greater success. The Norwegian king fled before him into Sweden, where he managed to secure the help of many outlaws and broken men. With them, and a faithful knot of personal friends, he returned to Norway to regain his throne; but at the battle of Sticklestead he was defeated and slain (1030). His body was hastily buried, but with the revival of national sentiment among the Norwegians he came to be venerated as a saint and martyr, and his remains were later translated in great state to a shrine at Trondhjem (Drontheim). Many English churches are consecrated to him. Tooley Street, in London, still preserves his name in the old Danish quarter.

Olaf (ANLAF), TRYGGVASON (d. 1000), was a member of the house of Harold Harfagr, exiled from Norway by the dominant family of Eric Blood-Axe. His first appearance in English annals is probably in 991, when, we are told, he came with 450 ships to Stone, and thence to Sandwich, and thence to Ipswich, harrying all about, and so to Maldon. Here he was met by Brihtnoth, the famous ealdorman of Essex, whom he defeated and slew. In 994, with Sweyn, the Danish king, he laid siege to London, but failed to take it. They then harried, burnt, and slew all along the coasts of Essex, Kent, Sussex, and Hampshire. On receipt of £16,000 they agreed to a peace, and Olaf promised never again to visit England save peacefully. Next spring he went to Norway and wrested the kingdom from Earl Hakon; here he ruled for five years, during which time he established Christianity in the various districts of Norway and her colonies. He appears to have met his death at the hands of his former comrade-in-arms, Sweyn, in the great sea-fight of Ewold in 1000. Rumours of his living later at Rome and in the Holy Land as a hermit were long rife in the North, but may be dismissed as purely legendary.

Oldcastle, SIR JOHN, styled LORD COBHAM (d. 1417), was a trusted servant of the Crown in the Welsh Marches, and a personal friend of Prince Henry, to whose household he appears to have been attached. He was an earnest follower of Wyclif and became the leader of the Lollard party. In 1413 the clergy determined to strike a blow at them by indicting Oldcastle. Henry's personal intervention failed to move him from his heretical opinions, and he was accordingly summoned before the archbishop. He refused to appear, and was excommunicated. At last, compelled to attend before a spiritual court at St. Paul's, he yet refused to recant his opinion, and reasserted many of his former statements. Thereupon he was pronounced a heretic, and imprisoned in the Tower; but succeeded in making his escape. A conspiracy was now formed to seize the person of the king at Elmham, and a great gathering of Lollards was arranged for at St. Giles's Fields. Henry's promptitude prevented the plan from maturing, and Oldcastle escaped from London. In 1415 he attempted to incite a rebellion, but in 1417 he was captured in the Welsh Marches, and put to death as a heretic and a traitor. Sir John Oldcastle married as his third wife the heiress of the barony of Cobham, and in her right was summoned to parliament as Lord Cobham, by which name he is often known. [LOLLARDS.]

Olive Branch Petition, THE (July 1775), was the ultimatum on the part of the American colonies prior to the War of Independence. It was a petition drawn up by Congress, urging the king to direct some mode of reconciliation. Respectful and conciliatory, the petition proposed no terms or conditions, though it was generally understood that the colonies would insist on the repeal of the obnoxious statutes, and would require some solemn charter regulating the relations of the two countries in the future. The petition was entrusted to Richard Penn, joint proprietor of the influential colony of Pennsylvania. But on his arrival in London in August "no minister waited on him or sent for him, nor even asked him one single question about the state of the colonies." The king would have nothing to do with the petition or its bearer. The American envoys foresaw too clearly that the result of the refusal would be bloodshed; but Lord Dartmouth only expressed the popular misconception of the gravity of the situation when he said that if he thought the refusal would be the cause of shedding one drop of blood he would never have concurred in it.

Omdut-ul-Omrah (d. 1800), Nawab of the Carnatic, on the death of Mohammed Ali (q.v.—1795) succeeded to the throne and debts of his father. During his administration the prosperity of the country was rapidly declining, and the resources of the government were threatened with extinction. He was, however, surrounded by European money-lenders, and enabled to pay the British subsidy and thus defer the crisis for a short time. Lord Hobart, governor of Madras, proposed that the mortgaged districts should be ceded to the company in lieu of the subsidy. This the nawab refused, and also a similar proposition by Lord Mornington in 1799. On the outbreak of hostilities with Tippoo, Lord Wellesley demanded a war contribution, which was promised, but not paid. Various propositions of cession were made in lieu of subsidy, but all were refused. Meanwhile the nawab had continued the intercourse and correspondence with Tippoo which his father had begun in violation of the treaty of 1792, and at the capture of Seringapatam proofs of this were discovered. Before, however, any action was taken the nawab died (1800).

Omicund was a wealthy banker of Murshidabad, who became acquainted with the plot which Mir Jafar (q.v.) had arranged with Clive for the destruction of Suraj-ud-Dowlah (1756). He demanded £300,000 as a bribe for silence. Clive therefore caused two treaties to be made out between Mir Jafar and the British—the real one on white paper, in which Omicund was not mentioned, and the other, the false one, on red, containing a promise to pay him this sum. Clive and the committees signed both, but Admiral Watson refused to sign the false one. Clive therefore forged his signature. When Omicund became aware of the deception he lost his reason.

O'Neill, CON BACACH, EARL OF TYRONE (d. c. 1559), joined the Geraldines in their rebellion, and for a long time maintained himself against the English forces. In 1542 he consented to resign his title of "The O'Neill," and, being refused the earldom of Ulster, went over to England and was made Earl of Tyrone; his favourite, though illegitimate son Mathew being elevated at the same time to the peerage as Lord Dungannon and the earldom entailed on him. But he could not maintain his power, and a furious struggle broke out between Mathew's son and his uncle Shane, in which the latter triumphed.

O'Neill, HUGH, 3RD BARON OF DUNGANNON AND 2ND EARL OF TYRONE, called "the arch rebel" (1540 ?–1616), was the son of Mathew, Baron of Dungannon, who was himself the base son of Con O'Neill, 1st Earl of Tyrone. He first appears as commander of a troop of horse on the queen's side against Desmond. In 1585 the rank and title of Earl of Tyrone were acknowledged to be his, and, on his appeal to the queen, he was also invested with the lands attached to the earldom. He married as his second wife the daughter of Sir Nicholas Bagenal, but was suspected of having carried her off by force. Afterwards he was the ally of Red Hugh O'Donnell (q.v.), but nevertheless he still temporized while he sought to obtain help from Spain. In 1595 he at last threw off the mask, and, assuming the royal title of "The O'Neill," allied himself with the neighbouring clans. After some fighting he seemed ready to submit, and was pardoned in April 1598. He was soon in arms again, however, and on August 14 he overthrew Sir Henry Bagenal in person at the battle of Blackwater. Ulster, Connaught, and Leinster in consequence rose. The queen, now thoroughly alarmed, sent over the Earl of Essex as lord-lieutenant. He brought with him ample powers, and an army of 20,000 foot and 2,000 horse, the largest Ireland had seen. The two leaders met at a ford on the borders of Monaghan and Louth; a truce was arranged, and Essex consented to submit O'Neill's demands to the queen (September). They included complete freedom of religion and the restoration of all forfeited land to the O'Neills, the O'Donnells, and to Desmond. Essex soon afterwards left Ireland, and Lord Mountjoy succeeded him as commander of the English forces. The rest of the country gradually submitted, but O'Neill still held out in hopes of foreign succour. In 1601, 4,000 Spaniards at last landed at Kinsale, and some 2,000 more at Castlehaven. Kinsale was at once besieged by Lord Mountjoy and the Earl of Thomond. O'Neill, joined by O'Donnell, and by Captain Tyrel with the 2,000 Spaniards from Castlehaven, marched to raise the siege. Against his own better judgment he engaged the English forces on December 23, 1601, and was defeated with a loss of 1,200 killed. In crossing the Blackwater on his retreat he suffered another severe loss and was himself dangerously wounded. The lord-deputy then followed him into Tyrone, took his forts, ravaged the country, and even broke to pieces the old stone seat on which the O'Neills had been from time immemorial inaugurated as chiefs. When all hopes of Spanish succour came to an end Mountjoy induced the queen to accept O'Neill's submission, which he made at Mellefont, and he was reinstated in his earldom of Tyrone. James I at first treated him very kindly, but, when the English shire system began to be introduced and the penal laws to be carried out, Tyrone conspired with Tyrconnel and the Spaniards. In 1607 he fled to Rome, where he died in 1616. By the death of his sons soon after, this branch of the O'Neills became extinct.

Biography by J. Mitchel, 1846; D. Coffey, "O'Neill and Ormonde," 1914.

O'Neill, OWEN ROE (1590 ?–1649), was a grandson of Hugh, 2nd Earl of Tyrone. He had been an officer in the Spanish service, but returned to Ulster, where in July 1642 he assumed command. He was soon hailed as "The O'Neill," though he was not in the direct line of descent. The council entrusted him with the command in Ulster; but he was not at first very successful, and had to appeal to them for help. But on June 5, 1646, he won the splendid victory over Monro's Scots and English at Benburb (q.v.). He was opposed to the reconciliation between Ormonde and the Catholics, and in 1649 went so far as to come to an agreement with Monck; but after Rathmines the English parliament refused to agree to this treaty, and he then proceeded to join Ormonde. Before he could effect his purpose, however, he died.

O'Neill, Sir Phelim (1604 ?-53), was one of the leaders in the Ulster rising of 1641. He was a weak man, and the only one among the leaders who seems to have really allowed and encouraged outrages. Early in 1642 he announced that he was entrusted with a royal commission. He also began to style himself "The O'Neill." In July 1642, however, the command dropped from his feeble hands, and Owen Roe O'Neill, his successor, expressed in strong terms horror and disgust at his conduct. In 1653 he was tried before the High Court of Justice at Kilkenny, presided over by Sir Gerald Lowther, and, together with some 200 others, convicted and executed.

T. Fitzpatrick, "The Bloody Bridge," 1903.

O'Neill, Shane (1530 ?-67), was the legitimate eldest son of Con O'Neill. By Henry VIII's patent the earldom of Tyrone, as granted to Con, was to descend to Mathew, his base son, and his heirs. Mathew had before Con's death fallen by Shane's hand, but his son was supported by England. Shane O'Neill, however, won recognition as "The O'Neill" by a large part of the clan, and held out in rebellion against the Earl of Sussex, his personal foe. An attempt to set up O'Donnell against him led to that chief's capture (1560). As Shane was anxious for peace, he was induced to visit England, where he was well received by Elizabeth, but not allowed to return. When, however, in 1561, the young Earl of Tyrone (Mathew's son Brian) was murdered by one of his kinsmen Shane was allowed to depart, and at once succeeded to all his nephew's power. In 1564 the lord-deputy made an attempt at a meeting with Shane at Dundalk to induce him to liberate O'Donnell, who was still his prisoner. This he finally did, but on terms sufficiently humiliating for England and its ally. Soon afterwards he concluded a treaty with Sir Thomas Cusack, in accordance with which he submitted; he was, however, allowed to call himself "The O'Neill" till an English title should be found for him, and the garrison of Armagh was withdrawn. This treaty he observed very faithfully, and, in accordance with the wishes of the English, he attacked and for the time destroyed the Island Scots (q.v.) in 1564. When Sir Henry Sidney went over as lord-deputy Shane refused to restore O'Donnell's lands, and ravaged the Pale. In consequence he was attacked, and in 1567 all his forts were taken, and his clan abandoned him. He fled to the Scots, but was murdered.

O'Neills, The Sept of the, was the regal race of Ulster, representative of the ancient family which governed Ireland before the days of Brian Boru. At the time of Edward Bruce's invasion in 1315 their chief, Donal, resigned his title in favour of Bruce, but, after Bruce's defeat and death at Dundalk, Donal was driven from Tyrone and died in obscurity in 1325. The regal title of The O'Neill was, however, always borne by the chief of the Sept when he was in arms against England. In 1542 Con O'Neill (q.v.) submitted to Henry VIII, and in return for the surrender of his hereditary title was made Earl of Tyrone, being refused the earldom of Ulster. The old claims were however, revived under Elizabeth by Shane and Hugh O'Neill, and in the seventeenth century by Phelim and Owen Roe.

Orange Free State. [SOUTH AFRICA, UNION OF.]

Orangemen, The, was a term which began to be used as early as 1689, and was applied to the upholders of Revolution principles. On September 21, 1795, the first Orange lodge was instituted by the Peep-o'-Day Boys (q.v.). The lodges multiplied, their chief object at that time being to disarm the Catholics, who indeed had no right to keep arms. By 1797 they numbered 200,000 men. Many noblemen and gentlemen joined them, and it was their influence which counteracted that of the United Irishmen (q.v.) in the north. In 1825 they were dissolved by the Association Bill. In 1836, however, they again numbered 145,000 members in England and 125,000 in Ireland. The Duke of Cumberland was Grand Master, and the Orangemen were suspected of a wish to change the succession in his favour by force of arms. Consequently, after a parliamentary inquiry, their lodges were broken up. In 1845 they were again revived, and many faction fights followed in Ireland. In 1869 great excitement was created by the arrest of their Grand Master for violating the Party Processions Act. Later they became active in their opposition to Home Rule.

Ordainers, The Lords, consisted of eight earls, six barons, and seven bishops, appointed in March 1310, to hold office till Michaelmas 1311, and to draw up ordinances for the reform of the realm. A precedent for the appointment of such a commission was found in the proceedings of the Oxford Parliament of 1258, and in both cases it is noticeable that the Commons had no share in the matter. Archbishop Winchelsey was at the head of the clergy, while among the earls the extreme party, led by Thomas of Lancaster, predominated. Two days after their appointment the Ordainers issued six preliminary ordinances, and when parliament assembled in August 1311 thirty-five were laid before it. The range of these enactments was extraordinarily wide, but the most important clauses were those which provided for the control of the king and for penalties against his favourites. The offices of state and of the household were to be filled with the consent of the barons in parliament; the king was not to go to war, raise an army, or leave the kingdom without the permission of parliament. He was "to live of his own," and special judges were to be appointed to hear complaints against the royal officials and bailiffs. The ordinances, it has been well said, were "a complete programme of limited monarchy." The party of the Ordainers broke up as a result of the capture and treacherous execution of Piers Gaveston (q.v.) in 1312; Lancaster and his supporters made formal submission to Edward II in October 1313.

Ordeal. This name, once written ordál and ordél, etymologically signifies a distribution into "deals" or parts, then a discriminating, and then a deciding (Ger. Urtheil), and was given to a peculiar method of reaching the facts in criminal cases that made a feature of the Anglo-Saxon judicial system. Though represented as an inheritance from pagan times, it is described as "a reference to the direct judgment of God," and would seem to have been allowed as an alternative to those who failed in or shrank from the process by compurgation or by oath. "If he dare not take the oath," says an old law, "let him go to the triple ordeal." But the recorded details will not warrant a positive statement. We only know that in certain circumstances, while the court, sheriff, bishop, thegns, etc., declared the law, the ordeal was expected to reveal the facts. The ceremony took place in church. After three days of severe discipline and austere diet, having communicated and made oath that he was innocent, the accused person, standing between twelve friends and twelve foes, when a special service had concluded, plunged his arm into boiling water, drew out a stone or lump of iron, and had his arm bandaged by the priest. This was the ordeal of water. Or he was called on to seize a bar of iron that had lain on a fire till the last collect of the service had been read, carry it for three feet, and hasten to the altar, when the priest promptly applied the bandages. This was the ordeal of iron. If in three days' time the priest could say the arm was healed, the sufferer was pronounced guiltless; if not, he was judged as one convicted of God. Minor or less accredited ordeals were the corsned, or eating of the consecrated or accused morsel, and the casting of the subject, bound, into deep water. If the former did not choke, if the latter threatened to drown, it was taken as a proof of innocence. Walking on burning ploughshares also appears as an ordeal, but seldom, if ever, save in incredible stories, as in that told of Emma, Canute's widow. Ordeal continued after the Conquest. The Conqueror allowed it to Englishmen when challenged by Normans, in place of the newly-introduced trial by battle. Domesday is full of cases in which men offer to prove their rights by battle or by ordeal. In the Assize of Northampton (1176) (q.v.) it is ordered that men presented before the king's justices for the darker crimes shall "go to the judgment of water." But the method fell into disrepute; the Church withdrew her countenance from it; other processes, notably the crude forms of the jury system, grew into favour; the Lateran Council of 1215 abolished it. This sealed its doom in England as elsewhere; a letter of Henry III's to the itinerant justices in 1219 is usually accepted as marking its final extinction.

Orders in Council are orders issued by the sovereign with the advice of the privy council. They have been issued in times of emergency. In 1766 and again in 1792 an embargo was imposed on the exportation of corn, because of a deficient harvest and the prospect of a famine. Napoleon's Berlin Decrees, declaring the whole of the British Islands to be in a state of blockade, called forth, on January 7, 1807, an Order in Council prohibiting all vessels, under the penalty of seizure, from trading to ports under the influence of France. Further orders bearing upon the same question were issued on November 11 and 21 of the same year. On April 26, 1808, by a new Order in Council, the blockade was limited to France, Holland, a part of Germany, and the north of Italy. The legality of Orders in Council has been frequently questioned. They have, however, been authorized by statute in various matters connected with trade and the revenue; and the International Copyright Act, 7 and 8 Vict. cap. 12, contained a clause empowering the Crown by Order in Council to extend the benefits of that act to works first published in any state that gave a like privilege to the productions of this country.

Ordinance is a form of legislation opposed to a statute. An ordinance has been defined as "a regulation made by the king, by himself, or in his council, or with the advice of his council, promulgated in letters patent or in charter, and liable to be recalled by the same authority." The essential difference between an ordinance and a statute lay in the fact that the former did not require to be enacted in parliament, and might be repealed without parliament. Moreover, the ordinance is the temporary act of the legislature. From the earliest days of parliament a great deal of jealousy was felt on account of the ordaining power of the king and his council. It very frequently happened that an ordinance practically repealed or materially modified what had been enacted by statute; and in 1389 a petition was presented by the Commons praying that no ordinance be made contrary to the common law, the ancient customs of the land, or the statutes made by parliament. The sovereign still possesses the power, which must be given to the executive, of legislating by ordinance in certain cases. But these ordinances, or Orders in Council (q.v.) as they are termed, are only made with the consent of parliament, are in most cases laid before the two Houses, and may be abrogated by act of parliament.

Ordinances, THE, OF 1311. [ORDAINERS, THE LORDS.]

Ordovices, THE, were an ancient British tribe who occupied the north of Wales and Anglesey. They maintained a strenuous resistance to the Romans. Suetonius Paulinus attacked them and destroyed the sacred groves on Mona in A.D. 60; but they were not finally subdued until 78, when Agricola established the twentieth legion at Deva to hold them in check.

Oregon Question, THE. The treaty of 1783 between the United States and Great Britain had omitted to define the frontier between Canada and the United States eastwards from the great lakes, and also westwards from the Rocky Mountains, leaving open the disposal of the vast district lying between the Rocky Mountains and the Pacific. In November 1818 a convention was concluded between the two governments containing the stipulation that "whatever territory may be claimed by one or other of the contracting parties on the north-west coast of America, to the west of the Rocky Mountains, as also all bays, harbours, creeks, or rivers thereon, shall be free and open to the ships, citizens, and subjects of both powers, for ten years from the date of the signature of the present convention." This convention was renewed August 6, 1827, for an indefinite period, with the understanding that either party might rescind the stipulation by giving twelve months' notice. The boundary question was thus still left in abeyance. Numerous difficulties occurred, and in 1846 the American legislature gave notice that the existing convention would terminate in twelve months. A great deal of indignation had previously been excited in Great Britain by President Polk's inaugural address in 1845, in which he distinctly claimed Oregon as part of the United States, and asserted that the Americans would maintain their right to it by force of arms if necessary. This speech was replied to by Sir Robert Peel in a spirited address to the House of Commons. The British government at once transmitted a proposition for a settlement, which was eventually accepted by the United States. The territory was then equitably divided between the two countries by the Oregon Treaty of 1846. The north-west frontier was defined along the mainland to the coast, but there were some minor points which were not defined with sufficient precision. Hence a dispute arose later as to the ownership of the little island of San Juan, which was decided against Great Britain by arbitration in 1872. [SAN JUAN AWARD.]

Orford, EARLS OF. [RUSSELL; WALPOLE.]

Orkney and Shetland, the northernmost county of modern Scotland, consists of two groups of islands, of which the Orkneys are the southernmost. There are traces of their having been originally inhabited by Picts. If Nennius could be believed ("Mon. Hist. Brit.," p. 56A), it was the original settlement of that nation. In A.D. 86 Agricola took possession of the Orkneys, but it is improbable that the Romans ever effected a definite occupation. When in 682 the Pictish king, Brude MacBile, devastated the Orkney Islands he must have waged war against some civil foes. But the real history of the northern islands begins with the Scandinavian settlements. Their position exposed them to Viking outrages, and invited the settlement of the hardy Norsemen, who fled beyond sea from the tyranny of Harold Harfagr. In 874 Thorstein the Red, son of a Norse king of Dublin, had already conquered both Orkney and Shetland, and Caithness and Sutherland. But within ten years Harfagr himself sailed to Orkney, added it to his empire, and constituted it an earldom in favour of Rognwald, who handed it over to his brother Sigurd. Jarl Sigurd soon added to his government Caithness and Sutherland, if not districts still farther south. It is unnecessary to enter into the detailed history of the jarls of Orkney, of their wars with the Scots, in the Hebrides, and in Ireland. Their district was frequently split up into two portions, held by different members of the reigning family. The Scottish kings claimed some indefinite suzerain rights over Caithness, but Orkney paid seat or tribute to Norway alone. Some of the more valiant of the earls conquered the whole of the districts north of the Spey, but the evidence of language no less than of history shows that "Sutherland" was the southernmost point of the district permanently occupied by the Norsemen. Unlike the Hebrides, the jarldom of Orkney was not only conquered, but colonized. The original inhabitants were nearly extirpated. To this day the language of the district is English, the nomenclature Norse, the laws and constitution purely Scandinavian. The udal tenure and the Norse poor law are but things of yesterday in Orkney. After the establishment of Christianity by Olaf Trygvasson (q.v.) in 997, Orkney became the seat of a bishopric, and Shetland later of an archdeaconry, which were included in the province of Trondhjem. But the obedience of the Bishop of Caithness was more doubtful. Earl Thorfinn (1014-64), the founder of the cathedral of Kirkwall, was almost the last of the great conquering jarls of Orkney. His conquests lapsed on his death. His sons, Paul and Erling, who joined Harold Hardrada's expedition to England in 1066, ruled jointly, and were the founders of two lines of earls. The son of Erling was the famous St. Magnus. Malcolm Canmore by his marriage with Thorfinn's widow brought the whole district into some relation with the Scottish crown. But in 1093 both Orkneys and Western Isles were conquered for a time by Magnus Barefoot of Norway, but on his death in 1104 the native jarls regained their practically supreme authority. In 1196 William the Lion definitely subjected Caithness to his throne. In the next century the earldom of Caithness was divided between the Angus and Moray families. At a later period the Sinclairs got possession of it. The islands remained under the nominal suzerainty of the kings of Norway, and, after the Danish conquest, of the kings of Denmark. In 1470 they were handed over to James III as security for the portion of his wife, Margaret of Denmark. At the same time the bishopric was transferred from the province of Trondhjem to that of St. Andrews. The pledge was never redeemed, and at last, on the marriage of James VI with Anne of Denmark, the pretensions of the Danish kings were more formally ceded. The islands were constituted into a Scottish county, though it was not until the Reform Act of 1832 that Shetland had any voice in returning parliamentary representatives. The land gradually passed into the hands of Scottish proprietors, but the bulk of the population remained Norse, though that language died out with the cessation of the political connexion.

Orleans, THE SIEGE OF (1428-9), was begun by the Earl of Salisbury in October 1428. The English were at this time masters of the whole country north of the Loire, and were anxious to extend their conquests across that river. For this purpose it was necessary that Orleans should be taken, as it commanded the valley of the Loire. The size of the city rendered a strict blockade almost impossible, while a considerable French force harassed the besiegers. The battle of the Herrings (q.v.) which was fought in February 1429, seemed to deprive the besieged of all hope of succour, and the fall of Orleans was certain, when the sudden rise of Joan of Arc, and the enthusiasm she created, aided by the skill of Dunois and other generals selected by her, entirely changed the aspect of affairs. Led by the heroine of Domrémy, the French succeeded in entering Orleans in April, and on May 8 the English raised the siege and retired, being defeated with considerable loss a month later (June 18) at Patay. The raising of the siege was the turn of the tide; after this the English lost town after town, fortress after fortress, till at last, of all their great French possessions, Calais alone was left to them.

Orleton, ADAM OF, Bishop of Winchester (d. 1345), was made Bishop of Hereford in the year 1317, translated to Worcester in 1327 and to Winchester in 1333. He supported the rising under Badlesmere in 1322, and in 1323 he was accused of high treason before parliament. He refused to recognize the jurisdiction of the lay court, and was supported by all the other prelates and many of the barons. Edward II, however, persisted with the trial. A verdict of guilty was returned, and Orleton's property was sequestered. Before long, however, he was ostensibly reconciled with the king; but he never forgot the treatment he had received, and in 1326 he took the lead among the bishops in support of Isabella and Mortimer. He played a very important part in the events which led to Edward's deposition, acting as spokesman for Isabella in parliament and before the king himself. Under the new reign he became treasurer and the proceedings against him in 1323 were reversed. He was one of the leaders of the attack upon Archbishop Stratford in 1341.

Orsini Question (1858). On January 14, 1858, Felix Orsini and other Italian exiles attempted the assassination of the Emperor of the French by means of explosive bombs. As these men came from London, where they had made their preparations, great indignation was excited in France that shelter was afforded to them. Count Walewski, French minister of foreign affairs, wrote with some acrimony to Count Persigny, French ambassador in London, on the subject, inveighing against the defective laws of England, which allowed the right of asylum to protect political assassins. The French ambassador made representations to the British government, and Lord Palmerston, recognizing the justice of the representations, introduced a bill for the punishment of conspiracy to murder (February 8). Unfortunately, however, certain French officers had thought fit to give vent to their indignation against England in their congratulations to the emperor, and entreated him to allow them to "demand an account of the land of iniquity which contains the haunts of the monsters, who are sheltered by its laws." The result was that in spite of Count Walewski's endeavours to remove the bad impression, the spirit of Britain was roused and Palmerston's measure was regarded as an unworthy concession to the menaces of the French army. It was thrown out on a division (by 234 to 215) and Palmerston resigned. His successor, Lord Derby, took up a stronger position, and returned a firm answer to Count Walewski's note. A satisfactory reply was received, and the matter terminated in a friendly and honourable manner.

Orthes, THE BATTLE OF (February 27, 1814), was fought at the close of the Peninsular War, and gained one of the strong positions which Soult had taken up in the south of France. Two days before the battle Beresford forced the passage of the Gave de Pau, below Orthes. On the next day Soult learnt this, and took up a strong position on a ridge, which was in part covered with woods, and presented a concave front to the allies. The ridge was crossed by the main road from Orthes to Dax, and was protected in front of its centre by some swampy ground, at the farther side of which was an old Roman camp. Wellington's plan was to turn the French right, while Hill, skirting their left, should seize the road to St. Sever; thus Soult would have no line of retreat, and would be shut up in Orthes. The attacks on the French right on the morning of the 27th completely failed; but Wellington ordered a concentrated assault to be made on the French left and centre, which succeeded, and the French fell back. Hill meanwhile had forced the ford at Souars, and was now in possession of the Pau road. There was thus open to Soult only a narrow road to Sault de Navailles, along which he conducted the retreat with such skill that the French were able to seize a small ridge before Hill could occupy it. Wellington, being wounded, was unable to superintend the pursuit himself, and it was not carried on so vigorously as it might have been. As it was, however, Soult lost an enormous number of stragglers.

Osborne, THOMAS, DUKE OF LEEDS (1631-1712), Viscount Latimer and Baron Danby (1673), Earl of Danby (1674), Marquis of Carmarthen (1689), and Duke of Leeds (1694), was the son of Sir Edward Osborne, of Yorkshire. He became high sheriff of York in 1661, and took an active part in the prosecution of Clarendon. He became successively treasurer of the navy (1668), privy councillor (1673), and on the fall of Clifford lord high treasurer (1674). At home he put in force the laws against Catholics and Dissenters, endeavoured to impose a non-resistance test on all public functionaries, and introduced a bill to give securities to the Church in event of the succession of a Catholic king. Abroad he opposed the aggrandizement of France, so far as the king allowed him, and contrived to bring about the marriage of the Princess Mary to William of Orange (1677). But he corrupted the House of Commons, and stooped to be the agent of Charles II in his bargains with Louis

XIV. The latter, finding Danby the opponent of French policy, worked his overthrow through Ralph Montagu, the ambassador at Paris, who revealed the secret dispatch by which Danby, at the king's command, asked payment for England's neutrality. He was impeached in 1678, and though not tried, was confined in the Tower till 1684. It was decided that the king's pardon could not be pleaded in bar of an impeachment by the Commons, and that the dissolution of parliament did not put an end to an impeachment. In the next reign, finding that the measures of James II threatened the Church, Danby allied himself with the Whig lords, signed the invitation of June 20, 1688, to the Prince of Orange, and secured York for the Revolution. Yet though he did not shrink from taking up arms, he scrupled to declare James deposed, and headed the party which argued that the king had by his flight abdicated, and that the crown had thus devolved on Mary. In the discussions between the Lords and the Commons which followed it was mainly owing to Danby that the House of Lords consented to agree with the Commons and invite William to ascend the throne. Therefore he naturally obtained a great position under the new government. He was appointed president of the council, and became in 1690 the real head of the ministry; "as nearly prime minister," says Macaulay, "as any English subject could be under a prince of William's character." His second administration, like his first, was stained by systematic bribery, nor was he free from corruption himself. In 1695 it was proved that he had received a bribe of 5,500 guineas from the East India Company, and he was for a second time impeached. He escaped condemnation, and caused the suspension of the proceedings by contriving the flight of the principal witness; but though he retained his place for three years longer, he completely lost his power. "Though his eloquence and knowledge always secured him the attention of his hearers, he was never again, even when the Tory party was in power, admitted to the smallest share in the direction of affairs. In 1710 he made his last important appearance in debate in defence of Sacheverell, and thus explained his conduct in 1688." He had, he said, a great share in the late revolution, but he never thought that things "would have gone so far as to settle the crown on the Prince of Orange, whom he had often heard say that he had no such thoughts himself. That they ought to distinguish between resistance and revolution, for vacancy or abdication was the thing they went upon, and therefore resistance was to be forgot; for had it not succeeded it had certainly been rebellion, since he knew of no other but hereditary right." But though he disavowed the principles of the Revolution, and shrank from the logic of his actions, his name is inseparably associated with that event, and the part he played then is his best title to remembrance. His character has been very variously judged;

he was bold, ambitious, and unscrupulous, and he has been defined as "a bourgeois Strafford."

[C. H. F.]

Osgod Clapa was a Dane who acted as stallor or master of the horse to Hardicanute, and later to Edward the Confessor. It was at the marriage of his daughter with Tofig the Proud that Hardicanute died. He seems to have been suspected of intrigues with Magnus of Norway, and was accordingly banished in 1046. He retired to Flanders, and for some time vexed the English court with piratical descents.

Osred II, KING OF NORTHUMBRIA (788-790), was the son of Alchred; he succeeded on the murder of Elfwald, but had held the kingdom little more than a year when Ethelred Moll (q.v.), who had been expelled in 778 from the throne, returned, and compelled him to abdicate. He was obliged to assume the tonsure, and subsequently to seek refuge in exile in the Isle of Man. He returned in 792, but was captured and beheaded by Ethelred.

Ostmen (or EASTMEN) (Norse, Aust-mathr), was the name generally applied to the Scandinavian settlers in Ireland. Towards the end of the eighth century the exceptionally disturbed condition of Ireland, where the power of the ard ri (over-king) had been reduced to nothing, and sept constantly waged war against sept, invited the Viking rovers to plunder and settle on its coasts. In 795 the first recorded invasion took place. For the next half-century the invaders sought plunder only. But about 850 they formed permanent settlements along the whole east coast. Dublin, whose suburb Oxmanstown still preserves the name of the Ostman, Wexford, Waterford—both purely Norse names—Limerick even, in the remotest part of the island, became the centres of Scandinavian jarldoms. With characteristic facility, the new-comers soon mixed with the natives. Besides the pure races—the Dub-gaill, or black foreigners, and Find-gaill or white foreigners, as the Danes and Norwegians were respectively called—the mixed race of Gall-goidel soon became equally famous as pirates, warriors, and mariners. They constantly spread devastation along the shores of Britain. The Welsh coast, from its proximity, was especially often attacked by them. But they also had close relations with the Northmen more to the north. A son of a king of Dublin first conquered Orkney; and names like Njal give weight to the theory that Iceland was largely settled by Irish Danes, or at least had constant dealings with them. The Danish kings of Dublin were especially powerful and stood in a peculiarly close relation to the Scandinavian settlers in Northumbria during the first half of the tenth century. At last the vigour of the Viking states began to abate. The Ostmen were compelled to acknowledge the overlordship of great English kings, like Edgar. Inter-marriage between Norse and Irish was common, but the clan-system among the latter was strong enough to keep the two races distinct right down to the Anglo-Norman invasion of the twelfth century. In the meantime, however, a great Celtic reaction set in, which culminated in the decisive victory of the famous Brian Boru (q.v.) at the battle of Clontarf in 1014. The power of the Norsemen was broken, though the weakness of the conquerors left Dublin a Danish city until the arrival of Strongbow. Their conversion to Christianity still further weakened the old Viking prowess. Their bishoprics, connected with Trondhjem in early times, were in striking contrast to the clan system of the Irish Church. The anxiety of these Norse bishops to avoid amalgamation with the latter by acknowledging the supremacy of Canterbury is strikingly brought out by the relations of Lanfranc with the Archbishop of Dublin. At last the remnants of the Ostmen readily assimilated themselves to their kinsfolk the Norman lords and soldiers who conquered the greater part of Ireland in the reign of Henry II. Except for their influence in the place-names of the island, on the growth of the towns, and the expansion of trade, they left few permanent traces in the later history of Ireland.

Ostorius Scapula, Roman governor in Britain (47-51), quelled a revolt of the Iceni in A.D. 48, and thoroughly reduced South-eastern Britain. He conducted the successful campaign against Caratacus (see Caradoc), the exiled king of the Catuvellauni, who had taken refuge with the Silures of South Wales, and sent him and his family captive to Rome in A.D. 50. Subsequent risings of the Silures, however, taxed his energies, and are said to have occasioned his death.

Oswald, KING OF NORTHUMBRIA (d. 642), was the son of Ethelfrith of Bernicia. After his father's death at the battle of the Idle in 617, at the hand of Edwin of Deira, he escaped with his brothers to Scotland, where he remained till 634. The defeat and death of Edwin by Penda of Mercia and Cadwallon of Wales, at Heathfield in 633, gave to the exiled house of Bernicia its opportunity; and after the death of his elder brother Eanfrid, Oswald was called to the Northumbrian throne. He defeated Cadwallon at Heavenfield, near Hexham, and established himself as undisputed sovereign both of Bernicia and Deira. He ranks, according to Bæda's reckoning, as the sixth Bretwalda, and is said to have reigned over Angles, Britons, Picts, and Scots. He was an ardent Christian, having received the Celtic form of the faith during his exile in the great monastery of Iona or Hii. One of his first tasks, therefore, was to re-establish, with the help of St. Aidan, Christianity in Northumbria, where it had perished as a result of the triumph of the heathen Mercians. Oswald's virtues receive high praise from Bæda, and he seems to have been one of the noblest of the English kings before Alfred the Great. He was killed at Maserfield (Oswestry), in battle against Penda of Mercia, his inveterate enemy. By his subjects he was regarded as a martyr, and miracles were said to be wrought by his relics. At his death Northumbria relapsed temporarily into anarchy.

Oswestry is a town in Shropshire of considerable antiquity. It derives its name from Oswald, King of Northumbria (q.v.), who was slain there in 642. The remains of a castle said to date from the Norman Conquest are situated on a hill to the west of the town.

W. Cathrall, "History of Oswestry," 1855; "Victoria County History: Shropshire."

Oswy (or OSWIU), KING OF NORTHUMBRIA (d. 671), was a younger son of Ethelfrith of Bernicia. On the death of his brother Oswald, at Maserfield, in 642, he became King of Bernicia, but Deira went to Oswin, a member of the rival house. In 651 Oswy defeated and murdered Oswin, but failed to subdue Deira. During the early part of this reign Northumbria was exposed to frequent attacks from Penda of Mercia, who was, after Oswald's death, the strongest power in the island. He was, however, defeated and slain by Oswy in 655 at the battle of Winwaed. For a short time after this Oswy was supreme in England. He reunited Deira to Bernicia, and for some years ruled directly over the whole of Mercia, but was eventually compelled by Wulfhere to retire within the boundaries of his own kingdom (659). His reign was most prosperous, and his kingdom was greatly enlarged by alliances with and victories over the Picts. He enjoyed supremacy over the Niduarian Picts of Galloway, and even over some of those beyond the Forth, while the Welsh of Strathclyde also were subject to him. The most important event of his later years was, however, unconnected with secular politics. In 664 there was held, under his ægis, the celebrated Synod of Whitby (q.v.), as a result of which Northumbria abandoned its allegiance to Iona and was brought into communion with Canterbury and Rome. The importance of Oswy's decision in favour of the Roman as against the Celtic usage can hardly be overestimated. A conflict with his eldest son Alchfrid, and with the intractable Wilfrid of Ripon, marked the next few years, but Oswy seems to have closed his career (February 671) in peace.

Otadeni (or OTTADENI), THE, were an ancient British tribe occupying the coast from the Tyne to the Firth of Forth, including a large part of Northumberland, with the present counties of Berwick and East Lothian, and part of Roxburghshire.

Otford, THE BATTLE OF (774), was fought between Offa of Mercia and the Kentishmen, and resulted in a victory for the former, and in the submission of Kent to Mercia.

Otho, one of the chaplains of Pope Honorius III, was sent over to England as nuncio in 1225, partly to plead for Falkes de Breauté (q.v.), in which he was unsuccessful, and partly to raise money for the pope. His demands were refused, and in 1226 Otho left England, to return in 1237 with full legatine powers. He now acted with great moderation, arranged some difficulties with Scotland, prolonged the truce with Llewelyn of Wales, reformed the Church in a great council held at St. Paul's in November, and attempted to abolish pluralities. But his popularity was short-lived. He was the centre of a brawl at Osney, near Oxford, in 1238, and barely escaped personal injury; while his exactions on behalf of Gregory IX, after the outbreak of the conflict with the emperor in 1239, became intolerable. He withdrew from England at length in 1241, taking with him, according to popular belief, more money than he left behind.

Ottawa is the capital of Canada. It was named Bytown, after Colonel By, until 1854, when it was incorporated as a city under its present name. In 1865 it was made the Canadian capital and seat of the legislature. The Parliament Houses, begun in 1860 and reckoned amongst the finest buildings in America, were destroyed by fire in 1916 and since reconstructed. [CANADA, DOMINION OF.]

Otterburn, THE BATTLE OF (August 19, 1388), was fought between an invading force of Scottish troops, headed by the Earl of Douglas, and an English force, led by the Percys. The Scottish army was divided into two portions, which marched into England by different routes. The smaller division, after harrying the country as far as Durham, retreated to Otterburn, in Northumberland, where they were surprised by Hotspur. Although the Scots were numerically inferior, their victory was decisive; both the Percys (Hotspur and Ralph) were taken prisoners, and many of the English were slain. The battle of Otterburn has been transformed and idealized in ballad poetry under the name of Chevy Chase. It marks the fading from the defenders of Scotland of the dread of immediate absolute conquest by England.

Oudenarde, THE BATTLE OF (July 11, 1708), was one of the great battles in the War of the Spanish Succession. Finding that the war was becoming unpopular both with the English and Dutch, Marlborough resolved on a decisive blow. The French, numbering 100,000, under the Duke of Burgundy, who was jealous of Vendôme, the second in command, were attempting to take Oudenarde, a fortress on the Scheldt. Marlborough, having been joined by Eugène, in command of the allies, numbering a little more than 80,000, advanced towards them, and they promptly raised the siege. Although the French outnumbered the allies, they were utterly routed. They lost 6,000 men and had 9,000 taken prisoners, besides ten pieces of cannon and 4,000 horses. The allies lost nearly 3,000 men.

Oudh, at one time a province of the Mogul Empire, became connected with England during the governor-generalship of Warren Hastings, through the Treaty of Benares and the transactions with regard to the Rohillas. The treaty began that defensive alliance which gradually tended to subject the vizir to the British, and which, in 1801, after various cessions of territory, placed him in an isolated position, surrounded by the British territories, without the necessities of defence. The sovereigns, in consequence, gave themselves up to extravagance, debauchery, and misgovernment, in spite of the repeated protests and threats of the British. Gazi-ud-din, on his accession in 1814, assumed, by the advice of Lord Hastings, the title of King of Oudh, and no longer recognized the authority of the Mogul. In 1856 Lord Dalhousie annexed the country by the order of the directors, the king becoming a state prisoner. In 1877 the two provinces of Agra and Oudh were placed under one administrator, the lieutenant-governor of the North-west Province and chief commissioner of Oudh. The name "United Provinces of Agra and Oudh" was adopted in 1902, and in 1921 the lieutenant-governorship became a governorship.

Oulart, SKIRMISH AT, May 26, 1798, occurred during the Irish Rebellion and involved the victory of 8,000 insurgents. Of some 200 of the North Cork Militia, all but five were killed. Father John Murphy (q.v.) led the rebels.

Outlawry, i.e., exclusion from the protection and benefit of the law, has been from very early times the punishment which has attended flight from justice, or refusal to appear before a legal tribunal. In the laws of Edgar it is even enacted that a person refusing obedience to a decision of the hundred shall, after being fined three times, become an outlaw, unless the king allows him to remain in the land. An outlaw was said to "bear a wolf's head," and therefore to be lawfully slain by any who met him. But as early as the thirteenth century some doubt seems to have been felt as to the expediency of so summary a procedure. Thus Bracton laid it down that though an outlaw might be killed if he defended himself or ran away, so that it was difficult to take him, when once taken his life was in the king's hands, and anyone then killing him must answer for it as for any other homicide. Yet Fleta, under Edward II, declares that an outlaw may be killed anywhere with impunity, and the case to which Coke refers, in order to prove that under Edward III such an act was declared by the judges unlawful, shows really that the old principle was still recognized. But as manners softened, the question ceased to be of practical importance, though the legal doctrine was still doubtful as late as Philip and Mary. The most important consequence of outlawry was the forfeiture of chattels for all cases, with the addition, in cases of treason or murder, of the forfeiture of real property; for other offences, of the profits of land during the outlaw's lifetime. Outlawry in civil cases for refusal to appear in court was abolished in 1879. In criminal cases it is practically obsolete, and no longer necessary, since extradition treaties have become general. It may be added that outlawry does not lie against a peer except for treason, felony, or breach of the peace.

Outram, SIR JAMES (1803-63), saw active service in Afghanistan (1838), and subsequently acted as resident at Hyderabad, Satara, and Lucknow. In 1842 he was appointed commissioner to negotiate with the Amirs of Sind, in which capacity he differed from Sir Charles Napier as to the latter's conduct. In 1856 he became chief commissioner of Oudh. His name is inseparably connected with the defence of Lucknow, and he ranks as one of the saviours of India during the Mutiny. In 1856 he commanded during the Persian War, and became in 1858 a baronet and lieutenant-general.

Overbury, SIR THOMAS (1581-1613), was educated at Queen's College, Oxford, became a student at the Middle Temple, and was knighted in the year 1608. Overbury earned distinction as a poet, traveller, and writer, and became the friend and confidential adviser of Robert Carr. The king became jealous of his influence, and wished to remove him from the court, whilst at the same time his opposition to Rochester's proposed marriage with Lady Essex made Rochester wish to get him out of the way for a time. James offered Overbury a diplomatic post abroad, which Rochester encouraged him to refuse, and the king for this refusal committed Overbury to the Tower (April 26, 1613). Rochester merely wished to keep Overbury quiet. Lady Essex seized the opportunity to be rid of him altogether, and at length succeeded in getting him poisoned (September 15, 1613). On December 26, the same year, took place the marriage of Lord Rochester, now created Earl of Somerset, to the divorced Countess of Essex. Early in 1615 the fact that Overbury had been poisoned came to the knowledge of Sir Ralph Winwood, the king's ambassador in the Low Countries, and was by him revealed to the king. Four of those concerned in the plot were executed, and the earl and countess were tried before the Lord High Steward's court (May 1616). Both were declared guilty, but pardoned by the king, and, after 1623, released from their confinement in the Tower.

Overkirk, GENERAL (d. 1708), was one of the Dutch favourites of William III, whose life at the battle of St. Denis he saved. On the accession of William he became master of the horse. He took an active share in William's battles in Ireland, and received grants of Irish land. On the outbreak of the War of the Spanish Succession he shared with Opilan the command of the Dutch troops.

Owen, ROBERT (1771-1858), philanthropist and Socialist, was the son of a saddler in Newtown, Montgomeryshire. He left school at nine, and served as draper's assistant in Stamford and in London. Then he went to Manchester, where he was amazingly successful. At nineteen he was manager of a large cotton mill which, under his direction, became one of the most famous establishments in Lancashire. While there he considerably improved the quality of the spun cotton. In 1794 he helped to form the Chorlton Twist Company. As its manager, he bought the New Lanark Mills (Glasgow) from David Dale, and shortly afterwards married the latter's daughter. In 1800 he settled at New Lanark as manager and part owner. It was while in Scotland that he carried out his philanthropic schemes which became famous all over the world and to which pilgrimages of inspection were made by reformers and statesmen from all over Europe. He reduced the hours of work; rebuilt the houses of his work-people; provided them with goods at cost price; improved the sanitation of the village; established visiting committees; raised the discipline and moral tone; and lastly (which eventually won over the support of his suspicious employees) continued pay while the factory was closed during a trade depression. To further his reforms he bought out his partners and formed a company with Bentham, Allen, and other Radicals in 1814. In 1816 he became the founder of infant schools in Great Britain by establishing such an institution at Lanark. From 1817 onwards his interests became more and more absorbed in the promulgation of his ideas to the world at large. He worked actively for factory reform, and was chiefly responsible for the passage of the act of 1819, though its terms keenly disappointed his expectations. In 1817 he first propounded his Socialist scheme—the establishment of communal villages—as a relief for the unemployed. Shortly afterwards he came to the conclusion that such a reorganization of the community was the ideal for society as a whole, and the rest of his life was spent in advocating this form of Socialism. His essays became widely read, and his influence grew to be enormous, eventually giving rise to many diverse movements such as the co-operative movement, secularism, militant trade unionism, etc. His popularity with the upper classes waned in proportion as it grew with the workers. He travelled considerably, and in 1825 attempted the establishment of an ideal community at New Harmony, U.S.A. The project was abandoned in 1828, and he returned to conduct a vigorous propaganda in England. As a result of "Owenism" the word "Socialist" first came to be used (1827) by some of his disciples. In 1832 he established the National Labour Exchange in London, with the use of "labour notes" to eliminate the middleman and to secure to the worker "the right to the whole produce of labour." It flourished for a time, but failed by 1834. At the same time he was intimately associated with the rise and fall of the Grand National Consolidated Trades Union of 1833-4. Thence onwards he ceased to be an organizing force among the newer trade unionists. He wrote and lectured prolifically from 1813 to the end, and ran numerous journals to spread his ideas.

Oxford, THE CITY OF, is mentioned as the seat of a school or college as early as 802. It was taken by Edward the Elder in 912, and became one of the most important of the West Saxon towns. It was captured by the Danes under Sweyn in 1013, after being burnt during the Danish attacks in 979, 1002, and 1010, and was several times the seat of the witenagemot under Canute. It was stormed by William the Conqueror in 1067, and the castle built about 1070. The city prospered under the Norman sheriff, Robert D'Oili. The castle was occupied by the Empress Maud in 1142, and captured by Stephen on her escape. The treaty between Henry II and Stephen was made at Oxford (November 7, 1153). The Dominicans and Franciscans settled in the city in 1221 and 1224 respectively. In 1258 the "Mad" Parliament met there, and the Provisions of Oxford were drawn up. Latimer and Ridley were burnt in Broad Street in 1555. In the Civil War Oxford was the head-quarters of Charles I after October 1642. The king established his mint there in 1643, and held a parliament in 1644. But in June 1646 the city surrendered to Fairfax. Charles II held the last Oxford Parliament in 1681. Later the city became Jacobite.

Oxford, EARLS OF. [ASQUITH; HARLEY; VERE.]

Oxford, PROVISIONS OF (1258), were the schemes of reorganization and reform forced on Henry III by the "Mad" Parliament of Oxford in 1258. A commission of twenty-four persons was appointed, twelve nominated by the king, and twelve by the barons. By the advice of these commissioners the king was to draw up means for the reform of the civil administration, the Church, and the royal household. When the parliament met, the barons brought forward a schedule of grievances which they desired the commissioners to remedy. The Provisions of Oxford themselves supply the machinery by which these grievances might be redressed. The twenty-four commissioners met, and each twelve selected two out of the other twelve, and these four nominated fifteen who were to form a council for advising the king and to hold three annual parliaments. With them the barons were to negotiate through another committee. There was also another committee of twenty-four, whose business it was to inquire into financial matters; while the original twenty-four were to undertake the reform of the Church. The commissioners drew up the Provisions of Westminster (q.v.), and drove the foreigners out of the country. This government lasted till 1261, when Henry repudiated his oath and the pope issued a bull absolving him. [MONTFORT, SIMON DE.]

Oyer and Terminer is the name given to a commission granted by the Crown to judges and others, "to hear and to determine" cases of treason, felony, and trespass. By virtue of this commission, judges deal with criminal cases in the various circuits. The words oyer and terminer are derived from the French ouïr, to hear, and terminer, to determine. The commissions, within regular form, date back to the end of the thirteenth and beginning of the fourteenth century.

Pace, RICHARD (1482?-1536), became secretary to Henry VIII on the recommendation of Pope Leo X, in 1515. He was sent by Wolsey on a diplomatic mission to the Swiss in the same year, and two years later he went to Germany to sound the Imperial electors. He became secretary of state in 1516, and dean of St. Paul's in 1519. The year 1520 saw him at the Field of the Cloth of Gold, and in 1521 and 1523 he went to Rome to advance Wolsey's candidature for the papacy.

Pacifico, DAVID (1784-1854), was a Portuguese Jew, born in Gibraltar, and consequently a British subject, resident at Athens. In April 1847 his house was attacked and burnt by the mob. The Hellenic authorities took no steps to prevent the outrage, and refused to indemnify Pacifico, who claimed heavy damages. Lord Palmerston demanded instant compensation; and on the refusal of the Greeks to satisfy this claim, or that raised in the case of the Fantôme, and of Dr. George Finlay [FINLAY QUESTION], a British fleet was ordered to enter the Piræus and seize the shipping there belonging to Greek owners, January 1850. The Hellenic government appealed to France and Russia. Negotiations took place between the governments of Great Britain and France, in the course of which a serious quarrel between the two powers was with difficulty avoided. Finally the claims were settled by arbitration, and Pacifico received about one-thirtieth of the sum he demanded. Palmerston's coercive measures towards the Hellenic government formed the subject of animated debates in both Houses of Parliament. In the House of Lords a vote of censure was carried against the government by a majority of 37. In the Commons, however, a vote of confidence was carried by 46, after a remarkably brilliant speech from Palmerston.

Paget, HENRY WILLIAM, 1st MARQUIS OF ANGLESEY (1768-1854), eldest son of Henry, 1st Earl of Uxbridge, served under the Duke of York in Flanders in 1794, and again in Holland in 1799, as colonel of a dragoon regiment. In December 1808 he joined Sir John Moore's force as a major-general, and greatly distinguished himself by the manner in which he covered the disastrous retreat of the British army, and contributed in no small measure to the victory at Corunna. In 1806 he was returned to parliament for Milbourne Port, and he was called to the Upper House on the death of his father in 1812. In the campaign of 1815 he was appointed to the command of the cavalry. At Waterloo, where he led the heavy brigade in the terrible charge which overwhelmed d'Erlon's division, he distinguished himself by the utmost intrepidity. In the battle he was wounded in the leg, which had to be amputated. For his services he was created Marquis of Anglesey, and received the thanks of both Houses of Parliament. In 1827 he was appointed master-general of the ordnance; and in 1828 the Wellington cabinet made him viceroy of Ireland. His advent was looked forward to with much dread in Ireland, owing to some thoughtless remarks he had once made as to using military force to quell disturbances. But he very much belied the anticipations that had been formed of him, and, by his impartial conduct and strict justice, gained great popularity. His views on Catholic emancipation, of which he was a strong advocate, entirely differed from the policy of the cabinet, and he was summarily removed from his post. In 1830 he was again appointed lord-lieutenant, and carried on the government of Ireland till the dissolution of Lord Grey's government in 1834. In 1846 he was made a field-marshal, and in the same year once more became master-general of the ordnance, which office he held till 1852, when he retired into private life.

Paget, THOMAS, 3RD BARON (d. 1590), the second son of William, Lord Paget of Beaudesert, was a zealous Catholic, and a supporter of Mary, Queen of Scots, and the Jesuits. He was attainted and compelled to take refuge abroad, on suspicion of being concerned in Throgmorton's plot (November 1583). His estates were forfeited in his absence in 1587.

Paget, WILLIAM, 1ST BARON PAGET OF BEAUDESERT (1505-63), was born of humble parents. He attracted the notice of Bishop Gardiner, and rising rapidly, was knighted, and became one of the secretaries of state in 1543, and in that capacity negotiated peace with France in 1546. He was appointed one of the council of regency by the will of Henry VIII, with the office of chief secretary, and supported Somerset in setting aside that arrangement and assuming the office of Protector. In 1549 Sir William Paget was sent on a mission to the Emperor Charles V, to persuade him to join England in a war with France; and, though unsuccessful, he was on his return raised to the peerage as Lord Paget of Beaudesert. In a statesmanlike letter, written from Germany, he attempted to inspire the wavering councils of the Protector with prudence and vigour in dealing with the rising in the west of England, but to little purpose. The see of Lichfield lost the greater part of its lands in order to furnish him with an estate. On the fall of Somerset, to whom he had been consistently faithful, Paget was thrown into the Tower, and deprived of his appointments (1551), but was pardoned in the following year. On the accession of Mary he became one of her most trusted advisers, and was made keeper of the seals. He was throughout in favour of moderation, and had no sympathy with those who wished for the establishment of the Inquisition and the execution of the Princess Elizabeth. He was one of the promoters of the marriage between Mary and Philip of Spain, and was disposed to regard the friendship of Charles V as highly necessary for England. On the accession of Elizabeth he resigned the seals; but though he did not enjoy the confidence of the queen, he continued from time to time to give her advice. During the last years of his life he advocated an alliance with Henry IV of France in preference to the friendship of Spain.

Paine, THOMAS (1737-1809), was the son of a Norfolk staymaker. He lived first at Sandwich and then at Lewes, practising various trades with indifferent success. In 1774 he emigrated to America, where he became editor of the Pennsylvania Magazine, and in 1776 published his famous pamphlet, "Common Sense," which was followed by a periodical called the Crisis, written for the purpose of keeping up the flagging spirits of the colonists. Paine was rewarded by Congress by the appointment of secretary to the committee of foreign affairs, and in 1781 was sent to France in company with Colonel Laurens to negotiate a loan for the United States. He visited France a second time in 1787, and went thence to England, where, in 1791, he published the "Rights of Man" in reply to Burke's "Reflections on the French Revolution." The government thereupon resolved to prosecute him for his attack upon the constitution, and, in spite of Erskine's brilliant defence, he was found guilty. He had already anticipated his sentence, however, by retiring to France, where he was returned to the National Convention by the electors of Pas-de-Calais. "The foreign benefactor of the species," as Carlyle calls him, voted with the Girondists, and advocated the banishment rather than the execution of the king. His moderation procured for him expulsion as a foreigner from the convention by the Jacobins, and imprisonment. In 1794, however, he was released on the intercession of the American government, and resumed his seat. The "Age of Reason," composed during his imprisonment, was a defence of Deism, written in extremely gross taste. Paine returned to America in 1802, and spent the rest of his life in obscurity.

Pakenham, SIR EDWARD (d. 1815), was a brother-in-law of the 1st Duke of Wellington, and one of his most trusted subordinates. He distinguished himself greatly in the Peninsular War, playing an important part in the victory of Salamanca (July 22, 1812). During the war with America he commanded the expedition sent against New Orleans. The place was vigorously defended by General Jackson, and in the disastrously unsuccessful assault (January 8, 1815) Pakenham lost his life.

Pakington, SIR JOHN (1671-1727), was a high Tory, and member for the county of Worcester during the reigns of William III and Anne. He preferred a complaint against William Lloyd, Bishop of Worcester, and his son, for using their influence in the elections against him, and proved his case, the House censuring their conduct as "unchristian." Pakington was throughout his life a violent partisan; his speech against the union with Scotland was hooted down because of its ungenerous insinuations, and he was equally headstrong in his opposition to the Occasional Conformity Bill. There does not appear to be any justification for the idea that he was the original of Sir Roger de Coverley. He was the ancestor of John Pakington, created Baron Hampton (d. 1880), who held various posts in Lord Derby's ministries, and who, in 1866, disclosed to his constituents the secret of the famous "Ten Minutes' Bill."

Pale, THE. That part of Ireland which was de facto subject to English law began to be called the "Pale" in the late fourteenth or early fifteenth century. It was in earlier times distinguished from Celtic Ireland as "the English land," or "English ground." The Pale was surrounded by a belt of waste marches, beyond which lay the lands of the Irish enemy. From the invasion of Edward Bruce, in 1315, until the Geraldine rebellion in the sixteenth century, the extent of "the English land" steadily diminished. Bruce harried the Pale mercilessly in 1316 and 1317. The small English freeholders were forced to follow the lord-deputy in his "hostings." Their abandoned farmsteads were robbed and burnt by English and Irish alike. They fled in great numbers across the seas, in spite of the most strenuous legal prohibitions. The Statute of Kilkenny (1366) (q.v.) openly acknowledges the division of Ireland into a Celtic and an English territory, and attempts to isolate them from each other by decreeing savage penalties against Celtic intruders into the Pale, and English colonists adopting Irish customs. But the law was soon a dead letter. A statute of Edward IV provides, just a century later, for the swearing-in of the Irish inhabitants of the Pale as lieges, and declares that deputies shall be named to accept their oaths "for the multitude that is to be sworn." The Parliament of Drogheda in 1494 ordered the construction of a mound and ditch around the English borders, "in the county of Dublin, from the waters of Annaliffy to the mountain of Kildare, from the waters of Annaliffy to Trim, and so to Meath and Uriel." These practically continued to be the limits of the Pale until Henry VIII undertook the conquest of the whole island. Dalkey, Tallaght, Kilcullen, Naas, Kilcock, Siddan, Ardee, Derver, and Dundalk formed the border in 1515. In 1534 there was, it was said, "no folk subject to the king's laws, but half the county Uriel, half the county of Meath, half the county of Dublin, half the county of Kildare." In 1537 Justice Luttrell describes the Pale as a "little precinct, not much more than 20 miles in length ne in breadth." Bullied by the Crown, "cessed" by the parliament, subjected by their lords at once to feudal dues and to tribal impositions, plundered by corrupt judges and extortionate deputies, blackmailed by the Irish in time of peace, and harried by both sides in time of war, the dwellers in the Pale were probably the most wretched of all the wretched inhabitants of Ireland.

Palladius, St., was one of the numerous Christian missionaries who preceded St. Patrick in Ireland. He was consecrated bishop by Pope Celestine I, and dispatched by him in 431 to Ireland. Little is known about his previous history; he was probably a member of a Gallic family exiled to Britain, and seems to have become Deacon of Rome. He landed near Wicklow, but failed to gain many converts, and departed, having erected there three wooden churches. On his way back to Rome he died, one account representing him as having been martyred by the Scots.

Palliser, Sir HUGH (1723-96), was second in command to Admiral Keppel (q.v.) in a ludicrously abortive action with the French off Ushant in 1778, in which, after several hours' fighting, the rival fleets withdrew without any advantage having been gained on either side. Keppel declared that Palliser was to blame for this failure. Mutual recriminations ensued, and the former being a member of the opposition, the latter a lord of the admiralty, their case was made a party question. At length the matter was referred to a court-martial, which, reflecting the unjust tone of popular opinion, triumphantly acquitted Keppel; and when Palliser, feeling that this was a reflection on himself, resigned his appointments and demanded an inquiry, he could only obtain a very qualified sentence of approval.

Palmer, ROUNDELL, 1ST EARL OF SELBORNE (1812-95), son of the Rev. William Palmer of Mixbury, Oxfordshire, was educated at Rugby and Winchester and Trinity College, Oxford. He was elected to a fellowship at Magdalen, and was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn (1837). In 1847 he was first returned to parliament for Plymouth as a Peelite. He represented Plymouth till 1852, when he was defeated; but regained his seat (1853), and held it till 1857. In 1861 he was appointed solicitor-general in Lord Palmerston's government, though he had not a seat in the House. He was then knighted, and shortly afterwards elected for Richmond, which he continued to represent till his elevation to the peerage. In 1863 he became attorney-general under Lord John Russell. In 1868 he was offered the chancellorship, but refused, as he could not agree with the administration on the Irish Church disendowment question. He continued, however, to be an independent supporter of the government on most questions, and represented it at Geneva (1871). [GENEVA AWARD.] He was appointed lord chancellor on the retirement of Lord Hatherley (1872), on which occasion he was raised to the peerage as Baron Selborne, retiring with the Liberal party in 1874. He again became Liberal chancellor in 1880, but refused the same office in the Home Rule cabinet of 1886. He was created an earl in 1882.

Palmer, Sir THOMAS (d. 1553), was joint commander of the English force which invaded Scotland in 1548, and took Haddington. During the blockade of the town by the French and Scots he was taken prisoner while escorting a relieving force which revictualled the exhausted garrison. Palmer's chief notoriety is derived from his betrayal (in 1551) of the Protector Somerset to the Earl of Warwick, to whom he revealed a plot to murder Warwick himself and others of the Protector's enemies, which, when supplemented by some false additions, led to his death. Palmer was subsequently condemned by a special commission and executed for his share in the treason of Northumberland and Lady Jane Grey.

Palmerston, HENRY JOHN TEMPLE, 3RD VISCOUNT (1784-1865). [TEMPLE.]

Pamirs, THE, are a group of elevated tablelands on the borders of Afghanistan and Turkistan, a portion of which was claimed by Russia in virtue of her conquest of Kokand in 1875, while part was claimed by Afghanistan and part by China. In 1892 a Russian expedition under Colonel Yonoff penetrated into the district from Ferghana and came into conflict with an Afghan force at Soma Tash, driving them back with some loss (July 23), and subsequently required two British officers to retire from the territory. The Russian view was stated to be that Great Britain might incite the Afghans and Chinese to use the territory as a basis for aggression against Russia. In 1895 a Boundary Commission settled the limits of the British and Russian spheres of influence, the British sphere being assigned to Afghanistan, the western frontier of which was thereby determined from Zulfikar on the Heri Rud to the Pamirs.

Pandulf, papal legate (d. 1226), sub-deacon of the household of Pope Innocent III, was sent to England in 1213 to make terms with King John. For a while the king held out, but finding himself deserted by everyone, he consented to Pandulf's terms, and resigned his kingdom to the pope, receiving it back as a fief of the Holy See. Pandulf remained in England throughout the struggle for the Charter, and rendered signal service to the royal cause. In reward he was elected to the see of Norwich, although he was not consecrated until 1222. On John's death he returned for a while to Rome, but in September 1218 he was appointed legate in England in place of Gualo. For the next three years the ultimate authority in the realm resided in him. He was in fact, if not in name, the successor in the regency of William Marshal, Earl of Pembroke. His ecclesiastical jurisdiction conflicted, however, with that of Archbishop Stephen Langton, who in 1221 induced the pope to recall him and to promise to appoint no successor during his (Langton's) lifetime. Pandulf retired to Rome, where he died in 1226. His body was brought to England and buried in the cathedral church of Norwich.

Panjeh Incident, THE, occurred between Great Britain and Russia in 1885. In 1884 the Amir of Afghanistan accepted a proposal for the delimitation of the frontier between his territory and Turkistan by a British and a Russian commission. The British commission set out, but the dispatch of the Russian was delayed pending further negotiations between the governments; and meantime Russian troops were pushed forward to occupy some of the points claimed. They were met by Afghan troops, and came into conflict with them at Dash Kepri, near Panjeh, March 30, 1885. The Afghan troops were defeated, and the Russians set up a temporary administration in Panjeh. A strong war feeling was aroused in England, but subsequently (May 2) it was agreed that the question who was responsible for the collision at Panjeh should be decided by arbitration. The arbitration was never effected, but eventually Great Britain, on behalf of the Amir, gave up his claim to Panjeh, he receiving in return the southern outlet of the Zulfikar Pass. The delimitation of the Russo-Afghan frontier was completed in 1895.

Papacy, RELATIONS WITH. The conversion of the south of England by the Roman monk Augustine, who was sent by Pope Gregory I, established a close connexion between the Church in England and the papacy. Gregory I drew up a scheme for the ecclesiastical organization of England according to the lines of the provincial organization of the Roman Empire. There were to be two ecclesiastical provinces—one in the south, and one in the north—and each of the metropolitans was to have twelve suffragan bishops under him. This scheme was never entirely realized. The north of England was converted by Celtic missionaries; but the superior organization of the Roman Church made it more attractive to many minds. The Northumbrian Wilfrid (q.v.) visited Rome, and returned a staunch adherent to the Roman system. The struggle between the Roman and Celtic Churches disturbed Northumbria till the Synod of Whitby (664), chiefly owing to Wilfrid's influence, decided in favour of Rome. This decision brought England within the circle of Western civilization, and made possible her political union. Soon afterwards the death of an archbishop of Canterbury at the papal court gave Pope Vitalian an opportunity of nominating Theodore of Tarsus as his successor. It is a striking instance of the cosmopolitan influence of the Roman system that an Eastern monk should rule the English Church. Archbishop Theodore had a rare gift for organization. He established the framework of the ecclesiastical system pretty much as it remains at present. He made the Church in England strong in religion and learning. England became a centre of missionary activity. In the eighth century English missionaries spread Christianity along the Rhine, and paid back England's debt of gratitude to the papacy by bringing the Frankish Church into closer connexion with the holy see. In 787 a sign of England's relationship to Rome was given by Offa, King of Mercia, who, to obtain the pope's consent to the establishment of a Mercian archbishopric at Lichfield, granted a tribute to the pope. This payment of a penny from every hearth passed on under the name of Peter's Pence (q.v.), and in later days the traditional sum of £201 9s. was paid for the whole kingdom. Though the papacy was regarded with great respect, its interference was rarely invited in the affairs of the English Church. In the tenth century Dunstan made the intercourse with Rome closer, and the archbishops from that time went to Rome for their pall.

On the whole, it may be said that in Anglo-Saxon times the Church in England was decidedly national, and worked harmoniously with the State. Few matters were referred to the pope's decision. Even Dunstan rejected a papal sentence, and legates were rarely seen in England. But the events preceding the Norman Conquest tended to bring the papacy into closer relations with English politics. Under Edward the Confessor a Norman favourite, Robert of Jumièges (q.v.), was made Archbishop of Canterbury. On Godwin's return from exile Archbishop Robert fled amongst the other Normans. His place was filled up by the election of Stigand, which Pope Leo IX refused to recognize, as being uncanonical. Pope Alexander II favoured the expedition of Duke William of Normandy, and sent him a consecrated banner. The papal approbation lent the Norman Conquest somewhat the appearance of a crusade, and three papal legates were sent afterwards to reform the English Church. Many bishops were deposed, and Norman successors were given to their sees. But neither William I nor Archbishop Lanfranc had the smallest inclination to surrender any of the rights of their position. The great Pope Gregory VII sent to demand arrears of Peter's Pence, which he considered as a feudal due, and claimed also the performance of homage. William I answered that he would pay the arrears; as to the homage, he had never promised it, his predecessors had never performed it, and he knew not on what grounds it was claimed. Moreover, William I reduced to shape the claims of the Crown in ecclesiastical matters. He set forth three points: (1) That no pope should be acknowledged in his realm save after his consent. The reason for this was the frequency of disputed elections to the papacy, and conflicting claims between rivals. (2) No decision of national or provincial synods was to be binding without his consent. (3) No vassal of the Crown was to be excommunicated till he had been informed of the offence.

The strong position assumed by William I was used by William II as a means of tyranny and extortion. Ecclesiastical fiefs were treated like lay fiefs; bishoprics were kept vacant, and their revenues were seized by the Crown.

The reign of William II shows the need which there was for a power like that claimed by Gregory VII to protect the Church from feudal exactions. A schism, however, weakened the papacy. Archbishop Anselm (q.v.) was attacked by William II because he wished to receive the pall from Urban II, whom the king had not yet acknowledged as pope. Finally the pall was sent to England, and was taken by Anselm from the high altar at Canterbury. But Anselm could not stand against the persecution of William II, and fled to the continent, where the papacy was still powerless to help him. On Henry I's accession he returned; but he had learned in his exile the most advanced principles of the Hildebrandine policy, and on his return he raised an objection to the investiture of spiritual persons by a layman. This was practically to assert the entire freedom of the Church from the State. Henry I would not yield, and Anselm again went into exile. But the king needed the archbishop's help, and in 1107 Pope Paschal II agreed to a compromise, which ten years afterwards was extended universally. The Crown was to receive homage for the temporalities attached to an ecclesiastical office, while the spiritual emblems, the ring and crosier, were to be conferred by spiritual persons. Soon after this Henry I used the mediation of Pope Calixtus II to compose his differences with the French king. Another subject of dispute arose about the presence of papal legates in England. The pope, as universal visitor of the Church, sent legati a latere for special purposes. The English clergy maintained that the archbishop of Canterbury was permanent representative of the pope (legatus natus) in England, and could not be superseded. Henry I did not fight this question. In 1125 a papal legate, John of Crema, presided at an important council in London; but the protest against legates was not in vain.

Henry II procured from the one English pope, Hadrian IV, a grant of the sovereignty of Ireland, which was said to be conferred on the ground that by the donation of Constantine all islands were vested in the Roman see. But he made no use of this grant till the murder of Archbishop Thomas Becket made it desirable for him to show some zeal in the pope's service. During the quarrel between Henry II and Becket the papacy was not strong enough to interfere with effect. Even after Becket's murder Alexander III received Henry II's excuses, and did not join his enemies. Henry II's invasion of Ireland was followed by the Synod of Cashel (q.v.), in which the Irish Church was reformed in accordance with the pope's wishes.

The reign of John marks the farthest advance of the papal power in English affairs. Under Innocent III the papacy reached its highest point, and John's brutal character was no match for the pope. A disputed election to the see of Canterbury led to an appeal to Rome.

There was enough informality to justify Innocent III in setting aside both the claimants; but he went farther, caused a new election to be held in Rome, and nominated Stephen Langton (q.v.) to the suffrages of the monks. John refused to admit Langton, and Innocent III laid his kingdom under an interdict. John confiscated the goods of the clergy: Pope Innocent III proceeded to excommunicate, and finally to depose, the king. John's tyranny had alienated his subjects, and the French king was ready to execute the papal sentence. In despair John made abject submission, granted his kingdom to the pope, and received it back as a fief (1313) by the annual rent of 1,000 marks. As John debased himself the spirit of the English barons rose. Aided by Archbishop Langton they demanded a charter of liberties. Innocent III, to his disgrace, took the side of his vassal, and the Great Charter was a victory won by a united people against the king and the pope alike. Innocent III annulled the charter, but died as the struggle was about to commence. John's death quickly followed, and the minority of Henry III gave time for reflection. The young king was crowned by the legate Gualo (q.v.), and for a time there was an attempt on the part of the papacy to set up a legatine government in England. Archbishop Langton, by earnest remonstrances, procured the withdrawal of legates and the confirmation by the pope of the legatine power of the archbishop of Canterbury. For two centuries there was no further attempt to interfere by legates in English affairs.

The papacy was soon involved in a desperate struggle against the imperial house of Hohenstaufen, for which it needed large supplies. England was exposed to increasing exactions, and the feeble character of Henry III made him a willing tool in the hands of the resolute popes, Gregory IX and Innocent IV. The pope taxed the English clergy to the extent of a twentieth or a tenth of their annual incomes. They protested at the Council of Lyons (1245), but their remonstrances were not supported by the king. Moreover, the pope used recklessly his prerogative of provisions, or nominations to vacant benefices, suspending the rights of the patrons. It was said that the incomes thus drawn from England by foreign and non-resident ecclesiastics amounted to 50,000 marks. An association was formed, headed by a knight, Sir Robert de Twenge (q.v.), which took the law into its own hands, harried the papal collectors, and drove them from the kingdom. Innocent IV offered Henry III the kingdom of the Two Sicilies for his second son Edmund, and Henry III did his best to induce England to pay the expenses of the war necessary to gain possession of this disputed heritage. The laity refused to pay; but the clergy suffered from every device which the papal ingenuity could frame. Hence clerical discontent was a strong element in the Barons' War, and the nation generally looked upon the pope as a foreign intruder.

The great king Edward I had to face a resolute pope in Boniface VIII, who aimed at making the papacy the centre of the international relations of Europe. By the bull Clericis laicos (q.v.), Boniface VIII forbade the taxing of the clergy except by his consent. The convocation in 1297 pleaded the pope's prohibition against a heavy demand for money made by the king. Edward I replied by outlawing those who refused to pay, and the clergy were driven to make composition with the royal officers. Soon afterwards, however, Edward I was glad to employ Boniface VIII as arbitrator in an untimely difference between himself and the French king. Boniface VIII, wishing to extend his influence, encouraged the Scots to appeal to him as judge between them and Edward I. Edward, to avoid a personal quarrel with the pope, laid his letter before parliament at Lincoln in 1301. The barons replied that the kings of England had never pleaded, nor been bound to plead, concerning their temporal rights before any judge, ecclesiastical or secular; their subjects would not permit them to do so. Boniface VIII was engaged in a contest with the French king, which ended in his defeat, and led to the establishment of the papacy at Avignon. The feeble Edward II was ready to use Pope John XXII as the means of procuring a truce with Scotland; but the fortunes of war had changed after Bannockburn, and it was now the turn of the Scots to refuse the papal mediation.

The French war under Edward III increased the English resistance to papal exactions, which under the Avignonese popes grew heavier and heavier. The popes at Avignon were thought to be on the French side, and England would not see her money carried to her foes. In 1343 the agents of two cardinals who held preferment in England were driven from the land. In 1351 was passed the Statute of Provisors (q.v.), which enacted that if the pope appointed to a benefice the presentation for that time was to fall to the king, and the papal nominees were liable to imprisonment till they had renounced their claims. To avoid the conflict of jurisdiction between the royal courts and the papal courts, the Statute of Præmunire (q.v.) in 1353 forbade the withdrawal of suits from the king's court to any foreign court. In 1366 Pope Urban V demanded arrears for the last thirty-three years of the tribute of 1,000 marks which John had agreed to pay to the papacy. The prelates were foremost in giving their opinion that John had no power to bind the nation to another power without its consent. Lords and Commons together resolved that they would resist to the utmost the pope's claim. Urban V withdrew in silence, and the papal suzerainty over England was never again revived.

The spirit of resistance to the papacy was expressed in the teaching of Wyclif, who began his career as an ardent supporter of the English Church against the pope. When he passed into the region of doctrine Pope Gregory XI issued bulls ordering his trial; but Wyclif was not personally condemned. The great schism in the papacy led to an increase in papal expenditure and papal exactions, especially under Boniface IX. But the spirit of England and the Statutes of Provisors and Præmunire were strong enough to offer determined resistance. In 1391 Boniface IX annulled the statutes by a bull, and proceeded to issue provisions which the English courts refused to recognize. Parliament at the same time asserted that they would not recognize the pope's power of excommunication if it were directed against any who were simply upholding the rights of the Crown. At the same time a more stringent statute against provisors was passed. The schism in the papacy greatly diminished the papal power, and led to many efforts to heal it. Ultimately, in the Council of Constance the rival popes were deposed or resigned, and in the vacancy of the papal office there was an opportunity for reforming abuses in the ecclesiastical system. The Emperor Sigismund was desirous of reform, and at first Henry V of England promised his aid. But the difficulties of harmonious working in the council were so great that Henry V deserted Sigismund, and joined those who thought that a new election to the papacy was a necessary prelude to reform. Henry Beaufort, Bishop of Winchester, the king's uncle, was called to Constance, to mediate between the contending parties. By his good offices arrangements were made for the election which ended in the choice of Martin V (1418), who showed his gratitude by raising Henry Beaufort to the dignity of cardinal. It shows the weakness of the government under Henry VI, that Beaufort was allowed to hold this dignity together with his bishopric. Up to this time English bishops had been compelled to resign their sees on accepting the cardinalate. Moreover, Beaufort was nominated papal legate against the Hussites. He raised troops in England, and led an expedition. Archbishop Chichele was weak and timid. Martin V ordered him to procure the repeal of the Statute of Præmunire, and when he pleaded his inability, suspended him from his office as legate. In 1428 Chichele was driven to beg the Commons to repeal the Statute of Præmunire; but weak as was the government, the Commons refused. Martin V humiliated the English episcopate, but gained nothing for himself.

The next relations of the papacy with England were purely political, arising from the pope's position in the politics of Italy. In 1489 Henry VII of England joined the league which was formed by Pope Alexander VI against the French, in consequence of Charles VIII's invasion of Italy. Similarly in 1512 Henry VIII joined the Holy League which Julius II formed against France. Julius II promised to transfer to him the title of "most Christian King," which had hitherto belonged to the French monarch. The transfer was not made, but a few years later Henry VIII was satisfied with the title of "Defender of the Faith," granted to him by Leo X in return for a treatise against Martin Luther. Henry VIII's great minister, Wolsey, became a cardinal, aspired to the papacy, and entertained projects for a reform of the Church. But Henry VIII's desire for a divorce from his wife, Katharine of Aragon, led to a collision with the papacy. Henry demanded that the pope should annul, or declare to be invalid from the first, the dispensation by virtue of which he had married his brother's widow. Clement VII temporized, and even endeavoured to procure Katharine's consent. He committed the cause to Wolsey and Campeggio as legates, and then revoked it to his own court. Henry VIII had gone too far to recede. Wolsey was declared liable to the penalties of Præmunire for having exercised the authority of legate. The clergy were by a legal quibble involved in the same penalty, and only escaped by admitting the royal supremacy. Henry VIII hoped to intimidate the pope; but Clement VII dared not give way. In 1533 the royal supremacy was established by act of parliament, and all direct relations with the court of Rome were suspended. In 1537 Pole was made legate north of the Alps, with a view to influence English affairs; but Henry VIII proclaimed him a traitor, and Pole was obliged to return from Flanders. Under Mary, in 1554, Pole was received as papal legate in England, and all acts of parliament against the pope's jurisdiction were repealed. Pope Paul IV was injudicious enough to urge upon Mary and Pole the impossible work of restoring the possessions of the Church. On Mary's death he showed such an implacable spirit towards Elizabeth that she felt that Anne Boleyn's daughter could not be reconciled to the Roman Church. In 1559 the royal supremacy was restored, and there was never again a question of its abolition. England drifted farther and farther from the papacy, and in 1571 Pius V excommunicated Elizabeth.

The marriage of Charles I to Henrietta Maria renewed to some degree diplomatic intercourse with the pope. Papal messengers were sent to England, and the queen had a representative at Rome. Charles I wished to confirm his claims to the allegiance of his Catholic subjects; and his proceedings were viewed by the Puritans with growing displeasure. The talk of union between the Church of England and the Church of Rome was one cause of popular discontent. Under Charles II and James II these relations were again renewed, with the result of accentuating more clearly the Protestantism of England by the Act of Settlement, 1701 (q.v.), which secured the Protestant succession. From this period relations with the papacy became regulated by the ordinary exigencies of diplomacy. During the Napoleonic war England took the part of Pius VII and restored to him the Papal States, of which he had been violently dispossessed. The last act of hostility towards the papacy was the Ecclesiastical Titles Act of

1851, which regarded as papal aggression the appointment of Roman Catholic bishops with territorial designations. [In 1914 British diplomatic relations with the papacy, which had officially lapsed since the days of Elizabeth, were resumed by the appointment of Sir Henry Howard at the Vatican.]

Paper Duties, REPEAL OF THE, was proposed in 1860 by Gladstone, partly to remove a "tax on knowledge." It was opposed on financial and other grounds, but the money bill embodying it passed the Commons and then was rejected in the Lords. The House of Commons then passed resolutions reasserting its own exclusive claim to grant supplies or limit them, and deprecating the Lords' interference, for which, however, it admitted that precedents existed. Next year the repeal was again proposed and the whole of the budget was included in one bill, a course which, since the Lords cannot (under a Commons resolution of 1678) amend money bills, left them the alternative of accepting the repeal or rejecting the whole budget. They therefore gave way. This practice of inclusion, for which there were a few precedents, has been regularly followed since. [PARLIAMENT.]

Papineau, LOUIS JOSEPH (1786-1871), was a leader of the French-Canadian party of Lower Canada, and one of the chief movers of the petitions to the home government setting forth the grievances of the National party. He was elected a member for the city of Montreal in 1811, and became Speaker of the assembly. On the outbreak of the riots in 1837 the government attempted to arrest him; but he fled to the United States, returning on the amnesty in 1847, and sitting in the Canadian parliament till his death in 1871.

Papua, or the Territory of the Commonwealth of Australia (q.v.), also called British New Guinea, is the south-eastern part of the island of New Guinea. The island was first sighted by de Meneses (1526) and de Saavedra (1528), while in 1606 Torres discovered the strait named after himself which separates it from Australia. The Portuguese and Dutch traded, but did not open up the island to Europeans. In spite of visits to the coast by Roda, Torres, Tasman, Dampier, Bougainville, Forrest, and Cook, it was not annexed until 1793 by two East India Company commanders. The Dutch, Germans, and English had partly colonized and divided the island into three by 1909. The German colony (the Territory of New Guinea) is now a mandated territory of the Commonwealth of Australia. Papua was annexed to Queensland in 1883, but the annexation was revoked by the British government, who, however, reannexed it in 1884, coming to an agreement with Germany. Papua was subsidized by the three eastern states of Australia until 1888, when it was made a Crown colony with a lieutenant-governor, executive and legislative councils, and a native regulation board to give advice. By the Papua Act of 1905 the Commonwealth of Australia accepted Papua on the terms of the permissive letters patent of 1902, and now administers the territory, which comprises also the islands of Trobriand, Woodlark, D'Entrecasteaux, and Louisiade groups. Native labour is largely skilled, and state regulation ensures a very fair economic justice.

Paris, MATTHEW (d. c. 1259), was a Benedictine monk of the abbey of St. Albans. He was a man of great accomplishments, and is specially notable as an historian. He wrote a work called "Chronica Majora," which is a continuation of the "History" of Roger of Wendover from the year 1235. He also wrote "Historia Anglorum (Historia Minor)," which extends from 1067 to 1253, and the "Lives of the Abbots of St. Albans." He is supposed also to have written the early part of the abridgment of the "Historia Major" called "Flores Historiarum," and attributed to Matthew of Westminster. Matthew Paris is the greatest of our mediæval chroniclers, and his works are by far the most important authorities for the first half of the thirteenth century.

Editions of the "Chronica Majora" and "Historia Minor" are published in the Rolls Series; "Chronica Majora" were first printed in 1571. There is a translation of the "Historia Anglorum" in "Bohn's Antiquarian Library."

Paris, THE DECLARATION OF (1856), was an important declaration relating to international law put forward by the Congress of Paris after the close of the Crimean War. The powers represented agreed to three points of international law: (1) Privateering should be abolished, (2) The neutral flag covered even enemy goods, contraband of war excepted, (3) Blockades in order to be respected must be effective, that is, maintained by a force sufficient to prevent access to the enemy coast. The United States government agreed to the second and third of these points, but not to the first.

Paris, TREATIES OF. Treaties involving this country have been concluded in Paris on the following important occasions:

(1) 1259, between Henry III of England and Louis IX of France. [ABBEVILLE.]

(2) May 31, 1727, between Great Britain, France, Holland, and the Empire. This treaty, a preliminary to a general pacification, averted the danger of a European war which had been raised by the treaties of Vienna and Hanover.

(3) February 1763, between Great Britain,

France, and Spain. This treaty closed the Seven Years' War. Negotiations had been opened in 1761, but broken off by Pitt at the news of the third Family Compact (q.v.). By the treaty France ceded to Great Britain, Nova Scotia, Canada, Cape Breton Island, Grenada, St. Vincent, Dominica, Tobago, Senegal, and Minorca. Spain ceded to Great Britain fishing rights off Newfoundland, the right to cut logwood in Honduras, and Florida (for which last she was secretly compensated by France with Louisiana). Great Britain ceded fishing rights off Newfoundland to France, together with San Pierre and Miquelon (which were not to be fortified), Belle Isle, Guadeloupe, Martinique, Goree, and certain towns in India held since 1749. British cessions to Spain consisted of Cuba and the Philippines.

(4) September 1783. [VERSAILLES.]

(5) May 1814, between the powers comprising the Fourth Coalition and France. It consisted of seven separate treaties, signed by the individual powers after Napoleon's abdication and banishment to Elba. Its terms were moderate. France received the territorial frontiers of 1792, with strategical additions in part of Savoy and Lorraine. She received back all her colonies except Mauritius and the West Indian Islands. But Great Britain retained Malta, and France was restricted in India to commercial privileges only. No war-indemnity was imposed, nor was any order made for the restoration of art-treasures carried off by Napoleon.

(6) November 20, 1815, concluded the Napoleonic Wars after the Waterloo campaign, and was far more severe than the treaty of the previous year. It restricted France to the boundaries of 1790 (Prussia received part of Alsace, Sardinia part of Piedmont, the Netherlands certain regions in the north); imposed an indemnity of 700 million francs; banished Napoleon to St. Helena; ordered the restoration of art-treasures; and established an allied army of occupation (150,000 troops) for five years, to be maintained by France.

(7) March 30, 1856, between Great Britain, France, Turkey, and Sardinia on the one side, and Russia on the other, closed the Crimean War. The independence and integrity of the Ottoman Empire were guaranteed by the powers; toleration was decreed to the Christian subjects of the Porte; the Black Sea was neutralized, demilitarized, and declared open to all merchantmen but not to warships; Kars was restored to the Porte and the Crimea to Russia; the navigation of the Danube was to be free to all nations and controlled by an international commission; Bessarabia was ceded by Russia to Moldavia, and Moldavia and Wallachia were to remain under the suzerainty of the Porte, each with its own autonomous convention; and the liberties of Serbia were similarly guaranteed. By a separate treaty Great Britain, France, and Austria guaranteed Ottoman integrity; while a separate convention between the six powers and the Sultan declared the Bosphorus and Dardanelles closed to warships as long as the Porte was at peace.

(8) March 3, 1857, between Great Britain and Persia, provided that Persia should renounce all claim or dominion over Herat and Afghanistan and refer future differences with the Afghan states to the friendly offices of the British government. This treaty also abolished the slave trade in the Persian Gulf.

Parish is derived from the Greek παροικία, and means primarily the district assigned to a particular church. In early times the bishoprics were small and the spiritual care of each town or district was in the hands of the bishop, but with the spread of Christianity and the development of the importance of the episcopate it became usual to assign special districts within the diocese to the care of a single presbyter under the bishop's supervision. By the ninth or tenth century at latest this parochial system became universal, but it had been gradually growing up long before that time. In England the original missionaries were monks, who were organized together by their dependence on the bishop, but it soon became an evidence of piety for the lord of a district to build and endow a church on it, in return for which he seems to have acquired the right of nominating the minister, who gradually obtained the disposal of the tithe, which originally had been administered by the bishop. Archbishop Theodore of Tarsus gave an impetus to the development of the parochial system in England, by encouraging the increase of the number of resident priests both in the country and in the town, and Bæda urged strongly on Archbishop Egbert the importance of the work. Ultimately the whole of England, with insignificant exceptions, was divided into parishes, which were usually, though not necessarily, coterminous with the township or manor, though in many cases the township was too small to require a priest and church of its own, so that some parishes contained several townships, and sometimes the boundaries of parishes and townships even overlapped. Still, as a whole, the parish became little more than the township in its ecclesiastical aspect, and as the old English local system became obsolete, the parish encroached, so to say, upon the township. In modern times the parish suggests civil quite as much as ecclesiastical jurisdiction. The parish after the Reformation became for many purposes the unit of local government. The parish vestry, originally an ecclesiastical assembly of all the inhabitants, became a civil court that acquired some of the slender functions of the townshipmoot; the churchwardens and overseers, its officers, became in a sense civil as well as ecclesiastical officers. By the Local Government Act of 1894, however [LOCAL GOVERNMENT ACTS], the churchwardens were deprived of their civil functions. In rural districts the civil duties of the vestry were transferred to the parish councils, while in the urban areas all but an insignificant residue passed to the urban councils. In 1921, by the Parochial Church Councils (Powers) Measure, ecclesiastical parish councils were established to which were transferred most of the powers relating to the affairs of the church which were formerly enjoyed by the vestry.

Besides civil parishes, as old parishes are called, the Church Building Act of 1818 permits the establishment of new ecclesiastical parishes or districts, which, independent in ecclesiastical matters, remain for civil purposes part of the mother parish.

Parisi, THE, were an ancient Celtic tribe occupying roughly the south-eastern portion of the present county of York.

Parker, SIR HYDE (1739-1807), entered the navy at an early age, and was made a post-captain in 1763. He distinguished himself during the American War, and captured Savannah in 1779. He took part in the relief of Gibraltar in 1782, and in the operations before Toulon in 1794. In 1801 he was appointed to the chief command of the expedition to Copenhagen, with Nelson as his second. The actual command of the fleet which was in action at the battle of Copenhagen was taken by the latter.

Parker, MATTHEW (1504-75), Archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Norwich and educated at Cambridge, where he attained great celebrity as a scholar and a theologian. He became famous as a preacher, and was appointed chaplain to Henry VIII, and in 1552 dean of Lincoln, but, having distinguished himself by his zealous advocacy of the Reformation, narrowly escaped martyrdom during the Marian persecution. His sound judgment caused him to be singled out by Elizabeth for the primacy, which he accepted much against his will, being consecrated at Lambeth by Barlow, late Bishop of Bath and Wells; Hodgkins, suffragan Bishop of Bedford; Miles Coverdale, late Bishop of Exeter; and John Scory, late Bishop of Chichester (December 17, 1559). From this time the history of Archbishop Parker is that of the Church of England. On several occasions the archbishop found himself brought into collision with Elizabeth, especially on the subject of the marriage of the clergy, which he favoured. He took an important part in the translation of the Bishops' Bible (1563-8), and in his revision of the Thirty-nine Articles showed much good sense. Parker was the author of the famous "Advertisements of Queen Elizabeth" (1565), which formed a book of discipline for the clergy, and the enforcement of which has earned for their author the obloquy of the Puritanical party and the reproach of having been a persecutor. In 1575 the archbishop died, having during the whole tenure of his office followed the consistent policy of maintaining ecclesiastical affairs as they had been left by Edward VI. In theology he was Calvinistic, but in matters of ecclesiastical government he was altogether opposed both to the Catholics and the Puritans, and anxious, with due prudence and circumspection, to obtain uniformity in the English Church. Parker was a student of English antiquities and early history. He wrote a work, "De Antiquitate Britannicæ Ecclesiæ" (1572), and edited Matthew Paris in 1571.

Parker's "Works" have been published by the Parker Society, established 1840. Biography by W. M. Kennedy, 1908.

Parker, SAMUEL (1640-88), Bishop of Oxford, was the son of John Parker, a baron of the Exchequer. At the Restoration he forsook the Puritan party, to which he had belonged, and made himself conspicuous by his bitter attacks on Puritanism. He was consecrated Bishop of Oxford in 1686, and next year was forcibly intruded into the office of president of Magdalen College. He died shortly after this, leaving the reputation of a voluminous and acute writer, and a dishonest man. He left an historical work, "De Rebus sui Temporis," published in 1727.

Parkhurst, JOHN (1512?-1575), Bishop of Norwich, the tutor of Bishop Jewel, was one of the most earnest of the reformers of Edward VI's reign, and was in consequence obliged to take refuge at Zürich during the Marian persecution. On the accession of Elizabeth he returned to England and became Bishop of Norwich (1560). Parkhurst was a supporter of the Nonconformists, and a vehement opponent of persecution.

Parkyns, SIR WILLIAM (1649?-1696), was a lawyer and a Jacobite conspirator, chiefly notorious for his share in the Assassination Plot (q.v.). He had been one of the most violent opponents of the Exclusion Bill, and had supported James II to the last. After the Revolution, however, he swore allegiance to William. He did not take a very active share in the Assassination Plot (1696), owing to infirmity. His chief duty was to provide arms for the conspirators. Large quantities were seized at his house on the detection of the plot. He was tried and condemned to death (March 24). A committee of the Commons went to interrogate him at Newgate, but he refused to betray his accomplices.

Parliament. The fundamental notion that has always upheld the office and action of parliament in the constitution, and has been professedly the guiding principle of all dealings with it on the part of the Crown, is that it is the realm of England in little, embracing in its conception all the separate parts which united make the great English nation. Every capacity, every political virtue inherent in the whole nation, is inherent in it. The history of the institution, taken apart from its origin, is usually held to begin with November 27, 1295. On that day the first assembly whose full parliamentary character is uncontroverted met at Westminster; but the word parliament—which translates colloquium, means a talking, and came to us from Italy—had been already in frequent use; it was given, for instance, to the peculiarly constituted meetings that the Provisions of Oxford determined should be held three times a year. Its earliest recorded application to a national assembly is found under the year 1246, and even after 1295 mere councils were now and then called by the name. Parliament, in the words of Stubbs, is “the concentration of all the constituents of the shiremoots in a central assembly.” They contained in their ultimate form the great folk, clerical and lay, the freeholders, and representatives of the townships and municipalities of the several shires. Parliament contains practically the same component parts of the nation, and the kinship of the humbler with the grander institution is seen in the use for centuries of the sheriffs and county courts (q.v.) in parliamentary elections. Through the sheriffs the whole electoral machinery was set in motion: at the county courts the elections of knights of the shire were made, and to them those of citizens and burgesses were reported. The county court, too, had long been the chief depository of the principle of representation; when the need arose its merit as a model for the great representative body could hardly be missed. But the historic parliament is something more than the express essence of all the county courts in the kingdom; it is an assembly that is an image of the people, not as an undivided whole, but as split up into separate interests. The clergy, the baronage, and the commons had all to be in it, united yet distinct, to make it a full parliament. Now the higher clergy and the baronage had always been in the national council; the lower clergy and the commons had only to be added, and the work would be done. The process of adding those took some time, and but for the strong motive that kept driving on the king to its accomplishment, might have taken much longer. Personal property or “movables” had become subject to taxation; the methods of getting the necessary consents, expressed or constructive, which the pre-parliamentary regime obliged the king to resort to, were complicated and tedious, and the need of a simple and swifter method was strongly felt. Accordingly we find several assemblies before Edward I’s time which contained one or more of the parliamentary elements that were still wanting, but which still lacked something to make them perfect. In 1213 two such were summoned, one with chosen men of the towns in it, to St. Albans; the other, with chosen men of the shires in it, to Oxford. In 1254 the sheriffs were directed to see that their several shires returned two knights each to settle what aid they were willing to give the king. During the years that follow similar instances are found; but in none were citizens and burgesses combined with knights of the shire till the meeting in January 1265 of the renowned parliament called at the instance of Simon de Montfort. This contained 117 dignified churchmen, 23 lay nobles, two men summoned from each shire through the sheriff, and two men summoned from certain cities and boroughs, but not through the sheriff. This, however, was not primarily and essentially a constitutional assembly. It was merely a parliamentary assembly of the supporters of the existing government. Consequently it is impossible to see in it the first parliament of the modern type. During the next thirty years there was no lack of assemblies that got the name of parliaments, in which the commonalty is recorded to have been present. In 1275, at the “famous and solemn” assembly held at Westminster, both shires and boroughs were represented, the only missing constituents of the “Model Parliament” being the lesser clergy. Under 1282 we read of provincial parliaments, one at York and one at Northampton, both representative of the lower clergy and lay commons—who, however, sat apart from each other—but without the lay nobility. A general tax was their object, in which fact we have a proof of the close connexion between taxation and the birth of representative government. A parliamentary gathering at Acton Burnel in 1283 is a good example of those unfinished parliaments. It contained no clergy, and representatives of only twenty-one cities and boroughs; and its business was to see David of Wales tried for his life. Others, equally imperfect, succeeded. At last the troubles that crowded in upon Edward I in 1295 persuaded him to throw himself upon his whole people. In October he issued writs for an assembly which should be a complete image of the nation. On November 27 this assembly met, and in it historians discern all the component parts and type of a finished parliament. It was composed of 97 bishops, abbots, and priors, 65 earls and barons, 39 judges and others, representatives of the lower clergy, summoned through their dioceses, and representatives of the counties, cities, and boroughs summoned through the sheriff. Every section of the population that had political rights was in it, in person or by proxy.

This fully developed parliament did not at once fall into the exercise of all the powers belonging to the body of which it was the expansion. One of them, indeed, the judicial, it has taken care never to assume. Taxation was at first the sole business that all its parts had in common, but time and circumstance soon brought rights and privileges. By slow degrees legislation and general political deliberations came to be classed among its powers. All its parts, however, did not advance towards these with equal speed; those which have since far outstripped the others moved but timidly at first. For a time, also, the several parts held aloof from one another, and even when the pairing process began, the tendency was towards the combination of the barons and knights of the shire into one body, the citizens and burghesses into another, while the clergy made a third. But this did not go far; within little more than a generation the clerical and lay baronages had coalesced into the joint estate of the lords spiritual and temporal, and all the lay representatives into the estate of the commons; and within little more than fifty years the lower clergy, preferring to tax themselves in convocation, had fallen away altogether. From this time parliament grew steadily in importance, and in a few generations was firmly rooted in the constitution. It had become indispensable to the legal transaction of the greater affairs of state. During mediæval times it was, except at rare and brief intervals, convoked often and regularly, and not seldom to provincial towns; its influence was felt in every department of government; it occasionally curbed the king's will; its members had become privileged, and a system of rules—a whole code of laws, in fact—had grown up to guide its conduct and prescribe its procedure. From the time of Edward III it is undoubted that no tax could be levied, and (in secular matters at least) no law be made that had not originated in and been sanctioned by parliament. Throughout the Tudor period it kept all its powers unimpaired, though in exercising them it was moved by special causes to submit for a time to the dictation of the Crown. In Elizabeth's days it began to recover its independence, and under the early Stuarts it entered upon a course of action which developed into a struggle for supremacy in the state. This it pursued so doggedly that it measured its strength with the Crown and overthrew it, but only to be itself overthrown by one of its own soldiers. Restored with the monarchy, it again drifted into a less violent conflict with its former antagonist, and at the Revolution it secured its supremacy; and it has since become the one all-important political power.

The powers and exemptions, known as Privilege of Parliament, which both Houses enjoy in common, are of two kinds—those that belong to the Houses in their corporate capacity, and those that belong to individual members. Of the former the most vital are freedom of speech, liberty of access to the presence of the sovereign, that the sovereign should not notice anything said or done in parliament, save on the report of the House, and the power of committing for contempt. Of the latter class the most valuable is exemption of members from arrest when going to, attending, or returning from parliament, except on a charge of treason or felony, or a refusal to give surety of the peace. Once these privileges were far more extensive. But legislation has removed the area of their personal privilege to the one immunity given above.

Parliament Act, THE (1911), which deprived the House of Lords of its veto on legislation, was passed as the result of a heated struggle between Lords and Commons. The Lords had always acted as a brake on the legislation of the Commons, but in the years preceding 1910 several bills important in the eyes of the Liberal government had been vetoed by the Lords, among them one for lowering the number of superfluous public-houses (1908). The climax came when the budget of 1909 met the same fate. The Liberals went to the country, enraged at what seemed an attack on the Commons' initiative in taxation, and were returned in 1910 with a majority of two and the support of the Labour Party and the Irish Nationalists. The Conservatives urged a referendum on the question, to which (early in the new reign) the Liberals replied by a bill abolishing the Lords' veto. This bill was thrown out by the Lords. A second general election was accordingly held, and the Liberals returned again with a majority of one, and the same Labour and Irish Nationalist support. Mr. Asquith resolved, and King George V agreed, to create new peers if necessary to pass the bill (as had been threatened at the time of the first Reform Bill in 1832). Under this threat the Lords passed the Parliament Bill by a majority of 17 (August 18, 1911). The Commons became the sovereign power in the State. The question of reforming the House of Lords and giving it a more representative character was shelved.

Under the Parliament Act money bills passed by the Commons were to become law if sent up to the Lords at least a month before the end of a session and not passed by them within a month; public bills (other than money bills) were to become law if passed by the Commons in three successive sessions and sent up to the Lords at least one month before the close of each session, the words of enactment being modified in every such case to meet the circumstances; and five years was substituted for seven years (see Septennial Act, 1715) as the maximum duration of a parliament. Parnell, CHARLES STEWART (1846-91), was born at Avondale, co. Wicklow, and educated at Magdalene College, Cambridge. He took no interest in the Fenian movement of 1865-7, and did not begin to study Irish politics seriously until 1874, but he was profoundly moved by the "Manchester Murders" of 1869. Elected member of parliament for Meath (April 19, 1875) after failing at Dublin, he entered upon a policy of parliamentary obstruction which on one occasion (July 31, 1877) kept the House sitting continuously for 26 hours. By April 1880 he was accepted as the leader of the Irish Home Rule Party in succession to Isaac Butt (q.v.), having succeeded in 1878 in uniting all the Irish parties hostile to English rule (including the Fenians under Davitt and Devoy) in favour of constitutional methods of agitation, and having become president of the Land League, aiming at reducing rack rents and at transferring ownership of land to the occupiers. The Land League was suppressed in November 1880 on account of violence, to avoid which Parnell had instituted a policy of boycotting hostile landlords; and in October 1881, after an abortive prosecution in the spring, Parnell was imprisoned in Kilmainham Jail under the Crimes Act of 1881. Subsequently released by the "Kilmainham Treaty" (q.v.), he became president of the National League in 1882. But the conciliatory policy of the government was checked by the Phoenix Park murders (q.v.), and in 1885, in view of the renewal of the Crimes Act, Parnell definitely broke with the Liberals and negotiated with Lord Carnarvon [HERBERT]. On Gladstone's introduction of the first Home Rule Bill on April 8, 1886, however, Parnell again supported the government. The next three years were occupied by the investigation of the Pigott forgeries [PARNELL COMMISSION], which had sought to implicate Parnell in the Phoenix Park murders (the first letter appeared in The Times on April 18, 1887, and the inquiry concluded on November 22, 1889, after Richard Pigott had committed suicide in Spain). This scare was followed in 1890 by the O'Shea divorce case, in which Parnell, who had first met Katharine O'Shea in 1880, was cited as co-respondent. He subsequently married Mrs. O'Shea, but the majority of his party, led by its Nonconformist members, abandoned him and elected Justin MacCarthy leader in his place. He died a broken man on October 6, 1891.

Parnell, HENRY BROOKE, LORD CONGLETON (1776-1842), was the second son of Sir John Parnell, chancellor of the exchequer in Ireland. His elder brother being born a cripple without the use of speech, the estates were settled upon Henry by a special act of parliament, 1789. He entered parliament in 1802 as member for Portarlington. He devoted himself, especially during his parliamentary career, to the questions of the corn law reform and Catholic relief, and soon became prominent as a champion in the opposition. He also published several pamphlets of some weight on these questions. He was chairman of the finance committee in the session of 1828. His motion, in 1830, with regard to the civil list, on which the ministry was outvoted, produced the downfall of the Wellington administration (November 15). He afterwards sat for Queen's County for twenty-seven years, and subsequently represented Dundee, being created a peer August 20, 1841. He died by his own hand, June 1842.

Parnell Commission, THE. On April 18, 1887, The Times published in facsimile a letter purporting to have been written by Charles Stewart Parnell in 1882 in extenuation of the Phoenix Park murders. [IRELAND.] An attempt to obtain an inquiry broke down in the House of Commons, and the subject was only revived in July 1888 by an action for libel against The Times brought by F. H. O'Donnell, a Nationalist M.P., in which the defendants pleaded justification and published other similar letters. A special commission of three judges was then appointed to inquire into the charges made against sixty-four Irish members of parliament and Michael Davitt. Features of the case were the evidences of Irish outrages; the testimony of the spy, Major le Caron; the breakdown in cross-examination of Richard Pigott, a Nationalist journalist who confessed he had supplied the alleged letters to The Times, and his flight and suicide at Madrid; Parnell's evidence and the retirement of his counsel from the case after the judges refused to order the production of the books of a Unionist society alleged to have subsidized Pigott. The commission reported on February 13, 1890, acquitting Parnell of complicity with or sympathy for the Phoenix Park murders, and the defendants generally of organizing outrages, but declaring them guilty of counselling intimidation and of extenuating agrarian crime.

Parr, WILLIAM, MARQUIS OF NORTHAMPTON AND EARL OF ESSEX (1513-71), the brother of Queen Catherine Parr, was named one of the councillors appointed under the will of Henry VIII in 1547, to assist the executors in the government during the minority of Edward VI. During the rebellion in Norfolk, in 1549, he was for part of the time in command of the royal troops, but owing to his incapacity was superseded by Dudley. On the accession of Mary he was sent to the Tower for the support which he had accorded to Northumberland, but was subsequently pardoned. In 1554 Northampton was implicated in Wyatt's rebellion, and was again imprisoned, but was shortly afterwards released, and in 1558 became one of Elizabeth's councillors.

Parry, DR. WILLIAM (d. 1585), was a Welshman employed by Burghley to reside abroad and act as a spy on the English exiles. On his return home in 1580 he had frequent interviews with the queen, disclosing various designs on her life. In 1584, having violently opposed in parliament the act against the Jesuits, he was expelled from the House, and imprisoned for a short time, but released by the queen's orders. He was shortly afterwards denounced as having formed a scheme to assassinate the queen, and was executed for treason at Tyburn (March 1585). Doubt still exists, however, as to his guilt.

Parsons, ROBERT (1546-1610), "a subtle and lying Jesuit," was born in Somerset, and educated at Oxford, where he became a fellow of Balliol. Being compelled to quit England on a charge of embezzling the college money, Parsons went to Rome, and joined the Jesuits. In June 1580 he visited England in company with Edmund Campion (q.v.). A very severe statute against those who harboured or concealed Jesuits was passed by parliament (January 1581). So active was the search after the two missionaries that Parsons was compelled to return to the continent. He then went to Scotland for the purpose of undermining the English influence there; and in 1582 met the Duke of Guise at Paris, where he arranged the plan associating Mary and James in the government of Scotland, and went to Spain to procure assistance from Philip II. His schemes were, however, frustrated by the prompt measures of Elizabeth's ministers, and by the Raid of Ruthven (q.v.). In 1594 he published, under the name of Doleman, his famous "Conference about the Next Succession to the Crown of England," dedicated to Essex, in which he set forth the claims of the Infanta. He died in Rome.

Partition Treaties, THE (1698 and 1700), were an attempt to settle from outside the complex question of the Spanish Succession on the death of the king, Charles II. The first treaty (October 11, 1698) proposed to confer the greater part of the Spanish dominions on the least powerful of the candidates, the Electoral Prince of Bavaria. The first overtures were made by Louis XIV, and in consequence Marshal Tallard was sent to London in April, and the first rough form of the division was broached. In August, Louis, still hoping to secure the whole of the Spanish dominions for one of his grandsons, was inclined to break off the negotiations, but was dissuaded by Tallard. The departure of William III for Holland, where it was feared that he might form a union with the emperor, the Elector of Bavaria, and the chief Protestant princes against France, caused Louis to wish for a definite settlement. By the Treaty of Loo, as it is sometimes called, signed by the representatives of England, France, and Holland, France consented to resign all claims on Spain, the Indies, and the Netherlands in favour of Charles the electoral prince. The dauphin was to have the province of Guipuscoa, with Naples, Sicily, and some small Italian islands, which were part of the Spanish monarchy. Milan and Luxemburg were allotted to the Archduke Charles. As the electoral prince was still a child, it was agreed that his father, who was then viceroy of the Spanish Netherlands, should be regent of Spain during the minority. Unfortunately the electoral prince died of small-pox (February 1699), and no arrangement had been made to meet the contingency of his dying before succeeding to the throne. The second treaty (February 21 and March 15, 1700) was another attempt to settle the succession, consequent on the death of the Electoral Prince of Bavaria. This time the Archduke Charles of Austria was to be king of the greater part of the Spanish dominions (Spain, the Indies, and the Netherlands). France was to receive Guipuscoa, in the north of Spain, and the two Sicilies, together with Milan, which was to be exchanged for the Duchy of Lorraine. It was evident that Louis was insincere. Soon the Spanish minister, Portocarrero, and the French diplomatist, Harcourt, induced the dying King of Spain to make a new will declaring the Duke of Anjou, a son of the dauphin, heir to the whole of his dominions. The treaty was unpopular in England. In November the King of Spain died, and Louis, with complete disregard of treaties, accepted the Spanish inheritance for his grandson. The Tory House of Commons proceeded to impeach Portland, Oxford, Somers, and Montagu for their share in the treaties; but this resentment proved abortive, although in March 1701 both treaties were severely censured. The immediate result of the duplicity of Louis XIV was the formation of the Grand Alliance and the outbreak of the War of the Spanish Succession.

Passaro, THE BATTLE OF CAPE (August 11, 1718), resulted in the destruction of the Spanish fleet. Admiral Byng encountered the Spanish admiral, Castañeta, off Cape Passaro. The first shot was fired by some detached Spanish ships, and a general engagement ensued. Castañeta continued to cheer on his men, though wounded in both legs.

Patay, THE BATTLE OF (June 18, 1429), was fought after the raising of the siege of Orleans. The English army retired on Meung and Beaugency, but the latter town was captured by the French (June 17), and a pitched battle was fought next day at Patay, between Orleans and Brétigny, in which the English were defeated with heavy loss.

Patent Rolls, THE, contain accounts of all grants of offices, honours, and pensions, and particulars of individual and corporate privileges. The term patent was given to these rolls because they were delivered open, with the great seal affixed, and were supposed to be of a public nature and addressed to all the king's subjects. A Calendar to some of the Patent Rolls has been printed by the Record Commission.

Paterson, WILLIAM (1658 ?-1719), the founder of the Bank of England, was born in Dumfriesshire, and spent his early life in travelling in the West Indies. From Amsterdam he came to London after the Revolution of 1688, and in 1691 proposed the foundation of the Bank of England. His proposal was not immediately adopted, but he became acquainted with Montagu, who helped his scheme to achievement in 1694. Paterson became a director of the bank at a salary of £2,000, though he retired within a year and revived a former project outlined by him for planting a colony in Panama [DARIEN COMPANY]. After the failure of this scheme he returned to London, where William III frequently sought his advice on financial matters. [BANKING.]

Patrick, St. The career of the "Apostle of Ireland" is wrapped in obscurity. He was born about 387 or 389; according to some authorities at Kilpatrick, near Dumbarton in Scotland, according to others in Glamorgan. In his sixteenth year he was carried off by Irish marauders and sold as a slave. After six years he made his escape to Gaul, where he found a refuge in the monasteries of Lerins and Auxerre, coming under the influence of the great Bishop Germanus. After the failure of Palladius, Patrick was entrusted by Celestine I with the task of completing the evangelization of the Irish people, and was accordingly consecrated bishop. He landed in Wicklow, probably early in 433, and met with immediate success. He converted Loigaire, the ard ri of Tara, and, with his support, extended his activities throughout the north and west of Ireland. In the south his function seems to have been that of an organizer rather than of an innovator. His own foundation of Armagh he seems to have made the seat of the supreme ecclesiastical authority in Ireland. The date of his death has been variously given as 461 and 493. St. Patrick was not the first to carry Christianity to the Irish people. His importance in the history of the Church in Ireland consists in the fact that he organized the Christian communities already in existence, and planted the faith in such districts as remained unconverted. He established a connexion between Ireland and Rome, and thereby brought the Celtic peoples under the influence of Latin civilization.

Paulet, SIR AMIAS (1536 ?-1588), after being for some time the English ambassador at Paris, was created governor of Jersey, and in January 1585, owing to his stern Puritanism, was chosen to guard Mary, Queen of Scots, at Tutbury. At the close of the year he removed her to Chartley. He was insensible alike to Mary's charms and to her endeavours to win him over to her side. He was subsequently a commissioner at Mary's trial, and was present at her execution.

Paulet, SIR WILLIAM, MARQUIS OF WINCHESTER (1485 ?-1572), Lord St. John (1539), Earl of Wiltshire (1556), and Marquis of Winchester (1551), "the crafty fox with a fair countenance," was treasurer of the household to Henry VIII, and one of the judges at the trial of Anne Boleyn. By the will of the king he was appointed one of the council of regency, and became president of the council. As a firm supporter of the Protector Somerset, Paulet succeeded Wriothesley as lord keeper (March 7, 1547), but only held the office till October, when, owing to his incompetence as a judge, he was succeeded by Lord Chancellor Rich.

On Somerset's fall he joined the party of the Earl of Warwick and actually presided as lord high steward at the duke's trial in the year 1551, pronouncing sentence of death upon his benefactor. For some time he remained a supporter of Warwick, but his leaning towards the Catholic religion, together with the instinct of self-interest, gradually enlisted his sympathies on the side of the Princess Mary, though after her accession he continued in opposition to Gardiner and the persecuting party. At the age of eighty-four Lord Winchester obtained the position of lord high treasurer to Queen Elizabeth, an office which he held until his death.

Paulinus was one of the missionaries who came to reinforce Augustine in 601. In 625 he was sent to Northumbria as the chaplain of Ethelburga, the Kentish bride of King Edwin. Through his instrumentality Edwin was brought to Christianity in 626, and the Christian religion was accepted in Northumbria. He established his head-quarters at York, in accordance with the plan originally propounded by Pope Gregory to St. Augustine. The death of Edwin in 633, and the ravages of Penda of Mercia, compelled Paulinus to quit the kingdom and seek refuge in Canterbury. The see of Rochester being vacant, he was appointed to it, and held it until his death in 644. It is a moot point whether he should be considered the first Archbishop of York. He received the pall from Pope Honorius in 634, but it was not again conferred upon an occupant of the northern see until the middle of the eighth century.

T. Hodgkin, "Political History of England," vol. i.

Peace Preservation Act, THE (Ireland), was introduced on March 17, 1870, by Mr. Chichester Fortescue, in order to prevent outrages in Mayo, chiefly directed against cattle. By this act the use of firearms without a licence was forbidden, under heavy penalties, in any proclaimed district. The grand jury was also empowered to levy a cess on districts where outrages had been committed, to compensate the victims. Domiciliary visits were authorized, and persons loitering about at night might be seized by the police. In 1875 Sir Michael Hicks Beach asked for a continuance of this act, making it, however, less stringent. The Irish members in vain opposed it. The act was allowed to expire by Gladstone's government in 1880. [MEETING, RIGHT OF PUBLIC.]

Peada, King of Mercia 655-6, was the son and successor of Penda. He was only allowed by Oswy of Northumbria, his father-in-law, to hold the southern portion of Mercia. His reign is important as seeing the introduction of Christianity into Mercia. He was murdered in 656, whereupon Oswy annexed the entire realm.

Peasants' Revolt, The, of 1381.

This outbreak, the only spontaneous popular rising on a grand scale that our history presents, was as brief as it was fierce and general. It has several singular and one or two inexplicable features; many and varied causes contributed to it; many and varied interests engaged in it; a seemingly sudden and isolated outburst kindled into flame a dozen of shires with an approach to simultaneousness possible only to concert and organization; and after blazing furiously and in apparently irresistible might for a week or two, it sank into extinction as suddenly as it had risen.

[But if unity can be discerned in its organization, the causes of the rising were numerous and disconnected. The match was lit by the second Poll-tax, voted by parliament in November 1380. The incidence of the previous year's tax had been graduated according to the ability of the individual to bear the burden; now very little distinction was made between rich and poor, and the system of assessment was tightened up. The refusal of some of the people in South Essex to increase their contributions led to an inquiry and a riot at Brentwood, and the rebellion began. Disturbance followed the Poll-taxes only because the counties of the south-east of England were ripe for it. Political discontent already existed because the government had been unsuccessful in the war with France. Personal security was threatened not only by the highway robbers returned from service in the wars or fugitive from the land, but the coast towns were threatened by the privateers of the enemy. Finally the Poll-taxes, which an unpopular group of state officials were compelled to seek from parliament as an expedient to meet the war deficit, increased popular dissatisfaction with the government.]

But it is to economic rather than political quarrels that attention must chiefly be drawn. Where the Black Death (1348-9) (q.v.) had caused depopulation of the countryside, it produced tension in the relationship between the manorial lord and his labourers. On some manors the commutation of labour services for money rents had already proceeded far. The lord was therefore dependent to some extent upon hired labour, of which there was for some years a scarcity on account of the fall in population. The free peasant was at an advantage. He could either seek an opportunity of passing as a small-holder into a depopulated area, where the scant supply of labour forced the local lord to offer good terms to incoming tenants (an added inducement to flight, too, for villein tenants on manors where conditions were less favourable), or he could demand an increase of from 30 to 50 per cent. as a day labourer. As soon as the passing of the plague permitted administrative action the government attempted vigorous measures on behalf of the landlords against this new economic freedom of the wage-earning labourer [LABOURERS, STATUTES OF], striving to keep a check equally on rising prices and wages. Its success was not by any means complete, but the reactionary character of this legislation and the harshness of its execution exasperated the population in some of the country districts where the revolt was later to break out. So, too, in the towns the artisans offered resistance to the activities of the justices of labourers. Confederacies were formed to keep wages at the new level. The tenant in villenage, again, was apt to suffer inconvenience from the new conditions, where labour services as yet remained. While the death of members of his family diminished the supply of labour under his direction, the labour dues remained as before, and he felt the burden. For if, as is often stated, the population was reduced by one-half, the amount of work per man was actually doubled. Commutation was therefore desired by the tenant, but his wishes were often resisted by the lord, who could now get more value from service dues.

Both in town and country the labouring class had on the whole benefited from the economic disturbances, and with greater economic freedom and prosperity came the desire for an improvement in social status. There were revolts of villeins against the authority of the manorial courts, and conspiracies to claim freedom from serfdom. The fact that "the burden of services was heaviest in some half-dozen of the counties where the Peasants' Revolt was most violent is suggestive, and should be considered in connexion with contemporary peasant complaints about degrading labour" (H. L. Gray). According to M. Petit-Dutaillis, even the poorer clergy had their wages problem which disposed them to sympathize with the violent feelings of the working people and to assist in the erection of that widespread social philosophy of the dignity of labour which was summed up in the popular lines :

When Adam dalf and Eve span
Who was then a gentleman?

The revolt broke out in 1381 "because England was full of inflammable material and at the mercy of a spark." Wandering preachers like John Ball prepared this material. When the fire flamed out the action of the rebels turned to the rectification of local grievances, and this provides us with some notion of the various forms which these grievances assumed.

The people of Essex who rose first formed the core of the revolt. The clash of the insurgents with the justices at Brentwood led to the working up of excitement in London. A few days later the insurrection in Kent began. Here there was no villenage, but the evidence suggests that labour troubles were at the root of the discontent, together with resistance to the new taxation. The apocryphal story of the origination of the rebellion in Wat Tyler's revenge for an insult offered to his daughter by a tax collector thus points to one of the causes of disturbance. The Kentish rebels set prisoners at liberty, besieging Rochester Castle in order to free one who was alleged to be a serf. They proceeded to Canterbury, finding on the way a daring leader in Wat Tyler, who, says Froissart, had served at one time as a soldier in France. By June 13 half the countryside of south-east England was ablaze (for map showing the area of the revolt see Trevelyan, p. 254), and on this date Wat Tyler led his host into London, then entirely defenceless. The instinct of destruction was powerful in these men, and vented itself on everything connected with what they most hated. They wrecked John of Gaunt's palace of the Savoy and the house of the Hospitallers at Clerkenwell, destroyed Temple Bar, killed every lawyer they could find, and burnt every legal record they could lay their hands on. Then they occupied Tower Hill. The Flemings in London, who were peculiarly obnoxious to the industrial classes as foreign competitors, were slaughtered wherever they failed to escape from the mob. On the same day the men of Essex, who had first risen at Fobbing, and murdered the chief justice and jurors, appeared at Mile End, while the men of Hertfordshire took up their position at Highbury. These were chiefly rustics, indignant at present and prospective treatment. Yet their conduct was comparatively free from violence. They demanded (1) the abolition of villenage, (2) a general pardon, (3) liberty to buy and sell untolled in all fairs and markets, and (4) the fixing of the rent of their lands at fourpence an acre. Next day Richard left the Tower, met them at Mile End, listened to the tale of their grievances, promised them all they asked, and persuaded them to go home. During his absence the Kentish men burst into the Tower, flooded its rooms, insulted the king's mother, dragged out Simon of Sudbury, primate and chancellor, Sir Robert Hales, and Legge, the farmer of the poll-tax, and had their heads struck off on Tower Hill. The ensuing night Richard passed at the Wardrobe; and next morning (June 15) he encountered the rebels in Smithfield. There, while parleying with the king and wrangling with Sir Robert Newton, Tyler was suddenly smitten down by Walworth, the mayor, and slain by the king's followers. Richard's coolness and tact disarmed the rebels of the fury that rose within them at this deed; he put himself at their head, led them to Clerkenwell, and by granting the required liberating charter on the spot, induced them to march away home. Meantime most of the other southern and midland counties were in arms, the nobility and clergy retiring into their fortified houses and leaving the open country to the mercy of the rebels; and murderous deeds were done in many places. But the insurgents of Norfolk, Cambridge, and Huntingdon met a formidable antagonist in Henry Spencer, Bishop of Norwich, who sallied forth, and striking fiercely at their roving bands, broke them in pieces one by one, capturing, trying, and sending to the gallows their most active leaders, notably the formidable John Litster (q.v.), whom men called King of the Commons. Before these decisive measures and the news of the doings in London the insurrection quickly subsided. Then the work of vengeance began. The charters were revoked—indeed, the king had exceeded his prerogative in granting them—[and legal commissions passed the weeks which followed in harrying the most guilty areas, with such an excess of zeal that in some quarters rebellion broke out afresh. In September the terror slackened, and parliament, which met in November, recommended an amnesty. This was partially conceded.] Though the worst excesses of the revolt had been perpetrated by the political insurgents, these were gratified with a change of administration, while parliament refused the really aggrieved rustics the redress they had sought. [The old grievances remained, and from time to time afterwards outbreaks would recur which showed that rural society was still unsettled. This turbulent spirit “increased the influence of revolutionary ideas, and the spread of the Lollard heresy was greatly helped through the envy excited by the wealth of the clergy.” For a time those whose privileges had been attacked were careful to employ every means to secure themselves against further violence, but the process of commutation went on quietly, without being noticeably affected by the revolt.] [See COMMUTATION; BLACK DEATH; LABOURERS OF STATUTES.]

Peckham (or PECHAM), JOHN, Archbishop of Canterbury 1279–92, was provincial of the English Franciscans and a noted scholar, and on the resignation of Kilwardby was appointed to the archbishopric, on the nomination of Pope Nicholas III. As a friar, at a time when the friars had not lost their missionary spirit, Peckham looked upon himself as the agent of the pope in England, and had little sympathy with the national feelings. The greater part of his pontificate was occupied in disputes with the king, with the Archbishop of York, or with the monks of Canterbury. He was zealous in the correction of abuses in the Church, insisting with greater energy than discretion upon his visitatorial rights, and making a special effort to check pluralities. He was keenly interested in the condition of the Welsh Church, and was responsible for its reform and reorganization after the Edwardian conquest. Throughout his pontificate he lost no opportunity of advancing the interests of the Mendicant orders, and especially of his own order.

Pecock, REGINALD, said to have been born in Wales (c. 1395), was elected in 1417 fellow of Oriel College, ordained priest four years later, appointed in 1431 master of Whittington College in London, and became in 1444 Bishop of St. Asaph, and doctor of divinity.

Hist.—27

In 1450, on the murder of Bishop Moleyns, he was translated to the see of Chichester. Pecock distinguished himself by the originality of the views he expressed. His great work, the “Repressor of Overmuch Blaming of the Clergy” (published c. 1455), was directed against the errors of the Lollards, and vindicated the usages of the Church. For this and other works upholding reason and Scripture against tradition he was attacked in the council held at Westminster in 1457, cited before the Archbishop of Canterbury, his works examined by twenty-four doctors, and he himself finally condemned as a heretic. Under this pressure he abjured the heretical positions charged against him, and made a public recantation at Paul’s Cross (December 4, 1457). He was forced to resign his bishopric, and though he appealed to Rome and procured bulls ordering that it should be restored to him, he was unable to recover it. He spent the rest of his life in compulsory seclusion in the Abbey of Thorney, in Cambridgeshire.

Pecquigny, THE TREATY OF (1475), was made between Edward IV and Louis XI of France. The English invaded France in 1475, Edward IV having made an alliance with Charles of Burgundy; but directly the English set foot in France, Louis offered to treat for peace, and eventually the treaty of Pecquigny was made on these terms: 1. Edward to return to England on the payment of 75,000 crowns. 2. A truce to be kept for seven years. 3. The kings of England and France to assist each other against foreign enemies or rebellious subjects. 4. Prince Charles, son of Louis XI, to marry the Princess Elizabeth, daughter of Edward IV. 5. The King of France to pay annually to the King of England the sum of 50,000 crowns.

Peel, ARTHUR WELLESLEY, 1ST VISCOUNT (1829–1912), youngest son of the great Sir Robert Peel, entered parliament as a Liberal in 1865, and after holding some minor offices in the government, was elected Speaker in 1884, presiding over the deliberations of the House with brilliant success, until in 1895 he resigned and was elevated to the House of Lords, with a life pension of £4,000 a year.

Peel, SIR ROBERT (February 5, 1788–July 2, 1850), was the son of Sir Robert Peel, a wealthy Lancashire cotton manufacturer. Educated at Harrow and Christ Church, Oxford, Peel, after a very brilliant university career, entered parliament for Cashel in 1809, as a supporter of Spencer Perceval. In 1810 he was under-secretary for war; from 1812 to 1818 chief secretary for Ireland under Lord Liverpool. In 1817 he was returned as member for Oxford University, and in 1819 he was chosen chairman of the committee on the currency, in which capacity he was mainly instrumental in bringing about the return to cash payments. From 1822 to 1827 Peel was home secretary; but on the accession of Canning (April 1827) he retired, being unable to agree with that minister on the subject of Catholic emancipation. In January 1828 he returned under the Duke of Wellington; and in March 1829, having become convinced of the necessity of granting the demands of the Catholics, he moved the Catholic Relief Bill in the Commons. (The bill became law in April.) In May 1830 Peel succeeded to the baronetcy, and, having been rejected in 1829 by the University of Oxford and become member for Westbury, was now elected for Tamworth. During the discussion on the Reform Bill, Peel, who resigned with his colleagues (November 1830), strenuously opposed the measure. In 1834 he was recalled to office to form the brief Conservative ministry of William IV. On May 5, 1839, on the resignation of the Melbourne ministry, he was sent for by the queen; but his request for the removal of certain of her majesty's ladies of the bed-chamber who were connected with Whig leaders being refused, he declined to form a ministry, and the Whigs returned to office. In August 1841 they resigned, and Peel became prime minister, holding office till June 1846. His regime was marked by some important financial changes, including the Bank Charter Act of 1844. But it was specially marked by the repeal of the Corn Laws (q.v.), and the removal of protectionist restrictions on trade. Sir Robert, with the bulk of his followers, was altogether opposed to the removal of the corn duties, and vigorously resisted the Anti-Corn Law agitators. But he at length became convinced of the justice of their cause, and, to the intense disgust of many of his followers, himself brought in the bill for the repeal of the duties on corn. Thereupon a large portion of the Conservatives abandoned him, and the Liberals gave him little support, and in June 1846 he resigned. During the remaining years of his life he gave a general support to the home and commercial policy of the Whig ministers, though he opposed their foreign policy. He died from the effects of a fall from his horse while riding along Constitution Hill. Peel's policy, especially in the matter of the Catholic claims and the Corn Laws, exposed him to much misconstruction in his lifetime. But his honesty, his zeal for the welfare of the country, his moral courage and independence of character, have been amply acknowledged by the succeeding generations; and whatever exception might be taken to his general statesmanship, no one has doubted that his talents as an administrator and a financier were of the highest possible order.

Peelites was the name given to those Conservatives who, after the repeal of the Corn Laws (1846), formed a third intermediate party in parliament. Liberal-Conservatives, they refused a junction with either political extreme. Even after the death of Peel in 1850, the presence of Sir James Graham, Gladstone, the Duke of Newcastle, Sidney Herbert, and Cardwell among the Peelites made them especially formidable. On the accession of the Earl of Aberdeen in 1852 the isolation of the Peelites ceased, Aberdeen's ministry being formed by a coalition of Peelites and Whigs. The Peelites finally became absorbed into the Liberal party under Gladstone.

Peep-o'-Day Boys, THE, was the name assumed by many of the Ulster Presbyterians between 1780 and 1795, who banded themselves together to resist the Catholic "Defenders" (q.v.). On the institution of the Orange lodges in 1795 many of the Peep-o'-Day Boys passed into them. The Peep-o'-Day Boys bore a large share in the "Battle of the Diamond" (q.v.—September 21, 1795).

Peerage. It was doubtless from France that England first learned to narrow the political application of the word peers—which in literary and general usage still collectively designates all persons that are equals in rank or belong to the same class—to members of the specially privileged order, the hereditary nobility. The German companions in arms, who had conquered Gaul and divided the land among them, were at an early period called peers, that is, fellow-warriors pledged to mutual support. Its limitation in England to the hereditary counsellors of the sovereign, whose capacity to fill such an office originated at one time in the tenure of certain fiefs, at another in the direct receipt of a personal writ of summons to parliament, at a third in a formal patent of peerage, and, in its feminine form, to the wives of such hereditary counsellors, and in certain contingencies their female descendants, as well as created peeresses, may perhaps have been encouraged by the perfect equality of privilege that held the varying ranks of the order on the same level in the political system. In that system kings, princes, dukes, marquises, earls, viscounts and barons have all been equals, whatever social precedences may have distinguished them. The latest created baron had a voice and vote in parliament as potent as a King of Scotland's or a Prince of Wales's. But though all peers were once lords of parliament, there never has been a time when all lords of parliament were peers. The lords spiritual are not considered as peers; they are not regarded as having the right, when accused of treason or felony, to be tried by the peers; and they do not sit in judgment on a peer arraigned on a capital charge. The word came into regular use in the fourteenth century; it is found in the sentence passed on the Despensers in 1321. The status and composition of the peerage were then becoming gradually defined, and its place in the constitution settled. The English peerage was, however, no caste, such as was the French nobility, but merely a small knot of citizens whose distinguishing feature was that they had inherited the capacity, or been invited, or been commissioned by the king, to fill a responsible office in the State, that of perpetual adviser of the Crown, had a few cherished privileges conceded to them in consequence, and on dying passed on their duties and privileges to their heirs. For in time tenure lost its ennobling virtue, in time the writ of summons was discontinued as a mode of creating peers, and the more deliberate proceeding of bestowing the dignities that admitted to the peerage by a formal patent was exclusively used, and enabled the Crown, when it seemed advisable, to limit the right of inheritance, which hitherto had descended to heirs general, to heirs male. In mediæval days, when the dignity devolved upon an heiress, though she could not herself take the official seat in parliament and in council, she yet could give her husband, if not a right to the dignity, at least a presumptive claim to a writ of summons. Thus the King-maker was for a time Earl of Warwick, merely because he had married the sister and heiress of Henry de Beauchamp. And the state of suspended animation for a peerage that is known as abeyance arose when a peer left his honours at his death to co-heiresses, whose posterity had no power of assuming them till the stock of all but one of the daughters had been exhausted.

The special privileges of the peerage descend from an early period; but it was the quarrel of Edward III with Archbishop Stratford in 1341 that first made the most valuable of them matters of record. In the course of that dispute the lords reported that "on no account should peers . . . be brought to trial, lose their possessions, be arrested, imprisoned, outlawed or forfeited, or be bound to answer or to judge, except in full parliament and before their peers." And in 1442 it was settled by statute that peeresses had the same rights, when placed in the same position. But the value of the right was for centuries greatly impaired by its practical restriction to the times when parliament was sitting; during the recess the lord steward, who was appointed by the Crown, formed the court at his discretion, by choosing whomsoever he pleased from the body of peers, generally to the number of twenty-three only. This hardship was removed by the Treason Bill of 1696, which made it obligatory to summon to the court of the lord steward "all the peers who have a right to sit and vote in parliament." It is only on charge of treason, misprision, and felony that peers are entitled to the privilege; for minor offences they are tried by the ordinary courts. The other rights of a peer—freedom from arrest, admission on demand to the presence of the sovereign, liberty to kill venison in a royal forest, a claim to higher damages for slander, etc.—are now of little or no account. There are to-day many Scottish and Irish peers who are not lords of parliament; but they enjoy all the other distinctions of the order. The two most striking features in the later history of the peerage are the amazing increase in its numbers and the unreserved admission to its ranks of men of distinction in every honourable employment—soldiers, lawyers, diplomatists, bankers, tradesmen, manufacturers. In this way the order has grown from 59 landed proprietors in 1603 to a body of many hundreds of representatives of almost every form of social and personal distinction, literature not excepted. Peerage Bill, THE (1719), was introduced by Stanhope and Sunderland to restrict the power of the sovereign to create peers. It passed the Lords in March and again in November, but in the Commons Walpole got it rejected by 269 votes to 177 on the second reading (December 18). Had the bill passed into law it would have placed a limit on the number of peers in the House of Lords, since it declared that as soon as six new peers had been created the maximum number was to be reached. Its rejection thus averted a profound change in the constitution.

Pelagius was born in Britain, towards the end of the fourth century, and his original name appears to have been Morgan, of which Pelagius is a Græcized form. He left his native land very early, and lived most of his life in Gaul and Rome, where he became notorious for his heretical teaching on the subject of original sin and free-will. Pelagianism took root in Britain, and it was to combat this heresy that Germanus and Lupus came over from Gaul in 429. It would seem to have died out in Britain in consequence of the English conquest. St. Augustine of Hippo was the centre of the resistance to Pelagianism in the Church as a whole.

Pelham, HENRY (1695?–1754), was the younger son of Thomas, 1st Baron Pelham. He took an active part in the suppression of the rebellion in 1715; and first sat for Seaford in 1718. He became a lord of the treasury (1721), secretary of state for war (1724), and paymaster of the forces (1730). He was a zealous supporter of Walpole, and faithfully upheld the measures of that minister against the attacks of the opposition. Walpole's resignation in 1742 was followed by Wilmington's short ministry. On his death the candidates for the premiership were Pelham and Pulteney. With extreme reluctance the former was induced to assume the management of the Commons as first lord of the treasury. He was supported by the brilliant Carteret, who had been Pulteney's friend. The Pelhams succeeded to the difficulties of the Austrian Succession question, and were obliged to obey the dictates of their party, who were determined on hostilities with France. Carteret, finding his policy thwarted, retired in 1744. Pelham, who, unlike Walpole, dreaded opposition, now persuaded Chesterfield and Pitt to support the ministry, and placed several Tories in subordinate positions. Finding themselves superseded by Carteret in the king's councils, the Pelhams determined to bring the matter to a crisis by demanding the admission of Chesterfield and Pitt to office. On the king's refusal they resigned; but as Carteret failed to form a ministry, they were placed again in power. Meanwhile the Jacobite rebellion of 1745 had the effect of bringing the Pelhams back to Walpole's peace policy, and the war was concluded by the Treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle (October 1748) (q.v.). There had now ceased to be any opposition in parliament. In 1749 Pelham introduced his successful financial bill, whereby the interest of the national debt was decreased from 5 and 4 to 3 per cent. The reform of the calendar and Lord Hardwicke's Marriage Act (1753) are the remaining points of interest in his administration. In 1754 he died, and George declared, "Now I shall have no more peace." Like Walpole, Pelham was thoroughly successful in questions of finance, and almost uniformly successful in dealing with them. A timid, desponding, and somewhat fretful man, with little energy of character or intellect, he possessed, at least, to a high degree, good sense, industry, knowledge of business, and parliamentary experience.

Pelham-Holles, THOMAS, DUKE OF NEWCASTLE (1693-1768), succeeded to the property of his uncle, John, Duke of Newcastle, in 1711. He attached himself to the Whigs. On the accession of George I he became lord-lieutenant of Middlesex, and was created Duke of Newcastle in 1715. In that year he displayed great zeal in suppressing the Jacobite rebellion. He was made lord chamberlain, and sworn of the privy council. He followed Sunderland and Stanhope when the schism took place in the Whig ministry, but on their deaths in 1720 he joined Townshend and Walpole. In 1724, on the dismissal of Carteret, he became secretary of state. For many years he continued to be a follower of Walpole. At length, in 1737, seeing that Walpole was deprived of the friendship of Queen Caroline, and that the king was opposed to his peace policy, Newcastle began to intrigue against him. The king was encouraged in his wish for war; angry dispatches were sent to the English ambassador in Spain. Walpole's appointment of Lord Hervey as lord privy seal further alienated him. In 1742 his intrigues were successful; Walpole resigned. Wilmington was made premier, and on his death (1743) Newcastle's brother, Henry Pelham, became leader of the ministry. All opposition in parliament had ceased, but the Pelhams were jealous of Carteret. They brought matters to a crisis by demanding the admission of Pitt and Chesterfield to the cabinet. The king refused, and they resigned. Carteret was commissioned to form a ministry, but he failed, and the Pelhams returned to power. In 1747 Newcastle succeeded in getting rid of Chesterfield. Contrary to the wish of Henry Pelham, he still promoted the war. Chesterfield, finding his peace policy disregarded, resigned. Shortly afterwards Newcastle concluded the Peace of Aix-la-Chapelle (1748) (q.v.). In 1751 an estrangement took place between the two brothers. On the death of Pelham, Newcastle succeeded to the treasury. He was at a loss for a leader in the Commons. Sir Thomas Robinson, a weak man, was appointed to lead the House. Pitt and Fox contrived to torment him, but Fox making terms with Newcastle, he contrived to get through the year. It was evident that war was at hand. Newcastle was quite incapable. He gave contradictory orders to the English admirals, and on the failure of Admiral Byng the popular outcry against him was so great that he was compelled to resign (1756). He immediately began to intrigue for office. On the failure of Pitt's administration, a complicated series of negotiations ensued. During eleven weeks there was no parliament. For a brief period Lord Waldegrave attempted to form a ministry. At length Pitt and Newcastle came to terms, and that strong government so gloriously known as Pitt's ministry was formed. "Mr. Pitt," said Horace Walpole, "does everything; the duke gives everything." On the death of George II, Newcastle sent abject messages to Bute, offering to serve not only with him but under him. But patronage and the management of elections were taken out of his hands. In 1761 he deserted Pitt, and spoke against the Spanish War. But his position was untenable, and in 1762 he resigned. In 1763 he was dismissed from his lord-lieutenancy for censuring the terms of the peace. In 1765 he received the privy seal in Rockingham's administration. In 1768 he died, intriguing to the last.

Pembroke, EARLS OF. [TUDOR; HERBERT; CLARE; MARSHAL.]

Penal Code, THE, IN IRELAND, was first felt under James I. In 1603 a royal proclamation was issued ordering all Roman Catholic priests to leave the country under pain of death, and announcing that the penal clauses of the Act of Uniformity (q.v.) would be put in force. Parliament, however, remonstrated, and in 1613 a promise was given that the laws would not be enforced. A period of some toleration followed, which was cut short by the Cromwellian conquest. Under the Protectorate the Catholic gentry and priests were shipped off wholesale to Barbados as slaves; no Catholic was allowed to carry arms, to live in garrison towns, or to go a mile from his residence without a passport. In spite of the second Act of Uniformity, the Irish enjoyed a considerable amount of toleration under Charles II and

James II, but their sufferings began again after the broken Treaty of Limerick (q.v.). After the English parliament had in 1693 excluded Catholics from the Irish parliament by imposing the oath of allegiance and abjuration and a declaration against transubstantiation upon members, the latter body set to work upon the legislation known as the Irish penal code.

(1) The first of the penal statutes, passed in 1695, provided that no Catholic should keep a school under penalty of £20 or three months' imprisonment; and that parents should not send their children abroad for education under penalty of outlawry and confiscation, the case to be tried without a jury. (2) The Disarming Act (q.v.—1695) commanded all papists to deliver up their arms under penalty of a heavy fine for the first offence, and imprisonment for life and forfeiture for the second. (3) In 1697 all Roman Catholic ecclesiastics who were in correspondence with Rome were expelled the kingdom, and forbidden to return under pain of death; new priests were forbidden to enter Ireland, and in the following reign the existing clergy were placed under a strict system of registration (1704). (4) The Intermarriage Act provided that a Protestant woman marrying a Catholic should be dead in the eye of the law, and a Protestant man who married a Catholic should be regarded as a papist. (5) Catholics were disqualified in 1698 from practising as solicitors, and further measures were passed in the reigns of Anne and George II to prevent evasions of the act. The legislation of Anne's reign was terribly severe, and was deliberately framed with the object of depriving the native Irish of what little property they still possessed:—

(1) The Act for the Suppression of Papacy (1704) provided that any person who perverted a Protestant should be guilty of præmunire; that Catholic parents should be compelled to maintain and educate their Protestant children; that no Catholic could be guardian or trustee; that the eldest son of a Catholic, by turning Protestant, converted his father's interest in his estates into a mere life-tenancy; and that lands of Catholics were to descend in gavelkind unless the eldest son declared himself a Protestant. Again, no Catholic could buy land or take leases for more than thirty-one years; nor inherit land without taking the oaths, the estate passing at once, until his apostasy or death, to the next Protestant heir; no Catholics were to be allowed to settle in Limerick or Galway; no person was to hold office, civil or military, without taking the oaths and subscribing the declaration of transubstantiation. (2) By the act of 1709 an informer who could prove that a lease or sale had been secretly made in favour of papists was to have the property; and the previous legislation compelling Catholic fathers to support their Protestant children, suppressing papist schoolmasters and regulars, and commanding parish priests to be registered, were enforced with additional rigour. Lastly, in 1727 an act was passed by which every Roman Catholic was deprived of his vote, both at parliamentary and municipal elections. The only effect of this terrible code was the destruction of the Catholic gentry in Ireland; many of the best families emigrated, and a few apostatized. The other measures were either evaded or not put into execution. The persecution of the "Irish enemy" began to abate towards the end of Walpole's administration; and to Lord North belongs the credit of the first substantial Roman Catholic Relief Bill, by which, on taking the oath of allegiance, they were allowed to hold leases of 999 years (1778). In 1782 the penal code was further relaxed, the provisions against the purchase, inheritance, and disposition of land, residence in Limerick and Galway, instruction by popish schoolmasters, and the guardianship of children, being repealed. Additional measures for the freedom of the Roman Catholics were passed in 1792, when the restrictions on the legal profession were removed and the odious Intermarriage Act was repealed; and in 1793, when £40 freeholders were allowed to vote in parliamentary and municipal elections, to enter Dublin University, and to fill, with a few exceptions, civil and military offices. These were stepping-stones to the great Roman Catholic Emancipation Act of 1829, by which the last relics of the Penal Code were swept away.

Penda, KING OF MERCAIA 626–55, succeeded to the Mercian throne at the mature age of fifty. Under him Mercia first assumed a position of equality with the other kingdoms. The various Anglian tribes of Middle England were by him finally consolidated, and the foundations of the ascendancy of Mercia were firmly laid. He was the opponent of Christianity and of Northumbria, against which he even formed an alliance with the Welsh. In 633 he defeated and slew Edwin of Northumbria at Heathfield, and ravaged the whole country of the Northumbrians; in 642 he again defeated the Northumbrians at Maserfield, and slew their king, Oswald. He repeatedly defeated the East Angles, and slew three of their kings, finally compelling Ethelhere of East Anglia to become his vassal. He drove Cenwealh of Wessex out of his kingdom (645), and for a time made himself master of almost the whole of England, as well as of the Britons of Wales. But in 655 he was himself defeated and slain at Winwaed by Oswy of Northumbria, and the power of Mercia suffered a temporary eclipse. [MERCAIA.]

Peninsular War, THE (1808–14), was, so far as Great Britain was concerned, the most important episode in the wars with France, which lasted, with little intermission, from 1793 to 1815. In July 1808 an alliance was signed between Great Britain and Spain, and two British divisions were at once dispatched to Portugal, under Wellesley and Moore. From August 1 to 5 Wellesley was engaged in disembarking the troops in Figuera Bay, and on the 8th he moved towards Lisbon. On the 17th Laborde opposed him at Roliça, and was defeated; and Junot met with the same fate at Vimeiro four days later. Wellesley was, however, prevented from following up the advantage he had gained by a rapid pursuit; and on the 30th the Convention of Cintra (q.v.) was signed, by which the French were allowed to quit Portugal unmolested with all their stores, guns, and ammunition. Much as this convention was condemned at home, it secured, by the occupation of Portugal, a firm basis of operations. In November Napoleon himself took command in Spain; and after severe struggles with the Spaniards, the French, on December 4, entered Madrid, and installed Joseph for the second time on the throne of Spain. Meanwhile Sir John Moore, who, on the other generals being recalled after the Convention of Cintra, had succeeded to the command in Lisbon, had arranged to form a junction at Salamanca with Sir David Baird, who was bringing up reinforcements from Corunna, but owing to lack of transport, and the stupidity of the native authorities, neither general could move at an adequate pace; and it was not till November 13 that Moore arrived with his vanguard at the place appointed. In spite of the fact that all his precautions in the rear had been overthrown by the treachery of the Spaniards, he determined to press on to the assistance of the Spanish armies. On December 9 he first learnt that Madrid was in the possession of the French, and that one French army had been dispatched to Lisbon by way of Talavera, thus cutting off his retreat to Portugal, while Soult was on his march against Moore's army. He at once marched against Soult, and checked him in a brilliant skirmish at Sahagun; but Napoleon was drawing his armies round to enclose him; and there was nothing left but to retreat. This movement was begun on the 24th, and the several divisions concentrated at Astorga on the 31st. The next day Napoleon had to leave the army, and Soult was left to pursue a force which under extreme difficulties had forgotten all discipline. Nevertheless Moore managed to bring them safely to Corunna, where he halted to collect the stragglers. On January 15, 1809, he gave Soult battle, defeated him, though killed himself in the moment of victory; and the army was embarked without further molestation and sailed for England. In April Wellesley took command in Portugal, where the French were almost supreme. He at once advanced against Soult, and drove him back from Lisbon in a series of skirmishes. He followed up his partial successes by an advance up the valley of the Tagus, and on July 28 defeated Victor and Joseph in a hard-fought battle at Talavera. He, however, retreated soon afterwards into winter quarters on the Mondego. In the spring of 1810 Masséna opened a brilliant campaign, the object of which was the conquest of Portugal. After many successes he was met by Lord Wellington (for a peerage had been bestowed upon Wellesley after Talavera), at Busaco on September 27, defeated, and driven back. Wellington took advantage of the victory to retreat to the lines of Torres Vedras, which he had constructed as a defence for Lisbon. In March (1811), having received reinforcements, Wellington issued from his lines, and by a series of masterly movements forced Masséna to retreat to Salamanca. On April 9 he began to blockade Almeida, and in the beginning of May, at Fuentes d'Onoro, again defeated Masséna, who had advanced to its relief. During the battle the governor of Almeida had taken advantage of the carelessness of the investing force to destroy the fortress and escape. In the meanwhile Graham had broken out from Cadiz, where he had been invested all the winter, and on March 5 defeated Victor at Barrosa. Beresford had on March 15 been detached by Wellington to recapture Badajoz, which had been lost to the French by the treachery of its commander. Early in May he had made all the dispositions necessary for the siege; but the operations had soon to be abandoned on account of Soult's approach with a strong relieving force. Beresford gave him battle on the ridge of Albuera on May 16, and after a terrible struggle, in which victory was long doubtful, entirely defeated the French army. Wellington, coming up soon after the battle, at once ordered Badajoz to be reinvested. An assault, however, on Badajoz on June 9 was repulsed with great loss; and the siege was finally abandoned on the approach of Soult and Marmont, who had united their forces. Wellington retired behind the Guadiana, but took up so bold a position that he imposed on the two marshals, who, thinking him much stronger than he really was, in their turn withdrew, Soult to Seville, Marmont to the Tagus valley, where he quartered his army around Almaraz. Wellington at once advanced, but was foiled in an attempt to surprise Ciudad Rodrigo, which, however, was now completely blockaded. Late in September Marmont marched with an overwhelming force to its relief; and after checking him in a vigorous combat at El Bodon Wellington ordered a general retreat. On the 27th he again repulsed an attack of the French, and withdrew to a position so strong that Marmont did not venture to attack it, and from want of supplies withdrew again to the Tagus valley. In October Hill successfully drove the French from Cáceres, and opened up the whole district for a foraging ground for the allies. For two months Estremadura was completely in Hill's power, till in January 1812 he was recalled to Portugal by a threatened advance of Marmont. Meanwhile in the east of Spain the French had been very successful, and Valencia and Catalonia had been reduced.

On January 1 (1812) Wellington with all things ready crossed the Agueda, and on the 8th broke ground in front of Ciudad Rodrigo. The siege was hurried on in order to forestall Marmont's arrival. On the 19th the place was assaulted and carried after a terrible struggle. When Marmont in his advance learned of the fall of Ciudad Rodrigo, he hastily retired to Salamanca, which he fortified. Wellington lost no time in marching to the south, and preparing for the siege of Badajoz. The works were begun on March 17, and here again had to be conducted with all speed from the fear of Soult's relieving force. On April 7 the place was captured by one of the most determined and sanguinary assaults on record. On May 19 Hill surprised and destroyed the bridge of Almaraz, which formed the only communication across the Tagus between Marmont and Soult, and Wellington followed up this success by laying siege to the forts of Salamanca. In ten days they were reduced, and on July 22 Wellington utterly defeated the French in the great battle of Salamanca. For eight days he followed up the pursuit to Valladolid. Thence, leaving Clinton to watch the movements of the French in the direction of Burgos, he continued his march to Madrid, which he entered in triumph on August 12. Here he was again prevented by the illiberality and bad management of the home government from carrying the war any farther into Spain, although either Soult or Suchet might have been crushed. He accordingly turned towards the north, where Clausel had rallied the fragments of the Salamanca army. Clausel retreated before Wellington with much skill; and the latter halted before Burgos, resolved to take it before proceeding farther north. He was, however, very badly supplied with siege tools, and even ammunition ran short; and the siege, which was begun on September 19, was finally abandoned, after a month had been spent in unsuccessful attempts to storm the place. The retreat was conducted under great difficulties, aggravated by the utter disregard for discipline to which the men gave way. After several skirmishes Wellington's army found itself secure at Ciudad Rodrigo. Wellington then disposed it in winter quarters, and made strenuous preparations for renewing the campaign in the following year. The earliest movements of 1813 were, however, made by Murray against Suchet in the east, and resulted in the defeat of the latter near Castilla. It was not till May that Wellington began his forward movement, but then all his plans were so matured that the position of the French behind the Douro was turned, and they were in full retreat, without a battle having been fought. A union had also been effected by the same operations with the Spaniards in Galicia. Burgos was destroyed by the French in their retreat; and without taking any advantage of the natural difficulties of the country, Joseph abandoned every position, until he had crossed the Ebro and taken up a strong position at Vitoria. It was, however, of no avail, for on June 21 Wellington carried the position, and inflicted on Joseph the most crushing defeat suffered by any army throughout the war. Graham was at once dispatched to lay siege to San Sebastian; but in a few weeks the works had to be suspended on account of the arrival of Soult, who had been sent to supersede Joseph and was reorganizing the northern army. In a series of fierce combats fought among the passes of the Pyrenees, Soult's efforts to break the line of the allies were utterly baffled; he retired, and Wellington ordered the siege of San Sebastian to be resumed. On August 31 it was stormed. Soult made one more effort to succour it, but he was worsted in the combats of Vera and San Marcial, and had to retire again. Wellington, by the fall of San Sebastian, was free to devote his whole attention to Soult. By a series of skilful movements he forced the passage of Bidassoa early in October. A month later he attacked Soult in a strong position, which he had been fortifying for three months, on the Nivelle. Each redoubt was successively carried, and the English troops crossed the river. A month later he crossed the Nive, in the face of Soult's opposing force. The next day Soult issued from Bayonne, thinking that he could cut off the left wing of the allies. The attack was met by a stubborn resistance, till Wellington sent up reinforcements and compelled the French to withdraw in haste. But Soult directed a new attack against the right, which had been thus weakened. Wellington had, however, anticipated the attack, and, after "one of the most desperate battles of the whole war," succeeded on December 13 in completely baffling the French on all points. The country was, however, so flooded that no further movement was possible; and the allies went into winter quarters along the left bank of the Adour, the French being disposed along the opposite bank. In February 1814 Wellington determined to advance into France; but to do this it was necessary to drive Soult from Bayonne. It was only possible to cross the Adour below Bayonne, as it was weakly guarded there on account of its natural difficulties. His plan, therefore, was to draw Soult away by an advance of his centre and right, while Sir John Hope with the left effected the passage of the river. Accordingly Hill, with 20,000 men, moved off on February 12 towards the east. The French outposts were everywhere driven in, and Soult was hopelessly mystified as to Wellington's real design. He accordingly made his dispositions so as to be able to concentrate on Orthez. Wellington continued to drive in the enemy from all their outposts, and on the 26th Beresford crossed the Gave de Pau, and false attacks were directed against Orthez. On the following day the British attacked Soult's position at Orthez. For a long time the battle was doubtful; indeed, at one time the French seemed to be on the point of repulsing the attack and winning the day; but Wellington, quickly changing his mode of attack to suit the altered circumstances, won a complete victory, which would have resulted in the entire destruction of Soult's army had the pursuit been energetically executed. Meanwhile Hope had grappled with stupendous difficulties; had crossed the Adour, and in the face of the enemy had, by the indefatigable energy of soldiers and sailors combined, contrived a bridge which should resist alike the force of the tide and the attacks of the foe. The investment of Bayonne was now complete; and Wellington, crossing the Adour, dispatched Beresford with 12,000 men to Bordeaux, while he himself prepared to follow Soult, who was retiring towards Toulouse. In three skirmishes the allies encountered the French outposts, and drove them in; but Wellington was moving cautiously, and it was not till March 26 that the two armies were in sight of one another. Soult was resolved to hold Toulouse, in order to keep his communications open with the other armies, and Wellington was equally resolved to isolate him. Accordingly he attacked him on April 10; and at length, after a most terrible struggle, in which the allies lost more men than in almost any other battle in the whole war, the chief positions were carried. But even then Soult did not at once give up the place, and was ready to receive an attack the next day. Wellington, however, designed a new plan of operations, and Soult, afraid of being surrounded, carried off most of his troops to Villefranche. The movement was a most masterly conception, and its execution did not fall short of the skill with which it was planned. But its results were never known, because news had already arrived of the Convention of Paris and the abdication of Napoleon. Thus ended the War of the Peninsula.

Penn, WILLIAM (1644-1718), son of Admiral Sir William Penn, and founder of Pennsylvania, was educated at Christ Church, Oxford and at Saumur. He became a Quaker in 1667, and was in 1668-9 imprisoned in the Tower for eight months, and in 1671 for six months in Newgate, for propagating Quaker doctrines. On March 14, 1681, he received from the king, in satisfaction for debts due to his father, the land lying between Maryland and New York, and founded the colony called after him, Pennsylvania. From the summer of 1682 to that of 1684 he was engaged in laying the foundations of the colony and establishing good relations with the Indians. On his return to England he obtained great influence with James II, approved and supported the Declaration of Indulgence, and endeavoured to secure for the policy of the king the support of William of Orange. In 1690 and 1691 he was accused of treasonable correspondence with the exiled king, but in neither case was the charge proved.

Nevertheless he was deprived of his government of Pennsylvania in 1692, until it was restored to him two years later. In 1699 he made a second visit to America, whence he returned in 1701. His relations to the colony involved him in many debts, and disputes arose. In 1712 Penn was struck by apoplexy, as he was preparing to sell to the Crown his rights as proprietor, and, though he lived till 1718, was incapable for the rest of his life of doing any business.

Penry (or AP HENRY), JOHN (1559-93), a Welsh preacher, became one of the most zealous followers of Robert Browne and a determined opponent of Episcopacy. He was supposed to have originated the attacks on the bishops published under the name of Martin Marprelate (q.v.), but it was found impossible to trace the work to him. He was subsequently brought to trial on a charge of sedition, and though the evidence was incomplete, was found guilty and hanged at St. Thomas-a-Watering (May 29, 1593).

Penselwood was the scene of a battle fought between Edmund Ironside and Canute in 1016, which resulted in the victory of the former. Penselwood is on the borders of Dorset and Somerset, not far from Gillingham. Engagements were also fought there between Conwalea of Wessex and the West Welsh in 658; and between the Danish raiders and the local fyrd in 1001.

Pension Bill, THE (1730), was introduced by Samuel Sandys as a weapon of attack against Sir Robert Walpole. By an act of 1707 all persons holding pensions from the Crown during pleasure were made incapable of sitting in the House of Commons, and this act had been extended in 1714 to those who held them for any term of years. "But the difficulty was to ascertain the fact, the government refusing information." Accordingly Sandys proposed a bill (February 16, 1730) by which every member of the Commons was to swear an oath that he did not hold any such pension, and that if he accepted one, he would disclose it to the House within fourteen days. Walpole allowed this measure to pass the Commons by a small majority, and threw the responsibility of its rejection in the Lords on Townshend as leader in that House.

Pensions, MINISTRY OF, is a department of state set up by statute in December 1916 to deal with pensions arising out of services in the Great War. The minister of pensions holds the powers hitherto vested in the admiralty, war office, and the Chelsea commissioners to grant pensions.

Pensions, OLD AGE, were created by statute in 1908 and came into force in 1909. With certain exceptions, persons of 70 years of age and upwards, whose incomes did not exceed £31 10s., were made eligible for a pension. The amount of the pension was calculated according to the recipient's means; the maximum being 5s. and the minimum 1s. per week. The Old Age Pensions Act was amended in 1911, 1919, and 1924.* The amount is now 10s. per week where the income does not exceed £26 5s.; between which sum and £49 17s. 6d. the pension is calculated on a sliding scale.

Pensions, THE QUESTION OF, is intimately connected with that of the alienation of royal demesne, which was so frequently made a subject of complaint by the reformers of the Middle Ages. It was not until the accession of Queen Anne that steps were taken to prevent the sovereign from charging the hereditary revenues with pensions and annuities which were considered to be binding on his successors, when it was provided that no portion of the hereditary revenues should be alienated by the Crown beyond the life of the king. Pensions, however, were still granted on the hereditary revenues of Scotland and Ireland, and on the $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. duties, for the lives of the grantees. When George III surrendered the hereditary revenues in exchange for a fixed civil list amounting first to £800,000, and afterwards to £900,000, the civil list became the fund from which pensions were paid. There were no limits to pensions, except the civil list itself, and debts frequently accumulated in consequence; moreover, they dangerously increased the influence of the Crown. Burke proposed in consequence (1780) that the pension list should be reduced to £60,000, but his bill did not become law. However, the Civil List Act of the Rockingham administration, which was passed in 1782, was built on the same lines. The pension list was to be gradually reduced to £95,000, and no pension to any one person was to exceed £1,200. In order to prevent the practice of granting secret pensions during pleasure, it was directed that all future pensions were to be paid at the exchequer, and they were to be granted only in cases of distress or desert. The pension lists on the Irish and Scottish revenues, and on the $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. duties, still remained, however, and were sources of much political corruption. (1) In 1793 the Irish pensions had reached the sum of £124,000, the gross annual revenue being £275,102. After several attempts had been made to remedy the abuse, a bill was introduced into the Irish House of Commons, by which the hereditary revenues were surrendered in exchange for a civil list of £145,000, and a pension list of £124,000, which was eventually to be reduced to £80,000. No grants in any one year were to exceed £1,200, but pensions held during the pleasure of the Crown were exempted from the provisions of the act. The contemplated reduction was effected by 1814; and on the accession of George IV the Irish pension list was further reduced to £50,000, no grants exceeding £1,200 to be made until the list was so reduced. (2) The Scottish hereditary revenues remained exempt from parliamentary control until 1810, when the pensions charged on them amounted to £39,379. It was then provided that the amount of the pensions should be reduced to £25,000, and no more than £800 should be granted in one year until the reduction had been effected. (3) In 1830 the $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. duties were surrendered by William IV for life, the pension charged upon them continuing payable. At the same time the three pension lists of England, Scotland, and Ireland were consolidated, and arrangements made for their reduction from £145,750 to a future maximum sum of £75,000 on the expiration of existing interests. Lastly, on the accession of Victoria, the right of the Crown to grant pensions was restricted to £1,200 a year; these pensions to be granted in strict conformity with the resolutions of the House of Commons of 1834, which limited them to "such persons only as have just claims on the royal beneficence, or who, by their personal services to the Crown, by the performance of their duties to the public, or by their useful discoveries in science and attainments in literature and the arts, have merited the gracious consideration of the sovereign, and the gratitude of their country." In 1887 a select committee of the House of Commons, appointed on the motion of Charles Bradlaugh, reported against the granting of perpetual pensions in the future, and recommended the commutation of existing ones. A motion in this sense was passed in 1888, and since then many pensions have been commuted.

Pepys, CHARLES CHRISTOPHER, 1ST EARL OF COTTENHAM (1781-1851), the second son of Sir William Pepys, was called to the bar 1804. He was appointed solicitor-general to Queen Adelaide in 1830, and solicitor-general to the king in 1834. In 1831 he was returned to parliament for Higham Ferrers. In 1834 he became master of the rolls, and in 1835 one of the commissioners of the great seal, the Whigs not being prepared with a chancellor in whom they could confide. In 1836 he became lord chancellor, and continued in this office till 1841. In 1846, on the return of the Whigs to power, Lord Cottenham again became chancellor; but his health was bad, and in 1850 he received an earldom, and the great seal was put in commission.

Pepys, SAMUEL (1633-1703), the diarist, was educated at St. Paul's School and Magdalene College, Cambridge. He became clerk of the acts to the navy in 1660, and secretary to the navy in 1673. During the reigns of Charles II and James II the administration of naval affairs was largely in his hands, and he introduced some important reforms. He was imprisoned in the Tower on suspicion of being concerned in the Popish Plot (q.v.) in May 1679, but liberated the following February. He became president of the Royal Society in 1684. He wrote "Memoirs of the Royal Navy" (1690), and left in his manuscripts the famous "Diary," written in shorthand, which was deciphered and first published by Lord Braybrooke in 1825. The work is almost unequalled for its naïve candour, and its gossiping pages give a singularly piquant sketch of the court and society of Charles II's reign.

Perceval, SPENCER (1762-1812), was the second son of John, 2nd Earl of Egmont, and was educated at Harrow and Trinity College, Cambridge. In 1786 he was called to the bar, and ten years later took silk. At the same time he entered parliament for Northampton, and was soon noticed by Pitt as a promising member. In supporting the Treason and Sedition Bills he rendered good service to the government. Addington appointed him solicitor-general, and in 1802 attorney-general, in which capacity he had to conduct the prosecution of Colonel Despard for treason and of Peltier for a libel on Bonaparte, and in spite of the brilliant defence of Sir James Mackintosh, he secured a verdict of guilty. He held the office until Pitt's death in 1806. In March 1807 he became chancellor of the exchequer, and on the death of the Duke of Portland in 1809 he was named first lord of the treasury. At that time the war in the Peninsula was being carried on: Napoleon had as yet received no check on the continent; Great Britain was spending millions in encouraging the nations of Europe to offer an effectual resistance to him. Foreign politics were thus all-engrossing, and scarcely any attention was paid to the reforms at home which were so badly needed. For three years his ministry laboured, and then on May 11, 1812, he was shot by one Bellingham, in the lobby of the House of Commons. Nothing could have happened so opportunely for Perceval's reputation as his murder, which raised him to the position of a martyr. From having been really a minister of moderate abilities, by his death he suddenly became in public estimation a political genius, a first-rate financier, and a powerful orator. We can now look back more calmly and see in him a man of shrewd sense, imperturbable temper, narrow views, and restless ambition, which, to his credit, never led him astray from the path of integrity.

Percy, SIR HENRY (1364-1403), who from his impetuosity and daring was surnamed

"Hotspur," was the son of Henry Percy, 1st Earl of Northumberland. When quite young he was associated with his father in the charge of the Scottish Marches, and in 1386 he was sent to defend Calais, and made many daring excursions into Picardy. He is said to have killed the Earl of Douglas in the famous battle of Otterburn (q.v.—1388), where he was himself taken prisoner. On his release he fought in France, and was for some years governor of Bordeaux. He joined Henry of Lancaster on his landing in England in 1399, and received substantial rewards from him subsequently. In 1402 Hotspur participated in the brilliant victory of Homildon Hill (q.v.) over the Scots. Becoming discontented, however, with the king, Percy joined in 1403 with his prisoner the Earl of Douglas, and with Owen Glendower, but was defeated and slain in the battle of Shrewsbury (q.v.). He married Elizabeth Mortimer, eldest daughter of Edward, Earl of March.

J. H. Wylie, "England Under Henry IV," 1884.

Percy, HENRY, 1ST EARL OF NORTHUMBERLAND (d. 1408), served in France in the wars of Edward III's reign. He was made warden of the Scottish Marches, and in 1378 captured Berwick. He was frequently employed by Richard II, whose absolutist policy he supported, but his espousal of the cause of Henry of Lancaster in 1398 caused the king to sentence him to banishment. On Henry's landing in 1399 Northumberland was one of the first to join him, and when Henry became king he received large grants of land. In 1402 he and his son defeated the Scots at Homildon Hill (q.v.), but about this time they grew discontented with the king, either offended at Henry's negligence in ransoming their kinsman, Edmund Mortimer, or at the king's claim to deal with the prisoners taken at Homildon, or from having suspicions of his intentions towards them. At all events in 1403 Hotspur joined Glendower, and was defeated at Shrewsbury, while his father, who was marching to his aid, was compelled to submit. He was very soon forgiven by the king, but in 1405 Northumberland joined in a fresh conspiracy against Henry, proposing to partition England with Mortimer and Glendower, and on the plot being betrayed fled to Scotland. In 1408 he again took up arms, and met the royal troops at Bramham Moor, in Yorkshire, where his force was dispersed and himself slain.

J. H. Wylie, "England Under Henry IV," 1884.

Percy, HENRY, 8TH EARL OF NORTHUMBERLAND (1532?-1585), brother of Thomas, 7th earl, whom he succeeded (1572), was in 1559 sent to Scotland on a mission to the Congregation; and in the following year took part in the siege of Leith. In 1569, on the rising in the north, and the disaffection of his brother, the earl, he took no part in the insurrection, though he is said to have been implicated in the subsequent plot of Ridolfi. In 1583 he was arrested and sent to the Tower on a charge of complicity in the conspiracy of Francis Throckmorton (q.v.), who had implicated him in his confession. On June 21, 1585, he was found shot through the head in his bed. The earl was said at the time to have committed suicide, and this view was held by Froude. The evidence, however, is not conclusive.

Percy, HENRY, 9TH EARL OF NORTHUMBERLAND (1564-1632), son of Henry, 8th earl, distinguished himself in the Low Countries under the Earl of Leicester. He warmly espoused the interests of James VI during the last days of Queen Elizabeth, and was by him sworn of the privy council. He was subsequently charged with complicity in the Gunpowder Plot (q.v.), and although the accusation could not be proved, was deprived of his offices, fined £30,000, and imprisoned for fifteen years. In the Tower he gathered about him men of learning, and employed his time in the study of mathematics. On his release in 1620 he retired to Bath and Petworth.

Percy, THOMAS, EARL OF WORCESTER (d. 1403), was the younger brother of Henry Percy, 1st Earl of Northumberland, and served with distinction in the French wars. He afterwards became steward of the household to Richard II, who created him Earl of Worcester (1397). He joined Henry of Lancaster in 1399, but in 1403 took part in his brother's rebellion against him. He fought in the battle of Shrewsbury, where he was taken prisoner, and beheaded two days after.

Percy, THOMAS, 7TH EARL OF NORTHUMBERLAND (1528-72), was the nephew of Henry Algernon, 6th earl, and elder son of Sir Thomas Percy, who was attainted in the reign of Henry VIII. As one of the leaders of the Catholic party in England, the earl was regarded with suspicion from the very commencement of Elizabeth's reign, and his implication in the Catholic intrigues of 1562 with Philip II did not improve his position at court. A few years later Northumberland warmly espoused the cause of the Queen of Scots; and entered into a conspiracy with the Earl of Westmorland, Leonard Dacre, and others, for her release from Tutbury Castle, where she was in confinement. In October 1569 the queen summoned the rebel lords to appear in London, but they refused to obey her commands, and rose in arms. The energetic measures of the queen's ministers compelled the rebel earls to withdraw across the border without having gained more than some very temporary successes; and Northumberland—who, it is said, would have sought pardon from Elizabeth had it not been for the brave spirit of his wife—was then given up to Moray by Hector Graham of Harlaw, and imprisoned in Lochleven Castle, with William Douglas as his jailer (January 1570). After a captivity of two years and a half, his wife attempted to ransom him, and convey him to Flanders; but Elizabeth, fearing that his liberty might prove prejudicial to her interests, prevailed upon Douglas and the Earl of Morton to give him up to the English governor at Berwick (Lord Hunsdon) for £2,000. In spite of strenuous efforts made by Lord Hunsdon to obtain his pardon, he was beheaded at York (August 22, 1572) without a trial, as an attainted traitor.

O. Menmuir, "The Rising of the North," 1907.

Perrers, ALICE, was one of the ladies of the household of Philippa, queen of Edward III. After his wife's death she acquired complete influence over the king, and interfered in the affairs of state, supporting the policy of John of Gaunt. In the Good Parliament (1376) (q.v.) most serious charges were brought against her. She had interfered with the administration of justice and her rapacity and extravagance were equally unbounded. She was compelled to take an oath never to return to the king's presence; and an ordinance forbidding women to practise in the law courts was made the pretext for a sentence against her of banishment and forfeiture. On the death of the Black Prince, however, the proceedings of the Good Parliament were reversed, and Alice Perrers resumed her influence over the king. She was present at his death-bed, but fled from it after robbing him of his finger rings. She appears to have died in 1400.

Perrot, SIR JOHN (1527-92), was reputed to be the son of Henry VIII. He was imprisoned by Mary for his religious opinions, but under Elizabeth rose for a time to high favour. In 1570 he was appointed president of Munster, where he suppressed a widespread rebellion, and in 1584 was made lord deputy of Ireland. His policy, though calculated to benefit the country, gave such offence to the clergy that they contrived, by means of forged documents, to obtain his recall, which was followed by his trial for high treason in 1592. He was found guilty, though probably on very insufficient evidence, of using language derogatory to the queen, and of giving secret encouragement to Spain; and died in the Tower of a broken heart, September 1592.

Persian War, THE (1856). At the end of 1855 a series of studied insults obliged Mr. Murray, the British minister at the Persian court, to withdraw his mission from Teheran, and break off communication with the Persian government. Attempts were made to patch the matter up, but the news of the siege and capture of Herat, in spite of treaty obligations, was followed by a declaration of war by Great Britain (November 1, 1856). An army of 6,000 men, under the command of Sir James Outram, was at once dispatched to the Persian Gulf. The British attacked Rushan, a fort near Bushire, and the place was carried after an obstinate defence. The next day Bushire was attacked and similarly captured. On January 27, 1857, Sir James Outram arrived and took command. Being joined by part of Havelock's division, he advanced on Burrasgoon, where the Persians were encamped, found it deserted, and returned after destroying all the stores found there. On his return he was much annoyed by the Persian cavalry, but eventually succeeded in attacking and driving off the pursuing force. A short lull in hostilities then occurred, but on March 26 the strong fortress of Mohamrah on the Karoon river was attacked by sea and land. The garrison was commanded by Prince Khan Mirza. No real attempt was made at a defence; the guns of the fort and town were quickly silenced by the fleet, and the prince abandoned the place and retreated to Ahwaz, 100 miles up the Karoon, where he had large magazines and supplies. Sir James Outram immediately organized an expedition under Commander Rennie to ascend the river and destroy this place. The steamer advanced on the 29th, and on April 1 found the enemy, about 7,000 strong, posted at Ahwaz. The troops landed and advanced against the town. There was, however, no struggle. The Persians, cowed by their disasters, fled at once, and again allowed their camp to be taken possession of with all the stores it contained. On the 4th the expedition returned to Mohamrah, and thus the operations closed. Meanwhile, the preliminaries of a peace had been adjusted at Paris (March 4). The Shah agreed to renounce all pretensions to Herat, to withdraw his troops from Afghanistan, to guarantee protection to British commerce, and to suppress slavery in the Persian Gulf.

Perth, which in Roman times was called Victoria, was made a royal burgh by William the Lion in 1210. It was taken by Bruce from the English (1311), and in 1332 was fortified by Edward Baliol, who was for a time besieged there by the Earl of March. In 1339 it was retaken by Robert the Stewart for Sir Thomas Ughtred, Edward III's lieutenant. In 1559 it was occupied by the queen regent and a French bodyguard; in September 1644 it was taken by Montrose after the battle of Tippermuir, and in May 1689 by Claverhouse. In 1715 it was occupied by Lord Mar, and in 1745 was also in the hands of the rebels for some time. James I was murdered (1437) in the monastery of Black Friars in Perth, by Walter, Earl of Atholl.

Peterloo Meeting, THE (August 16, 1819), was the most celebrated of the meetings in which the national desire for parliamentary reform found expression. Manchester decided to follow the example of Birmingham, and made large preparations for a grand meeting on August 16, 1819, under the lead of a noted reformer, "Orator" Hunt (q.v.). The county executive made extensive military arrangements to prevent any rioting or disturbance. On the day fixed, between 70,000 and 80,000 people marched into St. Peter's Fields, then on the outskirts of Manchester, while the magistrates were watching the proceedings from a neighbouring house. As soon as Hunt rose to address the assembled crowd, the chief constable was sent to arrest him—a hopeless impossibility in the face of an enthusiastic mob. The yeomanry were then sent to charge the crowd; but they became scattered, lost their order, and were beginning to experience some rough treatment at the hands of the crowd, when the magistrates gave the Hussars orders to charge. Nothing could have been more effectual; "the charge swept the mingled mass of human beings before it; people, yeomen, and constables, in their confused attempts to escape, ran over one another." The meeting was broken up; and the field was left strewn with the victims of the impetuous charge, which has given to the meeting the name of the Peterloo Massacre. Hunt was arrested and imprisoned for two years and a half.

Peters (or PETER), HUGH (1598-1660), was a native of Treffry in Cornwall, and was educated at Cambridge. He became in 1633 minister of an Independent congregation at Rotterdam. In 1635 he emigrated to Massachusetts, and succeeded Roger Williams as pastor at Salem. He returned to England in 1641. "I was sent over to his majesty," he said on his trial, "that we might have a little help in point of excise and customs, and encouragements in learning." He remained in England, and became an active preacher and army chaplain. He became one of the commissioners for the amendment of the laws (1652). He was also appointed one of the Triers (1654). At the Restoration he was excepted from the Act of Indemnity, tried as a regicide and condemned to death. He was charged with plotting the king's death with Cromwell, and with exciting the soldiers against him by his preaching before and during the trial. He was also accused by rumour of being himself the executioner of Charles I, but this was not brought forward on his trial. He was executed on October 16, 1660.

Peter's Pence (ROM-FECH, or ROME-SCOR) was a tax of a penny on each hearth, which is said to have been first imposed by Ini, and sent to the pope to provide for the support of the English school at Rome. But for this there is little evidence. The payment of the tribute probably began under Offa, who in this way gained papal sanction for the establishment of a new archbishopric at Lichfield. From the beginning of the tenth century, Rom-feoh was exacted from the whole country, and sent annually to Rome. In the confusion of Stigand's primacy, and of the first years of Norman rule, it seems to have fallen into arrears; but William I promised about 1076 that it should be paid regularly. It succumbed to the general tendency, and became fixed at a comparatively small amount. In 1213 Innocent III complained that the bishops retained 1,000 marks out of it, and only sent 300. In 1306 Clement V exacted a penny from each household instead of £201 9s., which had for a long time been the customary payment. The threat of withholding Peter's Pence became a useful instrument in the king's hands; thus in 1366, and for some time after, it was not paid, in order to induce the pope to acquiesce in the Statute of Præmunire (q.v.). Peter's Pence is to be clearly distinguished from the annual tribute of 1,000 marks promised by John.

Petitioners (1679) was the name given to those members of the opposition, or "Country" party, who in this year presented petitions to Charles II asking him to summon a parliament in January 1680. Their opponents presented counter-petitions, expressing abhorrence of the attempt to encroach on the royal prerogative, and were hence called Abhorrrers (q.v.).

Petition of Right (1628). When the third parliament of Charles I met, the Parliamentary leaders resolved to begin by vindicating the violated rights of the subjects rather than renewing the attack on Buckingham. After a general discussion the Commons proceeded to pass resolutions against arbitrary imprisonment, unparliamentary taxation, and other grievances. Wentworth suggested that they should proceed by a bill which should define what the law should be in the future, but though his idea was adopted by the Commons, the king's openly expressed opposition obliged them to drop it (April 28). Coke now proposed that they should ask the Lords to join with them in a Petition of Right (May 6), and after about three weeks' debate the Upper House passed the petition (May 28). The petition demanded four things:—(1) That no freeman should be obliged to give any gift, loan, benevolence, or tax, without common consent by act of parliament. (2) That no freeman should be imprisoned contrary to the laws of the land. (3) That soldiers and sailors should not be billeted in private houses. (4) That commissions to punish soldiers and sailors by martial law should be revoked, and no more issued. Charles, with the consent of the council, answered evasively, "The king willeth that right be done according to the laws and customs of the realm, and that the statutes be put in due execution." Dissatisfied with this reply, the Commons prepared a remonstrance against the advisers by whose counsel the king had acted. The king interrupted them by a message forbidding them to meddle with affairs of state. The House boldly took up again the charges against Buckingham. Before this determination, and before the ambiguous attitude of the House of Lords, the king yielded and assented to the petition according to the usual form (June 7). But the king's final surrender did not secure the agreement of king and Commons. A new quarrel soon arose on the question whether the petition rendered illegal the levy of tunnage and poundage (q.v.) without a parliamentary grant. Nevertheless the king's acceptance marked the beginning of a great era in English history.

Petitions. [PARLIAMENT; CROWN.]

Petty, WILLIAM, 1ST MARQUIS OF LANS-DOWNE (1737-1805), better known as LORD
SHELburne, was sprung on his father's side from the Fitzmaurices, earls of Kerry, one of the oldest houses of Ireland; while, by female descent, he inherited the name and fortune of Sir William Petty. Entering the army at an early age, he distinguished himself at the battle of Minden, and on the accession of George III was appointed an aide-de-camp to the king.
The next year, after representing the family borough of High Wycombe for a few weeks, he was called to the House of Lords by the death of his father, the Earl of Shelburne. In his new sphere Shelburne at once attached himself to Lord Bute, and supported the peace negotiations of 1762. In the following year he was appointed a privy councillor and president of the board of trade. But in a very few months he deserted the government and joined the opposition under Pitt. No place was found for him in the Rockingham ministry, but on its fall and Lord Chatham's succession to office he was made secretary of state. In 1768 the Duke of Grafton yielded to "the king's daily instigations to remove Lord Shelburne." During the long period of Lord North's administration he continued to act firmly with the opposition, alike on the subject of Wilkes and the Middlesex election, and on the policy adopted towards the American colonies. On the resignation of Lord North he rejected the urgent request of the king that he would form a cabinet, and refused to take the place which was due to the Marquis of Rockingham. When that nobleman did become prime minister, Shelburne was appointed home secretary, Fox being foreign secretary; and between these two, on Rockingham's death, ensued a disastrous quarrel, which split up the Whigs, and resulted in the coalition of Fox and North. Lord Shelburne succeeded as prime minister (July 1782), but with only half of the Whigs behind him he very soon had to yield to the imposing strength of the coalition (February 1783). In 1784 he was created Marquis of Lansdowne, and for a time retired from active life. On the outbreak of the French Revolution

he joined the opposition ; but he never regained his former eminent position. Lord Albemarle says of him that " his insight into character was shrewd and generally accurate ; his eloquence was graceful and persuasive ; his knowledge of business, especially that which related to foreign affairs, was extensive."

Philip II, KING OF SPAIN (1527-98), though nominally sovereign of England, had only a brief and transient connexion with this country. He was affianced to Queen Mary in 1554, and celebrated his marriage with her in July of that year. Disgusted, however, with his wife, the country, and the parliamentary constitution, he left England in September 1555, never to return. In 1556 his father, Charles V, abdicated the crown of Spain in his favour.

Philpbaugh, THE BATTLE OF (September 13, 1645), was fought at a place two miles west of Selkirk, when Montrose's Highland army was surprised by David Leslie with 4,000 horse. Montrose himself escaped with a small portion of his force. The rest were cut to pieces.

Philippa, QUEEN (b. c. 1314, d. 1369), wife of Edward III, daughter of William, Count of Holland and Hainault, was married to Edward in 1328. She accompanied her husband to Flanders in 1338-40, and was with him during the siege of Calais in 1347, when she begged the lives of the burgesses condemned to death by Edward. She is said by the Flemish chroniclers to have supervised in person the defences of England against the Scots in 1346, and to have been present with the army at Neville's Cross ; but the story is of doubtful authenticity. She remained devoted to her own people, and was the patroness of Froissart, who spent five years in her service ; she enjoyed also great popularity in England, and was, says Froissart, " beloved of God and all men."

Phipps, SIR CONSTANTINE (1656-1723), defended Sacheverell (q.v.) in 1710, and was lord chancellor of Ireland from 1711 to 1714. He was an active Jacobite, and in 1713, by his efforts, won the Dublin elections for his party.

Pickering (or PUCKERING), SIR JOHN (1544-96), after having distinguished himself as a parliamentary lawyer, was elected Speaker of the House of Commons in 1584, and again in 1586. He was active in promoting the execution of Mary, Queen of Scots, and subsequently prosecuted Secretary Davison for the dispatch of the warrant for her death. He was counsel for the Crown on the occasion of the prosecutions of Philip Howard, Earl of Arundel, and Sir John Perrot for treason ; and in April 1592 he received the great seal with the title of lord keeper as the reward of his services to the queen, succeeding Sir Christopher Hatton. He maintained in his new position his reputation as a sound lawyer.

Picton, GENERAL SIR THOMAS (1758-1815), entered the army in 1771. In 1794 he was ordered to the West Indies ; and on the capture of St. Lucia, two years later, Sir Ralph Abercromby recommended him for the lieutenant-colonelcy of the 56th Foot, and soon afterwards appointed him governor of the island of Trinidad. In this capacity he allowed torture to be applied according to the Spanish law. Legal proceedings were instituted, and in 1805 he was found guilty by a jury in the Court of King's Bench. A new trial was, however, granted and the verdict was reversed in 1808. In 1809 he commanded a brigade in the Walcheren expedition, and was appointed governor of Flushing. Before he had recovered from a malarious fever, which he had contracted on this expedition, he was ordered to Portugal to command the 3rd Division, nicknamed the Fighting Division. At Badajoz he rendered most signal service. He was soon afterwards invalided, but resumed his command in time to share in the battle of Vitoria, where his division bore the brunt of the fighting. He was engaged in nearly all the battles of the Pyrenees and in the south of France. On the news of the escape of Napoleon from Elba, at Wellington's express desire Picton accepted a command in the Netherlands. At Quatre Bras he was with a very inferior force opposed to Ney, and for three hours sustained, unaided, a most obstinate contest. In this battle he received a wound, of which he told no one, lest he should be prevented from taking part in the greater battle, which he knew must soon take place. Accordingly he was present at Waterloo in command of the 5th Division, against which Napoleon launched one of his earliest and, as the Duke of Wellington testified, " one of his most serious attacks." As he was in the act of leading a charge he was struck by a musket-ball on the temple, and killed instantaneously. The story that the Duke of Wellington was on bad terms with Picton has been totally denied by the duke himself, who appreciated his qualities and solicited his services both in the Peninsula and in Flanders.

Picts, THE (i.e., Picti, or painted people), were the nation who in early times inhabited the north-eastern and northern parts of the modern Scotland. Their ethnology has been one of the most controverted points even in Celtic antiquities. But no one now believes that they were of Teutonic origin, and the general consensus seems to be that they were Celts of the Goidelic rather than of the Brythonic type. It has, however, been shown that not only some of their place-names, but also some of their customs, can hardly be of Aryan origin, and that consequently they were largely of "Ivernian" or pre-Aryan descent. But the term Picts, which is obviously of Roman origin, does not seem to be indicative of race, but to have been simply used to denote a group of people of various origin dwelling together, who ultimately became members of the same political organization. To the classical writers the term Pict simply meant the whole aggregate of the tribes dwelling to the north of the Roman walls, who at an earlier age were known as the Caledonii and Meatae. They never were subjugated by the Romans, and even when the Scots had occupied the western coast of Scotland they still held the region north of the Forth, and east of Drumalban, though at a later date Scandinavian conquests deprived them of the extreme north of the island. The range of mountains called the Mounth divided the northern from the southern Picts. There was also a third Pictish territory in Galloway, whose inhabitants, shut off by Brythonic tribes from their northern brethren, were called the Niduari Picts, and, curiously enough, retained the name long after it had become extinct north of the Forth. [CUMBRIA; GALLOWAY.] When they first became prominent in history as the devastators of the abandoned province, the Picts were mostly heathens. The Picts of Galloway had become at least partially converted to Christianity by the preaching of Ninian at the end of the fourth century. At the end of the sixth century the teaching of Columba established among the Picts the authority of the monastic and tribal church of Iona, and created intimate relations between the immigrant Scots and the race they had driven over Drumalban. About the same time a united Pictish monarchy seems to have grown up, with a peculiar rule of succession in the female line that was certainly pre-Aryan. Before long, however, the Picts were compelled to acknowledge fully the supremacy of the great Northumbrian monarchs of the seventh century. But the rash enterprise of Egfrid led to the Pictish victory of Dunnichen (Nechtansmere)—(q.v.), which again secured their freedom (685). In the next century the teaching of the missionary St. Bonifacius induced Nectan, King of the Picts, to expel the Columban clergy, and introduce the Roman usages (717). The result was constant war with the Scots, which, along with the Danish inroads, now become constant, reduced the Pictish kingdom to much misery. The history of the period after Bæda's invaluable work ends is very obscure. The Pictish law of succession especially exposed the state to the danger of foreign kings. At last, in 844, Kenneth MacAlpin, "the first of the Scots," established a new dynasty in the land of the Picts, which produced the political union of Picts and Scots. After the end of the ninth century there are no more kings of the Picts—or of Scöne, as, after its capital, the state was sometimes called—but of Alban. The whole of Scotland north of the Forth and Clyde was thus, except for the Norse jarldoms on coasts and islands, united, at least nominally, into a single state.

Pilgrimage of Grace was the name given to the insurrection in Yorkshire and Lincolnshire in 1536, caused chiefly by the ecclesiastical and other reforms of Henry VIII and Cromwell; in particular by the suppression of the smaller monasteries. It was headed by a young Lincolnshire gentleman, named Robert Aske (q.v.), and joined by most of the gentlemen and nobility of Yorkshire. The rebels mustered in great force and advanced towards York, which they occupied. Joined by the Archbishop of York, Lord Darcy, and the Percys, the rebels, 30,000 strong, moved southwards. At Doncaster they were met by the royal commissioners, the Earl of Shrewsbury and the Duke of Norfolk. A conference was held, and the rebels were induced by the terms offered to disband. But, finding that their demands were not really to be complied with, an insurrection broke out anew under Sir Francis Bigod. This was suppressed with great severity. Martial law was established in the north. Aske, Darcy, and twenty other leaders were seized (March 1537) and executed (June), and the movement was stamped out.

Pindari War, The (1817-18). The Pindaris were a body of freebooters, established in the Vindhya Hills, recruited from all nations and religions, and finding employment sometimes with the armies of native princes, sometimes in predatory excursions of their own. Their expeditions were of the most destructive character; all mounted and lightly armed they crossed the country in marches of from forty to fifty miles a day, fell upon the doomed district, carried off everything movable in it, and burnt the houses and crops. In 1815 the Pindaris crossed the Nerbudda, and ravaged the British possessions in the Deccan. Lord Hastings determined to end this, and prepared large armies in all the presidencies. The matter was complicated by the extensive conspiracy organized by Baji Rao (q.v.) and Appa Sahib (q.v.), and the treachery of Dowlat Rao Sindhia. The vigorous measures of Lord Hastings, however, broke up the conspiracy, and the Pindaris were beaten again and again (1817). Chitu Singh, their chief, however, with the remnant of his followers, to the number of 20,000, assembled in arms. The British forces were concentrated for a great attack; the Pindaris, seeing the hopelessness of resistance, fled; Chitu, deprived of his followers, sought refuge in the forests of Malwa, where he was devoured by a tiger; and the Pindaris submitted (1818).

Pinkie Cleuch, THE BATTLE OF (September 10, 1547), was fought during the Protector Somerset's campaign. The two forces were drawn up on each side of the Esk, the English under Somerset and Warwick, the Scots under the Earl of Huntly. The Scots crossed the river and at first gained the advantage, but were scattered by a great charge of the English.

Pipe Rolls, THE, or Great Rolls of the Exchequer, are preserved in the Record Office and are almost perfect from 2 Henry II to the present date. They relate to all matters connected with the revenue of the Crown, Crown lands, etc., and are of great value for historical and genealogical purposes. A Pipe Roll Society, for the publication of these documents, was formed in 1883, and, having published the rolls for Henry II's reign, has begun work on those for Richard I.

Pipewell, THE COUNCIL OF (1189), was held by Richard I, immediately after his coronation, to raise money and make other preparations for his crusade. Pipewell Abbey is in Northamptonshire, in the neighbourhood of Rockingham.

Pitcairn Island, so named from the midshipman who first observed it (1767), is famous as the scene of a notable social experiment. In April 1789 the crew of H.M.S. Bounty mutinied, owing to the harsh conduct of their commander, Captain Bligh (q.v.). After many adventures a party of the mutineers reached Pitcairn Island in the Pacific Ocean, where, together with some Polynesian women, they formed a settlement, remarkable for the orderly and exemplary conduct of its inhabitants. Their descendants inhabit the island to this day. The settlement was visited in 1839 by Captain Elliot, who gave such a favourable report of the state of the islanders that assistance was sent out to them by the government. In 1898 the island was placed within the jurisdiction of the high commissioner for the Western Pacific. In religion the islanders are Seventh Day Adventists.

Pitt, WILLIAM, 1ST EARL OF CHATHAM (November 15, 1708–May 11, 1778), was the grandson of a former governor of Madras, who had returned to England to buy estates and rotten boroughs, one of which, Old Sarum, he represented in parliament. His son Robert succeeded him, and sat in turn for the two boroughs of Old Sarum and Okehampton. Of Robert Pitt's two sons, William was the younger. He was educated at Eton and at Trinity College, Oxford, but he left Oxford, without taking a degree, to travel on the continent on account of the gout, to which he was throughout his life a victim. He came back from his tour to find his father dead and himself but slenderly provided for. As a profession he chose the army, and obtained a cornetcy in the Blues; but his family interest in 1735 procured for him the seat of Old Sarum. In April 1736 the Prince of Wales married Augusta, Princess of Saxegotha; and it was on the address which was presented to the king on this occasion that Pitt took the opportunity of delivering his first speech, which made a deep impression on the House. This impression was soon justified, as he became so troublesome to the government that Sir Robert Walpole dismissed him from the army. The Prince of Wales, however, recompensed him by making him his groom of the bedchamber, from which position he could in security declaim against the peace policy of the ministry. In 1742 Walpole resigned; and it was for some time doubtful who would succeed him. Pitt seems to have made overtures to Walpole, which the retiring minister rejected. From the new government that was formed under Carteret, Pitt was omitted. He vented his disappointment in the fiercest invectives against Walpole, and in advocating the most violent measures for his prosecution. All his violence failed to injure Sir Robert, now the Earl of Orford, who retired into private life, and left Pitt free to transfer his attacks to Carteret, who now held the reins. The chief object of his indignation was the prevailing method of subsidizing with British money petty German states, for the benefit of the family estates of the House of Brunswick. The old Duchess of Marlborough died in October 1744, and left Pitt a legacy of £10,000 in consideration of the noble defence he had made for the support of the laws of England, and to prevent the ruin of his country. But Pitt's ambition did not lie in the direction of money;

and on the elevation of Carteret to the House of Lords he saw a chance of advancement. To take advantage, however, of the chance, it was necessary for him to conciliate the king; and he accordingly resigned his office in the household of the Prince of Wales, and by the exertions of the Pelhams, against the king's wishes, he was appointed early in 1746 to the post of paymaster of the forces. The government continued in security until the death of Henry Pelham, in 1754, threw it into confusion. It devolved on the Duke of Newcastle to form a ministry. His great difficulty was as to the leadership of the House of Commons; and the rival claims of Pitt and Fox to that office were settled by a compromise in the person of Sir Thomas Robinson, an inoffensive mediocrity. Fox was appointed secretary-at-war, and Pitt retired to the lucrative pay office; but before a year was over they had combined to render their leader so ridiculous that Newcastle was compelled to make a change. Pitt was intractable on the subject of subsidies; and the duke turned to Fox, who became secretary of state, with the entire lead of the House of Commons and the management of the funds for corruption. On the resignation of Newcastle, in November 1756, the Duke of Devonshire succeeded him as first lord of the treasury, with Pitt as first secretary of state and virtual prime minister. The ministry was odious to the king, who said that he was not a king while he was "in the hands of these scoundrels"; and in April 1757 Pitt and Lord Temple were dismissed from their offices. But the contumely which Pitt had experienced from the court only served to raise him in the estimation of the country at large. The freedom of the City was granted to him; all the great towns of England followed the example set by the Corporation of London; and "for some weeks," says Walpole, "it rained gold boxes." During his short term of office Pitt found time and courage to pass several important measures, including his bold scheme of pacifying the discontented Highlanders by embodying them in the regular army. Newcastle having failed to form a ministry, an agreement was at length arrived at between the duke and Pitt, through the mediation of Lord Chesterfield. The king, however, refused to receive Pitt as a minister, and persuaded Lord Waldegrave to accept with great reluctance the premiership. But without Pitt it was impossible for any ministry to work; and Lord Waldegrave's broke up almost before it was formed. The king was obliged to yield to necessity. Newcastle took the treasury; Pitt became first secretary of state, with the lead of the Lower House; and Fox was silenced by the gains of the pay office. Pitt had told the Duke of Devonshire that he was sure he could save the country, and that no one else could. And he lost no time in setting about the task. His early plans, however, were not attended with success. An expedition against Rochefort failed through the bad management of the land forces. In Germany, Cumberland was compelled to sign the humiliating Convention of Kloster-Zeven (q.v.). In India, the conspicuous success of Clive in some measure compensated for these misfortunes. The war was vigorously carried on throughout 1758 in every part of the globe where Frenchmen could be found; still the year was marked by no great victories on either side. But in 1759 Pitt's energy, and his tact in choosing men, were everywhere rewarded by the successes by land and sea which marked that year of victory. These victories gave Pitt a position of extraordinary influence. He was known as the "Great Commoner"; and the Houses of Parliament no less than the people at large were hushed into awe and reverence by the success of his measures. But the death of George II on October 25, 1760, changed the face of affairs; and it was clear that the new king's partiality for Lord Bute would be more powerful than the nation's love of Pitt. In March 1761 parliament was dissolved; and with it the ministry began to break up. Bute was made second secretary of state in the place of Lord Holderness. But Pitt was determined, if possible, to save the country from a degrading peace; and he held on until finding his brother-in-law, Lord Temple, alone supported him in the council in his desire for war with France and Spain, he resigned on October 5, 1761. He had scorned all promotion and all gains for himself, but accepted a peerage for his wife, who was created Baroness Chatham. In November 1762 peace was made with France; and Bute could no longer stand before the open opposition of Pitt and the fury of the nation, and in April 1763 he resigned. A new ministry was formed out of the followers of the Duke of Bedford and those of Grenville, whose tenure of office was signalized by the prosecution of Wilkes, and the still more fatal attempt to tax the American colonies. Pitt meanwhile opposed all his eloquence to the doctrine of the legality of general warrants, and pointed out the mischief of Grenville's scheme for colonial taxation. His health became very bad, and he retired into the country and took no part in the debates on the Regency Bill. This bill, however, was the ruin of the Bedford ministry; and the king resolved to be rid of Grenville's bullying arrogance. Overtures were twice made to Pitt through the Duke of Cumberland; but they failed. He retired to his estate in Somersetshire, as if bent on finally withdrawing from public life; and the Rockingham ministry was formed. In January 1766 Pitt came up to London, and by his able assistance enabled the ministry to carry the repeal of the Stamp Act. The government was, however, too weak to stand; and in July Pitt at length consented to break with Temple, and to form a ministry without him. But he was suffering both mentally and physically: he could not stand the strain of the House of Commons; he accepted the privy seal, and was created Earl of Chatham.

It was felt throughout the country that he had been gained over to the court; and the popularity which had been so lavishly bestowed on him as the "Great Commoner" failed to follow him to the Upper House. His policy was as energetic and comprehensive as ever; but his mind was unbinged, and at last gave way so far as to incapacitate him for all public business. He was taken to Hayes, and remained there in gloomy seclusion for two years. In October 1768 he resigned the privy seal, and the ministry came to an end. Soon after his resignation Chatham's mental malady passed away before an attack of the gout sharper than usual. In July 1769 he once more appeared at court, after a reconciliation had been effected with the Grenvilles, and in the following January he again took his place among the Lords. He had lost none of his old power, and his first speech, inveighing against the policy pursued by the government towards America and in relation to the Middlesex election, was the signal for the resignation of Lord Camden and the Marquis of Granby. The Duke of Grafton himself, wearied by the continual onslaughts made upon him, and finding it impossible any longer to prop up his falling ministry, sent in his resignation on January 29. Lord North proceeded to form a ministry after the king's own heart, which would be content to carry out the king's wishes. Wilkes and America continued to be the chief topics; North adhered to the policy of his predecessors in both questions, and Chatham continued to wage war against him. He warmly advocated the repeal of the Test Acts, for which a bill was introduced. During the greater part of 1773 he employed himself in the study of India, and became strongly convinced of the "necessity of a reformation of Indian iniquities." But as the clouds every month thickened in America they dispelled all other thoughts, and caused him more and more to dread the application of coercion to the colonists. The Boston Port Bill heightened his alarm; and in May 1774 he appeared in parliament "to stand for England and America." In January 1775 he moved an address to the king, praying him to adopt a conciliatory policy towards America by removing the forces from Boston, and he followed up this motion by presenting to parliament a plan for the prevention of civil war. The object of his conduct was, as he himself briefly expressed it, "to secure to the colonies property and liberty, and to ensure to the mother country a due acknowledgment on the part of the colonies of their subordination to the supreme legislative authority and superintending power of the parliament of Great Britain." As long as there was any hope of the attainment of these two ends, Chatham was as warm an advocate as anyone for granting liberty to the colonies; but when the news of the capitulation of Burgoyne came in December 1777, followed almost immediately by the announcement of the alliance of America and France, it became clear that the Americans would be content with nothing short of entire independence; and Chatham was as firm in his opposition to this concession as he had been zealous in favour of granting them liberty and justice. At this point Chatham broke away from his long agreement with Rockingham's party, and carried Shelburne with him. On April 7, 1778, he made his last speech in parliament; and the effort was too much for him. He was carried to Hayes, and there died on May 11. A monument was raised to him in Westminster Abbey at the expense of the nation. Lord Chatham was essentially a war minister. It has been said of him that whenever a cannon in Europe was fired he required to know the reason. The epitaph on his monument in Westminster Abbey says, truly enough, that during his administration Great Britain was exalted "to a height of prosperity and glory unknown to any former age."

[W. R. S.]

Pitt, WILLIAM (1759-1806), the second son of William Pitt, 1st Earl of Chatham, and Lady Hester Grenville, was born May 28, 1759, and very early gave signs of his future greatness in his marvellous precocity. In 1773 he went up to Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, where his industry led him to devour mathematics and classics. He left Cambridge soon after his father's death, and, being called to the bar in 1780, went the Western Circuit. But in the autumn of that year a general election took place, and Pitt was returned to parliament for Appleby. In the following February he made his first speech in favour of Burke's plan for economical reform. His power was recognized at once; Fox proclaimed him one of the first men in parliament. He continued to gain influence and admiration by every speech he made. Early in December news came of Cornwallis's surrender in America, and Pitt seized the opportunity to attack the government. The ministry resigned, and was succeeded by Rockingham's cabinet. Pitt was offered the vice-treasurership of Ireland; but he knew his own value, and declined the offer, which would not have given him a seat in the cabinet. He nevertheless supported the government till Rockingham's death. Then followed Lord Shelburne's brief tenure of office, succeeded by the Fox-North coalition. When that came to an end in December 1783 the king invited Pitt to form a government. Never had a prime minister a more difficult task before him. In December the majority against him was almost two to one; but such was Pitt's resolution and tact that by March 5, 1784, it had dwindled, after sixteen divisions, to a bare majority of one. The country at large was vehement in its support of the government, and the City of London presented Pitt with its freedom. Pitt now dissolved the parliament, and government candidates were everywhere returned. Pitt at twenty-four "domineered absolutely over the cabinet, and was the favourite at once of the sovereign, the parliament, and the nation." Already in 1782 he had demanded an inquiry into the system of parliamentary representation. When, however, he was in power with a large majority at his back he was prevented by the king's strenuous opposition from again introducing the subject, and the French Revolution soon had the effect of driving the mere notion of reform of any kind out of men's minds. He nevertheless did make an effort in that direction when, in 1785, he introduced a bill "to amend the representation of the people of England in parliament." During his first eight years of power, Pitt enjoyed a time of tranquillity and peace, when there were no wars being carried on by England, at any rate at a nearer distance than India, and the country and parliament alike were anxious to see carried out some of the numerous reforms which had been so often talked about. The first of these measures which Pitt approached was the vexed question of Indian government, which had proved the death of the coalition ministry. Pitt's India Bill (1784) was quite successful, and was followed by his scheme for the reduction of the National Debt. In 1786 began the measures for the impeachment of Warren Hastings (q.v.). Pitt took no active part in, though he gave his support to, the prosecution. In 1788 the king fell ill, and Pitt, supporting the constitutional view of the regency question against Fox, who warmly took up the cause of the Prince of Wales, attached himself more firmly than ever to George III. In the same year he advocated with all his eloquence a bill for the abolition of the slave trade. When the French Revolution broke out Pitt appeared in a new light. For the remaining years of his life he was chiefly engaged in leading the European opposition to France. His war administration, however, was far from fortunate, and his military enterprises were ill-planned and unsuccessful. But at home he still held his own in the confidence of his countrymen. He saw the immediate necessity for the union of Ireland with Great Britain; but the king's narrow-minded obstinacy prevented him combining Union with Catholic Emancipation, which alone, he said, would make the Union effectual. But Pitt was not the man to be balked in his endeavours to fulfil a promise; and, as he could not have his own way in the matter, he resigned, in 1801, the post which he had held so triumphantly for seventeen years. With him went all the able members of his administration. "All that was left to the king was to call up the rear ranks of the old ministry to form the front rank of a new ministry." Addington became prime minister, and for a time seemed to succeed, chiefly by the help of Pitt, who supported him, and by the conclusion of a peace with France in the Treaty of Amiens (1802). But the real incapacity of Addington, combined with the restless ambition of Bonaparte, at length compelled Pitt to assume a different attitude towards the ministry. Parliament and the nation at large looked to Pitt as the only man who could save the country in the event of the war which it was seen must soon be continued with France. Addington felt the pressure on all sides, but tried to come to terms with Pitt which would still leave him in the possession of a large share of power. In May 1803 Pitt emerged from the retirement in which he had been living, and made a great speech, defending the declaration of war. In April 1804 Addington resigned. Pitt was commanded to form a ministry. He desired a broad government, which should include all the highest talent in the kingdom—Fox, Grenville, Windham, and others. But the king's obstinacy once more defeated an excellent scheme. Pitt yielded, and formed a Tory administration. Most strenuous efforts were made both at home and by the development of foreign combinations, to avert the threatening danger; and the glorious victory of Trafalgar in October 1805 crushed the French navy. But the close of Pitt's career is melancholy. The opposition, which had refrained from any factious resistance to the war policy of the government, in April 1805 proposed a vote of censure on Lord Melville for mismanagement of the navy while treasurer under Pitt's former administration. Pitt stood by his old friend; but the Speaker's casting vote decided a division against the accused. Pitt regarded the adverse vote as almost a vote of censure on himself, and was quite crushed. In the following July parliament was prorogued; but the war was carried on with Napoleon's usual activity. In September Pitt had the satisfaction of negotiating with Russia and Austria a general coalition against Napoleon, who in reply made every preparation for invading England. Circumstances, however, prevented him from carrying out that scheme, and he turned his attention to the continent. The capitulation of the Austrian army at Ulm on October 20 was the first result of this change of plan. The news proved a death-blow to Pitt, which even the news of Trafalgar four days later could not avert. The next day, at the lord mayor's dinner, he spoke the last words he was ever to utter in public. In December he retired to Bath to rest; but the news of Austerlitz (December 2) completed the breakdown of his health. He was just able to travel to London in January for the opening of parliament on the 21st; but when he arrived at Putney he was too ill to attend, and two days later, on January 23, 1806, he died. Pitt has been justly called the man of parliamentary government. No man ever, from his earliest appearance in the House of Commons to his latest days, exercised so absolute a sway over that assembly. By his incorruptible integrity, conspicuously displayed during nineteen years, he did more than any one man to crush out the corruption in high places which had prevailed during the first eighty years of the eighteenth century.

Place, FRANCIS (1771-1854), was one of the greatest of English Radicals. His father kept a private debtors' prison in London. Francis was apprenticed at fourteen to a leather-breeches maker and eventually became a journeyman. His great organizing ability first showed itself in the management of a three-months' strike among the journeymen of his trade. The strike failed and a time of direst poverty followed for Place, who was boycotted by the masters. His passion for education showed itself in his omnivorous reading during this period of unemployment and semi-starvation. He also organized clubs and friendly societies in various trades in 1794-5. In 1794 he became an active member of the London Corresponding Society, but left in the next year over the question of tactics. He then built up a business of his own, and in 1799 opened a shop at 16 Charing Cross, which was so successful that he retired from trade in 1817. He took an active share in Westminster politics, and in 1807 and 1810 successfully organized the campaign of the Radical Sir William Burdett. He came into contact with Spence, Owen, and other leading Radicals, and became intimate with James Mill and Bentham. He took a keen interest in elementary education and helped to organize Lancastrian schools in London. His greatest work was to secure the repeal of the Combination Acts of 1799-1800. He did this in 1824 through the instrumentality of Joseph Hume (q.v.), who became his lieutenant and the exponent of all his schemes in parliament. By this time he was the chief source of Radical opinion and organization in London and built up a great collection of facts and statistics (now in the British Museum) on social problems, on which the Radicals drew for speeches and propaganda. In 1830-2 he helped to organize the agitation for reform in London, chiefly through the National Political Union; and in the "days of May" he devised the scheme of a run on the banks to force the hand of Wellington. After the Reform Act he took part in numerous movements, and in 1838 helped to draw up the "People's Charter"; but he did not share actively in the Chartist movement itself. Domestic and financial troubles and ill-health gradually weakened his connexion with organized politics, and he died almost forgotten.

Place Bills. THE FIRST (1692) was a measure congenial to the Tory reformers of William III's reign. Its object was summarily to exclude all placemen from the House of Commons. "Nobody thought of drawing a line between the few functionaries who ought to be allowed to sit in the House of Commons and the crowd of functionaries who ought to be shut out. A member who was to be chosen after 1693 was not to accept any place whatever." The bill was violently opposed in the Upper House, Marlborough making a great speech in its support. When the question was put, 42 were in its favour and 44 against it. Proxies were called, however, and the bill was lost by three votes. Next year the bill was introduced again, and again easily passed the Commons. It provided that no member of the House of Commons elected after January 1, 1694, should accept any place of profit under the Crown, on pain of forfeiting his seat, and of being incapable of sitting again in the same parliament. The Lords added the wise amendment, "unless he be afterwards chosen to serve in the same parliament." The Commons agreed to this amendment. William, who appears to have misunderstood the nature of the bill, refused his assent. The angry Commons first passed an address, affirming that those who had advised the king on this occasion were public enemies; and then, on the motion of Harley, appointed a committee to draw up a representation to the king. William, however, in his reply, yielded nothing. "Thus ended, more happily than William had a right to expect, one of the most dangerous contests in which he ever engaged with his parliament." In 1694 the bill was introduced again into the Commons. It was thrice read, but on the third reading was rejected by 33 votes. The result of the bill would have been to cause parliament and the administration to stand against each other as two distinct bodies.

THE SECOND (1743) was originally proposed by Samuel Sandys, but subsequently opposed by him on the ground that George II was antagonistic to the measure. Derided though it was at the time, it had considerable effect; excluding a great number of inferior officers from the House of Commons, which has never since contained so revolting a list of court-deputies as it did in the age of Walpole.

THE THIRD took the form of a resolution that certain officers of the household should be disqualified from sitting in the House of Commons. This resolution passed the Commons on April 10, 1780, by a majority of two, four days after Dunning's famous motion regarding the influence of the Crown.

Plague, THE GREAT (1665), was the most severe of a series of bubonic epidemics which had begun with the Black Death (1347) (q.v.) and recurred at intervals throughout the Lancastrian and Tudor periods. The sweating sickness (q.v.) of 1506, 1517, 1528, and 1551, and the epidemics of 1625 and 1647 (in the last of which over 30,000 lives had been lost) were unusually severe. The Great Plague began in April 1665 and lasted until the very end of the year, reaching its height (with over a thousand deaths daily) in the middle of September. The population of London at the time was under half a million: and of the poor people who remained after the court and the wealthier classes had fled to Oxford and elsewhere, over 100,000 perished. The official Mortality Bills, which place the death-roll at under 70,000, are quite untrustworthy. The symptoms exhibited by the sufferers varied: some were taken by a chill, others contracted a fever, others again fell into a stupor and died without waking; but all betrayed the sinister plague-spots. Medical science was utterly at a loss to cope with the outbreak, and could rise no higher than bleeding, hot blankets, and ineffectual drugs. The severity of the visitation was increased by the squalid and overcrowded conditions of the poorer parishes, where open sewers were common and drinking-streams ran frequently through graveyards; by the fact that cases of plague were hushed up on account of the family's fear of social ostracism; by the unscrupulous tactics of the elderly female "searchers"; by the absence of any nurses save volunteers driven by fear of starvation to undertake paid nursing; by the neglect of the authorities to form isolation camps outside the city; by the ignorance of doctors and surgeons; and by the infection spread by those who fled from stricken houses before the premises were shut up with the remaining inhabitants—whole and plague-stricken alike—inside. In the summer the epidemic was carried from London (in a bundle of infected clothing) to Eyam in Derbyshire.

Plantagenet, the name by which the house of Anjou is generally known, is derived from planta genista, the broom-plant, a sprig of which was usually worn on his cap by Geoffrey of Anjou, father of Henry II. It is doubtful whether this custom of his is to be taken to indicate his love of field-sports, or as a sign that he was not ashamed of the humble origin of the house of Anjou, which had for its founder a woodman of Rennes. Plassey, THE BATTLE OF (June 23, 1757), was fought by Clive against the troops of Suraj-ud-Dowlah (q.v.) in the campaign undertaken to avenge the massacre of the Black Hole of Calcutta (q.v.). Clive, having concluded his arrangements with Mir Jafar (q.v.), addressed a letter to Suraj-ud-Dowlah, recapitulating the grievances which the British had to complain of, and stating that he was coming to Murshidabad to arrange them. He set out from Chandernagore on June 13 with an army of 800 Europeans, 2,000 natives, and ten pieces of cannon. Mir Jafar, however, proved faithless, and on the 19th the rains set in with great violence.

Clive saw that he had advanced too far to recede, and that there would be more danger in retiring than proceeding. Accordingly he called a council of war on the question, and it was almost unanimously decided not to risk an action. In spite of this, however, on June 22 the British force crossed the Hugli, and at midnight encamped in a grove of mango-trees at Plassey. In the morning the nawab's troops, headed by a body of fifty Frenchmen, were in motion, and the assault began with a furious cannonade. The British escaped the shots by sitting down under cover of a high bank. About noon a slight shower damaged the enemy's powder. They were compelled to withdraw their artillery, and Clive advanced vigorously to the attack of their lines. In spite of the gallantry of the French, Clive was able to storm the camp, rout the whole army, and pursue them for about six miles. The enemy, it is supposed, lost about 500 men; the British only 36. The nawab, influenced by the conspirators, had been the first to fly, and, mounted on a camel and followed by about 2,000 horse, bore to his capital the news of his disgrace.

Platen, MADAME DE, was a sister of Charlotte, Countess of Darlington [KILMANSEGGE], the mistress of George I. We find the sisters supporting Carteret against Walpole and Townshend, who relied on the influence of the Duchess of Kendal. She received a bribe of £10,000 to facilitate the passing of the South Sea Bill. In 1723 a marriage was arranged between her daughter and the Count of St. Florentin, but the countess required as a condition that a dukedom should be granted to the bridegroom. This Carteret, as secretary for the Southern Department, exerted himself to obtain from the Duke of Orleans. Horace Walpole was thereupon sent by his brother to Paris to counteract the intrigue. Madame de Platen was ultimately consoled by a portion of £10,000 from George, but the interference of Walpole caused Carteret to retire to the lord-lieutenancy of Ireland.

Playhouse Bill, THE (1737), was brought forward by Sir Robert Walpole in order to check the indecency of the stage. His Playhouse Act was an amendment to the Vagrant Act of Queen Anne's reign. It declared, says Lord Stanhope, that any actor without a legal settlement, or a licence from the lord chamberlain, should be deemed a rogue and a vagabond. To the lord chamberlain it gave legal power instead of customary privilege; authorizing him to prohibit the representation of any drama at his discretion, and compelling all authors to send copies of their plays fourteen days before they were acted, under forfeiture of £50, and of the licence of the house. Moreover it restrained the number of playhouses by enjoining that no person should have authority to act except within the liberties of Westminster, and where the king should reside. The bill was carried in spite of the vigorous opposition of Lord Chesterfield; and its effect in subjecting all plays acted to the previous examination of the lord chamberlain and the officials appointed by him has never been undone.

Pleas, THE COURT OF COMMON, or COMMON BENCH, began at the opening of the thirteenth century to separate off from the main body of the curia regis (q.v.). The 17th article of Magna Carta provided that "common pleas shall not follow the court, but be held in some fixed place." In the early part of the reign of Henry III it was already distinguished as having cognizance of the private suits of subjects, and as keeping its own records in the form of the "de Banco" Rolls. The Court of Common Pleas was ordinarily held at Westminster. In the reign of Edward I the barons of the Exchequer were forbidden to interfere in its jurisdiction, and from the beginning of that reign commences a regular series of chief justices of Common Pleas. A full bench consisted of the chief justice and of four (after 31 & 32 Vict. of five) puisne judges. This court had a concurrent jurisdiction with the Queen's Bench and Exchequer in personal actions and ejectment. It had an exclusive jurisdiction in real actions. Under the Parliamentary Elections Act of 1868, and under the Railway and Canal Act of 1853, it also received appeals from the revising barristers' courts. Appeals from this court formerly lay to the King's Bench, but were transferred by 21 Geo. IV and 1 Will. IV to the judges of the King's Bench and the barons of the Exchequer sitting in the Exchequer Chamber. The exclusive jurisdiction of the court was maintained by the Judicature Act of 1873, for the Common Pleas Division, but in virtue of s. 31 it has since been merged by order of council in the general jurisdiction of the High Court of Justice.

Plunket, WILLIAM CONYNGHAM, 1ST BARON (1764-1854), the son of a Presbyterian minister, was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and in 1787 was called to the Irish bar. In 1807 he became member of parliament for Midhurst; in 1812 for Dublin University. He was one of the most brilliant speakers in an age of orators. He was not a Whig, but a follower of Lord Grenville. In 1821, after Grattan's death, he became the chief promoter of Catholic emancipation (q.v.) in parliament. He had before been solicitor-general, and in 1822 became attorney-general, for Ireland. In this capacity he proceeded ex officio against the promoters of the "Bottle Plot" (q.v.), and his conduct was criticized in parliament, but he was able to vindicate it successfully. In 1827 Canning tried to get him made lord chancellor of Ireland, but the king refused. He was, however, made lord chief justice of the Irish Court of Common Pleas, and a peer. In 1830

he became lord chancellor of Ireland, and held the office for eleven years.

Biography by his grandson, 1867.

Poitiers, THE BATTLE OF (September 19, 1356), was the second of Edward the Black Prince's great victories over the French. In 1355 the truce which had been concluded for eight years came to an end. The Black Prince crossed to Bordeaux, and at the head of a great army, composed largely of mercenaries, marched up the Garonne, plundering the country as he went. After penetrating as far as Narbonne he made his way back to Bordeaux, where he kept Christmas. In the following year he directed his attention to the north, and in August marched towards the Loire; but near Poitiers he found his way barred by a large force under King John of France. The prince's army is said not to have exceeded 7,000; but it was strongly posted behind ditches, hedges, and vineyards, of which the last were lined with archers. His offers to treat were rejected, and the French horse pressed on to the attack up a lane or cart-track which pierced the protecting hedge on the English right. But they fell back in confusion before the arrows of the English. The main body of the French army fought, however, on foot, and advanced in four "battles" to the encounter. The first and second battles were repulsed by the English after a hard struggle, and their defeat resulted in the flight from the field of the third, led by the Duke of Orleans. The last of the four, which was commanded by the king himself, put up a strong resistance, but the tide was finally turned in the English favour by Edward's expedient of sending a detachment under the Captal de Buch to attack the French rear. The raid was complete. Large numbers of the French were killed, and among the crowd of prisoners was King John himself.

Pole, ARTHUR (1531-70?), eldest son of Sir Geoffrey Pole, attempted in 1562 to form a conspiracy in conjunction with his brother, Edmund Pole, and with the aid of the Duke of Guise, against Elizabeth, offering in case of his success to sink his own claims to the throne in favour of Mary, Queen of Scots. The plot was discovered before it came to anything, and Pole was sent to the Tower, and condemned though not executed. He died in the Tower. His claims to the throne, by which he hoped to win over a large number of adherents, were derived from George, Duke of Clarence, brother of Edward IV.

Pole, EDMUND DE LA, EARL OF SUFFOLK (1472?-1513), was the son of John de la Pole, 2nd Duke of Suffolk, by Elizabeth, eldest sister of Edward IV. For consenting to take service under Henry VII he was created Earl of Suffolk, and allowed to redeem a portion of the estates of his father. A few years later he was guilty of homicide, and resenting the notion of being tried for the crime as a deadly insult, he fled to Flanders, and entered into active relations with the Dowager Duchess of Burgundy. Henry, however, persuaded him to return, but in the following year he again fled to Flanders, this time with a view to restoring his broken fortunes by some private enterprise. On the shipwreck of the Archduke Philip in January 1506, Henry did not hesitate to insist upon his surrender as a main article of the treaty he then extorted from Philip. He was at once committed to the Tower, from which he did not emerge again till the day of his execution in 1513. It is supposed that his execution at this date was chiefly due to Henry VIII's anger at his brother, Richard de la Pole, entering the service of France.

Pole, JOHN DE LA, EARL OF LINCOLN (d. 1487), was the son of John de la Pole, 2nd Duke of Suffolk by Elizabeth, sister of Edward IV. On the strength of the attainder of the Duke of Clarence and the stigma of illegitimacy cast upon Edward IV's children, the Earl of Lincoln had cherished hopes of an eventual succession to the crown of England, and was recognized by Richard III as his lawful successor. The accession, therefore, of Henry VII to the throne, after the victory of Bosworth, was especially distasteful to him, and, though ostensibly reconciled to the new monarch, he eagerly associated himself with his more active opponents. The imposture of Simnel appeared so peculiarly adapted to further his ambitious projects that he lost no time in giving it a personal and most energetic support, crossing over himself to Flanders for the purpose of collecting troops and funds. In Ireland, whither he went from Flanders, the Earl of Lincoln met with so enthusiastic a reception that he was encouraged to transport his forces with all speed to England. But he was greeted with indifference when he appeared at Fouldsey, in Lancashire. He pushed rapidly southwards in the direction of Newark, with a mixed force of Irish and English, a regiment of "Almains," 2,000 strong, commanded by Martin Schwarz (q.v.), an officer of considerable reputation. The king's forces advanced against him, and a bloody and obstinate battle was fought at Stoke (q.v.), near Newark (June 16, 1487), which resulted in the complete defeat of de la Pole's forces, and his own death.

Pole, MICHAEL DE LA, EARL OF SUFFOLK (d. 1389), was the son of William de la Pole, a Hull merchant, who had risen to be a baron of the Exchequer. He early succeeded in ingratiating himself with Richard II, and in 1383 was appointed chancellor. He was extremely unpopular with the barons, and the misgovernment of the kingdom was in great measure attributed to him. He was created Earl of Suffolk in 1385, and this still further increased his unpopularity, so that in 1386 the king was obliged to remove him from the chancellorship, and the Commons drew up articles of impeachment against him. The charges preferred were for the most part frivolous, but his condemnation was determined on, and he was sentenced to imprisonment till he should ransom himself according to the king's pleasure. After the dissolution of parliament an attempt was made by the king and his friends to annul their decisions, but the barons were too powerful for them, and finding resistance of no avail, de la Pole fled in 1387 to France, where he died two years later. In the meantime, in the "Merciless Parliament" (q.v.) of 1388, he had, at the instigation of Thomas of Gloucester and the lords appellant, been condemned and sentenced to forfeiture.

Pole, REGINALD, CARDINAL (1500-58), was the son of Sir Richard Pole, by Margaret, daughter of George, Duke of Clarence, brother of Edward IV. Though educated for the Church and destined for the highest ecclesiastical preferments, he gave up all his prospects rather than acquiesce in the divorce of Queen Katharine and the separation of England from the papacy. He retired to Italy, and was made a cardinal by Paul III. He was the intimate associate of Contarini and the early reformers of Catholicism; had an important share in the business of the Curia, and, it is said, narrowly missed the papal chair. He took a leading part in the Council of Trent, though that assembly condemned his doctrine of justification. He never lost sight of England; wrote a book against Henry; constantly stirred up the Catholic powers against him, and was the leading representative of English Catholicism in Europe. At last the reaction under Mary restored him to England as papal legate and Archbishop of Canterbury (March 1556). He was the queen's leading adviser in ecclesiastical affairs, though he is said to have been averse to some of the more brutal aspects of her persecutions. Towards the end of his life he was involved in a quarrel with Paul IV, who deprived him of his legatine position.

Pole, WILLIAM DE LA, 4TH EARL AND 1ST DUKE OF SUFFOLK (1396-1450), grandson of Michael de la Pole, served with distinction in the French wars, and took part in the battle of Verneuil and the siege of Orleans. He was one of the ambassadors at the Congress of Arras in 1435, and was the chief promoter of the marriage of Henry VI with Margaret of Anjou, for arranging which he received a marquise in 1445, and four years later he was made a duke. From 1445 he was practically chief minister, and was strongly inclined towards a peace policy, which brought great odium upon him, while the terms of the marriage treaty which he had negotiated were greatly in favour of France, Anjou and Maine being ceded to King René, the father of Margaret. Suffolk's great rival was Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester, whom he accused to the king of treachery. Gloucester was arrested in February 1447, and his suspicious death shortly afterwards was popularly attributed to Suffolk. Suffolk's administration was extremely unfortunate; disaster followed disaster abroad, while at home taxation was heavy, and misery and desolation prevailed. The popular anger against Suffolk culminated in 1450. The Commons brought grave charges against him. He was accused of gross mismanagement and treachery in France, of wishing to marry his son to Margaret Beaufort, thereby securing the crown for his descendants, and of appropriating and misusing the royal revenue. Suffolk, while denying the charges, placed himself at the king's disposal, who, without declaring his guilt or innocence, banished him from the realm for five years. It would seem that Suffolk assented to this rather than inculpate the king and the council by awaiting his trial at the hands of the Lords. On his way to the continent he was seized by the crew of a ship which was lying in wait for him off Dover, and barbarously put to death by them as a traitor. He married Alice, daughter and heiress of Thomas Chaucer, and probably a granddaughter of the poet.

J. Gairdner, Introduction to "Paston Letters," 1904.

Police System, THE, developed slowly in England, though on the continent the Emperor Charles V is reputed to have been the first ruler to institute police. The chief antecedents of the modern police system are to be found in the Statute of Watch and Ward (1285), and statutes passed in 1585, 1737, and 1777, all of which dealt with London alone. The crying need for a regular police force continued, however, until the foundation of the Metropolitan Police in 1829 by Sir Robert Peel, then home secretary. The scheme had to live down much opposition, and was widely denounced as an instrument of despotism. But by 1835 it had proved its worth. In that year the Municipal Corporations Act established Borough Constabularies. County Police were instituted in 1839-40, and made compulsory by the Police Act of 1856. Stipendiary magistrates and the Metropolitan Police Courts were regulated by statute in 1839, 1840, and 1858.

Polish Question (1831-2). At the outbreak of the Polish rebellion Great Britain warmly sympathized with the rebels. At the same time Palmerston, occupied with the Belgian question, steadily refused to assist the Poles except by suggestions to Russia. But that power knew he would not interfere by arms, and his remonstrances were treated with derision. He made another attempt to obtain mercy for the Poles after the fall of Warsaw, but Nesselrode briefly informed him that the only obligation incumbent on Russia by the Treaty of Vienna was the duty of maintaining the union, and that the constitution was a grace of the emperor, which had been forfeited by rebellion. In 1831, however, the woes of Poland attracted the attention of the House of Commons. But these attacks produced no result. The feeling in favour of the Poles grew as the news of the Russian cruelties was brought home, and in July 1833 Cullar Fergusson moved an address to the Crown in favour of the Poles. Palmerston, however, opposed this, urging that the British government could not do more than it had done, unless it declared war, and that the latter course would be hardly advisable. However, the most violent language was applied to Russia and her emperor in parliament, and the feeling against them became so strong that later in the session the ministry was compelled to give way and grant a sum of £10,000 for the relief of the Polish exiles.

— (1863). The Polish question arose again when news of the Polish insurrection of 1863, and its sanguinary suppression, excited great indignation in Great Britain and France. France was ready for intervention if Great Britain would join. Earl Russell went to the extent of drawing up, in concert with France and Austria, a note on the subject, urging on the Russian government six points as the outline of a pacification of Poland. These were—a complete amnesty, a national representation, a distinct national administration of Poles for the kingdom of Poland, full liberty of conscience, with the repeal of all the restrictions imposed on Catholic worship, the recognition of the Polish language as official, and the establishment of a regular system of recruiting. Lord Palmerston, however, refused to hear of anything like armed intervention. When Russia learnt that the note was a mere unsupported suggestion, she treated it coolly and contemptuously. The question, however, was brought up in the House of Commons by P. Hennessy. The result was a hot debate, in which Disraeli, Palmerston, Walpole, Stansfeld, Lord Robert Cecil, and others, vied with each other in expressing detestation of these barbarities. A great meeting was held on the subject at the Guildhall, at which similar indignant speeches were delivered. Nothing, however, was done by the government beyond the dispatch of the note.

Ponsonby, JOHN WILLIAM, 4TH EARL OF BESSBOROUGH (1781-1847), better known as Lord Duncannon, entered parliament for Knaresborough in 1805. He was an active member of the Whig party for many years, and had a considerable share in drafting the Reform Bill. In 1831 he was made chief commissioner of woods and forests, and in 1834 he received the seals of the home office, and in 1835 the privy seal. In 1846 the Earl of Bessborough was appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland by Lord John Russell. His accession was very popular, as he was a resident Irish landlord, and had always displayed a patriotic and liberal interest in Irish affairs. His vicerealty extended over the period of the great famine, and his efforts were earnestly directed to the alleviation of that calamity. He died in May 1847, during his tenure of office.

Pontage was a duty imposed upon all freemen for the making and repairing of bridges, and is the same as the "brig-bot" of Anglo-Saxon times. In a charter of Edward I to certain foreign merchants we find them exempted from "pontage."

Poor, ROGER LE (or, ROGER PAUPER), was the son of Roger, Bishop of Salisbury. By his father's influence he was made chancellor by King Stephen in 1135, but in 1139 he was, together with many other ministers, arrested by the king. He was carried to Devizes, where his cousin Nigel, Bishop of Ely, was holding out against the royal troops, and the threat that, unless he surrendered, his cousin should be put to death before his eyes had the intended effect. After remaining in captivity for some time Roger was released on condition of quitting the kingdom, to which he never returned.

Poor Law, THE (IRELAND). There was no legal provision for the Irish poor previous to the year 1828, though some two and a half millions were annually spent in charity. In 1838 the English system was introduced, and though the Irish were, and are, especially unwilling to enter a poor-house, it on the whole succeeded. During the famine, indeed, the poorer unions were very soon bankrupt, and parliament was more than once called on to relieve them. At last, in 1849, the Rate in Aid Bill was passed, by which, to relieve the poor districts of Connaught, a general rate all over Ireland was resorted to, government lending £100,000 for the relief of immediate distress, on this security.

Poor Laws is the name which has been given to the legislation providing for the relief and maintenance of the destitute. In mediæval England the care of the helpless poor was undertaken generally by the lords of manors, the parochial clergy, the monasteries, and religious gilds, and in the case of poor craftsmen by the trade gilds. After the Black Death in 1349 (q.v.) the surviving labourers refused to work except at higher wages. By an ordinance of the same year (the first of the many "Statutes of Labourers") an attempt was made to force all able-bodied men to work, and almsgiving to "sturdy" or "valiant" beggars was forbidden. In the act of 1388, confirming the Statute of Labourers, appears the first germ of a law of settlement. The labourer was thereby forbidden to leave his place of service, or to wander about the country without a passport; impotent beggars were to remain where they were at the passing of the act, or if not there provided for, to seek a maintenance within their hundreds, or in the places where they were born. In the acts of 1495 and 1504 it was further provided that beggars should be "sent to the place where they were born, or have dwelt, or are best known, to support themselves by begging within the hundred."

In the sixteenth century the break-up of the system of the manor and craft-gild, the dissolution of the monasteries and religious gilds, and the increase of prices owing to debasement of the coinage, made the question of pauperism much more pressing than it had ever been before, and some systematic attempt to provide relief was necessary to prevent social anarchy. [It is interesting to observe how closely parliament in its legislation followed successful experiments in municipal poor relief, e.g., in Norwich and London.] In 1536 it was enacted that while the "lusty" poor might be "daily kept on continual labour," the poor who were not able to work should be provided for. For this purpose the congregation of each parish was to be exhorted to charitable offerings, and a book was to be kept by the clergy showing how the money was spent. In 1551 collectors of alms at church on Sunday were to be appointed, and persons refusing to subscribe were to be expostulated with by the bishop. By a later act the bishop was empowered to send them before the justices, who, if persuasion failed, could impose upon them the payment of a definite amount. It was not, however, till the passage of the legislation of 1597-1601 that a general compulsory rating was substituted for semi-voluntary contribution. [The act of 1601, which was a re-enactment with certain not very important alterations of an act of 1597, was the foundation of the English Poor Law]. It ordered the nomination by the justices of two or three overseers in each parish, who were empowered to raise the amount necessary for the relief of the poor by taxing every inhabitant. The act drew a clear distinction between able-bodied poor unwilling to labour, or unable to find employment, who were to be set to work, and impotent poor unable to work, who were to be relieved. Persons able but refusing to labour were to be committed to prison. [There followed a period of nearly half a century of parental government, which has become famous for the zeal exercised by the council in supervising the poor-law activities of the local magistrates.]

[The old Tudor laws of settlement, which provided for the return of new arrivals in a parish to their old homes, if they were rogues or were not self-supporting, seems to have lapsed after the passage of the statutes of 1597 and 1601, which omitted to renew them in the general codification.] A much more severe law of settlement began with an act of 1662. This authorized the justices, upon complaint of the overseers, made within forty days of a person's coming to a strange parish, to order him to be removed to his own place of settlement, unless he could give securities to the parish against becoming chargeable to it. The natural result of this act was to keep the poor to their own parishes, and to prevent labour going where it was needed. ["For more than a hundred and thirty years the nine-tenths of the entire population who were manual-working wage-earners, or independent handicraftsmen, remained subject to this intolerable law" (Webb).] In 1685 it was enacted that inasmuch as "poor people at their first coming do commonly conceal themselves," the forty days should count from their giving notice of their residence to the overseers. In 1691 various other ways of obtaining settlement were established, such as payment of taxes for a year, or a year's hiring, or the serving of an annual office. Still more important was another provision of the same act. In order to prevent misuse of the powers of overseers, it was ordered that a register should be kept of paupers and of the amounts received by them, that a new list should be made out yearly, and that no one else should receive relief, except by authority of one justice, or by order of the bench of justices at quarter sessions. This latter clause was speedily interpreted as empowering justices to order relief to applicants at their own discretion. An attempt was in vain made to meet the misuse of this power by an act of 1723, which enacted that the applicant must prove that he had already applied to the parish officers, who must show cause why he was not relieved. But the evil result of allowing justices to act independently in the matter of relief were not very apparent till the end of the eighteenth century, and, on the whole, the Poor Law worked well down to 1760.

In 1697 a workhouse had been built in Bristol under a special act, and there "the workhouse test" was first adopted, i.e., willingness to enter the house was alone taken as a test of destitution. The plan proved so successful that it was imitated in some other towns, and by the act of 1723 parishes were empowered, singly or in unions, to provide workhouses, with the proviso that persons refusing to enter such houses should be refused relief. This act resulted in a great diminution of expenditure when adopted, yet it seems to have been carried out in comparatively few parishes.

The industrial revolution which began in the second half of the eighteenth century, and the increase of enclosures, led to a rapid extension of pauperism, which was still further encouraged by a slipshod philanthropy. By Gilbert's Act of 1782 parishes were empowered to form unions or incorporations with adjacent parishes; these incorporations were permitted to build workhouses. The justices were to appoint guardians (paid officials, like modern relieving-officers) to administer relief. The act of 1723 was practically repealed in the case of incorporations by the provision that none but the impotent were to be sent to the workhouse, while suitable employment was to be provided for the able-bodied near their own homes. Sixty-seven such incorporations were formed, and the result of the statute was that in five years the cost of relief rose from one and a half to two million pounds.

The pressure of the continental war led to still more disastrous measures. In 1795 the Berkshire magistrates drew up a declaration (the so-called "Speenhamland Act of Parliament") fixing a scale of relief according to the price of wheat, and the number of children in a family, and they were imitated in several other counties. The practical effect of this was that relief was granted in aid of wages, and the farmers, themselves benefiting through their long leases by the high price of corn, were able to throw part of the cost of their labour upon non-farming residents in their parishes. Next year an act legalized generally out-door relief, and formally repealed the act of 1723. [The views of the commissioners of 1832-4 are well expressed in their note on these Poor Law modifications: "It is clear that when the magistrates assembled at Speenhamland, in 1795, 'to settle the weekly income of the industrious poor,' public opinion sanctioned their attempt. This is shown by the Act of 1796 which was passed a few months after, and may be considered the great and fatal deviation from our previous policy. The 43rd Elizabeth never contemplated, as objects of relief, industrious persons. It made no promises of comfort or happiness."] Some attempt was made in 1819 to improve the state of things by empowering such parishes as chose to elect a "select vestry" to superintend the overseers. In most parishes, however, especially in the rural districts, relief was still administered by the overseers, with the right of appeal to the justices on the part of the labourer when the overseers were not sufficiently pliant. The worst consequences followed—the agricultural labourers were pauperized, the bastardy laws made vice very profitable, and a premium was set on idleness and improvidence. Between 1784 and 1818 the amount of poor rate increased about three times as fast as population (population from eight millions to nearly twelve millions, poor rate from two million pounds to almost eight millions). These evils led to a commission of inquiry in 1832, and to the great act of 1834, the most important in the history of Poor Law after 1601. It attempted to restore the workhouse test for able-bodied paupers; parishes were grouped into unions, and placed under elected boards of guardians, and the guardians were put under a central board at London—the Poor Law Commissioners, superseded in 1847 by the Poor Law Board, and that in 1871 by the Local Government Board, headed by a responsible minister as president. The measure was for a time very successful, and by 1841 the poor rate had fallen to £4,760,000. In 1844 the "Out-door Prohibitory Relief Order" finally forbade all relief except in the workhouse. But the commissioners still allowed out-door relief in case of sickness or "bodily infirmity," and this was speedily construed to cover relief to persons over sixty years of age incapable of earning wages. But this led once more to a rapid increase of out-door relief, encouraging improvidence, and causing wages to be lower than they would otherwise have been. During the ten years 1861-71 the expenditure rose from five and three-quarter to more than seven and three-quarter million pounds, and the number of paupers from 883,921 to 1,037,360. This increase of pauperism, together with the growth of a spirit of scientific philanthropy, led to strong efforts to enforce the workhouse test, and these met with considerable success. They were seconded in London by Goschen's Act of 1870, which placed workhouse expenditure on a metropolitan fund, while leaving out-door relief to be borne by each district. Since then the incidence of the metropolitan poor-rate has been so altered that the richer parishes pay more and the poorer parishes less. In 1905 a royal commission was appointed to inquire into the working of the laws relating to the relief of the poor. In 1909 its report was issued, pointing out the defects of the present Poor Law, and formulating proposals for reform. [It is the Minority Report of this commission, with its vivid description of conditions in the general mixed workhouse, that provides the text for those who wish to undertake sweeping reforms in the present system of administration and workhouse accommodation, which, in spite of the activities of the commission of 1905 and the minister of reconstruction's committee of 1917, still remain unchanged in essentials. But of recent years there has been great extension of out-door relief. Social insurance has prevented many from falling into destitution. Old age endowment, though inadequate, has worked in the same direction. The following figures show the number of persons receiving poor relief in England and Wales in recent years. Only a small proportion of these were housed in institutions.]

Poorunder, THE TREATY OF (1776), was concluded between the East India Company and the Poona State. It annulled all the engagements of the Treaty of Surat to Ragoba, who was to disband his army and retire to the banks of the Godavary on a pension. The British army was to quit the field, Salsette was to be retained if the governor-general desired it, but all other acquisitions were to be relinquished; the claim of the British on the revenues of Baroach was conceded with twelve lacs for the expenses of the war.

Popham, SIR JOHN (1531?-1607), a native of Somerset, was appointed solicitor-general in 1579, and next year elected Speaker of the House of Commons. He became attorney-general in 1581, an office which he held for eleven years, during which he took part in most of the important state trials of the period. In 1592 he succeeded Sir Christopher Wray as lord chief justice, in which capacity he presided at the trials of Sir Walter Raleigh and the conspirators in the Gunpowder Plot (q.v.). He is said to have been the originator of the idea of the transportation of felons to New England (Virginia) and other colonies. Sir Edward Coke called him "a man of ready apprehension, profound judgment, most excellent understanding, and admirable experience and knowledge of all business which concerned the Commonwealth."

Popish Plot, THE (1678-9), was the name given to an imaginary conspiracy of the Catholics in the reign of Charles II. Though, no doubt, there were some projects for an attempt against the government agitated by the English Catholics, there is little doubt that the "plot" owed its existence chiefly to the imagination of Titus Oates (q.v.) and other informers. Oates was an English clergyman of bad character, who had become a Roman Catholic and joined the Jesuits at St. Omer. In 1678 he deposed before a magistrate that he knew the particulars of a papist scheme, by which the king was to be killed, a Roman Catholic ministry appointed, and a massacre of the Protestants prepared with the assistance of a French army. A few days afterwards Sir Edmund Berry Godfrey (q.v.), the magistrate before whom Oates had sworn, was found murdered on Primrose Hill, and a universal panic spread over the nation, which seemed for the time to have lost its senses. The wildest stories of Oates and the informers who arose were believed without question. Parliament met on October 21, and the Commons resolved, "that there hath been, and still is, a damnable and hellish plot, carried on by papist recusants for assassinating the king, the subverting the government, and for rooting out the Protestant religion." The plot was taken up by Shaftesbury as a weapon against his political opponents and the Duke of York. On the evidence of Oates, Dangerfield, Carstairs, and Bedloe, many leading Roman Catholics were tried, convicted, and imprisoned or executed. A valuable find was made in the papers of Father Edward Coleman, the Duchess of York's private secretary, who was arrested on September 30. Oates went so far as to swear that he had heard the queen give her consent to the king's murder. On November 30 an act was passed "for disabling papists from sitting in either House of Parliament." In May of the following year (1679) the bill to exclude the Duke of York from the throne was brought in, and though Charles deferred it for that year by a dissolution, it was carried through the Commons in November 1680, but rejected in the House of Lords. In December 1680 Lord Stafford, the most distinguished of the victims of the Popish Plot, was executed. But by this time a reaction had set in. The judges would no longer convict on the evidence of the informers, and the people were alienated by what seemed like a Whig persecution of the Duke of York. In March 1681 Charles dissolved his fifth parliament, and governed without one during the remainder of his reign; and later in the year one of the false witnesses, College, was put on his trial, and condemned at Oxford, and Shaftesbury himself was prosecuted by the Crown for treason, though the bill was thrown out by the grand jury in London. Population. There is no subject on which wilder guesses have been made than those which, without enumeration, or something equivalent to enumeration, have been hazarded about the population of cities and counties, about the numbers of contending or invading armies, and about the ravages of famine and pestilence. Accounts of those numbers have been given, occasionally with some statement which appears to be confirmatory, but which later research has accepted with distrust. Thus, Herodotus states a number for the invading host of Xerxes, and asserts in confirmation of his figures that a rough census was taken of the army and its followers. But in the more critical age of Juvenal the whole narrative was scouted as the invention of a vainglorious and mendacious Greek. In the same manner, but with a better critical apparatus, Hume, in his essay on the populousness of ancient cities, challenged the assertions of those who claimed millions where thousands would have been nearer the truth. In our own country the same exaggerations have been made, doubtless in good faith. Gascoigne, the critic, and in some degree the chronicler of the fifteenth century, a chancellor of Oxford University, and a highly estimable and honourable person, alleges that he read the names of thirty thousand students in Oxford during the period immediately antecedent to the great plague of 1349. They could not possibly have been housed in the town, or if housed, could hardly have been fed. We are told that sixty thousand persons perished by disease in Norwich between January and July in the above-named year, but it is certain that, till the nineteenth century, Norwich has never had 60,000 inhabitants. Numbers are habitually exaggerated, and when panic is abroad the exaggeration rapidly becomes a geometrical ratio.

During the fourteenth century, and nearly to the end of the sixteenth, the population of England and Wales could not have been more than from two to two and a half millions. The proof of this statement is partly indirect, and partly direct. It may be confidently affirmed that, provided the inhabitants of a country subsist on one kind of grain, as the English from the remotest period have on wheat—more generally, indeed, from the Middle Ages to the eighteenth century than they even do at present—the number of persons in the country will be almost exactly equal to the number of quarters of wheat which is annually produced in the country. Now it could be shown, and it has been shown elsewhere, that the maximum produce of wheat in England and Wales from the beginning of the fourteenth to the close of the sixteenth century could not have been more than two and a half millions of quarters, and was probably much less, the average rate of production per acre being below eight bushels. The writer of this article has examined many thousands of farm accounts, giving the exact amount of produce from the acreage sown in all parts of England, and he is confident that eight bushels to the acre is a liberal estimate in average years. [The force of this argument depends on the assumption that wheat was the cereal food of the mass of the population. But we know that many men, especially those of the poorer sort, consumed bread made of rye, or of wheat and rye mixed, and that oatmeal, too, was an article of diet. If the wheat area alone could support two and a half million people, the total population must have been considerably greater.]

We are not, however, without direct estimates. There are several taxing rolls in the Record Office, especially records of poll taxes, from which it is possible to arrive at an approximate estimate of population. One of those more than a century ago was published, and commented on in the "Archæologia." In 1377, the last year of Edward III's reign, parliament granted the king a poll tax of four pence a head on all lay persons over fourteen years of age, none but known beggars being exempted from contributing. Beneficed clergymen paid a shilling; other ecclesiastical persons, except mendicant friars, paid, like the laity, four pence. The number of persons who paid the tax in the whole country, and in the principal towns, is given, and Topham added one-third to the amount, in order to include the untaxed part of the population, a quantity which the vital statistics of the time entirely justified, though now, owing to sanitary improvements, the life of childhood is prolonged beyond what was to be expected then, and therefore the proportion of youth to a more adult age is higher. The forty-two towns, which are separately enumerated, had an aggregate population of 168,720 persons. The rest of the population in the county and small towns is 1,207,722. But from this enumeration Durham and Chester, and Wales, including Monmouth, are excluded, not being taxed in the grant. Topham put this population at 182,123, making a total of 1,558,565. By adding a third of this number for the children, and giving a very liberal allowance for beggars and begging friars, a total of two and a quarter millions is reached. [Here it must be remembered that this estimate is made for a year scarcely a generation later than the worst visitation of the Black Death in 1349 (q.v.), which may have destroyed between one-third and one-half of the population, and less than a decade after the visitation of 1369. It would not be rash to assume a figure of something like 4 millions for the early fourteenth century, a drop to 2,500,000 at the Black Death, a partial recovery before 1400, and a gradual increase till the end of the Tudor period when the population of England and Wales was probably between 4 and 5 millions.]

Rogers, in the original article contributed by him to this dictionary, was inclined to think that a great increase of population took place in the seventeenth century. Arguing back from 5,500,000, Gregory King's (probably slightly over-estimated) figure for 1688, to the 2,500,000 of Elizabeth's reign, which Rogers suggested, we should have to conclude that the population doubled in the century; but this is unbelievable when common sense, our knowledge of the century, and the estimates of contemporaries are given fair play. In 1700 the total population of England and Wales was between 5,500,000 and 5,800,000; it is unlikely that the population increased by much more than one and a quarter millions during the Stuart period. Until we have the early census figures, from 1801 onwards, to work upon, it is only by indirect methods that a rough estimate of the growth of population can be determined on. The careful work of Mr. Griffith, which is based on the researches of Rickman, the early census statistician, into the baptismal and other registers of the eighteenth century shows a small increase in the period between 1700 and 1750. In the third decade there was actually a fall in numbers. The figure for 1750 is about six and a quarter millions. Thereafter the advance is more rapid: 6.6 per cent. in the 'fifties; 6.9 per cent. in the 'sixties; 6.4 per cent. in the 'seventies; 8.3 per cent. in the eleven years 1790 to 1801. This was the first census year, and Rickman's corrected figure for it is 9,168,000. Thereafter the percentage increase was: 1801-11, 14.39 per cent.; 1811-21, 16.39 per cent.; 1821-31, 13.74 per cent.; 1831-41, 14.46 per cent. From 1841 onwards methods of census procedure and calculation improved. For information on population in more recent years, see CENSUS.]

Porteous Riots, THE (1736), were occasioned by the hanging of a smuggler named Andrew Wilson at Edinburgh on April 14, 1736. Captain John Porteous, of the City Guard, ordered his men to fire on the rioters, six of whom were killed and eleven wounded. Condemned to death, Porteous was reprieved by the government, but was seized by the populace and hanged on the day previous to that fixed for his execution (September 7). The lord provost, Wilson, was declared incapable of further office, and the city was compelled to pay £2,000 to Porteous's widow.

Portugal, THE JOURNEY OF (1589), was the name given to the expedition undertaken in the year 1589 to wrest the Portuguese crown from Philip of Spain, and bestow it on Dom Antonio, an illegitimate son of Henry of Portugal. The expedition, which was under the command of Sir Francis Drake and Sir John Norris, sailed in April 1589. Corunna was partly destroyed, and Norris defeated a large force of Spaniards who had come to relieve the city. Drake then sailed up the Tagus to Lisbon, whilst Norris landed at Peniche and marched overland to join him. Lisbon, however, was too strong to be taken, the country refused to rise for the pretender, and in May the expedition returned home.

Portugal, RELATIONS WITH. The friendly relations which Henry II had established with the princes of the Iberian peninsula made the few dealings between the early Portuguese monarchs and the English court of a generally amicable nature [LISBON]. More intimate relations began when the Black Prince became the partisan of Pedro the Cruel of Castile, and John of Gaunt claimed his throne as his daughter's husband. The reigning King of Portugal, Dom Ferdinand, joined the English against Henry of Trastámara, who had succeeded in winning the throne of Peter. In 1381 an English army, under the Earl of Cambridge, who had also married a daughter of Peter's, came into Portugal; but very little was done, the English troops behaved badly, and Ferdinand concluded a truce with the Castilians. The marriage of Cambridge's son John to Beatrice, the king's daughter, was annulled on the retirement of the English, and on Ferdinand's death in 1383 Don John of Avis had to fight for his throne against Beatrice's husband, King John of Castile. In 1386 John of Gaunt came with an English army to help the new king, whom he married to his daughter Philippa. But the campaigns proved unfortunate, and John of Gaunt abandoned both Portugal and his hopes of the Castilian crown. The career of maritime glory into which Portugal embarked in the fifteenth century brought it into no direct relations with England, though it prepared the way for later English enterprise; and when the English first appeared in India they were welcomed by the Great Mogul as likely to counterbalance the Portuguese. Intimate commercial relations between England and Portugal also sprang up during the later Middle Ages. The conquest of Portugal in 1580 by Philip II of Spain led to the fitting out of the Armada in Lisbon harbour, but also to the English affording a refuge to Dom Antonio Prior of Crato, the popular candidate for the Portuguese throne, in whose behalf Drake, in 1589, avenged the Armada by an expedition to the coast of Portugal. But though Antonio accompanied the fleet, it did more harm to Spain than good to Portugal, and the plundering of Portuguese vessels, and the devastation of Portuguese colonies by the English, involved their old ally in their war against her new master. In 1640 Portugal began her successful revolt under John of Braganza against Spain. One of the first acts of the new state was to conclude, in 1642, a commercial treaty with Charles I; but this rather complicated its relations with the government of the Commonwealth. In 1650 John refused to surrender the fleet of Princes Rupert and Maurice, which had taken refuge in the Tagus, to Blake; an act which, despite the voluntary retirement of the princes, caused some disagreement. But in 1652 the English war against the Dutch, the enemies of Portugal, and Cromwell's adoption of an anti-Spanish policy soon afterwards made it an easy matter to renew in 1654 the treaty of 1642. This began the political and commercial dependence of Portugal on England, which was continued by the marriage of Catherine of Braganza to Charles II (1662); a measure necessitated by the abandonment of the Portuguese by the French in the Treaty of the Pyrenees, and justified by the security it gave to Portuguese independence, against both Spaniards and Dutch. But the cession of Bombay and Tangier almost acknowledged the commercial supremacy of the English. At last the designs of Louis XIV on Spain involved the Portuguese in hostility to him, and justified the conclusion of the Methuen Treaty (q.v.) in 1706, which completed the dependence of Portugal. Through it Portuguese armies fought with Stanhope and Galway against the French and Spaniards during the Succession War. All through the eighteenth century Portugal, like Holland, was a satellite of England. The whole trade of Portugal fell into British hands. The commerce of Lisbon and Oporto was entirely carried on by British factors. The vineyards of the Douro, and the mines of Brazil, were ultimately quite dependent on British capital. The bread which the Portuguese ate, and the clothes which they wore, were brought from England; and, what was worse to disciples of the mercantile system, the "balance of trade" was constantly in favour of the British. The famous Marquis of Pombal, who during the reign of King Joseph (1750-77) upheld almost alone the power of Portugal, sought to change this dependence into alliance on equal terms. The British factors and Jesuits combined to plot his ruin; but his triumph resulted in a transient revival of Portuguese trade through his commercial companies, and Pitt was willing to accept the assistance of the Portuguese army, which the Count von der Lippe had reorganized in the war against Spain at the close of the Seven Years' War (q.v.). The death of King Joseph, and the fall of Pombal, renewed the degradation of Portugal. The war against revolutionary France again necessitated its dependence on Great Britain. Even in 1801, when France and Spain were united against it, Portugal struggled some time before accepting the Treaty of Madrid, which gave France equal commercial rights with Britain. But the refusal of Portugal in 1807 to accept the continental system involved it in fresh hostilities with France. British help alone forced Junot to conclude the Convention of Cintra (q.v.). Henceforth Portugal was the basis of operations against the French during the whole Peninsular War. Government and army became alike dependent on Great Britain, and the Portuguese troops, disciplined by Beresford, proved no unworthy allies of the British under Wellington. The conclusion of the war left Portugal, where the liberal spirit was rising, in the hands of the tyrannical government of a king who had sought in Brazil a secure refuge from the French. In 1822 a constitution was obtained; but in 1824 an absolutist reaction under Dom Miguel took place. It was renewed in 1828. Canning exerted all his energies in favour of the constitutional party. But after his death the Wellington ministry took a neutral attitude, which practically meant supporting Dom Miguel. The heroic struggle of Donna Maria II provoked, however, much sympathy, and in 1833 a British expedition under Napier powerfully assisted in the triumph of the constitutional party, and the quadruple alliance of Great Britain, France, and Spain with Portugal guaranteed their success. In 1835 the Methuen Treaty was annulled. The subsequent ambition of Portugal to take part in the colonizing of Africa received a check in 1889, when Lord Salisbury forced her to abandon her claims to Nyassaland.

Post-Nati, CASE OF THE. On the accession of James I to the throne of England, it became a question whether his Scottish subjects, born after his accession to the English throne (post-nati), were aliens in England or not. The Scots contended that they were not, and the same view was taken by the judges in the House of Lords. In the House of Commons it was contended that a statute would be required to naturalize them. The point was decided in the Court of Exchequer Chamber in the case of an infant named Colvill (Calvin), born in Scotland in 1605, when ten of the twelve judges decided that a post-natus was not an alien in England.

Post Office, THE, may be said to have originated in the mediæval system of royal messengers, whose supervisors furnish the earliest postmasters, of whom Sir Brian Tuke (c. 1533) is the first of whom we have authentic record. Regulations as to post-horses and the speed of messengers were laid down in detail by James I, whose accession brought an increase in communication between England and Scotland. The year 1619 saw the creation of the office of "Postmaster-General of England in foreign parts." Matthew de Qvester, the first holder, was succeeded by Witherings, who doubled the speed and the frequency of the continental mails. At this time the yearly cost of the post office to the Crown was £3,400. Eight main postal lines were established in 1635.

Visions of a penny post occurred as early as the Commonwealth period to John Hill of York, who embodied his theory in a pamphlet, "Penny Post," 1659. (A similar plan was actually adopted for a short time in 1680 in London, by Dockwra and Murray.) Under Charles II the post office was farmed out, according to a statute of 1657. In 1710, however, the posts of the empire were consolidated into one establishment, the offices of Dublin, Edinburgh, and New York being reorganized and postal rates regulated. The revenue increased from £96,000 in 1724 to £164,000 in 1774. In 1784 mail-coaches with armed guards were first introduced by Pitt (at the suggestion of John Palmer of Bath) as a precaution against mail robberies. Meanwhile a packet system to the colonies had been developed, and reached an annual cost of £100,000 by 1800.

The nineteenth-century post office reforms began with the publication of Rowland Hill's "Post Office Reform" in 1837. At this time postal rates (outside London) varied from 4d. to 1s. 8d. for a single sheet weighing less than 1 oz., and the average rate was 9d. inland. Hill's proposal for a flat rate of 1d. per $\frac{1}{2}$ oz. was submitted to a parliamentary commission. The result was an act (passed on August 17, 1839, by a majority of 100) establishing the penny postage. The act came into force on January 10, 1840. Postage stamps were introduced in the following May. The result more than justified the experiment. The number of letters carried increased from 75 millions to 195 millions in the first two years, and the gross revenue for the same period amounted to £1,250,000. Within seven years the number of letters carried annually increased to 329 millions. The rest of the century is a record of expansion and development. The money-order department of the Post Office was instituted in 1838. The telegraph services were transferred to the State in 1870. Post cards were introduced in the same year. Post Office Savings Banks were created by statute in 1861. Postal-orders were first issued in 1881, sixpenny telegrams in 1885, and the parcel post in 1883. In 1874 the Universal Postal Union was formed. In 1912 the National Telephone Company services were transferred to the State. The penny post persisted until 1922, when the inland rate was raised to 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.

Poynings, SIR EDWARD (1459-1521), after a distinguished military career was sent to Ireland as lord-deputy by Henry VII soon after his accession. He was very successful both in subduing the partisans of the house of York and in quelling the native Irish rebels in Ulster and along the borders of the Pale. He reduced the eastern portion of the island to order. His period of government is specially noted for the passing in December 1494 of "Poynings' Act," which decreed that all existing English laws should be in force in Ireland, and that no parliament should be held in Ireland without the sanction of the king and council, who should also be able to annul statutes passed by the Irish Houses. Thus the legislative independence of the English colony in Ireland was at an end. "Poynings' Act" was not repealed until 1782.

Præcipe, THE WRIT OF, was a peremptory command addressed to the sheriff, ordering him to send a particular cause to be tried in the king's court, instead of the local court. By section 34 of Magna Carta its use was limited.

Præmunire, STATUTES OF. In the fourteenth century there seem to have been two forms of papal exaction more distasteful to the English parliament than any others: the one—of no modern standing even then—the right claimed, and often exercised, by the pope of giving away Church benefices in England to men of his own choice, and often to aliens; the other, his persistent action in assuming to himself and his curia the right of deciding cases of law which ought properly to have been dealt with by the king's courts at home. Against each of these abuses the parliaments of the middle of Edward III's reign aimed statutes: attempting to check the first abuse by the Statute of Provisors (1350-1) (q.v.), and the second by the first Statute of Præmunire (1353). By the latter of these two statutes the king "at the grievous and clamorous complaints of the great men and the commons of his realm of England," enacts that all his liege people of every condition who refer any matter properly belonging to the king's court to any jurisdiction outside the realm shall be allowed two months within which to appear before the king's council, his chancery, or his justices of either bench, etc., to answer for their contempt of the king's rights in transferring their cases abroad. "If," the statute continues, "they fail to put in an appearance at the due time, their lands and chattels are all forfeited to the king; their persons are liable to be seized, and if not found, the offenders are to be outlawed." Two things are worth noticing with reference to the statute; first, that the clergy are not mentioned as petitioning for its enactment or assenting to it; and, second, that although the measure is plainly levelled against the pretensions of the Roman Curia, yet its aim is nowhere stated in the body of the act. There were several subsequent Statutes of Præmunire. The later and fuller are naturally more often called the statute, as in a way they superseded the earlier. The name is more especially reserved to an act passed in the sixteenth year of Richard II (1393). In this statute it is plainly stated that the right of recovering the presentation to a church benefice "belongeth only to the king's court by the old right of his crown as used and approved in the time of all his progenitors, kings of England." The statute then proceeds to condemn the practice of papal translation, and after rehearsing the promise of the three estates of the realm to support the king in his rights, enacts without any circumlocution, "that if any purchase, or pursue, in the Court of Rome, or elsewhere, such translations, processes, excommunications, bulls, etc.," he and his notaries, counsellors, and abettors shall forfeit all their lands and tenements, goods, and chattels to the king, while the offenders themselves are to be attached and brought before the king and his council, or be proceeded against by writ of Præmunire facias, as is ordained in other Statutes of Provisors. It is from the phrase Præmunire facias that the whole enactment has derived its name. These are the opening words of the writ directed to the officer, bidding him forewarn the offender when and where he is to appear to answer to the charges brought against him. The word Præmunire is said to be a corruption of Præmoneri, to be forewarned. The scope of these Præmunire Acts was still further enlarged under 2 Henry IV, 3 Henry V, etc. The Statutes of Præmunire were, however, constantly disregarded. Papal provision became in the fifteenth century the most usual way of appointing to bishoprics. The custom of granting dispensations from the statute had much influence on the growth of the king's dispensing power. It was by a dexterous manipulation of the clause which included the abettors of a breach of the Statute of Præmunire in the penalty due to the prime offender that Henry VIII laid the whole body of the clergy at his mercy in 1531 for having acknowledged the legatine authority of Wolsey; and the king's pardon was only bought by a large sum of money, and their acknowledgment of him as supreme head of the Church. Under

Elizabeth, to refuse the oath of supremacy was made a breach of the Statute of Præmunire; and also to defend the pope's jurisdiction in England, or to support a Jesuit college, or any popish seminary beyond the sea. By later enactments the penalties following a breach of this statute have been extended to offences very different from those which were commonly connected with the word Præmunire.

Pratt, CHARLES, 1ST EARL CAMDEN (1714-94), was the son of Chief Justice Sir John Pratt. He was educated at Eton, and called to the bar in 1738. When Pitt came into office in 1757 he was appointed attorney-general. When Pitt resigned in October 1761 Pratt continued in office as attorney-general, and in the following January became chief justice of the Common Pleas. While he held this position, he continued to maintain constitutional principles against tyrannical attempts to oppress the subject, and decided in numerous cases against the legality of general warrants. To him Wilkes applied, and the chief justice ordered his release on the ground of his privilege as a member of parliament. On the formation of the Rockingham cabinet, in 1765, he was raised to the peerage as Baron Camden. In February 1766 he made a great speech in favour of the repeal of the Stamp Act, and against the Declaratory Act. In the following July he was raised to the woolsack. In January 1770 he openly declared his differences with his colleagues on the Wilkes question, and resigned the great seal. In 1772 he warmly opposed the Royal Marriage Act. In January 1782 he supported Lord Shelburne's amendment to the address on the king's speech. On the formation of the second Rockingham cabinet in March 1782 Lord Camden obtained the office of president of the council. In 1783 he resigned, and offered a vigorous opposition to the "Coalition" ministry. Soon after Pitt became prime minister Camden was again made president of the council. In May 1786 he received an earldom. He conducted, in the House of Lords, the measures adopted by the government in relation to the Regency Bill. The last occasion on which he addressed the House of Lords was during the debate on Fox's Libel Bill.

Pratt, JOHN JEFFREYS, 1ST MARQUIS CAMDEN (1759-1840), son of the preceding, entered parliament in 1780 as member for Bath. In 1795 he succeeded Lord Fitzwilliam as viceroy of Ireland. On his entry into Dublin in March 1796 there was a serious riot, which could only be quelled by bloodshed. In 1797 he was bitterly denounced by Grattan, on account of the severities he had found it necessary to authorize in Ulster; but the parliament, now thoroughly alarmed by the progress of disaffection, was on his side. The English government was more uncertain how to act, but ultimately supported Lord Camden, and took his side in the dispute in which he was involved with General Abercromby. He was, after the beginning of 1797, in full possession of all the rebel plans, but was unable to act on his information during the rebellion of 1798. He was consequently urging the gravity of the situation on the English cabinet, but it was only after Father Murphy's successes that the Guards and other English troops were sent out to support him. The Whigs in England, meanwhile, continued to attack him as a tyrant of the worst kind, Sheridan moving for his recall in the Commons, and the Dukes of Leinster and Norfolk in the Lords. Both motions were defeated, but popular clamour was so great that in June 1798 he was recalled. In 1804 he entered the cabinet, and in 1812 was made a marquis. For nearly sixty years he held the lucrative post of teller of the exchequer; but during more than half that period he patriotically declined to draw the enormous emoluments of the office.

Prayer Book, or, properly, the Book of Common Prayer, is the Liturgy of the Church of England, ordained by law for national use. Before the Reformation, Latin service-books were in use throughout Christendom, founded upon a common model, but containing considerable variations. The prayers for various hours of the day were contained in the Breviary; the order for celebrating the Holy Communion in the Missal. There was also a manual of devotions in English called the Prymer, current in the fifteenth century. The desire of the reforming party, headed by Cranmer, was for greater simplicity and intelligibility in the service-books, and Cranmer steadily moved in that direction. In 1541 a new edition of part of the Sarum Breviary was issued; and in 1542 Cranmer notified to convocation the king's pleasure that the service-books should be examined, corrected, and reformed of all superstitious prayers. A committee of bishops and divines sat for that purpose and prepared materials for the future. Portions of the Scriptures were ordered to be read in English in churches; and in 1544 the Litany, which was already in English for use in processions, was revised by Cranmer. In 1545 was issued the "King's Prymer," which contained the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, the Ten Commandments, and several canticles and collects, as well as the Litany in English.

In the reign of Edward VI the work of liturgical revision first bore definite fruit. In the first year of the reign convocation and parliament ordered the Communion to be administered under both kinds; and a committee of divines was appointed to draw up "The Order of Communion," which was published in 1548. This, however, was only a temporary measure for immediate use. The commissioners applied themselves, under Cranmer's presidency, to the task of framing a complete Book of Prayer. They finished their labours within the year, and submitted the book to parliament, by which it was accepted. The Act of Uniformity, passed in January 1549, ordered the book to come into general use on the evening of Whit-Sunday. The objects of the compilers of this book are stated in their preface to be (1) the formation of a uniform use for the whole realm, (2) the simplification of rubrics, (3) the reading of the whole Psalter in order, (4) the continuous reading of the Bible, (5) the omission of needless interruptions, (6) conformity to the pure Word of the Scripture, (7) the formation of a Prayer Book in the vulgar tongue. The First Prayer Book of Edward VI followed closely on the Prymer for morning and evening prayer, so as to make as little change as possible. Its chief differences from the Prayer Book now in use are—(1) Matins and Evensong began with the Lord's Prayer and ended with the Third Collect. (2) The Litany followed the Communion office, and there were no instructions for its use. (3) In the Communion office the Commandments were not read; the prayers were differently arranged, and included a mention of the Virgin and prayers for the dead; there was an invocation of the Holy Ghost before consecration; the words used in giving the elements were only the first clause of the two now in use; the priest was ordered to stand "afore the midst of the altar"; the old vestments, albs, and copes were prescribed for the celebrant; water was mixed with the wine. (4) In the Baptismal Service a form of exorcism was used; trine immersion was directed; the child was arrayed after baptism in a white garment, called a chrisom, and was anointed with oil on the head. (5) The Burial Service contained prayers for the dead, and provision was made for a Communion at a burial.

This Prayer Book was well received by the people generally; but an influx of foreigners brought to England opinions more decidedly Calvinistic. The Prayer Book was no sooner in use than a small party called for its revision. They prevailed with the king, who again appointed a committee, with Cranmer at its head. In their work the committee asked the opinions of the learned foreigners Peter Martyr and Bucer. The result of this revision was the Second Prayer Book of Edward VI, which was published in 1552. It added the introductory portion of Morning and Evening Prayer, appointed the Litany to be used as at present, added the Decalogue to the Communion office, reduced its prayers to the order in which they now occur, omitting the points noticed above; directed the priest to stand "at the north side of the table," and to wear no vestment save the surplice. The tendency of the alterations made it most clearly seen in the substitution of the second clause now used at the administration of the elements for the first clause, which was omitted. The Second Prayer Book showed no desire to retain old uses because they were old, but was a movement towards the doctrines of the continental reformers.

The Second Prayer Book of Edward VI had scarcely time to come into use before it was swept away by the Marian reaction. When Elizabeth came to the throne in 1558 she behaved with great caution, and was crowned according to the rites of the Roman Pontifical. A committee was, however, appointed early in 1559 to compare the two books of Edward VI and correct them. The commission, of which the chief mover was Edward Guest, afterwards Bishop of Rochester, decided in favour of Edward VI's Second Prayer Book, with a few alterations. These were adopted by parliament, and the revised Prayer Book came into use on June 24, 1559. The alterations were not important, but were significant of Elizabeth's desire for comprehension. The ornaments in use in the second year of Edward VI were recognized; the two clauses in the administration of the elements at the Communion were put together as they are now; a petition was omitted from the Litany—"From the Bishop of Rome and all his detestable enormities, Good Lord deliver us."

Again the return of exiles from the continent brought discord, and the Puritan party desired another revision. At the accession of James I the king agreed to hear the Puritan demands at a conference at Hampton Court in 1603 (q.v.). The Puritans met with little attention, and the changes made in the Prayer Book were slight; chief of them was the addition of the Thanksgiving Prayers, and of the latter half of the Catechism. Charles I attempted to force on Scotland the use of the English Liturgy, and his attempt led to a revolution. Under the Commonwealth the Prayer Book was swept away. After the Restoration a conference was held at the Savoy (q.v.), in 1661, between twelve bishops and twelve Presbyterians, to discuss the wishes of the Presbyterians for a revision of the Prayer Book. This conference did not show much attempt at conciliation on either side. A committee of bishops was again appointed to revise the Prayer Book, and no steps were taken to meet the wishes of the Presbyterians. What alterations were made rather increased than diminished the scruples of the Puritans against receiving the work. The revised Prayer Book, finally reduced to the shape in which we now have it, was approved by parliament, and its use was enforced by the Act of Uniformity of 1662. Some printed copies were carefully compared with the original, were then sealed with the great seal, and were sent to all cathedrals, to the courts at Westminster, and to the Tower, to be preserved for ever. Since then the Sealed Books have remained the standard for preserving the Prayer Book in its original form. It is true that in 1689 a committee was appointed to prepare such alterations "as might reconcile, as much as possible, all differences." But convocation was opposed to all change, and the proposals were never considered.

[In 1926 certain changes in the Prayer Book were recommended. The subject of revision had been prominent in 1857 and 1863 and again in 1879. In 1904 a royal commission was appointed to investigate "alleged . . . breaches or neglect of the law relating to . . . Divine Service in the Church of England." The commission reported in 1906, and there were issued to the convocations Letters of Business authorizing the discussion of modifications in the existing law. Convocation included in its work a discussion as to a revision of the Prayer Book, and this was taken up by the Church Assembly on its formation. In 1926 the House of Bishops was engaged on the revision, and reported in February 1927. The bishops' proposals passed both Houses of Convocation on March 30, 1927, and the Church Assembly on July 6. The proposals were rejected by a majority of 33 in the Commons on December 15, 1927, and again by a majority of 46 on June 14, 1928.

"The New Prayer Book" (draft), 1927; The Times of February 8, 1927; T. B. Strong, "Notes on the New Prayer Book," 1927.]

Prerogative, THE ROYAL. Prerogative has been defined as an exclusive privilege. Historically considered, it is not much more than the legal exercise of the royal authority. An old judge expounded it as "that law in case of the king which is law in no case of the subject." "It is of blood," said Bacon, "to the Common Law; it sprang from sources akin to those from which the Common Law has sprung; it did for the king and still does for the Crown what the Common Law did for the subject." "It grew," said Stubbs, "out of certain conditions of the national life, some of which existed before the Norman Conquest, others were the products of that great change, and others resulted from the peculiar course of Henry II and his descendants." Before 1377 the Crown had actually or virtually parted with most of its legislative and taxing powers. Chief among its admitted and exclusive powers at this time were those of calling, interrupting, and dismissing parliaments, of ratifying legislation, of creating peers, and conferring every form of honour, of making cities and boroughs, of pardoning criminals, of negotiating with foreign powers, of declaring and conducting war, of nominating to Church dignities and presenting to an immense number of benefices, of appointing all public officials, of coining money, regulating trade, fixing weights and measures, and establishing markets and havens. The spurious "Prerogativa Regis" adds to these the custody of idiots and lunatics, wreck of the sea, whales and sturgeons, and the right to the lands and goods of attainted felons. With few exceptions, these claims are still conceded to Prerogative. But besides these it then claimed, and despite a long and stubborn opposition continued to exercise, the rights of purveyance, and of issuing commissions of array, with all the manifold accompaniments and consequences of both. A power to dispense with and even suspend the operation of a statute was also among its demands. Such was the mediæval measure of Prerogative at its widest legal stretch, though even to this a king like Richard II, in his days of absolutism, would seek to give an unquestionably illegal extension. During the constitutional rule of the Lancasterian dynasty the tendency opposite to Richard's set in, that of not only dislodging Prerogative from its disputed position, but also of placing its legitimate exercise under parliamentary control. The Tudor despotism, however, forced this to yield in its turn; and for a time it became the fashion to strain the principle to the utmost, and give it a practically unbounded sphere of action. The high prerogative doctrine then came into vogue, which vested in the king, besides his ordinary power limited by law, an extraordinary power as extensive as the whole province of government, to be resorted to, if the safety of the commonweal were judged by the king to require its application, when the constitutional resources of authority were deemed inadequate. This was perhaps what Bacon meant when he described Prerogative as "the accomplishment and perfection of the Common Law," stepping in to the rescue of the State when the Common Law was found wanting. At the same time the erection of exceptional jurisdiction and the granting of monopolies were regarded as covered by the regular Prerogative. The dangerous doctrine and the questionable practices were effaced for ever by the action of the Long Parliament. But the dispensing and suspending powers still lingered; Charles II and James II employed them without scruple. The latter, however, was finally extinguished by the Bill of Rights, which also placed severe limits upon the dispensing power. The Revolution started a new method of dealing with Prerogative; it was left with most of its powers unimpaired, and some of them even strengthened, but their exercise was gradually drawn under the efficient control of parliament. This now belongs to a body of ministers who are responsible for it to the Commons and the country, and are virtually chosen and dismissed by both.

Presbyterianism is a form of Church government intermediate between Episcopacy and Congregationalism (q.v.). Episcopacy is monarchical; Congregationalism democratic; Presbyterianism aristocratic. The name is derived from the New Testament term presbyters, or elder, and it is generally agreed that the organization of the Church in New Testament times was of the Presbyterian type. The Reformation of the sixteenth century, which was marked by a strong endeavour to effect a return to the primitive polity by the Christian Church, saw a vigorous revival of Presbyterianism. Most significant of all was the fact that John Calvin adopted the Presbyterian form of organization for his church at Geneva. From Geneva, together with the Calvinistic theology, the Presbyterian system of government spread to France (where it was soon suppressed), the Netherlands, Southern Germany, England, Scotland, Northern Ireland, and the American colonies. Under Presbyterianism each congregation elects its own minister and elders subject to confirmation by the presbytery, which consists of all the ministers and selected elders of a certain specified district. The presbyteries are united and controlled by a General Assembly to which all send representatives.

So far as England is concerned, a serious attempt to convert the Episcopal Church, as established by law, into a Presbyterian Church was made under Elizabeth, particularly during the years 1572-93, by the Puritan party led by Thomas Cartwright (q.v.). Against this the queen and Whitgift fought strenuously and successfully. Half a century later, during the period of the Civil War, the influence of the Scots caused a partial adoption of Presbyterianism by the Parliamentary party (1643 et seq.); but the system was uprooted by Cromwell's Committee of Triers (q.v.) under the Commonwealth government, which was dominated by Independents. At the Restoration the hopes of the Presbyterians revived, but they were finally dashed to the ground by the Act of Uniformity, 1662.

In Scotland, on the other hand, the Presbyterian system established itself [CHURCH OF SCOTLAND; FREE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND], and from the eighteenth century onward branches of the Scottish Presbyterian Churches have planted and maintained themselves in England.

Press, THE FREEDOM OF THE, consists in the absence of legal restrictions on the employment of the printing-press for the discussion of questions of public concern. The first restrictions to be abandoned were those by which the Tudor council attempted to limit printing to members of the Stationers' Company (1557), and to manuscripts which had received the imprimatur of certain bishops or judges (1559). Stuart councils, courts, and parliaments next attempted to restrict publication to such printed works as received the licence of a press censor (1637 onwards); this licensing system was abandoned (1695) after being attacked by Milton and Blount. Thenceforward printing and publishing have remained almost completely free from administrative regulation (except under the temporary D.O.R.A., 1914-20), because such regulation had proved ineffectual when deliberately defied, and undesirably biased and vexatious in so far as it was effectual. To this extent, the liberty of the press became generally recognized as part of the British constitution; but indirect restrictions continued to exist. "The liberty of the press is indeed essential to the nature of a free state; but this consists in laying no previous restraints upon publication, and not in freedom from censure for criminal matters when published" (Blackstone, 1769).

Publishers of parliamentary reports were subjected to judgment at the bar of either House of Parliament for breach of privilege, until the struggle with Alderman Wilkes (1771); and the House of Commons continued to exercise jurisdiction over publications derogatory to its own dignity until the imprisonment of Burdett (1810) and Hobhouse (1819). Prosecutions before other courts, for breach of the common law of criminal libel, remained very frequent; and until Erskine and Fox's Libel Act (1792) juries judged only the fact of publication, the criminal character of the publication being tacitly assumed. There was something like a regular "prosecuting system" (Bentham) from the publication of Paine's "Rights of Man" (Part 2, 1792) to 1819-24, when Carlile and several of his shop assistants allowed themselves to be imprisoned: voluntary subscription societies were organized by Tories for indicting publishers and retailers of Radical and deist works; Crown law-officers dispensed with grand juries, by filing ex-officio informations; English libellers were made liable to transportation ("Two Acts," 1795) and banishment ("Six Acts," 1819—q.v.); Scottish libellers were transported (last case 1819); and owing to the criminal matter in their poems the Chancery Court refused to recognize Shelley's claim to educate his child, or the publisher's copyright in Byron's "Don Juan."

According to the common law derived by King's Bench judges from the Star Chamber and ecclesiastical courts, anything can be regarded as a defamatory, seditious, blasphemous, or obscene libel—according as it treats of personal, political, religious, or sexual matters—if its circulation tends to produce a state of things which can be regarded as a breach of the peace. Libels defamatory of individuals can be made the ground not only of civil actions for damages, but also of criminal prosecution in so far as they constitute a breach of the peace; but since 1843 defendants have been allowed to plead in justification that a defamatory criminal libel is true, and that its publication is conducive to the public interest (Campbell's Libel Act—the only statutory amendment of the common law of libel). The chief forms of seditious libel are those which tend to bring into hatred or contempt, or to excite disaffection against, (1) the person of his Majesty, his heirs and successors, or (2) the government and constitution of this kingdom as by law established, or (3) either House of Parliament, or (4) the administration of justice; or to excite his Majesty's subjects to attempt—otherwise than by lawful means—the alteration of any matter in Church or State as by law established (Stephen). The term blasphemous libel includes all abuse or calumny of the Christian religion or Scriptures, and probably also anything tending to undermine popular faith in Christianity.

Another more indirect restriction consisted in press-taxes imposed for revenue purposes in 1712. The newspaper-tax, raised to 4d. by 1815, was extended to "weekly political pamphlets" ("Six Acts," 1819); it was reduced to 1d. in 1836, after 750 convictions had been obtained against Hetherington and his assistants in the "battle of the unstamped" (1831-5); and it was finally abolished in 1851.

Prestonpans, THE BATTLE OF, was fought on September 21, 1745, at a village in Haddington county, nine miles east of Edinburgh, between the Young Pretender's adherents and the royal forces under Sir John Cope. The latter were defeated. Of Cope's army, the Loudoun Campbells were captured, and the rest (save for 200 infantry) cut down. The Highlanders lost only 100 men.

Pride's Purge is the name given to the violent measure by which (December 6, 1648) the army excluded a large number of the Presbyterians from the parliament. At the close of 1648 the army resolved to bring the king to a trial, and to put a stop to the treaty proceeding between him and the Parliament. Parliament on December 5 decided that the king's answers to their proposals offered foundations for a peace. The army, which had occupied London on December 2, surrounded the House of Commons on the morning of the 6th with the regiments of Colonels Pride, Hewson, and Hardress Waller. Pride, with a list of names in his hand, prevented certain obnoxious members from passing in, and locked up those who resisted. The number of those arrested amounted in the course of the next day to 47, and 96 were excluded. On the same day a paper, called the "Humble Proposals and Desires," was presented to the members still sitting on behalf of the council of officers, setting forth the demands of the army. The House, reduced to less than 80 members, decided by 50 to 28 to proceed with the consideration of these proposals (December 7), and in the next three weeks rescinded its late votes, and determined to try the king.

Primrose, ARCHIBALD PHILIP, 5TH EARL OF ROSEBERY (b. 1847), succeeded his grandfather in the title in 1868. In 1881 he joined Gladstone's second government as undersecretary at the home office, resigning in 1883, and returning in 1884 as lord privy seal and first commissioner of works. For a few months in 1886 he was foreign secretary, and held the same portfolio from August 1892 to March 1894, when he succeeded Gladstone as premier, remaining in office until 1895. He formally resigned the Liberal leadership in 1896. In 1903-5 he was a conspicuous opponent of Joseph Chamberlain's fiscal proposals. In 1909 he protested against Mr. Lloyd George's budget, and in 1911 he vehemently denounced the Parliament Bill. He became Earl of Midlothian in 1911.

Prior, MATTHEW (1664-1721), was one of the most distinguished of the literary diplomatists and politicians of William III's and Anne's reigns. He was educated at Westminster and St. John's College, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow. He was a friend of Charles Montagu, afterwards chief of the Whig party, and wrote with him "The City Mouse and the Country Mouse" (1687), a satire on Dryden's "Hind and the Panther." Prior was sent as secretary to the congress at The Hague, and became one of William's gentlemen of the bedchamber. He was appointed secretary to the English legation at Ryswick (1697), and was entrusted with the duty of bringing the treaty to England. Next year he was sent in the same capacity to France under the Duke of Portland. When factions broke out in the court Prior deserted Portland and attached himself to Albemarle. He was appointed under-secretary of state to the Earl of Jersey, but was removed from office on the retirement of that nobleman. In 1701 he was elected for East Grinstead and appointed commissioner of the board of trade. Under Anne he remained out of favour while the Whigs were in power; but in July 1711 he was sent with the Abbé Gualtier to Paris with propositions for peace. In August 1712 the ministry, weary of the length of the negotiations, sent Bolingbroke to Paris to shorten the work by personal conversation with Torcy. Prior accompanied him, and on Bolingbroke's return he was left as chargé d'affaires, without regular authority, and with scanty remittances. Disgrace rapidly overtook him on the death of Anne. As soon as he returned to England he was examined before the Committee of Safety, of which Walpole was chairman, for his share in the negotiations for peace. He was imprisoned, and Walpole moved an impeachment against him, but eventually he was released without trial. The rest of his life was spent in retirement.

Prisons, LEGISLATION ON. As early as 1166 it was enacted (by the Assize of Clarendon, c. 7) that in each county the sheriff should provide a jail at the king's cost if one did not already exist. In addition to these "common jails," some of the law courts had special prisons connected with them, such as the Marshalsea, attached to the King's Bench, and the Fleet (q.v.), attached to the Star Chamber and Chancery. Little attention was paid to the condition of these prisons until the eighteenth century. The jailers were paid, not by salaries, but by the fees which they could exact from the prisoners, and men were often retained long after their innocence had been pronounced because they could not pay the sums demanded. In 1728 the discovery of certain cruelties perpetrated in the Fleet led to the appointment of a parliamentary commission. The warden and his agents were put upon their trial for murder, but were acquitted; and the act passed in 1729 to remedy the worst evils was almost useless. The question was apparently forgotten until John Howard (q.v.) began to prosecute his inquiries. In 1774 two acts were passed, one providing that every prisoner against whom the grand jury failed to find a true bill should be immediately and without fee released, and that the jailer should be paid from the county rate; and the other to secure the due cleansing, etc., of prisons. After this time numerous statutes were passed. Of these the most important were those of 1823, 1865, and 1877. The act of 1823 was largely the result of Elizabeth Fry's efforts, and introduced a classification of prisoners. In 1865 the distinction, which had never been carefully maintained, between common jails and houses of correction—the latter intended only for convicted criminals, was finally abolished; and what was far more important, it was enacted that in all cases imprisonment should be "separate," i.e., solitary. Finally, the Prisons Act of 1877, which is now the principal statute on the subject, gave an increased power of control to the home secretary and to the prison commissioners appointed on his recommendation. It is to be added that between the years 1853 and 1864 transportation was abolished, and penal servitude, i.e., imprisonment with hard labour on public works, substituted. [The first Penal Servitude Act was passed in 1853. Important amendments—notably the restriction of corporal punishment and the establishment of three divisions of prisoners—were added by the Prison Act of 1898. In 1914, by the Criminal Justices Administration Act, the power of Courts of Summary Jurisdiction was enlarged.]

Probate and Divorce, THE COURT OF, was created in 1857, and received the testamentary and matrimonial jurisdiction, which had previously been vested in the ecclesiastical courts. By the Judicature Acts of 1873 (q.v.) this court, together with the Admiralty Court, was constituted one of the divisions of the Supreme Court.

Proclamations. In mediæval and later times, when the range of customary and statute law was still comparatively limited, and many practices that gave concern to kings and ministers were left uncorrected thereby, the king took upon himself at times to supply the defect by issuing proclamations which either expanded and applied the provisions of already existing laws—in any case were presumed to be fair deductions from such laws—or were independent acts of prerogative. They were under the Plantagenet and Lancastrian kings avowedly temporary. Under the Tudors proclamations took a bolder tone, and threatened to encroach on the domain of legislation. In 1539 was passed the famous Statute of Proclamations, which enacted that the king, with the advice of his council, might set forth proclamations, with penalties in them, as obligatory on the subject as an act of parliament, provided they did no damage to the estates, liberties, or persons of the king's subjects, and infringed no law. The precise significance of this measure has long been disputed. The tendency in recent years has been to minimize its importance, Professor Adair even going so far as to declare that it was not concerned at all with the legality of proclamations, but merely with the relief of the congestion of council business. In any case the first law of Edward VI repealed the measure. In Elizabeth's reign proclamations were not seldom used to supplement legislation, assist in the promotion of a policy, or regulate the conduct of the people. The banishment of Anabaptists, fasting in Lent, building houses round London, carrying daggers, or wearing long rapiers, trading with the French king's rebels, are a few of the things that were commanded or forbidden in them under penalties, and it is not clear that very many of them were distinctly illegal; statute law certainly warranted some, the unstrained prerogative others. James I resorted to the practice so often, and pushed it so decidedly across the boundaries of legality that in 1610 the alarmed Commons made it a subject of formal complaint, alleging that the king's proclamations touched the liberty, goods, inheritance, and livelihood of men, and that there was a general fear they would grow to the strength of laws. The gravest examples were that which in 1604 dictated rules to the constituencies in choosing members of parliament, and those which forbade new buildings about London, and the making of starch out of wheat, and in most cases disobedience was made punishable in the Star Chamber. James gave a reassuring reply, and consulted his chief judges. An important consequence followed. The consulted judges, led by Coke, were unanimously of opinion that by his proclamation the king could not create an offence. He could only admonish his subjects to keep the law, and could not make an offence punishable in the Star Chamber if it were not so already. James frankly accepted this statement of the law, and desisted from issuing proclamations imposing fine and imprisonment. But in Charles I's reign proclamations were greatly multiplied, especially during the long cessation of parliament. For staying in London despite a proclamation ordering country gentlemen with their families back to their homes, one Palmer was, in 1632, fined £1,000 by the Star Chamber. The unconstitutional nature of these proclamations is unquestionable. It is curious, however, that they afterwards found no place in the Grand Remonstrance. In the ecclesiastical province the sovereign's action in this respect is less disputable. Proclamations for and against certain religious tenets, practices, and ritual were frequent between 1529 and 1640. That of Charles I, in 1626, "for the establishing of the peace of the Church," is one of the latest examples. The practice survived, but only just survived, the convulsion of 1640-60. To only one or two of Charles II's reign has exception been taken. It is significant that no mention is made of them in the Declaration of Rights. To-day proclamations are still issued by the privy council, but they are invariably warranted, sometimes commanded, by the statute law. [J. R.]

"Propesyings" was the name given in the reign of Queen Elizabeth to meetings of the clergy, under the superintendence of the bishops, for the discussion and explanation of passages of Scripture. The meetings, which were held in public for the edification of the people, were presided over by a moderator. The system began during the primacy of Archbishop Parker, and was very obnoxious to Elizabeth, as savouring of Puritanism. Most of the bishops were in favour of Propesyings, as were many of the privy council, and Archbishop Grindal was sequestered for five years from the exercise of his jurisdiction for refusing to put down the Propesyings at the queen's command. They were finally suppressed by a special command of Elizabeth, May 7, 1577, and never subsequently revived.

Proportional Representation.

There are two main forms of proportional representation, the list system and the single transferable vote system. In either the election is held over a constituency returning several members, and the system operates in such a way that the voters are arranged into as many equal groups as there are members to be elected, each group being united in the support of a particular candidate. Of list systems there are many varieties, but the following features are usual. Parties as such are officially recognized. Candidates are put forward in party "lists"—hence the name—in an order of priority determined by the party organization. The voter votes for the list and has little or no power to alter the order of priority of the candidates. The electoral quotient, or quota, for the constituency is the minimum number of voters entitled to a representative. The quota is variously determined, but an approximate value is the number of persons voting divided by the number of seats. Each list receives one seat for each complete quota of voters supporting it (the remaining seats being allotted in various ways), and the candidates elected for the list are those at the head of the list.

In the single transferable vote system there is no official recognition of parties; the candidates' names appear on the ballot paper in a single list in alphabetical order. The voter exercises his one (single) vote by numbering with the figures 1, 2, 3, etc., in the order of his preference the candidates he desires to support. A vote is credited in the first place to the first choice of the voter; in designating his first choice the voter in effect joins the group of voters supporting a particular candidate.

The quota required for election under the single transferable vote system is, in the election of one member (though this limiting case is hardly proportional representation), one more than one-half of the votes; in the election of two members, one more than one-third; and so on. If the requisite number of quota-groups are formed by first choices only, the election is at an end. If not, the additional choices come into play to prevent the vote being wasted. A vote is "transferred" to a next choice only if the voter's prior choice is either elected with votes to spare, or if, after any surplus votes of elected candidates have been transferred, the voter's prior choice is at the bottom of the poll, and is defeated. By transferring first any surplus votes, and then in succession the votes of each candidate lowest on the poll, the requisite number of equal groups is built up.

The single transferable vote system was first advocated in England by Thomas Hare in 1857, and is widely known as the Hare System. John Stuart Mill described Hare's proposal as "among the very greatest improvements yet made in the theory and practice of government." The Hare system is the only form of proportional representation which has found acceptance in English-speaking countries. On the continent of Europe list systems are generally used.

In 1917 the Speaker's conference on electoral reform, which decided the main provisions of the Reform Act of 1918, recommended a partial adoption of proportional representation for the House of Commons, extending to about one-third of the seats. This recommendation was rejected by the House of Commons, though approved by the House of Lords.

Proportional representation is in operation in Great Britain for electing University members of parliament (1918); in Scotland for electing county education authorities (1919); in the Irish Free State for parliamentary and local elections (1922); and, overseas, for parliamentary elections, in Tasmania (1907), the Union of South Africa (Senate only, 1909), Malta (1921), and, partially, in some Canadian provinces.

On the continent of Europe the system now applies for parliamentary, and generally also for local, elections in Austria, Belgium, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Estonia, Germany (both Reich and States), Greece, Jugo-Slavia, Finland, Holland, Latvia, Lithuania, Luxemburg, Norway, Poland, Sweden, Switzerland. The system is also in practice in Iceland and Japan. In many countries, including Belgium, Denmark, Germany, Holland, and Switzerland, proportional representation is a constitutional provision.

Protector, THE TITLE OF, was first given to the governors appointed during the minority or incapacity of the king. It was borne by the Duke of Bedford during the minority of Henry VI (or in his absence by the Duke of Gloucester); by the Duke of York in 1454, and again in 1455 during Henry's illness; by the Duke of Gloucester in 1483, and the Duke of Somerset from 1547 (January) to 1548 (October). The House of Lords, in answer to Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester, thus defined the meaning of the word: "It was advised and appointed by authority of the king assenting the three estates of this land, that ye, in absence of my lord your brother of Bedford, should be chief of the king's council, and devised unto you a name different from other counsellors, not the name of tutor, lieutenant, governor, nor of regent, nor no name that should import authority of governance of the land, but the name of protector and defender, which importeth 'a personal duty of attendance to the actual defence of the land, as well against enemies outward if case required, as against rebels inward, if any were, granting you therewith certain power, the which is specified and contained in an Act of the said Parliament, to endure as long as it liked the king.'" In the case of the Duke of Somerset the instrument signed by the privy council on January 31, 1547, declared him to be appointed because the good government of the realm, the safety of the king, and "the more certain and assured direction of his affairs" required "that some special man of the number aforesaid (the executors) should be preferred in name and place before the other, to whom, as to the head of the rest, all strangers and others might have access, and who, for his virtue, wisdom, and experience in things, were meet and able to be a special remembrancer, and to keep a most certain account of all our proceedings." The title of Protector given to Cromwell (which may be compared with that of "custodes libertatis Angliæ," assumed by the Long Parliament) was chosen because it was not altogether strange to English ears, and perhaps also because it left the definite form of government, whether monarchical or republican, an open question. Cromwell's title was "Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland." It was given to him first in the Instrument of Government (q.v.), and, after his refusal to accept the crown, confirmed by the Petition and Advice.

The discussions on the question of the titles of king and protector are to be found in Burton, "Parliamentary Diary." [C. H. F.]

Protestant Refugees in England. As soon as the Reformation was established in England this country became the principal resort for the oppressed Calvinists of the Low Countries and of western and northern France, just as Switzerland was for the central and southern provinces of France. The immigration began before the end of Henry VIII's reign; it received a powerful impulse through the policy which guided the ministers of Edward VI; and in 1550 a charter was granted to the Protestants settled in London, allowing them free exercise of their religion, and appointing the church of Austinfriars for the joint worship of Dutch, Walloons, and Huguenots. The whole community was placed under the superintendence of John A. Lasco, a devoted minister who had abandoned high preferment as a Catholic priest in Hungary in order to found a Protestant church at Emden, in East Friesland. Driven from his charge there, A. Lasco had sought refuge in England in 1548, and took an active part in securing public support for his fellow exiles. A few months after the establishment of the congregation of Austinfriars, the French-speaking portion of it—Huguenots and Walloons—separated to found a distinct church in Threadneedle Street, known as "The London Walloon Church"; in 1840 they removed to St. Martin's-le-Grand. Meanwhile colonies were being formed in other parts of England. The silk-weavers of Canterbury settled there as early as 1547, and from 1561 until the present day, although now their industry can hardly be said to exist, they have worshipped in the crypt of the cathedral. By 1575 colonies were in existence at the seaports of Southampton, Winchester, Rye, Dover, Sandwich, and Yarmouth; and inland at Glastonbury, Wandsworth, Maidstone, Colchester, Norwich, Thetford, and Stamford. All, or nearly all, of these had their own religious services. Other sporadic Walloon settlements appear to have existed at Buckingham, Stony Stratford, Newport Pagnell, and other places in the southern Midlands. In the first years of this immigration the Dutch and Walloon element seems to have greatly outnumbered the Huguenots. An account of the year 1567 reckons 2,993 Dutch to only 512 French within the City of London proper; but on the south coast the French appear to have prevailed almost exclusively. The success, however, of the Dutch in the resistance to Spanish rule soon put an end to the emigration from that quarter; and the issue of the Edict of Nantes (1598), which gave a legal status to the Calvinistic community in France, had the natural result of keeping the Huguenots at home. There was, therefore, a pause in the inflow into England until the fourth quarter of the seventeenth century. But the measures preliminary to the revocation of the Edict of Nantes (1685) had their effect in a great multiplication of the French settlements in England. Between 1686 and the beginning of the eighteenth century no fewer than thirty French churches sprang into existence in London and its immediate vicinity. Others arose at Bristol, Barnstaple, Bideford, Plymouth, Stonehouse, Dartmouth, and Exeter, at Faversham, at Thorpe-le-Soken in Essex, and in Edinburgh. A whole set of colonies was founded in Ireland, at Portarlington and Youghal, in Dublin (where the French had three churches), at Lisburn, Waterford, Cork, and other places. The last influx of Protestant refugees was that of the mixed multitude of French and Germans who were ejected from the Palatinate in 1709; several thousands of whom were received in England, and the majority, probably, sent on to America. Many of the English congregations named were from the beginning attached to the National Church; nearly all in time became so. The foreigners soon adapted themselves to English customs, and, although they experienced much opposition from native tradespeople, were able to exercise their handicrafts to the signal advantage of the country. There are few industries that have not benefited by the work of the immigrants. In particular may be mentioned those in silk (at Canterbury and Spitalfields), linen, cotton, wool, paper, beaver (at Wandsworth), sailcloth, glass, etc. The total number of those who settled in English territory after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes can hardly be short of 80,000.

Provisors, THE STATUTE OF. The papal practice of "provision" gave rise to one of the most serious ecclesiastical abuses of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. Under pressure of financial necessity, created mainly by their strife with the Hohenstaufen, the popes adopted the expedient of appointing to English benefices their own nominees and supporters, who were commonly foreigners, pluralists, and absentees. The abuse of "provisions" was accentuated by the system of "reservation," whereby the Curia secured in advance the disposal of livings. Thus Gregory IX in 1238 demanded the reservation to his use of the next three hundred English benefices to fall vacant. Although measures such as these aroused strong opposition in England, it was not until 1351 that a serious attempt to check the abuse was made. The passing of the Statute of Provisors marks the zenith of anti-papal sentiment. It declared invalid all appointments made by way of papal provision and ordered the arrest and detention of offenders against the law. Nevertheless the statute, like its better-known complement, Premunire, was rarely put into effective execution. Provisions continued to be issued by the popes, appointing to English benefices, and Edward III himself set the example of disregarding his own laws by asking for the appointment of his ministers to bishoprics by way of papal provision.

Prussia, RELATIONS WITH, began with the commercial and crusading intercourse between England and the Teutonic order. The towns of the old Prussian state were all Hanse towns, and the intimate dealings between England and the Hansa extended to Elbing, Danzig, and Riga. At last rising English commerce was checked by the exclusive system of the Hansa. At the end of the fourteenth century the quarrels between Prussian and English merchants led the Hochmeister in 1385 to confiscate all English merchants' goods. In 1388 an understanding was arrived at, but the desire of the English for more privileges involved constant disputes all through the fifteenth century. Despite this, crusading expeditions to help the Teutonic knights in their struggle against the heathen were not unfrequent. In 1352 Duke Henry of Lancaster took the cross, and in 1391 Thomas of Gloucester projected, and Henry of Bolingbroke accomplished, a crusade against the Lithuanians. Meanwhile relations with Brandenburg became friendly during the tenure of the Margravate by the Bavarian and later Luxemburg houses. The Reformation united Prussia and Brandenburg under the Hohenzollern. The acquisition of the Rhenish duchies brought the Prussian house into relations with James I and Charles I. The close connexion of the Hohenzollern with Holland, at first a cause of disunion with England, ultimately became a bond of connexion. The Great Elector's last act was to contribute powerfully to the Revolution of 1688 by sending his troops into Holland to invade England. He had felt himself threatened by James II's alliance with Louis XIV, and had strongly urged William to seize the English crown. Common alliance with Austria, common hostility to France, now united England and Prussia. Frederick I, the first king, married the sister of George I, Sophia Charlotte. His son, Frederick William I, married his cousin Sophia Dorothea, daughter of George I. Frederick William I for many years remained on good terms with England. In 1725 he signed the Treaty of Hanover; but later he secretly deserted the English for the Austrian alliance, and the double marriage project by which Prince Frederick of Wales was to marry Wilhelmina, the king's daughter, and his heir Frederick, the Princess Amelia of Hanover, was never carried out. The accession of George II hardly mended matters. He bore no goodwill to his brother-in-law, or to his nephew Frederick II, who became king in 1740. The Elector of Hanover feared the growing power of Prussia; yet so important was Prussia's help against France that British diplomacy did its utmost to compel Maria Theresa to acquiesce in Frederick's conquest of Silesia. During the Seven Years' War (q.v.) Frederick found in Great Britain his one important ally. His brilliant feats of strategy won him great popularity in Great Britain, where he was regarded, strangely enough, as the "Protestant hero." The accession of George III led, however, to Great Britain's sudden desertion of Prussia in a way that Frederick never forgave. His later policy of Russian alliance was largely the result of his conviction that no stable alliance could be formed with Great Britain. Frederick William II, however, found in Great Britain an ally, first against Austria and Russia, next in the intervention in Holland to restore the House of Orange, and lastly in the war against revolutionary France. But in 1796 Prussia concluded peace with France at Basel, and refused to join the second coalition of 1799; and delayed in 1805 to join the war until Austria was defeated and Prussia herself threatened by the French. After Jena Prussia was compelled by Napoleon to exclude British manufactures and join in his measures to reduce the power of his great enemy. The War of Liberation renewed the alliance between Prussia and Great Britain, and Blücher and Wellington destroyed Napoleon's last army at Waterloo. The Tory government, after the peace of 1815, found in Prussia a congenial ally, though it had to curb Prussian animosity towards post-war France. The refusal of Prussia to co-operate against Russia during the Crimean War, and its attacks on Denmark in order to restore Schleswig-Holstein to Germany, caused some discontent in Great Britain. But the sympathy felt for the power which alone could give unity to Germany, and the alliance between the royal houses, long sufficed to maintain a general friendliness, [GERMANY, RELATIONS WITH.]

Prynne, WILLIAM (1600-69), the Puritan pamphleteer, matriculated at Oxford in 1618, and entered at Lincoln's Inn in 1620. He was an untiring student of ecclesiastical and legal antiquities, a bitter Puritan, and a voluminous writer on controversial subjects. In 1632 he published a work entitled "Histriomastix," attacking the immorality of the stage, and containing words supposed to reflect on the queen. For this he was fined £5,000 by the Star Chamber; degraded from his degree and the practice of his profession; and sentenced to be pilloried and to lose both his ears (February 17, 1634). Again, in 1637, for attacking the bishops in his "News from Ipswich," he was sentenced to imprisonment for life (June 14, 1637). The Long Parliament released him, and declared these sentences illegal. He was most active in the prosecution of Laud, and was appointed one of the visitors of the university of Oxford. He was elected to parliament in 1648 as member for Newport (Cornwall), but as he opposed the king's trial, and considered his answers to the parliamentary propositions to offer grounds for a treaty, he was expelled by Pride's Purge (q.v.). In 1659 he exerted himself to procure the restoration of the "secluded members," and when readmitted, worked to bring about the king's return. In the discussions on the punishment of the regicides he was one of their severest opponents. In the debates on religion he supported the Presbyterian view. From 1660 to his death he was keeper of the records in the Tower.

Public Worship Regulation

Act, THE (1874), was introduced into the House of Lords by the Archbishop of Canterbury, and into the House of Commons by Russell Gurney. The object of the bill was to give parishioners a ready way of invoking the authority of the bishop, and to enable the bishop to prohibit by his own mandate any practices which he considered improper, or else to submit the question to a special court. All that was requisite to put this machinery in motion against any clergyman was that three of the parishioners, or one archdeacon or churchwarden, should declare themselves dissatisfied, and proceed to make use of the law. A new court was erected, to which was transferred all the authority of the Court of Arches, and at its head was placed Lord Penzance, as the first judge, who thus became the direct successor of the Dean of Arches. There was a very warm debate on the subject in both Houses. Lord Salisbury and Gladstone opposed it with great vehemence as destructive of the independence of the Church. Disraeli and Sir William Harcourt stood forward as its most prominent champions. The act has not been successful. [HIGH CHURCH.]

Pucklechurch is a village of Gloucestershire, a few miles north-east from Bristol.

It was a royal vill in Anglo-Saxon times, and there, in 946, King Edmund was stabbed by a robber named Liofa, while keeping the feast of St. Augustine of Canterbury.

Pulteney, WILLIAM, EARL OF BATH (1682-1764), entered the House of Commons (1705) and distinguished himself on the Whig side during the last years of Anne's reign, having contracted a friendship with Walpole. On the accession of George I, Pulteney became one of the secretaries of state. In the political language of the day he, Stanhope, and Walpole were known as the three "grand allies." When Walpole's quarrel with Stanhope resulted in his retirement from office, Pulteney followed his patron (1717). When Walpole became supreme in 1721 Pulteney naturally expected a position in the cabinet. Instead, a peerage was offered him. In disgust he joined the opposition (1725), and in conjunction with Bolingbroke brought out the Craftsman, a journal in which Walpole was bitterly attacked. In 1728 he conducted a vigorous assault on Walpole's sinking fund, without much success; but his speech against Walpole's excise scheme was more successful, and the minister was obliged to withdraw the obnoxious measure. Pulteney's name had previously been struck off the list of privy councillors. He supported the Prince of Wales in opposition to the king and Walpole. In 1740 he was one of those who seceded from the House—an unwise step which he attempted in vain to excuse. In 1741 he conducted that last grand attack on Walpole's foreign policy which drove him from office. Pulteney, however, declined to form a ministry, and retired into the Upper House as Lord Bath. He gradually sank into insignificance, and his popularity waned. In 1743 his friends succeeded in persuading him to come forward as candidate for the premiership in opposition to Pelham; he failed, however, although supported by the splendid talents of Carteret. In 1746 he and Granville (Carteret) were commissioned by the king to form a ministry. This, the "Forty hours' Ministry," was an egregious failure, and the Pelhams returned to power. Long before his death Pulteney had become altogether forgotten by the political world. His talents were considerable, and his public life was on the whole respectable, and marked by uprightness and integrity; but he was somewhat wanting in steadfastness of purpose and discretion. Besides some poems which were highly praised by Pope, Pulteney was the author of several vigorous political pamphlets. [L. C. S.]

Punjab is the district lying about the five rivers, the tributaries of the Indus. It was inhabited by a half-religious, half-military community, the Sikhs, or Akalees. Their commonwealth or "khalsa" was divided into fraternities called misils, the chief of each of which was the leader in war and arbiter in time of peace. Of these chiefs twelve were deemed the foremost in rank. From 1806 to 1839 Ranjit Singh (q.v.) ruled all the Punjab. Six years of anarchy followed, and then, in 1845, war broke out with the British, whose victory involved cessions and submission (1846). The Sikh indignation at this humiliation produced the second Sikh War (q.v.), ending in the annexation of the Punjab (1849). It was placed under a board of commissioners, but its government has since been assimilated to that of the other provinces.

Puritans, THE. During the course of the English Reformation a difference sprang up between the moderate reformers and those who wished to make the forms and ceremonies of religious worship as simple as possible. Besides, "the English bishops" (writes Fuller under the date 1564) "conceiving themselves empowered by their canons, began to show their authority in urging the clergy of their dioceses to subscribe to the liturgy, ceremonies, and discipline of the Church: and such as refused the same were branded with the odious name of 'Puritans.'" Up to about 1570 the question at issue between the Elizabethan Puritans and the authorities of the Church was a question of ritual. After that date the institution of Episcopacy was attacked, especially by Cartwright (q.v.), on the ground of the apostolic ordination of Presbyterianism, and the question of church government added to the former cause of division. Thus was founded the Presbyterian section of the Puritan party. The first Puritans were anxious to remain within the national Church and reform it after their own ideas. But from the first attempt to enforce conformity some of them began to form separate conventicles. In June 1567 a company of more than 100 were seized at worship in Plummers' Hall, London, and fourteen or fifteen sent to prison. This is "the first instance of actual punishment inflicted on Protestant Dissenters" (Hallam). Later in the reign a sect arose, called—from their leader, Robert Browne—Brownists (q.v.) (or Separatists), holding that each congregation was in itself a complete church, denying that the State or any assembly of the clergy had any right to control it, and proclaiming the duty of separation from the national Church. This was the origin of the Independent section of the Puritan party. [CONGREGATIONALISM.] The result of the spread of these views was the act of 1573, enacting imprisonment, banishment, and death as penalties for Nonconformity.

The demands of the Puritan clergy were expressed in the Millenary Petition (q.v.) presented to James I in 1603, and at the Hampton Court Conference (q.v.—1604). They asked for certain definite alterations in the ritual, for a preaching ministry, and for the amendment of the articles in a Calvinistic direction. They wished to maintain uniformity in ritual and in doctrine, but to change the characters of both. After the rejection of their demands, conformity to the existing order was enforced, and about 300 of the Puritan clergy were ejected from their livings, as many had been expelled by Whitgift during the previous reign. English Puritanism in the earlier part of the seventeenth century continued to adhere more and more exclusively to Calvinistic doctrine, and by the mouth of the House of Commons to demand the suppression of the opposite views. One of the resolutions passed by that body on March 2, 1629, declared that "whosoever shall bring in innovation in religion, or by favour seek to extend or introduce Popery or Arminianism or other opinions disagreeing from the true and orthodox Church, shall be reputed a capital enemy to this kingdom and the commonwealth." During the same period questions of ritual and ceremonial became of less importance in Puritan teaching, and the demand for a purer morality and a reformed life more and more its characteristics. The number of Puritans within the Church increased. Baxter describes them thus: "Most men seemed to mind nothing seriously, but the body and the world. . . . The other sort were such as had their consciences awakened to some regard of God and their everlasting state; and according to the various measures of their understanding, did speak and live as serious in the Christian faith, and would much inquire what was duty and what was sin, and how to please God; and made this their business and interest, as the rest did the world." Under the government of Charles I and Laud a series of measures was directed against the Puritans. Controversial preaching was silenced by a royal proclamation, so that the doctrines at issue between the two parties in the Church could not be freely discussed, the lectureships were suppressed, and writers against the hierarchy or the Prayer Book severely punished. The summoning of the Long Parliament at length gave the Puritans the ascendancy, and they set to work to carry out their ideas on Church reform. The Grand Remonstrance (q.v.) set forth their programme. They wished (1) to reduce within bounds the "exorbitant power" of the prelates; (2) to unburden the consciences of men of needless and superstitious ceremonies, suppress innovations, and take away the monuments of idolatry; (3) to effect this intended reformation, a synod of British divines, "assisted with some from foreign parts professing the same religion," was to be assembled to discuss and submit to the confirmation of parliament the necessary measures. At the same time they meant to maintain uniformity of doctrine and discipline. "We hold it requisite that there should be throughout the whole realm a conformity to that order which the laws enjoin according to the Word of God." To carry out these views the Presbyterian system of church government was established in England, and a new Prayer Book and Confession of Faith drawn up, two or three thousand of the clergy were ejected from their livings, and a severe law passed against all heretics and sectaries. But the Independent section of the Puritan party, the successors of the Separatists, defended the cause of toleration and congregational government, purged the parliament, put a stop to the assembly of divines, and finally dissolved both. The advanced section of the Independents would have abolished altogether an established Church. Cromwell, however, was determined to carry out a more conservative policy; "his definite ideal had come to be a State Church that should comprehend Presbyterians, Independents, Baptists and pious men of all sound evangelical sects with an ample toleration of dissent round about it." This ideal he carried out during the Protectorate. After his death, when the secluded members had been readmitted to sit in parliament, Presbyterian government was re-established (March 1660), and the Restoration found it in possession. Charles had promised a liberty for tender consciences, and led the Presbyterians to hope for their comprehension within the Church establishment. Negotiations for that purpose were carried on, and a conference took place at the Savoy (1661) (q.v.), but attempts at a compromise failed, and the Act of Uniformity (q.v.) was passed (May 1662). About 2,500 of the Puritan clergy were deprived of their livings in consequence of this change. Those who conformed and remained within the Church formed the Low Church party, those who now definitely separated themselves from it, the Nonconformist, or Dissenting party.

Purveyance. "Purvey" is but another form of "provide." Purveyance, in its general sense, was the obligation believed to be of immemorial antiquity, imposed upon all people of the country-side through which the king was making progress, of providing him and his multitudinous following with the means of support and conveyance, at prices fixed by the royal officers, and paid, if paid at all, in tallies, the value of which was to be deducted from the next taxes that the several victims of the exaction would have to pay. Reduced to particulars, it meant the right of buying for, and the duty of selling goods to, the king in preference to any other purchaser (called pre-emption), the power of demanding personal services, horses, and carts, and everything else that the case needed, from those of the neighbourhood who could give them, at whatever cost of damage, loss, and inconvenience, with no chance of ever being adequately paid, and little of ever being paid at all. No irregular royal right was of greater antiquity, better established, or of longer continuance. We can trace it by the efforts to correct its evils from the Great Charter (arts. 28-31) till the Civil Wars, [by way of the Articuli super Cartas (1300), the Ordinances of 1311, the statutes of Edward III's reign (notably that of 1362), and the Commons' Petition of 1604], and it was undoubtedly much older than the Charter. Even in its warranted use it was specially oppressive in England; the very eagerness of our best kings to do their work well, by keeping them constantly travelling from place to place, aggravated its hardships. But its nature lent it readily to abuse; it was accordingly grossly abused, and most galling its abuses were. Not only were the purveyors outrageously unjust, dishonest, and unfeeling, making, as an authority states, every old woman tremble for her poultry till the king had gone by, and perverting their office to their own enrichment, but the son or servant of the king was counted as the king himself, and every other colourable pretext for making the requisition was seized without scruple. It was, moreover, construed into a claim to call upon whole counties for supplies of beef, pork, and corn, on great state occasions. Purveyance was, therefore, odious in itself; and it loaded the Crown with a heavy burden of unpopularity. No grievance provoked so much legislation; it is prominent in every remedial movement and measure for centuries; we are told that not fewer than thirty-six statutes were passed to restrain it, ten in Edward III's reign alone. Yet its legality was always admitted, nor was there ever any thought of removing the "accursed prerogative" itself, as Archbishop Islip called it. The curtailing legislation was not altogether useless; after 1362, when Edward III enacted that purveyance should provide for the personal needs of the king and queen only, and that purveyors should change their name to buyers, its abuses seem to have been less grievous. In process of time, however, an abundant crop of new ones had grown round it; of these the Commons' Petition, in 1604, gives a detailed account that shows a wonderful ingenuity on the part of the purveyors and cart-takers in working the prerogative for their own benefit, and to the oppression and vexation of the people. Bacon told the king that their practices were "the most common and general abuse of all others in the kingdom." It was then proposed to compound the right for an annual payment of £50,000, but the proposal fell through. Two years later the king pruned away the worst of the evils by proclamation; and the rage against the officials subsided. In 1610 a surrender of the right by the Crown was almost arranged by Cecil in the bargain known as the Great Contract, but broke down with the collapse of that negotiation. It was discontinued, however, with the relics of feudalism, at the fall of the monarchy, and was not restored with its restoration. In 1660 purveyance was formally abolished by the convention of that year, [though a statute of 1661 revived it in part by declaring that the king, when travelling,

Pusey, EDWARD BOUVERIE (1800-82), was born at Pewsey (Wilts) and educated at Eton and Christ Church. He became a fellow of Oriel College in 1823, where he was closely associated with Keble and Newman (q.v.). In November 1828 he was appointed Regius Professor of Hebrew at Oxford by the Duke of Wellington, then prime minister, and at the same time became a canon of Christ Church. He joined Newman in the series of "Tracts for the Times" (1833), and threw himself into the religious revival with an energy which soon converted the tracts into doctrinal treatises, won for the movement the nickname "Puseyism," and caused Pusey in 1836 to oppose the appointment of Dr. R. D. Hampden (q.v.). He gradually became the leader of the Oxford Revival, and in June 1843 was suspended for two years from his office of preacher at the University on account of his sermon on the Eucharist. When Newman was received into the Roman Church in 1845 Pusey definitely became the chief guide of the revival. He founded Anglican sisterhoods in London, Devonport, Oxford, and elsewhere (1845-50), maintained his Tractarian principles against all opposition, particularly during the crisis of the "Papal Aggression" in 1850, and began later a campaign of opposition to Latitudinarianism (1852), which culminated in his attack on Benjamin Jowett in 1862. In 1865 he published a letter to Keble on "The Church of England a Portion of Christ's one holy Catholic Church, and a means of restoring visible Unity: an Eirenicon," pleading for reunion between the Churches of England and Rome. It was followed by a second (1867) and third Eirenicon (1869) in reply to Newman's retorts. But his efforts failed, along with his endeavours to secure reunion with the Wesleyans (1874-5), though he remained active until his death on September 16, 1882.

Pym, JOHN (1584-1643), descended from a good Somersetshire family, and educated at Broadgates Hall, Oxford, early obtained a responsible office in the exchequer, and entered parliament in 1614 as member for Calne. In the second parliament of Charles I he was one of the managers of Buckingham's impeachment, and in the third he took a prominent part in the debates on the Petition of Right (q.v.). In 1640 he was naturally pointed out to head the popular party, and the great speeches in which he summed up their grievances were widely circulated amongst the people. He moved the impeachment of Strafford, drew up with the aid of St. John the charges against him, and was the chief manager of his trial. The Bill of Attainder was forced on him by the extreme party amongst his followers, and Pym did his best to give the proceedings a judicial form. Not only was he a very able debater and parliamentary tactician, but he had what Clarendon terms "a very comely and grave way of expressing himself." He was a strong Presbyterian, though not at first disposed to go the length of the Root-and-Branch (q.v.) party, and it was probably on account of this relative moderation that it was at one time intended by the king to offer him the post of chancellor of the exchequer. The Protestation and the Grand Remonstrance (q.v.), two appeals to the people, were particularly his work. The influence which he exercised gained him from the Royalists the name of "King Pym," and marked him out for impeachment on the charge of treasonable correspondence with the Scots and attempting to subvert the fundamental laws of the kingdom, brought against him by the king in January 1642. After the refusal of the guarantees demanded by parliament, Pym became a leading member of the Committee of Safety (July 4, 1642). He was practically the head of the government, and unceasingly active in directing the conduct of the war and maintaining the spirit of resistance in city and parliament. He was excepted from pardon in the king's proclamations, and exposed both to the slanders of the Royalists and to many accusations from the discontented of his own party. But he retained the confidence of the parliament to the last, and a month before his death they conferred on him the important post of lieutenant-general of the ordnance of the kingdom. His last important work was to bring about the alliance with the Scots. He died on December 8, 1643, and was buried in Westminster Abbey. Clarendon thus describes his position in 1640: "He seemed to all men to have the greatest influence upon the House of Commons of any man; and, in truth, I think he was at that time, and for some months after, the most popular man, and the most able to do hurt, that hath lived in any time."

Pyrenees, THE BATTLES OF THE (July 25-August 2, 1813), fought during the closing period of the Peninsular War, were a series of combats which resulted in the defeat of Soult's attempt to relieve San Sebastian. In July Soult had been sent to supersede Joseph. On the 25th and 26th General Cole was vigorously attacked by Soult at Roncesvalles, and only just managed to maintain his position until Picton and Campbell arrived, while, at Maya, Stewart was all but driven from the pass, after losing two successive positions. Wellington, on returning from San Sebastian, heard of these combats at Imeta, and at once gave orders for all the troops to concentrate in communication with the force at Pamplona. The retreat of the troops was successfully accomplished. On the 28th a combat took place at Sorauren, where Wellington, with very inferior numbers, held a strong position against the attacks of Soult. On the 30th Hill was attacked at Buena in a difficult position, and his position was turned; but in the meantime Wellington had assaulted and taken Sorauren and had thrown the French who were engaged against him into hopeless confusion. Soult's position had become desperate, and it was necessary to retreat. In the narrow passes he with difficulty escaped being surrounded and losing his whole army. During nine days' fighting the allies had lost 7,300 men, while the French loss must have been quite double. Soult's army was rendered incapable of further action for the time being, and Wellington at once ordered Graham to renew the siege of San Sebastian.

Quadruple Alliance, THE (August 2, 1718), was the name given to the extension of the Triple Alliance of 1717 (q.v.) between Great Britain, France, and Holland by the adhesion of the emperor to its principles. A treaty was drawn up by the allied powers, with the main object of maintaining the European settlement effected by the Treaty of Utrecht (q.v.). With a few changes of detail the chief articles of the treaty were that Spain was to restore Sardinia to the emperor, and the King of Spain was to renounce his claim to succeed to the French crown; while the emperor renounced all claim to what had been guaranteed to Philip V by the Treaty of Utrecht. Philip was to renounce his claim to the Italian possessions of the emperor and to the Netherlands. The emperor was to be put in possession of Sicily, in return for which he was to give up Sardinia to the King of Sicily, who was to be confirmed in all the cessions made to him by the Treaty of Turin in 1703; while the emperor was to acknowledge the house of Savoy's right to succeed to the crown of Spain in case of the failure of Philip V's heirs. France and Great Britain promised to aid the emperor to acquire possession of Sicily; while the emperor and the French bound themselves to maintain the Protestant succession in England. The kings of Spain and Sicily were to be forced to submit to these terms, but were allowed three months' consideration. If any one of the mediating powers was attacked, the others should assist her. If both Spain and Sicily held out, Sardinia was to be first conquered, and then Sicily, of which two islands the former was to be put in the guardianship of Great Britain; and in case of this resistance on the part of these two powers, the emperor was allowed to recover the part of Milan ceded by the Treaty of Turin. When once in possession of Sicily the emperor was to give up all claim upon Spain and the Indies.

Quatre Bras, THE BATTLE OF (June 16, 1815), was an encounter between the left of the French army and the British advanced guard in the short campaign of 1815. Quatre Bras itself was merely a mass of farm-buildings situated at the point where the four main roads to Brussels, Nivelles, Charleroi, and Namur intersect. Napoleon's orders were that, while he attacked the Prussians at Ligny, on the 16th, Ney should simultaneously overwhelm the British force at Quatre Bras. The attacks began at three o'clock in the afternoon, and as evening wore on Ney became aware that no reinforcements could reach him; and at the same time fresh troops were arriving for the allies, among whom were two brigades of the Guards. As the attacks became feebler, Wellington ordered all the troops to advance. They at once drove the French before them, and carried every position which the French had won. Night had fallen, and the troops bivouacked on the field of battle. The reinforcements had given Wellington a numerical superiority over Ney; but the necessity of forming a connexion with Blücher, who was falling back from Ligny, compelled him to forgo the opportunity of attacking Ney on the 17th, and at ten o'clock next morning he began a retreat to the field of Waterloo.

Quebec, THE PROVINCE OF, or Lower Canada, one of the original federating states of the Dominion of Canada (q.v.).

Quebec, THE CAPTURE OF (September 13, 1759), was effected by General Wolfe (q.v.) during the campaign in America which formed part of the Seven Years' War. The idea of attacking Quebec, the capital of French Canada, was one of long standing with British ministers, and in 1711 an expedition was sent, but returned without being able to make its way through the channel of the St. Lawrence. The town, situated on a promontory of lofty rocks—the Heights of Abraham—was considered impregnable, and was defended by 13,000 French troops under the Marquis de Montcalm. He had so disposed his troops as to command the only dangerous position of assault, with the river and the sandbank in his front, and behind him heavy woods. Wolfe's force of 8,635 men, on board Admiral Saunders's fleet, succeeded in landing on the Isle of Orleans, before the city, by June 27, 1759. On the 29th Wolfe took possession of the headland of Pointe Levis, which faces Quebec. He opened fire on the city from his two batteries, while Montcalm remained for the most part on the defensive. On July 9 Wolfe carried his troops over to the left bank, while a squadron of British ships, passing farther up the river, maintained the blockade. At last, being unable to induce Montcalm to move, Wolfe crossed the Montmorency, but was beaten back. Still the two other British armies failed to appear. To add to the other difficulties, Wolfe fell ill of a fever, and there were only between 3,000 and 4,000 effective men. On the night of September 12 Wolfe determined to attempt to scale the Heights of Abraham. In the darkness half his forces were carried across with the tide. Clamoring up the precipice, they startled the French company guarding that part of the heights. Before Montcalm could muster his men, the British were at the back of Quebec. In the engagement that followed Wolfe was wounded, and died in the moment of victory. At the Tercentenary celebrations in 1908 the Plains of Abraham were converted into a national park.

Quebec Act, THE (1774), was passed at the instigation of Lord North, despite the opposition of Chatham and Burke, to conciliate as far as possible the French Canadians, and to secure their allegiance to Britain in the approaching war with America. This act restored the old French system, included in Canada the territory previously annexed to Newfoundland, extending its boundaries to the Ohio and the Mississippi, and established the Roman Catholic Church, to which the vast majority of the Canadians belonged. Further, it "confirmed the French Canadians in their possessions, their laws, and rights, on condition of their taking an oath of allegiance which was so worded as not to hurt the conscience of Roman Catholics." It also provided for the establishment of a legislative council, with authority over everything except taxation.

Queen is a word which originally meant no more than woman or wife, though it early came to be used for the wife of a king. Asser, after telling how Ethelwulf upon his return to England with his second wife, Judith, placed her upon a throne by his side, "contrary to the perverse custom" of the West Saxons, proceeds to explain that the evil deeds of Eadburh, wife of Beorhtric of Wessex, had caused the nobles of that kingdom to swear that they would not henceforth allow any king's wife to sit upon the throne beside her husband, or even to be called "queen" (regina). According to Freeman ("Norman Conquest"), this explains the fact that in Wessex the usual title for the king's wife was "lady," hlæfdige, though in Mercia "queen," cwen, was still used. From the time of Ethelred, however, a special form for the coronation of the queen appears in the rituals; Eadgyth, wife of the Confessor, is said by the chronicler to have been "hallowed to queen," though she is afterwards always spoken of as "lady"; and from the coronation of Matilda, wife of the Conqueror, onward, the title "queen" is always applied to the wife of the king. But it still carried with it the sense of king's wife, and this may, perhaps, explain the fact that the Empress Matilda, who claimed the crown in her own right, is never spoken of as "queen," or "regina," but in the chronicles appears as "empress," and in William of Malmesbury and a charter as "domina." On the other hand, Stephen's wife, Matilda, is spoken of as "the king's cwen."

Henry I's attempt to secure the accession of his daughter broke down, partly because the rule of a woman was unprecedented, and opposed alike to the old English theory of election and the new feudal spirit, but still more because of her marriage with the Count of Anjou, the hereditary enemy of the Normans. But till long afterwards there were doubts whether a queen could reign in England. The accession of Mary Tudor was secured alike by her father's will, authorized by act of parliament, and by the strong legitimist feeling of the country. To extinguish, however, "the doubt and folly of malicious and ignorant persons," a statute was passed declaring that a queen regnant has the same powers and prerogatives as a king. Mary, wife of William III, occupied a curious position, midway between that of queen consort and queen regnant, for while the Bill of Rights declared the Prince and Princess of Orange joint sovereigns, and her name accompanied his in all public documents, "the sole and full exercise of the regal power" was entrusted to the prince.

The mediæval queens consort of England usually possessed considerable estates separately administered, and had their own chancellors. In modern times they have had their attorneys- and solicitors-general, though the offices are merely nominal. Apparently even before the Conquest the queen consort received "queen gold" (aurum reginæ, probably the same as the gersamma reginæ of Domesday), i.e., one mark of gold for every one hundred marks of silver paid to the king in fines and the like. As there was no queen consort from the death of Henry VIII to the accession of James I, its payment was suspended, and Anne of Denmark never exacted it. In 1635 writs were again issued for levying it, but Charles afterwards bought the right from his wife for £10,000, and it was never enforced.

By the Act 25 Edward III it was rendered treason to compass or imagine the death of the queen, or to violate her, and in the latter case the queen herself, if consenting, was guilty of treason. For this offence Anne Boleyn was tried before the peers of parliament; Caroline, wife of George IV, was proceeded against in a like case by a bill of pains and penalties. The legal position of a queen consort is that of a feme sole, and not of a feme covert. She "is of ability to purchase lands and convey them, to make leases, to grant copyholds, and do the other acts of ownership (without the concurrence of her lord), which no other married woman until very recently could do. She may likewise sue and be sued alone without joining her husband. She may also have a separate property in goods, as well as in lands, and she has a right to dispose of them by will" (Stephen). But though she can be sued, she is not liable to any amercement.

A queen dowager is not protected by the Statute of Treasons. An act is said to have been passed in the reign of Henry VI, though of this there is little evidence, rendering any person who dared to marry a queen dowager without special royal licence liable to the forfeiture of his lands and goods. No action, however, seems to have been taken when it was discovered that Lord Seymour of Sudeley had married Catherine Parr before leave was given. [W. J. A.]

Queen Anne's Bounty was instituted in 1703 for the relief of the poorer clergy. The tax known as first-fruits and tenths of livings on the Church (the surrender, that is, of the entire income of the first year of every ecclesiastical living, and the tenth part of the income of every subsequent year) had been originally imposed by the papacy, but had been transferred to the Crown by Henry VIII. Under Charles II the condition of the clergy was miserable in the extreme; their incomes hardly ever amounted to £100 a year—they were often less than £15. At this time the tax produced only £14,000 a year, and the king used it as a fund from which to pension his mistresses and their offspring. In 1697 Bishop Burnet presented to William III a plan for transferring the proceeds of the tax from the Crown to the poor clergy, but the king set it aside. The design was carried out in the next reign. On February 7, 1703, the day after the queen's birthday, Sir Charles Hedges, chancellor of the exchequer, announced to the House that her Majesty intended to make a grant of her whole revenue arising out of the first-fruits and tenths of livings, for the benefit of the poorer clergy. The project was warmly approved by the House, and a bill passed empowering the queen to incorporate such persons as she should select as trustees for her bounty. The measure passed through the Lords after some opposition. Various regulations have been made with reference to this fund since it was first handed over for the benefit of the clergy. Of these acts the principal are 2 and 3 Anne, c. 11, authorizing the queen to establish a corporation for the management of the fund, which was done the same year, the corporation consisting of archbishops, bishops, privy councillors, various law officers, the mayors of cities, custodes rotulorum, and lieutenants of counties, etc. By 1 Geo. I, c. 10, these trustees were allowed to examine witnesses on oath. £200 was to be invested for the increase of each living with a stipend of less than £10 a year: then those not exceeding £20. To every living under £45 a year the governors might make a grant of £200 on condition of a similar amount being raised from other sources. Fresh regulations were made in the Clergy Residences Repair Act of 1776 (17 Geo. III, c. 53). By 46 Geo. III, c. 133, £6,000 a year was granted for the augmentation of livings not exceeding £150 a year. By 28 and 29 Vict., c. 69, any five of the governors (three being archbishops or bishops) were constituted a quorum. Other statutes have allowed certain advances for repairing chancels, building parsonages, and other similar purposes. The act of 1776 was amended in 1911 by the Parsonages Act, under which the governors are empowered to lend money at not more than 4 per cent. for parsonages, etc., on mortgage of a benefice.

Queen-gold (Aurum Reginae) was a claim made by the queens of England on every tenth mark paid to the king on the renewal of leases on Crown lands or the granting of charters or payment of certain fines (e.g., those in lieu of military service)—matters of grace supposed to be obtained by the powerful intercession of the queen.

Queensberry, JAMES DOUGLAS, 2ND DUKE OF (1662–1711). [DOUGLAS.]

Queensberry Plot, THE (1703). In March 1703 Queen Anne granted a pardon to all Scottish political offenders who would take the oath to her government. Encouraged by this act of generosity several of the exiled adherents of the Stuarts availed themselves of this opportunity of returning to their own country for the purpose of stirring up sedition. Amongst those who took advantage of the new state of affairs was Lord Lovat. It soon got noised abroad that there was to be a great Highland gathering at Lochaber early in August, and people were not long in discovering or inventing a political meaning to this event. Lovat availed himself of the general feeling of disquietude to gratify a grudge which he had long held against Lord Atholl, the keeper of the privy seal. Having in his possession an unaddressed letter written by the Pretender's queen to some Scottish noble, he filled in the blank of the superscription with the name of Atholl, and then forwarded the document to the commissioner, the Duke of Queensberry. The latter nobleman, glad of an opportunity of ruining his colleague, sent on the letter unopened to the queen. Before long, however, Robert Ferguson, one of Lovat's friends, revealed the deceit, and the chief plotter had to fly to the continent. But as a result of his deception Queensberry had to quit office, and even then the effects of this movement were not all over. In December the queen informed the House of Lords in London that there were French emissaries stirring up rebellion in Scotland, and the House at once began to investigate the question on its own account, but without coming to any very definite result. In the meantime, however, the appointment of a committee of inquiry in the House of Lords had wounded the feelings of the Scots, who naturally considered that such a question should be dealt with by their own privy council. At the same time the proceedings of the House of Lords had stirred up indignation nearer home. The Commons discovered in the action of the peers that this body was assuming powers of criminal inquiry which did not belong to it, and prayed the queen to give orders for the investigation to be carried on by her officers. Accordingly, when the Scottish parliament met in January 1704, the queen desired the privy council to ascertain how much truth there was in the suspected plot.

Queensferry Paper, THE (June 1680), was found in the pocket of Henry Hall (d. 1680), one of the leading Covenanters in Scotland. He was captured at Queensferry, and the document found in his possession was read at the council board. It was a preliminary sketch of the more famous Declaration of Sanquhar (q.v.).

Queenston, THE BATTLE OF (October 13, 1812), was fought on the shores of Lake Ontario between an invading force of Americans, and the British and Canadian forces led by Generals Brock and Sheaffe. The victory remained with the British, who, however, purchased it by the death of General Brock.

Quérrouaille, LOUISE RENÉE DE, DUCHESS OF PORTSMOUTH and AUBIGNY (1649-1734), came over to England in 1670 in the train of Henrietta of Orleans, the sister of Charles II. She shortly became the mistress of the king, who created her Duchess of Portsmouth (1673). She appears to have been friendly with Arlington, and to have long kept up a communication with the French ambassadors, being very anxious for the friendship between Louis XIV and Charles II to continue. Towards the close of the reign she became a strong partisan of the Exclusion Bill. A little later she became on good terms with the Duke of York, finding that he was willing to guarantee her £5,000 a year from the receipts of the post office. Next year (1682) she was mainly instrumental in securing Sunderland's recall to office, and in 1684 was one of the prime movers of the ruling ministers, Sunderland and Godolphin. When the king was seized with his fatal apoplectic stroke it was she who reminded the Duke of York that his brother was at heart a Catholic, and who thus succeeded in calling Francis to the royal deathbed. She returned to France in 1685. By Charles II she was the mother of Charles, Duke of Richmond; but her own title died with her.

Quia Emptores (or WESTMINSTER III) is the name given to the statute enacted in 1290, which directed that in all future transfers of land the new tenant should hold the land not from the alienor, but from the next lord. Thus if B holding land from A transferred some of that land to C, C would hold it not from B but from A. In this way sub-infeudation was checked, but incidentally free substitution was made possible. The result of the measure was to set in motion a process by which in course of time the importance of merely tenurial principles were immensely decreased. By the gradual extinction of all mesne tenures the seignory of all freehold lands held in fee simple tended to become concentrated in the Crown. The consequence of the removal of restraints on alienation was to make land for the first time a marketable commodity in the full sense, and thus finally to destroy the rigidity of the feudal organization.

Quiberon, THE EXPEDITION TO (1795), was intended to assist the royalist insurgents of La Vendée and Brittany. After much delay the expedition, consisting largely of French royalist refugees, left England (June 16, 1795), and landed at the peninsula of Quiberon, near Carnac. Here they were joined by a large number of "Chouans" and irregular troops, commanded by the royalist generals de Puisaye and D'Hervilly. The little fort of Penhièvre was captured by these troops; but nothing more was done, owing to jealousies among the leaders. Meanwhile Hoche, the Republican general, had raised 10,000 troops, and managed to recapture the fort and shut the invaders up in the peninsula of Quiberon. They were then attacked by the Republicans, and cut to pieces or driven into the sea. About 3,500, with the leader, de Puisaye, escaped to the British vessels. The remainder were killed or taken captive. Of the prisoners 700 were shot by their captors after the fighting was over.

Quiberon Bay, THE BATTLE OF (November 20, 1759), was fought between the British and French fleets during the Seven Years' War (q.v.). Sir Edward Hawke had been engaged during the summer of 1759 in blockading the French fleet, which lay at Brest under de Conflans; and when, in November, he was forced to stand off, the French admiral seized his opportunity to sally forth in the hope of overpowering a few British frigates that were cruising about under Captain Duff, before Hawke could come up to their aid, and to transport 18,000 troops from the Morbihan to Scotland. In this plan, however, de Conflans was unsuccessful, and the united British fleets drove the French—to whom they were slightly superior in numbers (23 to 21)—back from the point of Quiberon to coast near the mouth of the Vilaine. The French ships were drawn up close to a shore rocky and set with islands. Shoals and quicksands rendered their position still more dangerous to attack. Nevertheless, Hawke determined on an engagement, and refused to listen to the representations of his pilot. The battle resulted in a decisive victory for the British, who lost only forty men and two ships, and by night two French ships had struck, four had been sunk, and the others had drawn up the Vilaine. In return for this victory, which relieved Britain from all fear of invasion, and shattered the French naval power for a time, a pension of £2,000 a year was conferred upon Admiral Hawke.

Quo Warranto Commissions were issued by Edward I to his justices for the purpose of inquiring by what warrant local magnates were administering royal justice in their franchises. They were continued at intervals for a period which extended into the reign of Edward III. The records of their proceedings are embodied in a collection of pleadings published (1818) under the title of "Placita de Quo Warranto." The inquiry was not entirely a novel thing. Writs of Quo Warranto had been in use since the time of Richard I, and we have records of inquiries of a similar nature to the above made by the justices of Henry III. But the elaborate and efficient measures taken by Edward I have given the series of inquiries inaugurated by him a special place in the history of English local jurisdiction. On his arrival in England in 1274 he ordered a general investigation into the usurpation of royal jurisdiction in his private courts. The material collected by this commission is embodied in the Hundred Rolls. Armed with the information so obtained, the justices set out on their Quo Warranto itinerary to challenge the claims of all whose jurisdiction might be questioned. The theory employed by the king's council in disputed cases was that of Bracton: peace and justice belong to the Crown; where no express grant of a franchise can be shown, the claimants may be presumed to have usurped it. It is obvious that if such a theory were pressed hard, opposition would be likely to be met from the lords of local courts, since with many an old-established franchise there was no certain foundation other than its exercise beyond the memory of man. For these no charters could be shown, and the royal justices aroused considerable resentment among those whose privileges were imperilled. There is the well-known story of Earl Warrenne, who produced an old and rusty sword, and said to the justices, "This is my warrant! My ancestors, who came over with the Conqueror, won their lands by the sword, and by the sword I will defend them against all usurpers." Whatever may be the authenticity of this story, the earl, like his fellow-magnates, fought hard at law to preserve his jurisdictions. It seems probable that the royal claims were not so hardly pressed as tradition has declared. In some cases immemorial possession was allowed as sufficient justification for a claim. But to meet opposition the king in 1290 struck a compromise in the two Statutes of Gloucester, which allowed that uninterrupted possession from the beginning of Richard I's reign should constitute a title. Those who could exercise this plea and had already lost their franchises in the course of the proceedings were to have restitution. As a matter of fact, very few franchises were abolished. "In almost every case where a liberty was found to be unwarranted, the king was willing, for a substantial fine, to restore it to its late holder and give him a charter." There must have been satisfaction among both parties when the original ill-feeling had passed. For the king's part, his exchequer had profited and he had put a check upon the unlicensed assumption by private persons of the royal jurisdiction. The law was now perfectly clear. On the other hand, the holders of franchises could feel more secure in their possession, since it was now only necessary to show that the lawful employment of jurisdiction was established either by charter or by prescription.

Rabbling the Curates was the name given to the expulsion of Episcopalian clergymen from the south-west of Scotland by the Cameronians in 1689-90. There seems to have been comparatively little mob violence. Cameronian committees were formed to superintend the ejectment, and formal notices to quit were sent to the curates. A subsequent act of the Scottish parliament legalized these proceedings by declaring the parishes vacant.

The expulsion is described in the Cameronian pamphlet, "Faithful Contentings Displayed."

Radcliffe, JAMES, 3RD EARL OF DERWENTWATER (1689-1716), was a grandson of Charles II by his mistress, Moll Davis (q.v.). He was a Roman Catholic, and deeply implicated in the rebellion of 1715, for which he was tried and executed in the following year, at the early age of twenty-eight.

Biography by C. H. Bowden, 1897.

Radcliffe, THOMAS, 3RD EARL OF SUSSEX (1526 ?-1583), though inclined to Catholicism, was a faithful and honourable counsellor and affectionate kinsman of Elizabeth. He was made, on his father's death in 1556, lord deputy of Ireland, where he distinguished himself by his energetic government. He became an active servant of Elizabeth, and on his recall from Ireland (1567), where he had quarrelled with Sir Henry Sidney, was sent to Vienna to try to arrange the conditions of the queen's marriage with the Archduke Charles. On his return to England he became president of the Council of the North (1568), and was one of the commissioners at York for the inquiry into the murder of Darnley. Sussex afterwards advocated the marriage of the Scottish queen with the Duke of Norfolk, and on that account was supposed by the confederate earls to be favourable to their cause. He remained loyal, however, and as president of the North took part in suppressing the rebellion of 1569, though he incurred the charge of lack of energy. He was one of the few peers who were in favour of the Alençon marriage, and in his capacity as lord chamberlain seems to have exercised a good deal of influence at court. He was a man of blunt and straightforward character, a good soldier, but not much of a courtier.

Radcot Bridge, THE BATTLE OF (December 20, 1387), was a skirmish on the upper Thames near Faringdon, between de Vere, Duke of Ireland, the favourite of Richard II, and the baronial forces under Gloucester and Derby (afterwards Henry IV). De Vere, finding himself out-numbered, fled, and his men surrendered after a slight skirmish. The result of this defeat was to place the king entirely at the mercy of Gloucester and the other lords appellants.

Radical. The exact origin of this term as applied to a political party is unknown; possibly it was derived from a speech delivered by Fox in 1797, wherein he declared that "radical reform" was necessary. The word seems to have come into general use about 1816, and was applied to persons agitating on behalf of extreme measures of parliamentary reform. The best account of the early character of the movement is given by the weaver Samuel Bamford ("Passages in the Life of a Radical"). Describing a meeting of representatives from several "Hampden Clubs," he says, "Resolutions were passed declaratory of the right of every male to vote who paid taxes; that males of eighteen should be eligible to vote; that parliaments should be elected annually; that no placeman or pensioner should sit in parliament; that every twenty thousand inhabitants should send a member to the House of Commons. It was not until we became infested by spies, incendiaries, and their dupes, that physical force was mentioned among us." The most important leaders of the party were "Orator" Hunt, Cobbett, and Major Cartwright. It was also patronized by Sir Francis Burdett. Some of the extreme Radicals, however, seem to have planned an armed movement; and the action of the government and public fear caused the terms Radical and rioter to be used as synonymous. Brougham said in 1819, "The Radicals have made themselves so odious, that a number even of our own way of thinking would be pleased enough to see them and their vile press put down at all hazards." During the struggle over the Reform Bill of 1832 the term began to be adopted by some comparatively moderate parliamentary advocates of reform. In the parliaments which followed they numbered from fifty to seventy, including Grote, Molesworth, Roebuck, Joseph Hume, etc. Henceforth the term came to indicate little more than an advanced Liberal; and after the Reform Bill of 1867 was often used as a scornful designation for the whole Liberal party.

Raffles, SIR THOMAS STAMFORD (1781-1826), colonial administrator and naturalist, was the son of a naval captain. He became a clerk in the India House, and was appointed in 1805 assistant-secretary to the company's establishment at Penang. His ability brought him under the notice of Lord Minto, to whom he suggested the conquest of Java from the Dutch. This island he administered as lieutenant-governor from 1811 to 1816. From 1818 to 1824 he was lieutenant-governor of Benkulen in Sumatra, and succeeded in establishing the settlement at Singapore. In Java and in Sumatra he emancipated the slaves, and introduced many reforms.

Raglan, FITZROY SOMERSET, 1ST BARON (1788-1855). [SOMERSET.]

Ragman Rolls, THE, are a collection of documents recording the homage performed by the Scottish barons and clergy to Edward I on his progress through Scotland in 1296. They are a most important source of information upon the condition of Scotland in the fourteenth century. The Bannatyne Club published the documents in full in 1834.

Railways and Railway Legislation. The first public British railway, as distinct from the tram-lines of colliery owners, was authorized by act of parliament in 1801. The railway was for goods and mineral traffic, and connected Croydon and Reigate with the Thames at Wandsworth. In 1814 an application was made to parliament for power to construct a railway for coals and goods, to be worked by animal power or stationary engines, between Stockton and Darlington. The bill became law in 1821. In 1823 George Stephenson was appointed engineer of the company, and at his suggestion the company obtained parliamentary powers to use locomotive engines and to carry passengers. In 1825 the Liverpool and Manchester Railway was authorized; it was opened in 1830. The dates of the acts incorporating some of the other great undertakings are:—London and Birmingham (afterwards London and North-Western), 1833; London and Southampton (nucleus of the South-Western), 1834; Great Western, 1835; South-Eastern, 1836; Great Northern, 1846. The first general Railway Regulation Act, passed in 1840 and modified in 1842 and 1871 by the Regulation of Railways Acts, empowered the board of trade to inspect all passenger railways before their opening, and to require returns of railway traffic, accidents, and rates. But a more important act was passed in 1844 (7 & 8 Vict., c. 85). This provided that the board of trade might revise the rates charged by any line when its clear annual profits exceeded 10 per cent.; it also secured to the State the option of purchasing any line opened after 1844 after twenty-one years from its completion. This act also introduced "Parliamentary trains"—i.e., it enacted that along every line one train each way must be run on every week-day at a speed of at least twelve miles per hour, carrying passengers at one penny per mile. In 1846 the "battle of the gauges" was decided by the enforcement by law of a uniform gauge of 4 ft. 8½ in., except in those districts served by the existing broad gauge (Great Western) system. In 1854 the Railway and Canal Traffic Act compelled the companies to give reasonable facilities for the receipt and forwarding of traffic transferred from one line to another, and prohibited the giving of undue preferences to particular customers.

The Railway and Canal Traffic Act of 1873 set up a Railway Commission of three members, two being legal and one a railway expert, for the settlement of disputes between the companies or a company and the public. The act of 1888 set up beside this commission an administrative tribunal in the shape of the board of trade. The Railway Regulation Act of 1893 (56 & 57 Vict., c. 29) conferred important powers on the board of trade in revising the hours of labour of railway employees; while the Prevention of Accidents Act of 1900 made important provisions in another direction. During the Great War the British railways were placed under State control, private ownership being restored, however, after the peace. Since then the number of railway companies has been reduced by amalgamation to four.

Rainsborough, THOMAS (d. 1648), was one of the Parliamentary soldiers who took part under Cromwell in the storming of Bristol, where, according to Cromwell's own account, he "had the hardest task of all." In 1648 he was appointed admiral, but the fleet mutinied and set him ashore. In October 1648 he was assassinated in his lodgings at Doncaster by a party of Royalists who had sallied from Pontefract Castle.

Raipur Ghaut, THE TREATY OF (December 24, 1805), terminated the war between the East India Company and Jeswunt Rao Holkar (q.v.), who regained all his territories, but was obliged to renounce his claims to Bundi and Rampu and accept the Chumbul as his northern boundary.

Raleigh, SIR WALTER (1552?-1618), was the son of Walter Raleigh of Hayes Barton, Devonshire. In 1578 he accompanied his half-brother, Sir Humphrey Gilbert, on a voyage of discovery to Newfoundland, which proved unsuccessful. In 1580 Raleigh obtained military employment in Ireland, where he distinguished himself by his ruthless severity, and took part in the massacre of the Smerwick garrison (q.v.). For his services he received 12,000 acres of the Desmond land, and it was upon these that he first planted the potato in 1596. In 1584 he was knighted. In the same year he obtained a charter for the colonization of any lands not held by a Christian prince, and sent three expeditions to America, but the colony which had received the name of Virginia had to be abandoned in 1590. After taking an active part in the defence of the country against the Armada, he voyaged to Guiana to find El Dorado in 1595, accompanied Essex to the capture of Cadiz in 1596, and joined in the expedition to the Azores in the following year. On the accession of James I he was dismissed from court. He was shortly afterwards charged with complicity in Lord Cobham's plot in favour of Lady Arabella Stuart, was found guilty of treason and sentenced to death. The true history of the plot can scarcely be recovered, but it seems certain that Raleigh was guilty of nothing more than vague talk. The sentence of death was not carried into effect, however, and Raleigh remained a prisoner in the Tower for twelve years, occupying himself in writing his "History of the World." In 1617 he was released, in order to conduct an expedition to Guiana in search of gold, but the gold mine remained undiscovered, and Raleigh returned to England in 1618. He was badly received by James, who, disappointed at the ill success of the expedition, declared his intention of punishing those who had committed acts of violence "against his dear brother of Spain." Raleigh was executed on his old sentence (October 29, 1618).

Ramillies, THE BATTLE OF (May 23, 1706), was the second of Marlborough's great victories in the War of the Spanish Succession. Both Marlborough and Villeroy, the French commander, were eager for a battle, and the armies met near Ramillies, between Namur and Louvain. Villeroy's right wing was composed of the household troops, while his left, which he considered sufficiently protected by the swamp created by a stream (the Little Geete), consisted only of a single line of infantry backed by cavalry. Marlborough made a feint of attacking the left; Villeroi was at once deceived, and withdrew troops from his right to strengthen it. Then the main body of the British and Dutch attacked the French extreme right, which was also taken in the flank by the Danish cavalry, which had galloped round unperceived. Thus the French position was turned, and now the main body was attacked. After a hard struggle the household troops retreated. The difficulties caused by the baggage wagons in the rear created a panic, and the whole army fled in the direction of Brussels. Many towns at once surrendered, and before the end of the year the only places of importance held by the French in the Netherlands were Mons and Namur.

Ramnagar, THE BATTLE OF (November 22, 1848). At the beginning of the second Sikh war the British army, under Lord Gough, attacked Shere Singh (q.v.) at Ramnagar on the Chenab. His position, however, was too strong to storm; and many lives were lost in a charge of the dragoons to clear the Sikhs from the dry sandy bed of the river. A flanking movement was then attempted, whereupon Shere Singh withdrew to Sadullapur.

Ramsay, SIR ALEXANDER, of Dalhousie, compelled the English in 1338 to raise the siege of Dunbar. After carrying on a successful guerrilla war against them for some years, he took the castle of Roxburgh (1342), receiving as his reward the sheriffdom of Teviotdale. This aroused the jealousy of William Douglas of Liddesdale (q.v.), who captured him at Hawick and starved him to death in his castle of the Hermitage.

Ramsay, GEORGE, 9TH EARL OF DALHOUSIE (1770-1838), distinguished himself as a soldier in his earlier life. For his services in the French War, and especially at the battle of Waterloo, he was raised to a peerage in the United Kingdom. In 1816 he was appointed governor of Nova Scotia, and four years later governor-general of Canada. More of a soldier than a statesman, he failed to conciliate the democratic party, who were clamouring for reforms. About this time a select committee of the House of Commons declared the grievances of the Canadians to be real, and in 1828 Lord Dalhousie was recalled. From 1824 until 1832 he was commander-in-chief in the East Indies.

Ramsay, JAMES ANDREW BROWN, 1ST MARQUIS AND 10TH EARL OF DALHOUSIE (1812-1860), was the third son of the 9th Earl of Dalhousie, and was educated at Harrow and Oxford. He entered the House of Commons young, but was soon called to the Upper House on his father's death. Under Sir Robert Peel's ministry he was successively vice-president and president (1845) of the board of trade—a post in which perhaps he did more than any other statesman for the development of our railway system. On the fall of Sir Robert Peel's government he did not quit office, but was soon appointed governor-general of India (1847). It was a time of great peril for British India, where the Sikhs were threatening much trouble, and in such an emergency Dalhousie determined to be on the scene of danger. After the victories of Gujarat (q.v.) and Multan (q.v.), he reorganized the government of the Punjab, and in 1852, by the capture of Pegu, completed the frontier of British Burma. The remainder of his term of office was occupied in consolidating the great empire under his rule. Oudh and Nagpur, in addition to Pegu and the Punjab, were brought directly under our government, while the civil service was more and more thrown open to all natural-born subjects of the Crown, British and Hindu alike. Under the strain of such work Dalhousie's health began to fail, and in 1856 he resigned office, and soon afterwards left Calcutta for Europe. Parliament passed a vote of thanks to him for his services, and the government showed its sense of his merits by creating him a marquis.

Randolph, THOMAS (1523-90), one of the ministers of Queen Elizabeth, was compelled to seek an asylum abroad during the reign of Mary, owing to his religious opinions. On his return to England after Mary's death he was employed on several important diplomatic missions to France and Russia. His first embassy to Scotland was in 1559, when he accompanied the Earl of Arran, and in the following year he was employed by Elizabeth to testify to the Scots her disapprobation of the Confession of Faith. In 1563-4 he was charged with the delicate mission of recommending a husband for Mary Stuart, the person selected being Robert Dudley, afterwards Earl of Leicester. In 1564 Randolph was named a commissioner at the Conference of Berwick, and in 1565 was again ambassador in Scotland, commissioned to assure the Protestant lords in Scotland of Elizabeth's sympathy, and to promise Argyll and Moray that they should have what aid from England they required. In 1566 the Queen of Scots ordered him to withdraw from her court, believing that he had been Elizabeth's instrument in keeping alive in Scotland the Protestant faction. In 1570 he was again sent to the north, but the feeling against England was so strong in Edinburgh that he found that he could not with safety remain. Two years later he was obliged to return to Edinburgh, and was twice shot at. In 1581

he was ordered to demand the release of Morton from James VI; but the hatred of the English still continued, and he had to flee for his life. His last mission to Scotland took place in 1586, and resulted in a treaty between the two kingdoms. Cautious, trustworthy, and deeply skilled in Scottish politics, Randolph obtained the confidence of the queen and the goodwill of Cecil.

Rangoon, the capital of Burma, was occupied by the British in 1824, during the first Burmese war. In the second Burmese war, undertaken on account of the oppression of British subjects at Rangoon, the town was taken by storm by the British forces under General Godwin, April 14, 1852. At the conclusion of the war the province of Pegu, including Rangoon, was annexed to British India. Situated at the mouth of the Irawadi, it is an extremely favourable situation for trade, and has become one of the most important commercial cities of British India.

Ranjit Singh (1780-1839). Upon the fall of the Mogul empire, its territories were divided between the Mahrattas in the south and the Sikhs, a religious sect, in the Punjab. It was the work of Ranjit Singh, the son of a sirdar of one of the Sikh principalities, to weld the loose Sikh confederacy into a kingdom. Gaining, in 1799, the governorship of Lahore in return for the aid he had given to Zaman Shah of Afghanistan, he practised upon the religious fanaticism of his Sikh countrymen, and organized the "khalsa" or "the liberated" into an army under European officers, which resembled in many points the Ironsides of Cromwell. He speedily conquered the neighbouring sirdars, but he found himself shut in on the east by the river Sutlej, the boundary of the British territory. He was wise enough to make a treaty of peace with the British in 1809, and to this he was faithful till his death. He captured Multan in 1810, Peshawar in 1823, and Kashmir in 1819, and in that year assumed the title of Maharajah (King of Kings). The Afghans inflicted upon him a defeat in 1836, but his authority was too firm to be shaken by disaster, and he seemed to leave behind him a firmly-established power on his death in 1839.

Rape, A, is a territorial division of Sussex. Sussex is divided into six rapes, which again are subdivided into hundreds. At the time of the Domesday survey there were five rapes (Chichester and Arundel being treated as one), and Messrs. Round and Salzman think the arguments for Norman origin very strong. Each of the Domesday rapes—Chichester, Bramber (or Steyning), Lewes, Pevensey, and Hastings—was in the possession of a single powerful lord. It seems to have been the rule for the rapes to have sheriffs of their own, and of these we find mention in documents of the eleventh and twelfth centuries. They collected geld from their district and paid it to the sheriff of the county. The rape may possibly represent the shires into which Sussex was divided while it was yet an independent kingdom. The original meaning is discussed in the "New English Dictionary."

Ballard, "The Domesday Inquest"; "Victoria County History: Sussex."

Rapparees were bands of Irish led by dispossessed proprietors who refused to submit to the Cromwellian transplantation to Connaught, and carried on a guerrilla warfare against the new English possessors. At first known as Tories, they came later to be called Rapparees, which Burnet, writing in 1690, called "a new name." But the names Tory (q.v.) and Rapparee came to mean in Ireland only ordinary felons at large. Their numbers were immensely exaggerated: thus in 1707 "there were but six Tories in the county Tipperary, and four in the county of Cork."

Ratcliffe (or RADCLIFFE), SIR RICHARD, was a confidential friend of Richard III. He was responsible for the execution of Rivers, Grey, and their companions in 1483; a service for which he was richly rewarded. To his advice it was largely due that Richard publicly disavowed any intention of marrying his niece Elizabeth (1485). Ratcliffe was killed at Bosworth. He is the "ratte" of the well-known contemporary couplet:

The catte, the ratte, and Lovell our dogge
Rulyth all England under a hogge.

Rates are contributions in certain proportions levied for specified local purposes by local authorities, as distinct from Taxes levied by the government for national purposes. All are now based on the Poor Law valuation of the annual value of each separate piece of real property in a given district, which is periodically revised by an assessment committee, from whose decisions there may be an appeal to the courts. The rates thus fall only on occupiers. Many examples of local rates are found before the sixteenth century in England. But the payment was often apportioned according to the estimated total income of each payer, so that personal property, capital (e.g., stock-in-trade), and real property wherever situate were rated. (For examples, see E. Cannan, "History of Local Rates in England.") The Poor Rate under the statute of 1601 (which became the pattern for future rating) was so assessed in some places even in the nineteenth century. But such a system is practicable only in a small community. As wealth increased and became more varied, only real property and its occupiers could be reached by the rating authorities, and judicial decisions and acts of parliament eventually confined rating to occupiers alone. All rates are now levied under statutory authority. Our rating system conspicuously illustrates the slow and unequal growth and involved character of our modern system of local government. Only an imperfect classification is possible, but the following may be suggested:—1. Parochial Rates, or rates associated with the parochial system: (a) The Poor Rate, "for the relief of the poor and other purposes," collected by paid collectors (formerly by the overseers), according to the "precept" of the board of guardians of each Poor Law union. This arrangement dates from 1834. (b) Church rates (q.v.) generally have not been recoverable at law since 1868, but are still so recoverable in some parishes under local acts. (c) Parishes were formerly grouped into "highway parishes," which levied rates for the maintenance of the roads (with many exceptions). The highway authority outside boroughs or urban districts is now the rural district council. (d) The so-called "Adoptive Acts" enable specified local authorities to levy rates for the maintenance of baths and wash-houses and free libraries, for burials, lighting and watching, and certain public improvements. Where a parish is not superseded by a borough or an urban district council it is such an authority. Burial rates, however, are levied by a burial board appointed by the local authority; but the legislation on burials is very confused. 2. Borough Rates are levied by the corporation of a borough under the Municipal Corporations Act (1834) to make up any deficiency in the borough revenues, which are partly derived from its own property. It has generally statutory authority to levy an improvements rate, or a rate to meet the interest on loans, and often to maintain a police force. It is also a local authority under the "Adoptive Acts." 3. District Council Rates: Before the Local Government Act (1894) rates for sanitary purposes were leviable under various Public Health Acts, and rates for improvements, paving, lighting, etc., in "urban districts" under local boards or improvement commissioners. The sanitary authority was the board of guardians in rural, the local board or improvement commissioners in urban districts, or in a borough the corporation. Under the act of 1894 the rural district council is the sanitary authority in rural districts; while urban district councils replace local boards and commissioners. Urban district councils are also authorities under the Adoptive Acts. 4. County Rates, made by the county council, are collected by the overseers.

Rathmines, THE BATTLE OF (August 2, 1649), was one of the earliest engagements in Cromwell's Irish campaign. It resulted in the defeat of Ormonde by the Cromwellian forces under Colonel Michael Jones.

Ravenspur, or RAVENSER, near Spurn Head in Yorkshire, was in early times the most considerable port on the Humber. In 1298 the privileges of the burgesses of Ravenspur were confirmed, and in the early fourteenth century it was represented in parliament. The encroachments of the sea finally submerged it by the middle of the sixteenth century. The process of erosion had begun when Henry Bolingbroke—afterwards Henry IV—landed here in 1399, to claim his inheritance and to make war on Richard II. Here, too, Edward IV landed in 1471, a little previous to the battle of Barnet.

Reading, the chief town of Berkshire, is mentioned first in 871 when Ethelred and his son Alfred were defeated at Reading by the Danes, though the victory of Ashdown (q.v.) near the town was afterwards won. The town was important as defending the frontier of Wessex against Mercia, since Wessex had been deprived of the lands north of the Thames. Under Ethelred the Unready in 1006 the town was reached by the Danes and burnt. Henry I founded a great monastery at Reading, in which he himself was afterwards buried. Reading was frequently favoured by the royal presence, and several parliaments were held by Henry VI and Edward IV. The dominant feature of its later mediæval history was the struggle between the Abbey and the merchant gilds. The town suffered during the Civil War, surrendering to the Parliamentary troops in 1643; and in 1688 on the landing of William of Orange. It returned two members to parliament from 1295 to 1885, when one was taken away. University College, Reading, received its charter of incorporation in March 1926.

"Rebecca Riots" was the name given to a series of riots which occurred in South Wales in 1843 as a protest against turnpike-gates. The rioters were dressed in women's clothes, and, in allusion to Isaac's bride (Gen. xxiv. 60), the leader and his followers were known as "Rebecca and her daughters." The raids on toll-gates were for a time successful, but after the daylight riot at Carmarthen on June 10 troops and London police were drafted into the disturbed areas (Brecknock alone was unmolested). The unrest thereupon declined, and at the close of the year a government commission was set up to inquire into the operation of the Turnpike Laws.

Rebellion, THE GREAT. The struggle between the monarchy and the Parliament which led to the Great Rebellion began with the accession of the House of Stuart to the English throne. James I and Charles I inherited the Tudor dictatorship, but the authority which Henry VIII and Elizabeth had exercised in harmony with the feelings of the nation they endeavoured to use for unpopular purposes. The Commons, who had grown strong and rich during the sixteenth century, woke to a consciousness of their strength, and headed the opposition to the Crown, as the barons had done in the thirteenth. Whilst James I formulated a dogmatic theory of the sovereign power, and strove to realize it, the Commons revived the constitutional claims of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. The Petition of Right in 1628 (q.v.) was an attempt to limit the king's powers and secure the subject's rights, but there was no impartial authority to interpret the meaning of the contract, and the Commons claimed by virtue of it much that Charles had not meant to concede. For eleven years the king governed through the privy council without calling a parliament. The judgment on Hampden's case in June 1638 definitely settled the question of taxation in the king's favour. But at this very time the king's ecclesiastical policy had called forth in Scotland an opposition which obliged him, after an unsuccessful attempt to suppress it by arms, to have recourse once more to an English parliament. The Short Parliament, which met in April 1640, instead of supporting the king in the war, demanded the abolition of ship money and the taxes levied for the support of the army, and was about to petition in favour of the Scots, when it was dissolved. The ill success of the second Scottish war, and the invasion of England, obliged Charles again to call a parliament, known afterwards as the Long Parliament (q.v.), on November 3, 1640. On the 11th the impeachment of Strafford was moved by Pym, that of Laud followed a little later, and other leading officials fled abroad. Ship money (q.v.) was declared illegal, and tonnage and poundage (q.v.) were no longer to be levied without the consent of parliament. The Star Chamber, the Court of High Commission, and other extraordinary jurisdictions were abolished. The Triennial Bill bound the king to summon a parliament every three years, and he was obliged to consent to an act prohibiting him from dissolving the existing parliament. Hitherto the Commons had been united, but the question of Church reform caused a division in their ranks. One party wished to abolish the bishops altogether, the other merely to limit their powers. Thus the king was enabled to gather round him a party which gave him support on the further questions which rose out of this disagreement. In the Grand Remonstrance (q.v.) the Parliamentary leaders appealed to the people, setting forth the king's misgovernment in the past and the political and ecclesiastical reforms they demanded for the future. The Irish rebellion, which broke out in October 1641, raised the question whether the king could be trusted with an army. In England war began in the following autumn. The king set up his standard at Nottingham on August 22, 1642. On the king's side were the north and west of England; in Wales and Cornwall and on the border he found his strongest adherents, while the south and east, and the manufacturing districts especially, took the side of the Parliament. The battle of Edgehill (q.v.—October 23) had no decisive results, and a second battle at Brentford (November 12) was equally fruitless. In the campaign of 1643 the advantage was decidedly on the king's side. In the spring and the summer a Cornish army conquered the west, and the Marquis of Newcastle recovered Yorkshire. The fate of the Parliamentary cause seemed to depend on the question whether Gloucester and Hull would hold out. But the Earl of Essex relieved Gloucester, and defeated at Newbury (q.v.) the king's attempt to intercept his march back to London, whilst three weeks later Newcastle was forced to raise the siege of Hull. In one part of the country, however, in the eastern counties, the Parliamentary cause had not only held its own, but gained ground, and an army had been formed there, headed by the Earl of Manchester, but inspired by Cromwell (q.v.), which exercised a decisive influence on the next campaign. Both king and Parliament sought aid outside England. The king concluded a truce with the rebels, and brought over troops from Ireland. The Parliament made an alliance with the Scots, confirmed by the Solemn League and Covenant, which procured them the assistance of a Scottish army, but bound them to endeavour to bring the three kingdoms to religious uniformity, and to reform the English Church "according to the Word of God, and the example of the best reformed Churches." The Westminster Assembly (q.v.), which had, in July 1643, commenced the deliberations ending two years later in the establishment of Presbyterianism in England, was now joined by Scottish divines, and Scottish representatives entered the committee which directed the war. A Scottish army under the Earl of Leven crossed the border, joined the troops of Fairfax and Manchester, and laid siege to York. Rupert relieved York, but offered battle under its walls, and the victory of Marston Moor (q.v.—July 2, 1644) was followed by the conquest of all England north of the Trent. In the west and south the king was more fortunate. He defeated Waller at Cropredy Bridge (June 29), and shut up Essex in Cornwall, where the latter's foot were obliged to surrender (September 1644). But the advance of the Royalists on London was put a stop to by the second battle of Newbury (October 27, 1644). Whilst the fruitless negotiations of Uxbridge (q.v.) were going on, the Parliament, urged by Cromwell, resolved to adopt a new system of carrying on the war. By the Self-denying Ordinance (q.v.) the members of parliament who held commands had to resign them, and by a second ordinance the army was remodelled, reduced to 21,000 men, and placed under the command of Sir Thomas Fairfax. He was allowed to retain the services of Cromwell, who became his lieutenant-general. Well armed, well disciplined, and well paid, its ranks full of men "who had the fear of God before their eyes, and made some conscience of what they did," the "New Model" (q.v.) changed the face of the war. Fairfax took the field on May 1, 1645, and on June 14 Charles was defeated at Naseby with the loss of half his army. One after another the king's fortresses in the west were conquered. Winter alone stopped the progress of Fairfax; but in March 1646 the king's last army laid down its arms, and his last fortress, Raglan Castle, surrendered in August. Charles himself took refuge in the Scottish camp at Newark at the beginning of May. In the negotiations which followed, the Parliament's chief demands were the control of the militia and the establishment of Presbyterianism in England. The king delayed giving a definite answer as long as possible, but finally offered to concede the militia for ten years, and the establishment of Presbyterianism for three. The Scots at last, weary of his delays, surrendered him to the Parliament, receiving in return compensation for their expenses in the war (January 30, 1647). The Presbyterian leaders were as anxious to impose uniformity, and as hostile to liberty of conscience and diversity of worship as Laud himself. The army, on the other hand, had fought for religious as well as for civil liberty, and were resolved to secure it. They believed also that "God's Providence" had "cast the trust of religion and the kingdom upon them as conquerors." They had also a special grievance as soldiers in the proposal to disband them without payment of their arrears, so they did not scruple when their demands were refused to seize the king's person (June 4, 1647), march on London, expel eleven of the Presbyterian leaders from parliament (August 7), and treat directly with the king themselves. The king still continued his attempt to play off one party against the other, and refused to accept the terms of the soldiers. He escaped from the hands of the army (November 11), and took refuge in the Isle of Wight, where, whilst publicly negotiating with the Parliament, he privately concluded a treaty with the Scots, promising in return for his restoration to establish Presbyterianism for three years, and suppress all dissident sects. Parliament replied to his rejection of the Four Bills, in which they had embodied their demands, by a vote that no more addresses should be made to the king (January 3, 1648), and a meeting of the officers of the army decided that it was their duty so soon as the expected war was over to call "Charles Stuart, that man of blood," to account for the blood he had shed and the mischief he had done. In April the second Civil War broke out. Fairfax defeated the Kentish Royalists, shut up the main body of the insurgents at Colchester, and starved them into surrender (August 26). Cromwell, after putting down the insurrection in Wales, attacked and destroyed the Scottish army under the Duke of Hamilton in a three days' battle at Preston in Lancashire (August 17-19). Meanwhile the Presbyterian majority in parliament had seized the opportunity to pass a severe law against heresy and reopen negotiations with the king [NEWPORT, TREATY OF]. The victorious army trusted neither king nor parliament, but resolved to put a stop to the negotiations and effect a settlement of the kingdom itself. The king was seized at Carisbrooke, and removed to a place of security (December 1). The House of Commons, purified by the exclusion of 96 Presbyterian members (December 6) [PRIDE'S PURGE] and the voluntary abstention of many others, became the obedient instrument of the army. It passed a resolution to bring the king to justice (December 13), assumed the supreme power (January 4, 1649), and erected a High Court of Justice to try Charles (January 9). The trial lasted from January 20 to 27, and the king was executed on the 30th, but out of the 135 members of whom the court was composed only 59 signed the death warrant. The new government, which took the name of Commonwealth, consisted of a Council of State of 41 persons exercising the executive power, and a House of Commons, which rarely numbered more than 60 members. Record, COURTS OF, are those "where the acts and judicial proceedings are enrolled in parchment . . . which rolls are called the records of the court, and are of such authority that their truth is not to be called in question" (Stephen's "Commentaries"). They are of two classes: superior (including the House of Lords and the Judicial Committee) and inferior (including County Courts and Coroners' Courts). The superior courts have power to impose fine and imprisonment for contempt of court; the inferior courts power to fine only. A court must either be a Court of Record by immemorial recognition or by modern creation through act of parliament. James I, by yielding to the Commons in the case of Goodwin (1603), recognized that their house was a Court of Record.

Record Office. In 1800 a committee of the House of Commons was appointed to examine into the condition of the public records, and in accordance with its recommendations a royal commission was appointed, which was renewed six times, and lasted till the accession of Queen Victoria. The Record Commission published its report in 1837, and on its recom-

mentation, by an act of 1838, the guardianship of the records was conferred upon the Master of the Rolls, with power to appoint a deputy. Under this act the documents have been placed in the Public Record Office in Chancery Lane, London, and a staff of officials and clerks is employed in their preservation and arrangement. The central repository was begun in 1851, and in 1852 the State Paper Office passed into the control of the Master of the Rolls. In 1856 began the publication of the Calendars of State Papers, and in 1858 the Chronicles and Memorials known as the Rolls Series (q.v.).

Records, or ARCHIVES, have been defined as "documents drawn up and used in the course of an administrative or executive transaction (whether public or private) of which they themselves formed a part; and subsequently preserved in official custody to perpetuate the memory of the transactions described in them." They "far excel the chronicle in scope, authenticity, and objectivity"; and a marked characteristic of modern historical research has been the increasing reliance placed upon them as a basis of investigation. History as it is understood now is, it may be said, largely, if not mainly, dependent upon archives; and the widening within recent years of the scope of historical study to embrace new varieties such as Constitutional, Legal, Economic, Social, and Administrative History has been due in the main to the growing exploitation of record sources.

The archives of England, especially for the mediæval period, are unrivalled by those of any other country. Those of the central government are now for the most part assembled at the Public Record Office in Chancery Lane, in the custody of the Master of the Rolls (q.v.). A general idea of their content can be obtained from such introductory studies of the subject as C. Johnson's "The Public Record Office" (S.P.C.K. Helps for Students of History), or from the new official "Guide to the Public Records," compiled by M. S. Giuseppi (2 vols., 1923). The purpose of the present article is merely to indicate those classes which are most readily accessible and most generally valuable to the student.

Of special importance for the political historian of the Middle Ages are the records of the two great mediæval departments of State—the Chancery and the Exchequer. Among the more important classes of Chancery documents are the Patent Rolls, on which were entered the public or "open" letters addressed "to all to whom these presents shall come," and dealing with every variety of public business. This series begins in 1204, and is accessible in print either in extenso or in calendar form down to 1509. The Close Rolls, containing mainly letters addressed to individuals, are of less but still of considerable interest. They begin in 1201, and are available in print down to 1402. Parallel series are the Charter Rolls recording foundations, grants of land, liberties, markets, fairs, etc., from the reign of John onwards (calendarized down to 1516); the Liberate Rolls, on which were entered after 1226 letters close relating to payments or allowances from the Exchequer (calendarized 1226–40); and the Fine Rolls, registering the payments made in return for grants, pardons, etc. (calendarized to 1383). Of great importance also are the Chancery Inquisitions, which include the returns made by local juries as to the lands and heirs of deceased tenants-in-chief (Inquisitions post mortem, calendarized Henry III–Henry VII); and as to the probable effect upon existing interests of contemplated royal grants (Inquisitions ad quod damnum), as well as to many miscellaneous questions of interest to the Crown (Miscellaneous Inquisitions, calendarized 1219–1349). Later come the Parliament Rolls, which begin in 1278, and which throw invaluable light not merely upon parliamentary history and procedure, but upon general constitutional development, and indeed upon almost every aspect of contemporary life (printed under the title of Rotuli Parliamentorum, 1767–77). The Statute Rolls begin in the same period, but do not continue as a separate class after 1468 (printed in "Statutes of the Realm," Rec. Comm. 1810). There may be mentioned also the collections of Chancery Warrants, consisting of privy seals, signed bills, and other documents, forming steps in the process of issuing letters under the great seal; and the mass of judicial records—proceedings, decrees and orders, and affidavits—which accumulated as a result of the development of the equitable jurisdiction of the chancellor in the later mediæval period.

The records of the Exchequer offer to the student a field of research no less fruitful than that afforded by the Chancery records, although up to the present less use has been made of them, and although they are for the most part less readily available for study. The most important of them are the Great Annual Rolls or Pipe Rolls (q.v.), on which were entered summaries of the accounts presented yearly to the Exchequer by the sheriffs and other royal officials. There is one example of this series extant for the reign of Henry I, but they do not become regular until 2 Henry II. The early rolls are at present in course of publication by the Pipe Roll Society, which so far has carried the work down to 5 Richard I; and there are two rolls of Henry III accessible in print (1230, ed. Chalfont Robinson, Princeton Univ. Press, Pipe Roll Society Series; and 1241–2, ed. Cannon, Yale Univ. Press). Accounts subsidiary to the Pipe Roll are the Foreign and Enrolled Accounts, which begin under Edward III. Other valuable Exchequer series are the Receipt and Issue Rolls, and the Memoranda Rolls of the lord treasurers and the king's remembrancers. The latter, in particular, are a mine of information of the most varied and interesting kind. Among documents preserved in, although not actually belonging to, the Exchequer are the series of accounts relating to the Wardrobe (q.v.) and Household (q.v.) of the king, the importance of which for general as well as for purely administrative history has only been fully realized since Professor T. F. Tout began his intensive study of mediæval administration.

Another considerable class of documents which is still in bulk unprinted is that of the judicial records. These include the Rolls of the Curia Regis (printed down to 1205), which separate under Edward I into two categories—Coram Rege Rolls, or Rolls of the King's Bench, and De Banco Rolls, or Rolls of the Common Pleas. The Assize Rolls—the records of the itinerant justices or of special commissions—are also of value.

The great constitutional and administrative changes of the Tudor period inevitably left their mark upon the archives. The Reformation and the dissolution of the monasteries resulted in the erection of such courts as the Court of Augmentations and the Court of First Fruits and Tenths; while the vast extension of conciliar activity and the growth of "prerogative courts," such as the Star Chamber, also gave rise to new classes of records. The series of Privy Council Registers begins in 1540; and the records of Star Chamber Proceedings run from the reign of Henry III to the abolition of the court under Charles I. The most important and significant feature of the administrative history of the sixteenth century was, however, the development of the office of secretary of state, with which coincided the formation of the great class of State Papers—of first-rate value for the student of modern political history. These were roughly divided, from the date of the establishment of the State Paper Office under Elizabeth in 1578, into two categories, Domestic and Foreign; a third series—Colonial—being subsequently added. Since the reorganization of the secretariat in 1782 the State Papers Domestic have been carried on under the title of Home Office Records, and the State Papers Foreign under the heading of Foreign Office Records. The State Papers Colonial for the period after 1699 are combined with the records of the Committee of the Privy Council for Trade and Plantations to form the Colonial Office Records. All these categories of the state papers are accessible to students in calendar form.

Apart from the records of the central government, there may be noted the archives which, while local in origin and scope, are yet of a public character. Such are the Town Records, among which are conspicuous the muniments of Nottingham, Leicester, Exeter, and pre-eminently those of the City of London, which are housed in the Records Office of the Guildhall. Of a semi-public nature are such ecclesiastical records as the Bishops' Registers, which are now in most dioceses in process of publication, and which throw invaluable light upon the history of the Church in general, as well as upon matters of purely diocesan interest. Finally there may be mentioned the mass of Private Records—deeds, court and account rolls, registers and cartularies, etc., some of which have found their way into public repositories, but the bulk of which are still in private custody and either inaccessible to the student or only to be consulted with difficulty. The Report of the Historical Manuscripts Commission (1870, etc.) affords some guide to the contents of the more important of these collections, and in connexion with the recent land legislation a definite attempt has been made to safeguard and preserve certain classes of records such as manorial rolls; but it remains true that private muniments constitute a virtually untapped and unplumbed source of historical information.

Recorder. Before the Municipal Corporations Act of 1835, 159 out of the 246 corporate towns in England had recorders or stewards. Most of these were nominated by the common council, sometimes, however, by the aldermen only, sometimes by all the burgesses. "They were mostly magistrates within their boroughs, and quorum judges of the Courts of General and Quarter Sessions, and Courts of Record where those existed." But few recorders, however, actually resided in the towns, and in many cases the office was obtained only in order to facilitate the exercise of political influence. By the act of 1835 all towns without a separate Court of Quarter Sessions were deprived of their criminal jurisdiction; but boroughs were permitted to petition the Crown for a separate Court of Quarter Sessions, stating the salary they were ready to pay the recorder. If the petition were granted, the Crown thenceforward nominated the recorder, who must be a barrister of at least five years' standing and hold his court four times a year, or more often if necessary. He is sole judge therein, save that he may not grant licences under the liquor acts, nor levy rates.

Recruiters. The Royalist members who deserted the Parliament at Westminster after the outbreak of the Civil War were one by one "disabled" by the House of Commons in 1645. Writs were moved for new elections in their place. Nearly 150 new members were returned, who were called by the Royalist writers "Recruiters." The new members included Ireton, Ludlow, Fleetwood, and Algernon Sidney.

Red River Expedition, THE (1870).

In 1869 the Red River Settlement, in North America, which had been in the territories of the Hudson's Bay Company, was transferred to the new Dominion of Canada. Some of the settlers, however, refused to acknowledge the transfer. On November 24 the rebels, under Louis Riel, took possession of Fort Garry, and resisted by force an attempt of Major Boulton to get possession of the place. One of Boulton's followers, named Hugh Scott, was seized and shot. An expedition, consisting of about 350 British troops and a number of Canadian militia, under the command of Colonel Garnet Wolseley, was sent against them. After a three months' journey in boats across the lakes and rivers, it reached Fort Garry (August 23, 1870). The rebels surrendered without resistance. The territory became a province of the Dominion, Manitoba. Riel headed a rebellion of the half-breeds of the N.W. provinces in 1885, and was convicted of high treason and hanged.

Red Sea Expedition, THE. In 1801 the Marquis Wellesley dispatched 4,000 Europeans and 5,000 sepoys, under General David Baird, to co-operate with the forces under Abercromby in the expulsion of the French from Egypt. The force proceeded up the Red Sea to Cosseir, whence it marched 120 miles over the desert to the Nile, reached Cairo on August 10, and encamped on the shores of the Mediterranean on the 27th. Before, however, the Indian contingent could be brought into action, the report of its approach, and the energy of General Hutchinson, who succeeded to the command on the death of Sir Ralph Abercromby, induced the French general to capitulate.

Redan, THE, was a fortress protecting the southern side of Sebastopol. [CRIMEAN WAR.] On September 8, 1855, the British attempted to take it by storm, while the French attacked the Malakoff. The attacking party under Sir William Codrington were, however, so diminished while crossing the open ground immediately in front, and there was so much difficulty in sending for reinforcements, that the handful of men who had entered the works were forced to retire. The evacuation of the southern side of Sebastopol during the night made a further attack unnecessary.

Redeswire, THE RAID OF (July 27, 1575), was a disturbance on the borders arising from a dispute between Sir John Forster, the English warden, and Sir John Carmichael, the Scottish warden of the Marches. The English were defeated, their warden and Francis Russell, 2nd Earl of Bedford, being taken prisoners. Bedford was killed. The affair nearly led to a rupture with the English court.

Redmond, JOHN EDWARD (1851-1918), was educated at Trinity College, Dublin. He entered parliament for New Ross in 1881, and was called to the bar in 1886. In 1891 he became the leader of the Parnellites, and in 1900 he united under himself the two Irish Nationalist parties. After the election of 1910 his power greatly increased. He supported Mr. Asquith in the struggle over the Parliament Bill (q.v.), and was consulted on the drafting of the Home Rule Bill of 1912. He resisted the extremist methods of Sinn Fein, though he did not obtain control of the Nationalist volunteers until June 1914. He supported the government on the outbreak of the Great War, and denounced the Easter rising in Dublin, 1916.

Redonda is a dependency of Antigua (q.v.).

Reduction, ACTION OF, is a process of Scottish law by which a settlement wrongly made is questioned. Acting upon this analogy, the Scottish government in 1628 drew up "a summons or initial writ of an Action of Reduction against all copyholders of ecclesiastical property," declaring the king's right to all kirklands. Charles I's object was to restore to the Scottish Church part of the lands of which it had been deprived at the Reformation.

Redwald, KING OF EAST ANGLIA (593-617), became a Christian probably owing to the pressure of his overlord, Ethelbert of Kent. Returning home from Kent, where he had received baptism, he was "led astray by his wife and certain perverse teachers, so that, like the ancient Samaritans, he seemed at the same time to serve Christ and the gods whom he had served before; and in the same temple he had an altar to sacrifice to Christ, and another small one to offer victims to devils" (Bæda). But it would appear from Bæda that even while Ethelbert was living his place as overlord in central Britain had been taken by Redwald. So that it is probable a war had arisen between Ethelbert and Redwald from this religious compromise, and had ended in Ethelbert's defeat. In 617 Edwin of Northumbria took refuge at his court from Ethelfrith, and in the same year Redwald attacked and defeated Ethelfrith on the Idle. But Redwald died soon after, and the East Anglian power seems to have broken up under his son, Eorpwald. Bæda, ii, 5, after describing Ethelbert's overlordship, says that Redwald was the fourth king who gained a power of this kind. In the "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle" Redwald is placed fourth on the list of Bretwaldas.

Reeve (Sax. gerefa), a name applied to many classes of officials, especially to those charged with the management of some territorial division; as the so-called Laws of Edward the Confessor say, "est multiplex nomen; greve enim dicitur de scira, de wapentagiis, de hun-dredis, de burgis, de villis." [Of these the most important was the shire-reeve, for which see SHERIFF.] Besides the sheriff, the following uses of the term are to be noted:—High-reeve (heah-gerefa) mentioned in the "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle," s.a. 778, 780, 1001, and 1002. Port-reeve (port-gerefa), borough-reeve (burh-gerefa), and wic-gerefa also frequently occur, in the sense of the chief officer of a town, who presided over its courts, etc. The first title was only used in trading towns (not necessarily ports), and was borne by the presiding officers of several of the smaller towns until recent times. Tun-gerefa is the usual term for the headman of a township. He was probably chosen by the inhabitants in free townships, but would be nominated by the lord in dependent townships. He appeared with the four best men in the hundred court, and in dependent townships was legally responsible for his lord's men. The position of the manor-reeve (the representative of the earlier tun-gerefa) in the thirteenth century is clearly described in Fleta. He was to be a good husbandman chosen by the villati, and was responsible for the cultivation of the land, having especially to watch over the ploughs, and see that due service was rendered. A kind of co-ordinate authority was apparently exercised by the lord's bailiff, and both alike were subject to the seneschal or steward, who supervised several manors. [Examination of manorial records has shown that the reeve was not invariably elected by his fellow-villeins, the appointment often being made by the lord. If the reeve's work was satisfactory he might be retained for further annual periods. His work was of an exacting nature, and the office was sometimes so unpopular that a peasant would be elected to it by his fellows if he were unfortunate enough to be absent from a meeting of the jurors. Each year he had to produce accurate accounts of services rendered on the manor and of changes in the farm stock, particulars of which he must have had difficulty, as an unlettered man, in keeping by him. The hundred-reeve appears in the laws of Ethelred as an official of more local authority than the reeve of the shire, and again in the reign of Edward the Confessor he is found exercising functions in the hundred court, but not independently of his sheriff, who after the Conquest acquires full control and often farms the presidency of the court to bailiffs.]

Schmid, "Gesetze der Angelsachsen," and Kemble, "Saxons," ii, Bk. ii, ch. vii, discuss all the uses of the term. Referendum, THE, a constitutional device whereby important measures of legislation are referred to a direct vote by the electorate on the petition of a certain number of voters, is not a British institution. It made its reputation in Switzerland, where it was adopted generally in 1848, and spread later to the United States. After the Great War it was embodied in the new constitutions of Germany, Esthonia, and the Irish Free State. It is in operation in parts of the British Empire. Australia had employed it before 1910, and used it during the war to reject compulsory military service abroad (1916 and 1917); New Zealand used it several times (1911 onwards) to reject prohibition; and several Canadian states have employed it. Efforts were made in 1911 to incorporate it in the governmental machinery of the United Kingdom, but without success. The Referendum question had become important as a result of the abolition of the Lords' veto by the Parliament Act (q.v.), and had already been publicly advocated by leading men of both parties—notably Lord Courtenay of Penwith, Mr. Asquith, Mr. Balfour—when Lord Balfour of Burleigh introduced his Referendum Bill in the Lords on March 2, 1911, providing for a Referendum to be taken whenever a Commons' bill was not passed by the Lords within forty days or was dropped on account of a difference between the two Houses, and also for a Referendum on any bill passed by both Houses if 200 of the Commons so desired. The second reading on March 28 was opposed by Lord Morley and defeated. Lord Lansdowne proposed later in the year (June 26) for a Referendum to be taken on any bill passed under the Parliament Act which affected the existence of the monarchy; but without success. During the same years, 1910–11, various specific questions were made the subject of agitation in favour of the Referendum: notably Women's Suffrage, Home Rule, and Welsh Disestablishment. In 1920 proposals were made for submitting the nationalization of mines to a Referendum.

Critics of the Referendum declare that the votes cast are usually few and unreliable; that the voter is rarely well-informed on the issue referred; and that the system lowers the responsibility of members of the legislature. Its advocates on the contrary emphasize its value as a check on absolutism. Perhaps the strongest conclusion that a perusal of the literature of the subject warrants is that analogies between Switzerland, the United States, and Great Britain are misleading; and that final judgment of the Referendum cannot be based on theory alone.

Reformation, THE. The process which ended in the separate organization of the English Church was due to three principal causes: (1) dissatisfaction with the practical operation of the papal headship; (2) a desire to reform the clergy and render the Church more useful; (3) a conviction that the system of the mediæval Church had in many ways deviated from the teaching of Christ and the apostles, and from primitive custom. The first of these causes showed itself in England in the reign of Henry III, and gradually led to legislative acts by which England endeavoured to protect itself from undue interference on the part of the pope. The Statutes of Provisors and Præmunire (q.v.) secured England against the heavy exactions by which the papacy during the Great Schism oppressed Christendom. [PAPACY.] In the reforming councils of the fifteenth century, which laboured in vain, England did not take a prominent part, because it already had the means of keeping in check the claims of the papacy. It was, however, an Englishman who first gathered together and expressed the dissatisfaction of Europe. John Wyclif began his career by maintaining the independence of the State from hierarchical interference. To this he added a longing after greater simplicity and spirituality of life. He sent forth preachers among the people. He denounced the worldliness of the papacy as anti-Christian. He undertook the noble task of translating the Bible into English. He wrote numerous tracts to stir up the people to greater earnestness in religion. He asserted the existence of a true spiritual Church founded on faith in Christ, and depending for its rule on the law of the Gospel. Moreover, as a means of reducing the organization of the Church to greater purity, he attacked the central point of sacerdotalism—the material conception of transubstantiation in the sacrament of the altar. He did not deny the presence of Christ in the Eucharist; he denied only the change of substance in the elements after consecration. Thus Wyclif united in his teaching the three principles which brought about the Reformation—a strong sense of national patriotism, a deep desire for greater spirituality of life, and an acute criticism of the doctrines on which the existing system of the Church was founded. Wyclif's teaching drew upon him ecclesiastical condemnation. His opinions spread in Bohemia, and gave birth to the rising of the Hussites. In England his followers, the Lollards, were unfortunately associated with political risings, and were suppressed. Still Wyclif's translation of the Bible and many of his writings were passed from hand to hand, and bodies of "Biblemen" scattered here and there throughout the land prepared the way for more decided efforts. [WYCLIF.]

The end of the Wars of the Roses saw a great change in the social condition of England. The ideas of the Middle Ages were languishing. The feudal system had practically passed away. While the nobles were fighting, the middle class had grown more prosperous. A narrow but practical spirit prevailed, which looked enviously on the wealth of the Church, which was unaffected by its sentiment, and which in a dim way wished to see it made more useful. As the New Learning made its way in England men like More dreamed of a new organization of society, and Colet bestirred himself in the cause of a broader system of education. The Church itself was vexatious to the people by the wide extension of its inquisitorial courts of spiritual discipline. The rabble of useless and lazy priests excited the contempt of thinking men. There was small hope of reform from within; for the organization of the Church depended on Rome, and the secularized papacy of the sixteenth century was powerless to initiate reforms. Politically the English Church, through fear of the Lollards, had relied for help on the Crown, and had trusted to the balance of parties. The overthrow of the baronage by the Wars of the Roses left the Crown practically supreme, as the people were too much engrossed in business to care for anything save a strong and peaceful government.

The desire for some reform in the Church was felt by Wolsey, who obtained from the pope permission to suppress thirty monasteries, and devote their revenues to educational foundations at Oxford and Ipswich. Perhaps Wolsey's schemes for internal reform would have progressed farther, if a crisis in the relations between Church and State had not been brought about by the self-will of Henry VIII. Henry VIII, fascinated by Anne Boleyn, was resolved on a divorce from his wife Katharine. He had married Katharine, his brother's widow, by virtue of a papal dispensation; he needed the papal consent for a divorce. The papacy was the source of ecclesiastical law, the supreme judge, with equitable powers in cases of grievance. So long as Henry VIII expected to obtain his divorce he was content to wait. But when Wolsey's plans failed, and Pope Clement VII showed that he dared not gratify the English king at the expense of offending the emperor, Henry VIII resolved to give the pope a sample of his spirit. The powerful minister Wolsey was declared subject to the penalties of the Statute of Præmunire, because he had exercised legatine powers without the king's consent. He fell, and no voice was raised in his favour (1529). Henry VIII appealed from the pope to the learning of Christendom, and proceeded to gather the opinions of the universities on the legality of his marriage and the propriety of his divorce. Further, to terrify the pope by a display of his power, he involved all the clergy of the realm under the penalties of Præmunire, because they had recognized Wolsey's legatine authority. The convocation of 1531 was compelled to sue for the king's pardon, and grant him a large subsidy by way of a fine. Moreover, the king demanded that he should be called in the preamble of the bill granting the subsidy, "sole protector, and supreme head of the Church and clergy of England." With difficulty Archbishop Warham modified the term "supreme head" by the limitation "as far as the law of Christ allows." In the parliament of 1532 the pope was still further threatened by an act forbidding the payment of annates to Rome. The clergy were terrified by the presentation by the Commons of a long petition concerning ecclesiastical grievances. It was clear that Henry VIII was in a position to do what he would. The Commons, as representing the middle class, were on his side, because they had many practical grievances which they hoped to see redressed. The clergy had no strong hold on the people, and had little organization amongst themselves. They were helpless before the king, and the pope was unable to give them any succour. What is known as "the submission of the clergy" was simply the practical recognition of this fact. Convocation in 1532 "submitted themselves humbly to his highness," and undertook thenceforth to promulgate no ordinance which had not received the royal approval, and to submit the provincial constitutions then in force to revision by a committee of sixteen laymen and sixteen clergy appointed by the king. In 1533 the new archbishop, Cranmer, took cognizance of the question of the king's divorce, and pronounced his marriage invalid from the first. As the pope had pronounced in favour of its validity, this was a decided assertion of the act passed in 1532 that appeals in such cases as had hitherto been pursued in the court of Rome should thenceforth be had within the realm. Henry VIII's marriage with Anne Boleyn announced his breach not only with the papacy, but with the public opinion of Europe. He had advanced step by step till there was no return possible. The parliament of 1534 passed acts confirming the submission of the clergy to the jurisdiction of the Crown, forbidding the payment of annates and all other dues to the pope, establishing the king as supreme head of the Church, with authority to reform all abuses, and conferring on him all payments that previously were made to the pope. All that was implied in the papal headship over the Church was now swept away from England. The secular privileges of the pope were conferred upon the Crown. The Church, whose machinery had already been broken down by papal encroachments, was left without any power to repair that machinery. Its legislative power was subject to the royal assent, its courts were left unreformed, and appeals were to be heard and decided in some court approved by the Crown.

Henry VIII had overturned the papal headship, and was no doubt aided in so doing by the example of those German states where the ideas of Luther had prevailed. But Henry himself was opposed to Luther's teaching, and had no sympathy with the cause of doctrinal reform. He wished the Church to remain as it had been, save that the rights of the pope were transferred to the Crown. Even Cranmer, though he had broken the rule of clerical celibacy, did not meditate any great change. But in Oxford and Cambridge especially men turned their attention to German theology. At the end of 1534 convocation petitioned the king to decree a translation of the Bible into English, a work which was not allowed till 1537. The visitatorial power of the Crown, vested in the hands of Cromwell as vicar-general, was not allowed to slumber. The visitation of the smaller monasteries led to an act in 1536 giving to the Crown all religious houses below the annual value of £200. In 1539 the suppression of the greater monasteries followed. The centres of the reactionary and papal party were abolished. The wealth and social importance of the Church were greatly diminished. The political power of the Church in the House of Lords was reduced. Those who were accused, with some reason, of making the ecclesiastical profession a cloak for idleness were dispersed.

These changes were not made without profoundly affecting English society. The bulk of the lower classes were attached to the old state of things, and suffered from the abolition of the monasteries. The number of those who were influenced by the teaching of Luther increased in activity. The middle class alone was satisfied, and Henry VIII took care to satisfy them in his measures. To define the position of the English Church, Ten Articles "to stablish Christian quietness" were put forward by the southern convocation in 1536, which asserted as "laudable ceremonies" the chief uses of the old Church. In 1537 was issued the "Bishop's Book," or "Institution of a Christen Man," which discarded the papal monarchy, but otherwise maintained the existing system. Free discussion of dogmatic questions was not according to Henry VIII's views. He valued his reputation for orthodoxy, and in 1539 the "Six Articles" inflicted the punishment of death on all who should call in question the chief dogmas and practices of the mediæval Church. So long as Henry VIII lived no further changes were made in the position of the Church of England. His strong hand kept contending parties from struggling, and his strong will impressed itself on the nation.

With the accession of Edward VI long pent-up antagonisms made themselves felt. One party, headed by Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, was contented with the abolition of the papal headship, and was opposed to further change. The reforming party was divided into three chief bodies—one consisting of revolutionary sectaries, whose wild talk had already created alarm; another of advanced reformers who had absorbed much of the theology of the Swiss teacher Zwingli, and regarded the sacraments as external symbols; a third of more moderate reformers, headed by Cranmer, who leaned to the teaching of Luther and Melancthon, were willing to reform superstitious errors, but held by the sacraments and the system of the Church. This last party succeeded in getting matters into their hands, and expressed their views in the First Prayer

Book of Edward VI, and in the "Book of the Homilies." The Prayer Book provided a uniform use for the service of the English Church; the homilies provided for the restoration of preaching as a means of teaching the people; the Bible was already translated. The practical character of the English Church was thus emphasized. It aimed at meeting the national needs, and appealed to the national intelligence. But the First Prayer Book did not satisfy the more ardent reformers, whose numbers were reinforced by a large influx of foreign teachers driven by religious persecution from the continent. Under their influence Cranmer's views developed, and in 1552 a second Prayer Book was issued, which simplified vestments, omitted some usages which were deemed superstitious, and remodelled the Communion service that it might be more acceptable to the followers of Zwingli and Calvin. The formularies of the Church were also set forth in Forty-two Articles, which in the main followed the ideas of the Saxon reformers, while retaining much of the conservatism which especially marked the beginnings of the English movement. No sooner had this been done than the accession of Mary (1553) produced a reaction, which the bulk of the people regarded with indifference. The progress of the Reformation under Edward VI had been too rapid. It had been accompanied by many outrages on the opinions of those who held by the old forms. It showed little tenderness or consideration for others, and was endured rather than welcomed.

Under Mary, Gardiner and his party prepared to return to a recognition of the papal headship. England was again reconciled to the papacy. Many of the English reformers fled to the continent; many who remained, amongst them Cranmer, suffered death for their opinions. But Mary's government was a failure. Her religious persecution was carried on in a spirit of narrow fanaticism, which stirred the popular mind against her. Her brief reign of five years undid the ill effects of the excessive zeal of the reformers under Edward VI, and disposed men to look regretfully on the reign and policy of Henry VIII.

Elizabeth had lived through both, and had conformed to Romanism under Mary. She made no change at first, but Anne Boleyn's daughter could not seriously contemplate a reconciliation with the papacy. Her first parliament in 1559 passed an act to "restore to the Crown the ancient jurisdiction over the estate ecclesiastical and spiritual, and abolish all foreign jurisdictions repugnant to the same." Elizabeth explained the meaning of the royal supremacy so re-established to be "under God to have the sovereignty and rule over all persons born within these her realms of what estate, either ecclesiastical or temporal, soever they be, so as no other foreign power shall or ought to have any superiority over them." At the same time heresy was defined to be what was contrary to the canonical Scriptures, or the first four general councils. The Prayer Book was revised and legalized, and uniformity of worship was enforced by an act bidding all men to resort to their parish church. The greater part of the Marian bishops refused to take the oath of supremacy, and were deprived of their sees. Matthew Parker, the new Archbishop of Canterbury, brought great learning and much moderation to the difficult task of reorganizing the English Church upon a basis which should be at once comprehensive and definite enough to form a strong institution. The exiles who had fled before Mary's persecution returned to England, strongly imbued with the ideas of Calvin. The Catholic party resented its loss of supremacy. Elizabeth supported as a compromise the system which her father had devised. The old order and ceremonies of the Church were left untouched, while room was made for the exercise of the spirit of personal religion. At first the Elizabethan system was not strong in its hold on the popular mind. It was tolerated because it was the only means of securing peace. Soon the feeling of the mass of the people gathered round it, and the events of the reign of Elizabeth identified it with the English spirit. A body of Calvinists, known as Puritans or Precisions, objected to some of its ceremonies, and to its episcopal organization. They vainly strove to make alterations, and the "Martin Marprelate" controversy (q.v.—1588) is a testimony to their zeal. They were strong in the House of Commons, and grew in strength under James I. and Charles I., so that the Great Rebellion was as much a religious as a political controversy. On the other hand, the Romanists organized themselves into a political party. Elizabeth was excommunicated in 1570, and Jesuit missionaries flocked into England. They were persecuted, and the great mass of the English Catholics remained loyal to their queen and country against the attacks of Spain. Practically the reign of Elizabeth saw England established as a Protestant country. The Church of England has in the main adhered to the lines then laid down, while Romanists and Nonconformists have gradually been admitted to civil and religious equality.

Reformation in Ireland. The parliament which met at Dublin in May 1536 rapidly copied the measures which the English parliament had just passed. In the first session the king was declared supreme head of the Church of Ireland, and given the first-fruits; and appeals to Rome were abolished. To facilitate the work, Poynings' Act was suspended, so that the English statutes needed only to be copied, and it was not necessary to send drafts to London and back. No opposition was offered by the laity ; but the spiritual peers sturdily resisted the progress of the bills ; and the proctors of the clergy (who were in Ireland members of parliament, though not apparently sitting with the Commons, but in a separate house) were so energetic in obstruction that the privy council decided that they had no right to vote, and caused an act to be passed in the next session depriving them of the privilege. In 1537 certain monasteries were suppressed, and this was soon followed by a general dissolution. A small part of the monastic revenues was transferred to bishoprics ; but, as in England, the greater portion of the land was sold at nominal prices to private persons. An important part was played in these transactions by George Browne, the "Cranmer of Ireland," who had been provincial of the Austin Friars, and had been created Archbishop of Dublin in 1535. The Bidding Prayer issued by him in 1538 is the first document in which the union of the churches of England and Ireland is declared. Until the accession of Edward VI no change was made in worship or belief. But when an attempt was made by the council without act of parliament to enforce the use of Edward's Prayer Book the Archbishop of Armagh and most of the bishops and clergy refused to obey. Only Browne and five bishops accepted the new liturgy. As Armagh was in the land of O'Neill, and beyond the control of the council, the primacy was transferred to Dublin, and some of the vacant bishoprics were filled up by advanced reformers, of whom the most important was Bale of Ossory. Under Mary the old state of things was restored. Browne, the conforming bishops, and the married clergy were deprived. In the second year of Elizabeth a carefully packed parliament passed the Act of Uniformity (q.v.), and copied the contemporary English measures. Three bishops alone refused to conform ; but in a large part of the country Mass continued to be performed, and where the new system was really introduced, the dissolution of the monasteries, which had in many places served the parish churches, left half the parishes without clergy. The English Church, which had been imposed by the English government, and was used as a means of anglicizing the Irish, never laid hold of the Irish people. They adhered firmly to the old opinions, and persecution only intensified their steadfastness. The disestablishment of the Irish Church in 1869 was an admission that the Reformation in Ireland had been a failure, and that the people were practically Roman Catholic.

Reformation in Scotland. The Reformation was the first national movement in Scotland which originated with the people, who now came forward for the first time as a power in the state. By the beginning of the fifteenth century the Church in Scotland had become very unpopular. Favoured by the Crown it had amassed riches and lands. Its prelates held the great offices of state, and were arrogant and overbearing, delighting in displays of their pomp and power. This excited the jealousy of the baronage. The burden of the tithes and Church dues, and the greed and injustice that were exercised in extorting them by the clergy, in whom the spirit of avarice was dominant, woke the hatred of the people, who lent a willing ear to the reformed doctrines. These doctrines were imported by the fugitives, who fled over the border to seek safety from the Marian persecution in England. Sympathy with their sufferings overcame the prejudice against their nation, and roused a Protestant reaction among the people. Many of the landowners, inspired by a desire to get hold of the Church lands, joined the popular movement. The Reformers signed the bond which pledged them to united support [COVENANT] in 1557. Abjuration of papal authority and adoption of the English Bible and Prayer Book were its principles. The "Lords of the Congregation," as the supporters of the bond were called, demanded of the regent, Mary of Guise, a reformation of religion in accordance with these principles. She refused, and summoned their preachers before the privy council. This roused a tumult. The mob, excited by John Knox (q.v.), rose in Perth, sacked the religious houses, and defaced the churches (1559). Their example was followed throughout the country. The regent employed French soldiers to quell the insurgents, and thereby excited a civil war. The Congregation took up arms and appealed to England for support. On the death of the regent the estates passed the Reformation Statutes, which abjured the authority of the pope, adopted the Genevan Confession of Faith, and declared the celebration of the Mass a capital offence (August 24, 1560). Thus the Church of Scotland was nominally separated from that of Rome. But these statutes were not confirmed by the Crown, for the queen, Mary Stuart, was in France. When she arrived in Scotland (1561), though she did not attempt to restore the old Church, she demanded toleration for herself and her attendants, and re-established the Mass in her private chapel. Meanwhile the ministers and the lairds fell out over the disposal of the Church lands. Most of the richest of the ecclesiastical estates had been already secured by laymen. Of the lands that were still unappropriated the privy council set aside one-third to pay the stipends of the ministers of the reformed Church. The rest remained in possession of the churchmen who held it, and as they died off it was to fall to the Crown. But the Lords refused to accept the "First Book of Discipline," a code of stringent statutes drawn up by the ministers for the government of the Church, even more tyrannical in spirit than the exactions of the old Church, which had been found so galling. For the Presbyters imagined that they had succeeded to the power of the pope, and assumed the right of interfering in matters secular as well as spiritual. On the deposition of the queen (1567) the Earl of Moray, her half-brother, was made regent for the infant king. He had been foremost as a leader of the Congregation, and during his regency Presbyterianism was in the ascendant. The government of all ecclesiastical matters was committed to the General Assembly, a council of presbyters elected by their brethren. Liturgical worship, however, was not altogether swept away with the rites and ceremonies of the Romish Church. A prayer book, called the "Book of Common Order," was in daily use in the churches. Under the regency of Mar Episcopacy was again restored (1572). But the bishops were merely nominal, as they had neither lands nor dignities, and were subject to the authority of the General Assembly. In 1592 this shadowy Episcopacy was again abolished, and the Presbyterian polity established. Each Presbyter was supreme in his own parish. A certain number of parishes formed a presbytery or council of presbyters, who dispatched the ecclesiastical business of the district. The synod, composed of several presbyteries, was a court of appeal for matters of graver import, while the supreme court, the General Assembly, met yearly at Edinburgh. It was formed of ministers and laymen, elders as they were called, sent up as deputies by the several presbyteries. The king (or his commissioners) was the secular president. There was also a moderator elected from among the presbyters as acting president. The Covenant, based upon the principles of the first bond, was very generally signed, and the "Second Book of Discipline," drawn up by Andrew Melville, was accepted as a code for the government of the Church. Shortly afterwards the accession of King James to the English throne again restored Episcopacy. The General Assembly was not, however, abolished, though it was deprived of its despotic power. No change was made in the established form of worship. The attempt made by Charles I to substitute the English "Liturgy" for the "Book of Common Order," and a "Book of Canons" for the "Book of Discipline" led to the outbreak of the Civil War. Under Cromwell Presbyterianism was again established, and again displaced by Episcopacy under Charles II. After the Revolution the bishops and the episcopal clergy were turned out. The Presbyterian Church was re-established by law (1690). Since that date it has been the Church of Scotland. And at the Union the liberty of the Church was secured by a provision that the Presbyterian should be the only Church government in Scotland from that time forward.

Reform Bills. The question of parliamentary reform, on which an agitation had arisen in 1769, and on which Pitt introduced an unsuccessful motion in 1782 and 1783, was first raised in a practical shape on April 18, 1785, when Pitt brought forward a bill proposing to disfranchise thirty-six rotten boroughs returning two members each, to give the members to the counties and to London and Westminster, and to extend the franchise to copyholders, and in towns to householders, setting aside £1,000,000 for compensation. The motion was rejected by 248 to 174. The outbreak of the French revolution a few years afterwards, and the European war, diverted men's minds from the subject, and produced a disinclination towards the extension of popular liberty. In 1790 both Burke and Pitt opposed Flood's parliamentary reform motion, which was negatived, and Grey's abortive motion of 1793 (rejected by 232 to 41) met with no better fate when brought forward again in 1797. The Fox ministry had no leisure, and the Portland ministry no inclination, to attend to the matter. In 1817 a motion of Sir Francis Burdett was lost by 265 to 77, and a bolder attempt of the same member to introduce manhood suffrage in the following year found not a single supporter besides the mover and seconder. In 1820 Lord John Russell carried a bill for withholding writs from the rotten boroughs of Camelford, Gram-pound, Penryn, and Barnstaple, which was thrown out by the Lords. Each year from 1821 to 1829 Lord John Russell or some other Whig introduced a motion for reform, which was invariably rejected. Huskisson's motion for the disfranchisement of Penryn and East Retford (q.v.) led (May 1828) to the secession of the Canningites from the Wellington cabinet. In February 1830 the Marquis of Blandford moved an amendment to the address in favour of reform, which was rejected by 96 to 11. The same year Calvert's bill to transfer the representation of East Retford to Birmingham, and Lord John Russell's motion to enfranchise Leeds, Manchester, and Birmingham, were rejected.

When Lord Grey became prime minister in 1830 the subject was at once taken up by the cabinet. On March 1, 1831, Lord John Russell introduced the Reform Bill. After most animated debates the second reading of the bill was carried (March 22) by a majority of one (302 to 301). On an amendment in committee for reducing the whole number of members the ministry were defeated (April 19). On April 22 parliament was dissolved, to meet again in June with the reformers in a great majority. The Reform Bill was again introduced (June 24), and on September 21 finally passed the Commons by 345 to 236, but was thrown out by the Lords (October 8) by 199 to 158. On December 12 a third Reform Bill was brought in and carried by a majority of 116 (March 23, 1832). The bill sent up to the Lords passed the second reading on April 14.

But on May 7 the peers, by a majority of 35, postponed the disfranchising clauses of the bill, thus virtually rejecting it. The king refused to create new peers, the ministers resigned, and the Duke of Wellington attempted to form a Tory ministry. But the attempt was hopeless, and the nation almost in a state of insurrection. On May 15 the Grey ministry returned to office, and the king intimated his readiness to create new peers if necessary. The Lords, however, at length gave way, and on June 4 the bill was passed by 106 to 22. The Reform Bill of 1832 disfranchised 56 boroughs having less than 2,000 inhabitants, and deprived 30 other boroughs of one member each. Of the 143 seats gained, 65 were given to the counties (making the total of county-seats 159), 22 of the large towns received two members each, and 21 others one each. A uniform £10 household franchise was established in boroughs, and in the counties the franchise was given to copyholders, leaseholders, and tenants-at-will holding property of the value of £50 and upwards. Reform Bills with analogous provisions were also passed for Scotland and Ireland in 1832.

Between 1832 and 1850 motions for further extending the franchise were frequently made and lost. In 1852 and 1854 Lord John Russell introduced Reform Bills which were withdrawn. In February 1859 Disraeli, on behalf of the Conservatives, introduced a bill designed to equalize the town and county franchise (fixed at £10 each) and to limit the forty-shilling freeholder to his borough-vote by depriving him of his county vote. This was defeated by 39 votes. In 1866 (March) a comprehensive Reform Bill was introduced by Gladstone. The "Adullamite" (q.v.) section of the Liberals had, however, seceded from their party, and the bill, after fierce debate, was carried only by 5 votes, and in June the government were defeated on an amendment. The Liberals resigned, and the Conservatives, in February 1867, brought forward and passed (August) Disraeli's Reform Bill of 1867. This bill conferred a household and lodger franchise in boroughs, though it still left a property qualification in counties [ELECTIONS].

Between 1872 and 1883 motions in favour of household franchise in the counties were moved (generally by G. O. Trevelyan) and rejected. In 1884 Gladstone introduced a Reform Bill intended to render the franchise uniform in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and to assimilate it in counties and boroughs. No provisions for the redistribution of seats were made, but the government undertook to bring in a bill dealing with the subject at an early date. After several amendments in favour of joining the Franchise Bill with a Redistribution Bill had been thrown out in the Commons, the bill passed its third reading in the Lower House by a majority of 130. The Lords, however, declared by a majority of 51 that no bill would be satisfactory which did not deal with the two subjects of extension of the franchise and redistribution. The two bills were brought in during the next session and carried.

No further changes in the franchise occurred until 1918, when the Representation of the People Act (q.v.), introduced by Mr. Walter Long, extended the vote to women of the age of 30 and over. The second Baldwin administration of 1924 took office pledged to accord the vote to women on the same terms as to men, to which end was passed the Equal Franchise Act of 1928.

Regalia are the insignia of royalty, including various articles used at coronations and on state occasions. The most important of these were under the charge of the Abbot of Westminster till the Reformation; they are now preserved in the jewel office at the Tower of London. In 1649 the crowns were broken to pieces; new ones were made for the coronation of Charles II, and have been used ever since.

C. Davenport, "The English Regalia," 1897.

Regency may exist during the absence or the incapacity of the sovereign through nonage or disease. William I, on his visit to Normandy in 1067, left Odo, Bishop of Bayeux, and William FitzOsbern, Earl of Hereford, joint guardians of his kingdom, though he assigned to each a special province. When the functions of the chief justiciar became defined, the vicegerency of the kingdom was reckoned among them, though the relative rights of this officer and of the members of the royal house were not settled. Henry II, during his absence, caused his authority to be vested in his son, the younger Henry, even before he associated him with himself in the kingship. On the death of Henry II Eleanor acted as regent until the return of her son, and on the fall of the justiciar Longchamp, while Richard was on the crusade, the barons recognized John as the vicegerent of the kingdom. From the time of Henry III it became customary for the king to appoint certain lieutenants, and sometimes his eldest son, though an infant, to act during his absence. Accordingly William III, on leaving England in 1695, Queen Mary being then dead, appointed seven lords justices for that purpose. George I left the Prince of Wales as regent during his first absence from England, but never did so again on any like occasion. The question of the exercise of the royal authority during the absence of the monarch is now of little moment.

As the common law does not recognize incapacity in the sovereign, special provisions have been made as to regency when occasion required. On the accession of Henry III at the age of nine, the barons appointed the Earl of Pembroke as regent with the title rector regis et regni, and associated certain councillors with him. When Edward III succeeded his father at the age of fourteen the parliament nominated a council to advise him. No regent was appointed during the nonage of Richard II, but the magnates in this case nominated the council. On the accession of Henry VI his uncle, the Duke of Gloucester, claimed the regency as next of kin, and by the will of the late king. Both these claims were disallowed by the council, and parliament constituted the Duke of Bedford protector, allowing Gloucester the protectorate during the absence of his brother in France. When the king fell ill in 1454 the Duke of York was appointed protector by the Lords, with the assent of the Commons. On his renewed illness the next year the Lords in again appointing the duke assumed the right of choice, though the assent of the Commons appears in the Act of Ratification. On the death of Edward IV his widow tried to obtain the guardianship of her son, but the Duke of Gloucester was made protector by the council. In 1536 parliament granted Henry VIII authority to name such guardians as he chose, in the event of his leaving a successor under eighteen if a male, or under sixteen if a female. The king accordingly appointed his sixteen executors as guardians of his son Edward VI, constituting them a council of government. In spite of this arrangement these councillors invested the Earl of Hertford with the protectorate.

After the death of Frederick, Prince of Wales, in 1751, parliament provided for a possible minority by enacting that the Princess of Wales should be regent and guardian of the king's person, and by nominating a council of regency to which the reigning king had the right of adding four members. George III, after a severe illness in 1765, wished parliament to allow him the right of appointing any person regent whom he chose. A bill, however, was passed naming the queen, the Princess of Wales, and any descendant of the late king as those from whom a regent might be selected. When the king was deprived of reason in 1788-9, Fox [REGENCY BILLS (3)] asserted that the Prince of Wales had a right to the regency, and, though he substituted "legal claim" for "right," maintained that parliament had only to recognize the prince's claim, and could not lay restrictions on his authority. Pitt on the other hand declared that the prince had "no more right to the royal authority than any other subject," and having caused parliament to be opened by commission under the great seal, introduced a bill restricting the power and patronage of the proposed regent. The recovery of the king prevented the settlement of these questions for the time. On a like occasion in 1810 parliament passed a bill imposing restrictions on the regent's authority. The next Regency Bill, passed in 1830, provided that, in the event of the death of William IV before the Princess Victoria was of the age of eighteen, the Duchess of Kent should be regent, no council being appointed. As on the accession of Victoria the King of Hanover became heir presumptive, a Regency Act passed in 1837 provided that, on the decease of her Majesty, the royal function should be discharged by lords justices until the arrival of the king. Another act, passed on the marriage of Victoria in 1840, provided that, should her Majesty leave a successor under age, Prince Albert should be regent, without any council, and with full powers save that he might not assent to any bill for altering the succession, or affecting the rights of the Church of England or the Church of Scotland. When George V came to the throne a Regency Bill was again required, as his eldest son was under age; and Queen Mary was accordingly appointed. From these examples it will be gathered that the right of selecting the person and determining the power of a regent now pertains to the estates of the realm assembled in parliament. [For the various Regency Bills see the next article.] [W. H.]

Regency Bills. "In judgment of law the king, as king, cannot be said to be a minor," says Coke; he has, therefore, by common law no legal guardian, nor has any provision been made for the exercise of the regal authority during his youth or incapacity. It has accordingly been necessary to make special provision as occasion has arisen, and the various measures which have been adopted have been of considerable political importance.

(1) 1751. Upon the death of Frederick, Prince of Wales, an act was passed appointing the Princess of Wales regent in the event of the death of George II before the Prince of Wales was eighteen years old. She was to be assisted by a council of regency nominated in the act, to which the king was empowered to add four others.

(2) 1765. Upon the recovery of George III from his first attack of mental disease it was thought desirable to provide for the regency during any such illness as should incapacitate him, or in case of his death, during the childhood of his children. With his lofty views of royal power, George III was not ready to place the nomination of a regent in the hands of parliament, but proposed that parliament should confer on him the power of appointing any person he pleased as regent. He almost certainly intended to nominate the queen, but the ministers feared lest the Princess of Wales should be nominated, and thus her favourite, Bute, become all-powerful. George so far yielded to his ministers that he consented to the limitation of his choice "to the queen and any other person of the royal family usually resident in England," and a bill was introduced into the House of Lords to this effect. After the doubt as to whether the queen was naturalized, and so capable of acting as regent, had been set at rest by the opinion of the judges that marriage with the king naturalized her, the question arose as to the meaning of the term "the royal family," and most of the ministers, moved by hatred of Bute, declared it did not include the Princess of Wales. Having caused a resolution introducing her name to be rejected, they persuaded the king to consent to the introduction of a clause limiting his choice to the queen and the descendants of the late king, on the ground that otherwise the Commons would exclude the princess by name. The Commons, however, reinserted her name, and this evidence of the duplicity of his ministers was one of the main causes of the fall of the Grenville ministry. It is to be noticed also that the act nominated a council of regency, consisting of the king's four brothers, his uncle, the Duke of Cumberland, and the great officers of state, and empowered the king, in the event of the death of a brother or of an uncle, to nominate another person in his place.

(3) 1788-9. In 1788 the king, after proroguing parliament, lost his reason, and it became necessary to provide for the regency. Parliament met without royal summons on the day to which it had been prorogued, and, after a fortnight's adjournment, proceeded to discuss the question. Fox laid down that "the Prince of Wales had as clear a right to exercise the power of sovereignty during the king's incapacity as if the king were actually dead, and that it was merely for the two Houses of Parliament to pronounce at what time he should commence the exercise of his right," while the premier, Pitt, declared that "unless by decision of parliament, the Prince of Wales had no more right—speaking of strict right—to assume the government than any other individual subject of the country." The position taken up by the two statesmen is explained by the fact that if the prince had become regent, Fox would at once have been made prime minister; and Pitt was anxious to delay the creation of a regent. In this he was assisted by the opposition, who resisted the proposal to limit the future regent's authority. At last, on February 5, 1789, after parliament had been formally opened by letters patent under the great seal affixed by authority of parliament, the bill, in which, among other limitations, the prince was forbidden to bestow peerages except on royal princes, was introduced in the Commons, and soon sent up to the Lords; but the king's sudden recovery put an end to further proceedings, and, though the king was anxious for some permanent provision for a regency, nothing was done.

(4) 1811. When George III's mind finally gave way the precedent of 1788-9 was followed exactly. The Bill passed the Lords on February 4, and consent was given to it by commission under great seal affixed by authority of parliament.

(5) 1830. The Duchess of Kent was appointed regent, in the event of the Princess Victoria succeeding to the throne before arriving at the age of eighteen. The regent was not to be controlled by a council, as in previous Regency Acts, but was to govern through the ordinary ministers.

(6) 1837. On the accession of Victoria, as the King of Hanover was presumptive heir, an act was passed providing, in the event of the queen's dying while the successor was abroad, for the carrying on of the government by lords justices until his return.

(7) 1840. Upon the marriage of Victoria an act was passed enacting that in the event of any child of the queen coming to the throne under the age of eighteen, Prince Albert should become regent, though without power to assent to any bill for altering the succession, or affecting the worship of the Church of England, or the rights of the Church of Scotland.

(8) 1910. When George V came to the throne his eldest son was under age. An act was therefore passed which appointed Queen Mary as regent. [F. S. P.]

Regicides, THE. Those persons who sat in judgment on Charles I, or were instrumental in his death, were all at the Restoration included under this title. The ordinance nominating the High Court of Justice finally appointed 135 persons to judge the king. Not half of these attended the trial. The number present at the opening, counting Bradshaw, the president, was 67, and 67 also were present on January 27, 1649, when sentence was pronounced. Of these 67, 58 and one other person (Ingoldsby) signed the death warrant. At the Restoration the House of Commons ordered that "all those persons who sat in judgment upon the late king's majesty when the sentence was pronounced for his condemnation" should be forthwith secured (May 14). In all the House of Commons placed in the category 84 persons, viz., 67 present at the last sitting, 11 frequently present, 4 officers of the court, and 2 executioners. Out of these the Commons proposed to punish capitally only 12 persons, viz., 7 judges, 3 court officers, and 2 executioners. The House of Lords went farther, and proposed that all those who had been present at the last sitting, or signed the warrant, saving only Colonels Hutchinson, Tomlinson, and Ingoldsby—in all 66 persons—should be punished capitally. But the Commons resolutely opposed the Lords' amendment. In the Bill of Indemnity as it finally passed (August 29, 1660) the penalties of the Regicides were ordered as follows:—(1) Four dead Regicides excepted by posthumous attainder for high treason, viz., Cromwell, Ireton, Bradshaw, and Pride. (2) Twenty dead Regicides excepted as to their estates, to be subject to future fines or forfeiture. (3) Thirty living Regicides (viz., twenty-two judges and eight others) absolutely excepted. (4) Nineteen living Regicides excepted with a saving clause, stating that they might be legally attainted; but that their execution should be suspended "until his majesty, by the advice and assent of the Lords and Commons in parliament, shall order the execution by Act of Parliament to be passed for that purpose." (5) Six more living Regicides were excepted, but not capitally. (6) Two Regicides excepted, but with the sole penalty of incapacitation for office, viz., Hutchinson and Lascelles. Tomlinson and Ingoldsby escaped without any penalties whatever. The trial of the Regicides took place before a court of thirty-four commissioners (October 1660). Twenty-nine were condemned to death, of whom ten were executed; the remaining nineteen, with six others who had not been tried, were mostly imprisoned till their deaths, though the fate of some is still obscure. There were still nineteen fugitives living in exile, of whom three were subsequently caught in Holland, brought over and executed, and one (Lisle) was assassinated in Switzerland.

Masson, "Life of Milton," vol. vi., 1880; Noble, "Lives of the Regicides," 1798. [C. H. F.]

Registration Act, THE (1836), created an elaborate machinery for the registration of births, deaths, and marriages. It regulated the method of registration, the appointment of the necessary officials, and the creation of a central registry office at Somerset House under a registrar-general, who was to present annual reports to parliament. The system then established has remained substantially unaltered till the present day.

"Regium Donum" was the endowment of £1,200 a year granted by William III to the Presbyterian clergy of Ireland to reward them for their activity against James II. In 1695 the lords justices advised the discontinuance of the grant, but William refused consent. From 1711 to 1715 the Irish House of Lords succeeded in preventing its being paid. But on the accession of George I it was revived and increased to £2,000. In 1870, in consequence of the Irish Church Disestablishment Act, it was abolished, but a compensation was granted to all interested parties.

Regnal Years. The importance of extreme accuracy respecting the regnal years of the sovereigns of England is evident from the fact that after the reign of Henry II no other date of a year occurs in public documents than the year of the reign of the existing monarch, and that an error of one day in calculating the beginning of the regnal year may mean an error of one year when the date is translated. Except in the case of a sovereign acceding on January 1, every regnal year contains part of two consecutive Christian years. The following table is calculated according to the common and historical year—i.e., from January 1—but as the civil, legal, and ecclesiastical year for a long period began on March 25 all dates between January 1 and March 25 belong, according to the civil computation, to the year before the historical year. January 1 to March 25 of the first year of the reign of William I was in the civil year 1066 and not 1067. Similarly Edward III is sometimes said to have begun his reign on January 25, 1326, instead of January 25, 1327, etc.

J. E. W. Wallis, "English Regnal Years and Titles," 1921.

Regni, THE, were a British tribe whose chief town was Regnum, the modern Chichester.

Regulating Act, LORD NORTH'S (1773), was the first important intervention of the British government in the direct administration of British India. The difficulties of the East India Company drove them in 1772 to seek a loan from parliament, and the ministry in consequence brought in a bill for the better government of India, which was carried in spite of the opposition of the India House. Its provisions were that the administration of Bengal should be vested in a governor-general and four councillors, and that this government should be supreme over the other presidencies; that the first governor-general and councillors, who were nominated in the act, should hold office for five years, and be irremovable except by the Crown on representation of the court of directors; that vacancies should be supplied by the court subject to the approbation of the Crown; that a Supreme Court of Judicature should be established at Calcutta to consist of a chief justice and four puisne judges to be nominated by the Crown and paid by the company; that the qualification for a vote in the India House should be the possession of £1,000 stock, and that the possession of more should entitle to a plurality of votes in a fixed proportion; that the directors should be elected for four years, and that one-fourth of the entire number should be renewed annually; that all the company's correspondence relating to civil and military affairs, the government of the country, or the administration of the revenues, should be laid before one of his Majesty's secretaries of state, and that no servant of the Crown or company should receive presents. The Regulating Act was revised in 1783 by Fox's India Bill, which, however, failed to become law, and by Pitt's India Bill of 1784.

Remonstrance, THE GRAND. In the first week after the Long Parliament met, it was moved by Lord Digby "to draw up such a remonstrance to the king as should be a faithful and lively representation of the state of the kingdom." In the following August it was resolved that this proposal should be adopted, and the Remonstrance was brought forward on November 8, finally discussed on the 22nd, and passed by 159 votes to 148. It was presented to the king on December 1, ordered to be printed on the 15th, and answered by Charles on December 23. In aim and substance the Remonstrance was "an appeal to the nation rather than address to the Crown." It stated the case of the Commons against the king, described the condition in which they had found the nation, what reforms they had already effected, what they proposed for the future, and what difficulties they had to struggle against. The preamble explained the causes which made a remonstrance necessary. Clauses 1 to 104 traced the history of the king's misgovernment from his accession to the meeting of the Long Parliament. Clauses 105 to 142 described the abuses abolished and the reforms effected and prepared by the parliament. Clauses 143 to 180 enumerated the obstructions to the work of reformation, evil counsellors and slanderers, the army plots, and the Irish rebellion. Clauses 181 to 191 explained and defended the scheme of the parliamentary leaders for the reform of the Church. The last fourteen clauses (192 to 206) pointed out the remedial measures the Commons demanded: the establishment of certain safeguards against the Roman Catholic religion; securities to be given for the better administration of justice; the king to choose for ministers and agents such persons as parliament "might have cause to confide in." The earlier clauses, which merely set forth the king's past misgovernment, were adopted without opposition, but the ecclesiastical clauses met with an able and vigorous opposition from Hyde, Colepepper, and others. The final debate also was long and excited, and the two questions whether the Remonstrance should be printed, and whether the minority might enter their protestations, nearly led to a personal struggle. It was the fact that it was a party manifesto which led to this opposition, and brought the Civil War nearer.

Remonstrants, THE. In 1650 a schism took place amongst the Scottish Presbyterians. Warned by the defeat of Dunbar (September 3), and the attempt of Charles II to join the Scottish Royalists, Argyll and his followers determined to unite with the Royalists to oppose Cromwell. Against this policy two leading divines, James Guthrie and Patrick Gillespie, with Johnston of Warriston, and the chiefs of the rigid Presbyterians of the south-west, presented to the committee of Estates "a remonstrance of the gentlemen commanders and ministers attending the forces in the west" (October 30, 1650). Those who joined in this opposition were called Remonstrants or Protesters.

Repeal Agitation. [IRISH REPEAL AGITATION.]

Repingdon, PHILIP (d. 1424), was one of the chief supporters of Wyclif at Oxford, but subsequently being alarmed at the progress of Lollardy he became one of its strongest opponents. In 1404 he was made Bishop of Lincoln and in 1408 cardinal by the pope, but in 1419 he resigned the see, perhaps because of the irregularity of his acceptance of the cardinalate. He seems to have lived in obscurity for the rest of his life.

Representation. [ELECTIONS; PARLIAMENT.]

Representation of the People Act, THE (1918), was introduced as a bill by Mr. Walter Long on May 15, 1917, after the report of a Speaker's conference established in 1916 to deal with the question of electoral reform. It was designed to prohibit the exercise by anyone of more than two votes, and to accord a parliamentary vote to all women of 30 and over who were entitled to the municipal franchise. The bill passed its second reading by 329 votes to 40, reached the Lords in December, and became law on February 6, 1918. The strong desire of the Lords to insert a clause providing for proportional representation (q.v.) resulted in a compromise, whereby not more than 100 members might be elected by proportional representation if constituencies so desired. The act in its final form made occupation as owner or tenant for six months the basis of the municipal franchise for men and women of 21 and over; and accorded a parliamentary vote to women of 30 and over eligible to vote in local government elections and a second vote to holders of University degrees. Plural voting was restricted to two votes, and receipt of poor relief was made no longer a disqualification. The maximum amount of election expenses also was fixed—at 7d. per elector in counties and 5d. in boroughs. The act added 13,000,000 new voters to the register. [REFORM BILLS.]

Representative Peers are those peers of Scotland and Ireland selected by their order to represent them in the House of Lords. By the Act of Union with Scotland (1707) it was enacted that Scotland should be represented in the British House of Lords by 16 peers chosen by the whole body of the Scottish nobility (at that time numbering 154). The proportion of Scottish to English members of parliament had been fixed at one to twelve, and the same proportion was observed in the House of Lords. The representative peers were to be elected for each parliament by open voting, and proxies of absent nobles were allowed. No fresh Scottish peerages were in future to be created. In 1711 the House of Lords denied the right of Scottish non-representative peers who had been given English peerages to sit among them. This, however, did not prevent the conferring of English titles on the eldest sons of Scottish peers, and after a decision of the judges in 1782 the Crown recommenced to grant patents of peerage in Great Britain to Scottish peers. More than half the Scottish peers are now also peers of England, and ultimately only 16 will remain without an hereditary right to sit, and these will perhaps be made hereditary peers of parliament. It may be added that one of the proposals of the Peerage Bill of 1719 was to substitute 25 hereditary for 16 elected peers from Scotland.

By the Act of Union with Ireland (1800), 28 Irish representative peers were added to the House of Lords: these, however, were to be elected for life, and not, as in Scotland, for one parliament only. A new Irish peerage was to be created only when three became extinct. But when the number fell to 100 it was to be kept at that figure by the creation of one new peerage whenever a peerage became extinct, or an Irish peer became a peer of Great Britain.

"Lords' Report on the Dignity of a Peer."

Requests, THE COURT OF, was an offshoot of the council in its judicial capacity. Its origin has often been assigned to an order of 13 Richard II requiring the keeper of the privy seal and a certain number of the council to meet between eight and nine o'clock a.m. in order to examine and dispatch the bills of people of lesser charge. Actually it appears to have been a much later development, although the jurisdiction which it exercised was of great antiquity. A special committee was appointed by Henry VII to hear the petitions of poor persons, and in 1516 or 1517 this was permanently housed by Wolsey in Whitehall. The name Court of Requests does not appear before 1529. The court was finally abolished, together with the Star Chamber, by the Long Parliament. There were also local tribunals, known as Courts of Request or Courts of Conscience, for the recovery of small debts, limited at first to sums under 40s., and afterwards under £5. The first of these was established by act of parliament in 1625; and similar courts were soon afterwards set up by act of parliament in various parts of the kingdom. They proved, however, very inadequate, and were suppressed by the County Court Act of 1846.

J. S. Leadam, "Select Cases in the Court of Requests,"

Rescissory Act, THE, was an act passed by the Scottish parliament in 1661.

It rescinded or cut off from the body of the law all the statutes passed in the parliament of 1640 or subsequently. This withdrew from the statute-book all legislation later than the year 1633, for the parliament of 1639 passed no statutes. It was proposed by Sir Thomas Primrose with the object of annulling the acts establishing Presbyterianism in Scotland. It was brought in and passed in one day (March 28), and immediately approved by Lord Middleton, the high commissioner, without waiting for leave from the king. Burnet dubs it "a most extravagant thing, only fit to be concluded after a drunken bout."

Resolutioners was the name given to the supporters of the coalition between the Scottish Royalists and the Presbyterian party proposed by the Argyll government in the autumn of 1650. In the kirk commission, which met at Perth, a resolution was passed (November 4) empowering the government to relax the Act of Classes (q.v.) and allow the Royalists to take part in the war. Those who supported this policy were called Resolutioners.

Restoration, THE, of 1660, was merely the completion of a process which had begun as far back as 1653 with the establishment of the Protectorate of Oliver Cromwell. The monarchical principle, disavowed in 1649, was thus early readmitted into the constitution, and what was restored in 1660 was rather the Stuart dynasty, the Lords, and the Church than the institution of monarchy itself. The first expedient adopted by the army after the retirement of Richard Cromwell in 1659 was the recall of the Rump Parliament, to which were added in January 1660 such of the members "secluded" in 1648 as were still available. In February General Monk and the army of Scotland entered London, and next month the reconstituted Long Parliament dissolved itself, after having appointed Monk commander-in-chief of the forces in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and provided for the election of a convention to settle the government. On April 14 Charles issued from Breda his famous Declaration (q.v.), and eleven days later the Convention Parliament assembled and passed a resolution to the effect that "according to the ancient and fundamental laws of the kingdom, the government is, and ought to be, by King, Lords, and Commons." On May 8 Charles was proclaimed, and three weeks later he entered London amid wild rejoicings. In the course of the next year the settlement of the country was carried through by the Convention (now declared a true parliament), in accordance with the terms of the Declaration of Breda. An Act of Indemnity and Oblivion was passed in August 1660, from which only the regicides and four others were excluded.

A land settlement was effected on the basis of the restoration of all Church and Crown lands and of confiscated Royalist estates; and the army was disbanded with the exception of a few troops reserved to Charles as a bodyguard. In addition, an annual revenue of £1,200,000 was assigned to the king for life; and certain of the measures of the Interregnum (including the Navigation Ordinance of 1651 and the ordinance abolishing feudal tenures of 1656) were re-enacted. The settlement of the Church was reserved for the new parliament which assembled in April 1661, and was given statutory expression in the series of enactments popularly known as the Clarendon Code (q.v.). The fact that no attempt was made in 1660 to exact from the restored monarch any specific pledges of constitutional government is significant of the spirit in which the Restoration was effected. The theory upon which it rested—viz., that Charles had reigned from the day of his father's execution—was in itself a vindication of the doctrines of divine right in their completest form. On the whole, however, it may be said that the main achievements of the first session of the Long Parliament were preserved; and that the rehabilitation of the royal authority at the end of Charles's reign was as much the result of accident as of the defects inherent in the Restoration Settlement.

Resumption Bill (1700). At the time of the conquest of Ireland by William III a bill had been introduced providing for the application to the public service of forfeited Irish lands. This bill, however, had not been carried through, and William had freely disposed of the forfeitures—some 1,700,000 acres in all. Of this a quarter was restored to the Catholics in accordance with the Articles of Limerick; sixty-five other great proprietors were reinstated by royal clemency; and a part was bestowed on persons who had commanded in the war, among them Ginkel and Galway. But the greater part was lavishly granted to courtiers and favourites, chief among them Woodstock, Albemarle, and Lady Orkney. In 1699 the Commons "tacked" to a Land Tax Bill a clause nominating seven commissioners to examine into forfeitures. The majority report of these commissioners, with its exaggeration of the value of the grants and bitter attacks upon the government for favouring Catholics, was welcomed by the Commons, who finally passed a Resumption Bill, appointing trustees, in whose hands the lands were to be vested. This they again tacked to the Land Tax Bill. The Lords were inclined to resist, but the country was on the side of the Commons, and the peers were induced to yield (April 10).

Revolution, THE (1688-9), is the name usually given to the series of events by which James II was expelled, and William and Mary established on the throne. Two events precipitated James's fall—the trial of the Seven Bishops (q.v.) and the birth of the Prince of Wales. So long as the clergy could expect that in a few years James would be succeeded by the Princess Mary, they were able patiently to bear reverses. But the prince would be brought up a papist, and take the leading place, surrounded by papist counsellors. So necessary was it to the success of James's plans that Mary of Modena should have a son, that the majority of the people sincerely believed the Jesuits had schemed a great imposture. The whole nation, Whig and Tory, were anxious to be saved from the rule of a Catholic prince, however parties might differ as to the means to be employed.

Such was the state of things when, on June 30, 1688, an invitation was sent to William of Orange to come to England at once with an armed force. It was signed by seven persons of influence—the Earl of Devonshire, one of the chiefs of the Whig party; the Earl of Shrewsbury; the Earl of Danby; Compton, Bishop of London; Henry Sidney, brother of Algernon Sidney; Lord Lumley, and Edward Russell. The Prince of Orange at once determined upon action. The birth of the young prince destroyed the hopes which he had built upon the probability of his wife's accession to the English throne. If he could succeed in dethroning James, he might expect to gain far more power than that of a king-consort; if he could bring the power of England into the confederation against Louis XIV his pre-eminence among the allies would be assured. But there were almost insuperable difficulties in the way. The magistrates of Amsterdam had long been opposed to the Orange princes and attached to France; the opposition of one town would be sufficient to prevent the States-General from consenting to the expedition to England, and if it did not altogether stop it, might cause a dangerous delay. If Louis determined to begin the impending war by an attack upon Holland, William's troops must be retained at home to defend their country. And, finally, if only James could induce his English troops to fight one battle against the Dutch invaders, whatever its issue might be, national feeling would be enlisted upon his side, and he might be able to retain his throne. But the revocation of the Edict of Nantes and the recent alterations in the French tariff had destroyed the French party in Amsterdam, and all the states and towns of the republic were enthusiastic in support of Orange. The preparations which were being made in Holland did not escape the observation of the French ambassador, and his master did what he could to save James. A French envoy was sent to London to offer naval assistance. But James petulantly declared he would not be patronized; the French envoy could gain no answer to his message; and the European powers were informed that the close alliance of England and France was a mere invention on the part of Louis. In anger Louis left James to his fate; he determined to open the war by an invasion of Germany, and William could venture for a while to leave Holland unprotected. In his negotiations with Catholic powers William was able to represent his undertaking as one which had little to do with religion, and his expedition certainly had the good wishes of the sovereign pontiff. And the folly of James in bringing Irish troops into England, and William's wise policy of putting forward his English supporters on every occasion when a conflict seemed likely to occur, threw national sympathy on the side of the Prince of Orange, and removed his most formidable difficulty.

Before the expedition started, a declaration was drawn up and published. It set forth that the fundamental laws of England had been violated, illegal measures had been taken to favour Catholics, prelates venturing to petition their sovereign had been imprisoned, judges had been dismissed, and preparations were being made to bring together a packed parliament. Moreover, just doubts were entertained as to the birth of the Prince of Wales. For these reasons, it was declared, William was about to enter England with an army in order to assemble a free parliament, to whose decision all the questions in dispute should be referred.

James was terrified when at last he heard of the impending storm. A formidable fleet was put under the command of Lord Dartmouth, and troops were brought from Scotland and Ireland. All the dismissed magistrates and deputy-lieutenants were replaced, and a proclamation was issued announcing the king's intention to abandon the attempt to repeal the Test Act, and his desire to carry out the Act of Uniformity. Witnesses were brought before the privy council to prove the birth of the young prince; and at the request of the bishops the Court of High Commission was abolished and the borough charters restored. But these concessions were too evidently dictated by fear to be of use, and James still obstinately refused to give up the Dispensing Power.

On October 19 William set sail from Helvoetsluys with a force of some 14,000 men, the fleet being wisely placed under the command of the Englishman Herbert. He was driven back by a gale, but set out again on November 1. A favouring breeze carried the fleet into the Channel, while it held Dartmouth in the Thames; on the 5th William landed unmolested at Torbay. Thence he proceeded to Exeter, where he began to be joined by the neighbouring gentry. Soon the defections from James became numerous; very significant was the desertion of Clarendon's son, Viscount Corn-bury, doubtless prompted by Churchill. James at once set out for Salisbury, but here Churchill and Grafton left him, and no longer daring to trust his army, the king returned to London. On his way he was abandoned by Prince George and Ormonde, and when he reached the capital he found that the Princess Anne had taken flight. In desperation the king yielded to the advice of the council, and issued writs for a parliament. Halifax, Nottingham, and Godolphin were appointed commissioners to treat with William, but this negotiation, as James told Barillon, was only a feint to gain time. Meanwhile the prince had advanced to Hungerford, and there, on December 8, the commissioners met him. William's terms were scrupulously moderate; all questions should be referred to a parliament, and in order that its deliberations might be free, neither army should come within 40 miles of the capital, though James and William were each to be allowed to visit Westminster with a bodyguard. These terms were arranged on December 9; on the 10th Mary of Modena and the young prince were sent out of the country under the care of the Count of Lauzun, and next day James himself took flight. Such peers as were in London met in the Guildhall under the presidency of Sancroft, and drew up a declaration that now that the king had left the country they had determined to join with the Prince of Orange, and until his arrival would act as a provisional government. But greatly to the vexation of William, James was stopped in his flight, and returned to London. It now became William's object to terrify him into again leaving the country. Remaining himself at Windsor, William sent Dutch troops to occupy Whitehall, and peremptorily insisted that James should remove to Ham. Again meditating flight, James proposed Rochester instead, and to this Orange readily consented. Next day, December 19, William entered London, and on the 22nd James fled from Rochester, and this time succeeded in reaching France.

William had already called together the Lords and the members of Charles II's parliaments, together with the City magistrates. These advised the prince to assume the administration provisionally, and summon a parliamentary convention. The Convention Parliament (q.v.) met on January 22, 1689. One party, especially among the clergy, were in favour of negotiating with James and restoring him upon conditions, but they could scarcely venture to propose this when James was himself issuing manifestos declaring all their grievances imaginary. Another party, headed by Sancroft, proposed that the royal title should be left to James, but that the government should be put into the hands of William with the title of regent. A third but smaller section, the chiefs of which were Danby and Compton, urged that by the flight of James the throne had been vacated, that judgment must go by default against the claims of the young prince, and that Mary was already de jure queen. But Mary refused to exclude her husband from the throne, and William himself declared that he would not remain merely as his wife's usher. The Whigs, meanwhile, were unanimous in proposing to confer the crown on William and Mary together, and to put the executive into the hands of the prince, and after long discussions this was agreed to by both Houses. The principal resolution of the Commons accepted by the Lords ran thus: "King James the Second, having endeavoured to subvert the constitution of the kingdom by breaking the original contract between king and people, and by the advice of Jesuits and other wicked persons having violated the fundamental laws, and having withdrawn himself out of the kingdom, has abdicated the government, and the throne has thereby become vacant." Of this resolution, as Macaulay justly says, the one beauty is its inconsistency; "There was a phrase for every subdivision of the majority. The mention of the original contract gratified the disciples of Sidney. The word abdication conciliated politicians of a more timid school. There were, doubtless, many fervent Protestants who were pleased with the censure cast on the Jesuits. To the real statesman the single important clause was that which declared the throne vacant; and, if that clause could be carried, he cared little by what preamble it might be introduced." On February 13 the crown was offered to William and Mary, accompanied by the Declaration of Rights. This they accepted, and the same day were proclaimed king and queen.

The same general plan had been followed in Scotland. There the withdrawal of troops had left the ground clear for the Whig lords. While the Covenanters rose in the west, and carried out a violent ecclesiastical change, the leading peers went to London, and advised William to call a Convention of Estates. This was done, and upon its advice the Estates were summoned for March 14. After an easily balked attempt of the Jacobite minority to hold a rival convention, a declaration was drawn up almost in the same terms as in England, with the addition that prelacy was an insupportable grievance. In Ireland, Londonderry and Enniskillen declared for William, but the rest of the country under Tyrconnel's administration remained firm in its allegiance to James, and not till the Irish had been crushed in war was the Revolution settlement accepted by them.

Reynolds, WALTER, Archbishop of Canterbury 1313-27, was a man of humble origin. He was a clerk in the household of Edward I, who is said subsequently to have made him preceptor to Prince Edward, of whose wardrobe

Salisbury Cathedral and became the spiritual he later became keeper. He obtained a considerable influence over the prince, and on Edward II's accession Reynolds was made treasurer, and Bishop of Worcester. In 1310 he was made chancellor. On the death of Winchelsey the king obtained from the pope his nomination to the archbishopric, although the chapter had elected Thomas de Cobham. After some months Reynolds resigned the great seal. Later on he sided with the queen against his benefactor. He crowned Prince Edward, and preached the coronation sermon. It has been said that few archbishops of Canterbury have been less fit for their work, yet Reynolds made some effort to remedy ecclesiastical abuses, and zealously upheld the rights of his see.

Rhé, EXPEDITION TO, 1627. In 1627 a rupture took place between England and France, and Charles I resolved to defend the independence of the French Protestants, and maintain his own claim to the mastery of the sea. For both these objects the possession of the island of Rhé, lying in face of Rochelle, and commanding the commerce between France and Spain, would be valuable. The English fleet, commanded by the Duke of Buckingham, sailed on June 27, and a landing was made on the island on July 12. St. Martin's, the capital, was besieged from July 17 to October 29. The destruction by a storm of the expedition destined to reinforce the besiegers, and the failure of an assault attempted on October 27, combined with the landing of a French force in the island, compelled the duke to raise the siege. These French troops, to the number of 6,000, commanded by Marshal Schomberg, had gradually been collected at the fort of La Préé, which Buckingham had neglected to take immediately after his landing. They now assailed the English during their retreat, and inflicted a very heavy loss on them.

Rhodes, CECIL JOHN (1853-1902), having completed his education at Oxford, went to South Africa, and by his astute direction of diamond mines at Kimberley acquired a large fortune. Turning to politics, he soon became a member of the Cape government—that of Sir T. Scanlon. When the Sprigg ministry fell in 1890 he became premier, and held the office until early in 1896, when, as a result of Dr. Jameson's abortive raid into the Transvaal, he resigned. For his share in promoting the raid he was severely censured by the House of Commons Inquiry Committee in July 1897. As director of the British South Africa Company, he, in 1893, conducted the campaign against the Matabele. He died in 1902. He was a business man of genius, a politician of a robust understanding, and an imperial statesman of an unscrupulous comprehension. His great idea was to encourage the spread of the Anglo-Saxon race, especially in South Africa. He advocated a complete occupation of Africa south of the Zambezi, the exploitation of its resources, and a native policy of segregation with a civilization voting test. From his youth he had devised wills bequeathing his all to the British Empire, and at his death his famous house was to go to the premier of a united South Africa and funds were provided for Rhodes scholars to proceed to the University of Oxford. The Union of South Africa and the commercial prosperity of Southern Rhodesia are his real contributions to the development of the empire.

Rhuddlan Castle. A fortress was first built at Rhuddlan, a position of considerable military importance commanding the vale of Clwyd, by Llewelyn ap Sitsyll early in the eleventh century. Upon the rebellion of Prince Gruffyd, in 1063, Harold marched upon him at Rhuddlan; Gruffyd escaped to the sea about two miles distant, but Harold burnt the castle. It was rebuilt, and afterwards conquered by a nephew of Hugh Lupus. Edward I caused a stately castle to be erected near the site of the former one; here Queen Eleanor gave birth to a daughter; and here a baronial assembly was held, by the advice of which, in 1284, the "Statute of Wales" was drawn up, assimilating the administration of the country to that of England. The castle was captured by the Parliamentary general Mytton in 1646, and dismantled.

Ribbon Society, THE, was a secret Irish confederacy, consisting of small farmers, cottiers, labourers, and in the towns small shopkeepers and artisans, which appeared about 1820 (the name "Ribbon" not being attached to it till about 1826) and gained great strength from 1835 to 1855. "In Ulster it professed to be a defensive or retaliatory league against Orangeism. In Munster it was at first a combination against tithe proctors. In Connaught it was an organization against rack-renting and evictions. In Leinster it often was mere trade-unionism, dictating by its mandates, and enforcing by its vengeance the employment or dismissal of workmen, stewards, and even domestics." To belong to a Ribbon Society was declared illegal by the Westmeath Act of 1871.

Rich, EDMUND, ST., Archbishop of Canterbury 1231-40, was born at Abingdon, studied at Oxford and Paris, and later became one of the most popular teachers of theology and philosophy in the former university. Between 1219 and 1222 he was appointed treasurer of adviser of the Countess of Salisbury, widow of King John's half-brother. Upon the death of Archbishop Richard le Grand some dispute arose as to the election of a successor, and Pope Gregory IX induced the monks who had gone to Rome to elect Rich upon their return, a measure to which the king's consent was readily obtained. But Edmund was not disposed to act as a tool of king or pope, though the latter had written urging him to persuade the English to overcome their prejudices against the aliens. Immediately after his consecration he visited the king, insisted on the reform of abuses and the dismissal of foreign ministers, especially Peter des Roches, and threatened him with excommunication if he refused. Henry yielded, and Peter and his creatures were dismissed. Edmund was a bishop of the type of Anselm, with somewhat of the spirit and practical instincts of Langton; but he lived in an unhappy period for the display of either class of qualities under a pope whom he knew only as a taskmaster, and under a king whose incapacity and want of firmness made it as hard to support as to resist him. To diminish his influence Henry III applied to the pope to send a legate to England, and Edmund had to struggle during the rest of his life against Otho's efforts to obtain benefices for foreigners in England. The archbishop also came into conflict with Henry in the matter of the marriage of Simon de Montfort to the king's sister Eleanor, widow of the earl marshal, whom he refused to free from her vow of perpetual widowhood. In 1238 Edmund visited Rome to obtain papal support in his attempt to enforce discipline in the monasteries of Canterbury and Rochester. But the pope, in revenge for his action in the matter of the alien clergy, treated him with studied insult, and decided all the appeals against him. At last in despair Edmund retired to the abbey of Pontigny in France, and died at the neighbouring priory of Soissy in 1240. The popular belief in his sanctity and the miracles reported from his tomb forced Innocent IV, much against his will, to consent to his canonization in 1248.

Rich, HENRY, 1ST EARL OF HOLLAND (1590-1649), was a younger son of Robert, 1st Earl of Warwick. He served in the Dutch wars, and on his return to England attracted the favourable notice of James I, who heaped honours upon him. In 1639 he was made lord general of the horse in the Scottish War, but seceded two years later to the Parliament. He rejoined the king in 1643, and fought with considerable bravery in the first battle of Newbury; but, finding himself coldly received by Charles, he quickly deserted to the enemy. He took part in the abortive Royalist rising of 1648, was captured by the Parliamentary troops, tried before the High Court of Justice in 1649, and executed.

Rich, RICHARD, 1ST BARON RICH (1496?-1567), who "brought a greater strain upon the bar of England than any member of the profession," was in 1533 made solicitor-general. He took a prominent part in the trial of Sir Thomas More, giving as evidence an untrue version of a private conversation held with More in the Tower on June 12, 1535, and so securing his conviction. He was rewarded in 1536 by being recommended to the office of Speaker, and during the rest of the reign of Henry VIII was a ready agent of the court in the prosecution alike of Protestants and Roman Catholics. Under the will of Henry VIII Rich was appointed a councillor to assist in the government during the minority of Edward VI, and in October 1548 succeeded Paulet as lord chancellor of England. In 1549 he drew up the articles charging Lord Seymour of Sudeley with treason, and subsequently joined the Earl of Warwick, taking an active part in the proceedings against his former patron Somerset. In 1551 he resigned the chancellorship, and remained prominent only as a persecutor.

J. Sargeant, "History of Felsted School," 1889.

Richard I, KING (b. September 8, 1157, s. July 1189, d. April 6, 1199), was the second son of Henry II and Eleanor of Aquitaine. He was destined by his father to rule his mother's possessions in the south of France, and when still quite young was entrusted with the government of Aquitaine, where he speedily joined in the great conspiracy of 1173 against his father. Pardoned at the suppression of the revolt, he passed several years in a series of chivalrous and brilliant exploits among the wild feudal nobles of Guienne and Poitou. His success made his elder brother so envious that he insisted on Richard doing homage to him, and on his refusal a war broke out between the brothers (1183). In alliance with Bertrand de Born, Richard's great enemy, Henry and Geoffrey reduced Richard to such straits that Henry II had to go to his assistance. The death of the younger Henry concluded the war, but in 1184 another quarrel between Richard and his father ensued on the former's refusal to gratify the latter by surrendering a portion of Aquitaine to his brother, John. Richard's restless temper was constantly involving him in wars with his neighbours, from which nothing but his father's influence could extricate him. Yet in 1189 he inspired that last successful revolt in the midst of which the old king died.

Despite his constant revolts Richard secured the succession without difficulty. He hurried to England, not with the view of taking possession of the government so much as to secure means to embark on the projected crusade, into which he threw all his energy. He held a great council at Pipewell, in which he displaced Henry's old ministers, sold a large number of places, and made arrangements for the government during his absence. About three months after his coronation he left England.

The history of Richard's reign naturally divides itself into two main subjects—the personal adventures of the king in Palestine, Germany, and finally in France, and the government of the country during his absence. The brilliant and chivalrous spirit of the king, and that martial prowess which gave him the name of Cœur de Lion, were nowhere better displayed than in his adventures in the east. After some delays in France, Richard and Philip Augustus landed in Sicily in September 1190. After rescuing his sister from the hands of the usurper, Tancred, and incurring the French king's hostility by repudiating the latter's sister, Alice (to whom he had been long contracted in marriage), in favour of Berengaria of Navarre, Richard set out for Palestine, conquering Cyprus on his way, and bestowing it on the Templars, by whom it was later sold to Guy of Lusignan. He arrived in Palestine in time to save Acre, but the return home of Philip Augustus, and the quarrel of Richard with the Duke of Austria, made the barren victories against the Saracens of little avail in effecting the deliverance of the Holy City. At last in 1192 Richard was glad to conclude a three years' truce with Saladin, which saved the remnants of the Frankish kingdom, and gave pilgrims free access to Jerusalem. On his way home he was imprisoned by his old enemy the Duke of Austria, and handed over to the Emperor Henry VI, who, as the representative of the Hohenstaufen, was glad to get hold of the uncle and protector of Otto the Guelf. Henry compelled his prisoner to acknowledge himself his vassal for the kingdom of England, bestowing on him in return the titular kingship of Arles.

Meanwhile the soundness of the administrative system which Henry II had established was being thoroughly tested in England. Despite the incompleteness of Richard's arrangements, despite the intrigues of Earl John, England remained in a prosperous condition during the whole of the period. Four successive justiciars ruled the land as practically independent sovereigns, burdened only by the heavy tribute which the absent king exacted. The first, William Longchamp, Bishop of Ely, was unpopular as a foreigner, and Earl John profited by this to excite the baronage against him. In 1191 the Archbishop of Rouen, Walter of Coutances, arrived with a commission from Richard to supersede him. His government, which lasted till 1193, was disturbed by the unsuccessful rebellion of John, in connexion with an attack of Philip on Normandy, and by the exertions necessary to raise the enormous ransom of £100,000, which the emperor required for the release of Richard. At the end of 1193 he was succeeded by Hubert Walter, Archbishop of Canterbury, whose administration continued until 1198. The latter at once contrived to suppress John's revolt. When Richard paid his second and last visit to his kingdom in the spring of 1194 the land was in profound peace. At a great council at Nottingham the accomplices of John were punished, the sheriffs removed, and money raised by all possible means. A second coronation at Winchester was a solemn declaration that, whatever humiliation Richard had been subjected to in his captivity, his royal dignity remained unimpaired. As soon as he had got all he could Richard hurried to France, where he spent the rest of his life in a constant petty warfare against Philip of France, until he met his death in 1199 while besieging the obscure castle of Chaluz. Meanwhile Hubert Walter (q.v.) administered England with success. The judicial iter of 1194, and the first germs of the offices of coroner and conservator of the peace, showed that he not only maintained, but also developed, the system of Henry II. In 1198 the refusal of a royal demand for money by the great council led to his resignation. His successor, Geoffrey FitzPeter, had not long entered upon his office when the king died.

Richard I is the most un-English of our kings. He knew and influenced England, where he hardly ever lived either before or after his accession, less than any other prince. Yet, besides his fame as a knight-errant, he had no inconsiderable talent for rough-and-ready statesmanship. But he was a bad king, careless, extravagant, and neglectful of all his duties. The main interest of his reign in English history is its story of quiet administrative routine and constitutional development.

Richard II, KING (b. January 1367, r. June 22, 1377—September 1399, d. February 14, 1400 (?), was the son of Edward the Black Prince and Joan of Kent. Soon after his father's death he was created Prince of Wales, and recognized as heir to the throne. During the early years of his reign he was in tutelage, but the boldness and presence of mind which he showed during the Peasants' Revolt (1381—q.v.), seemed to augur a successful and prosperous career. He appears to have been suspicious of the designs of his uncle, Gloucester, and to have determined to surround himself with ministers of his own choosing, and it must be admitted that they were selected with judgment, and (with perhaps the exception of de Vere) they hardly deserve to be stigmatized as favourites. But they were not successful administrators, and the heavy taxes which were imposed afforded an opportunity to Gloucester and his associates to denounce them. In 1386 Richard's minister, Michael de la Pole, Earl of Suffolk, was attacked in parliament, deprived of the chancellorship and imprisoned ; and the king was compelled to agree to the appointment of a commission of regency, consisting of the Dukes of Gloucester and York and eight other lords and prelates. In the following August (1387) Richard procured from the judges a declaration that the commission was illegal. But Gloucester entered London with a large force ; and the king, unable to resist, was obliged to give way and to allow his chief advisers to be appealed of treason (December 1387). The parliament of 1388, the "Merciless Parliament" (q.v.), condemned Vere, Suffolk, and six others to death; and though the two chief personages escaped, the sentence was carried out in four cases. The power of Gloucester lasted till 1389, when Richard suddenly declared that he was old enough to manage his own affairs, and dismissed the council of regency. But he did not resort to his former methods of government; on the contrary, he was reconciled to Gloucester and his associates, and was content to admit them to a share in the government. For some years nothing happened to disturb the harmony between the king and the nobles, and the first symptoms of a revival of troubles was in 1395, when Richard proposed to marry Isabella of France and form a firm alliance with that country. This was strongly opposed by Gloucester, who renewed his former factious behaviour and was suspected by the king of treasonable designs. Finally, in 1397, he was arrested and sent to Calais to await his trial, but died before it came on, murdered, there can be little doubt, by the king's orders. It has been suggested that Richard was panic-stricken by current rumours of a plot against his life, and determined to resort to the most arbitrary measures to secure his position. The evidence points, however, to a more deliberate and premeditated cause of action. At any rate a complete change came over his conduct. The pardons granted to the barons in 1388 were annulled; two of the most prominent were appealed of treason. Arundel was executed, and his brother, the archbishop, banished. The proceedings of the "Merciless Parliament" were rescinded, and the unassailability of the royal prerogative was reasserted. Thus Richard seemed to have established his absolute power; but still there were rumours of conspiracies. The Duke of Hereford (Henry of Bolingbroke, son of John of Gaunt), and Thomas Mowbray, Duke of Norfolk, accused each other of treason and were sentenced to banishment, the latter for life, the former for six years. Richard now resorted to various arbitrary methods of raising money, and he had already alienated the people from him, as well as the leading nobles, when, in 1399, he committed two acts of reckless folly which were the immediate cause of his downfall. He had promised Hereford that if during his exile his father should die, the Lancastrian estates should be secured to him. Nevertheless, on Gaunt's death, he seized the whole of his domains into his own hands. This gave an excuse to Hereford (or Lancaster, as he had now become) to return to England to claim his patrimony; and the circumstances were most auspicious for him, for Richard had gone upon an expedition to Ireland, leaving the Duke of York as regent in England. Henry of Lancaster landed in England, declared that he came simply to obtain his lawful inheritance, was joined by many of the great nobles, and not opposed by the Duke of York; so that when Richard returned from Ireland he found the kingdom was lost. Discovering his true position, Richard offered to resign the crown. The abdication was accepted by parliament, which drew up articles of accusation against him, enumerating all the illegal and despotic acts of which he had been guilty. Henry challenged the vacant throne and was accepted as king. After this, Richard disappears from history, and nothing is known for certain of the time, manner, or place of his death. According to one account, he was murdered at Pontefract by Sir Piers Exton, while the official story was that he starved himself to death. It seems most probable that he died of malnutrition and systematic privation.

The revolution of 1399 was not a popular movement, but was brought about by a series of circumstances to a considerable extent unconnected with each other, but which all combined to produce one result—a change of dynasty. The Church was opposed to Richard on account of his supposed Lollard tendencies and his treatment of Archbishop Arundel; the nobles hated him because he had refused to govern according to their views, and had endeavoured to curb their independence. The people supported Henry as being the representative of Thomas of Lancaster, and having been unjustly defrauded by Richard; while many asserted that Richard was not the son of the Black Prince, but a supposititious child, and others maintained that Henry was the true heir to the throne as the representative of Edmund Crouchback, who it was said was in reality the elder brother of Edward I. The extravagance and foreign manners of the court were extremely distasteful, and the war party strongly resented the French marriage. Among the charges alleged against Richard by parliament the most important are these:—The tampering with the judges in 1387; the revocation of the pardons of the Appellants; the murder of Gloucester; the ill-treatment of Lancaster and Arundel; arbitrary taxation; alienation of Crown lands; excessive power of the household courts; and rash words asserting his own absolute authority. The truth probably is that Richard attempted to do what Edward IV and Henry VII were able to effect later on—to crush the power of the nobles, rule by means of ministers, avoid expensive foreign wars, and keep the Church in submission. Like them, he worked by means of parliament, and thus obtained a legal sanction to his most unconstitutional acts. The chief reasons why they succeeded where he failed were, that by the time of Edward IV the strength of the baronage had been utterly broken by the Wars of the Roses, the Church had lost its power, and the nation was anxious for peace under a strong government.

In Richard's own character there was much that is attractive. He is to be compared rather to Edward III, the chivalrous, magnanimous king who left him heir to difficulties which he could not overcome, than to the feeble and worthless Edward II. If his theory of kingship was too lofty for the age, it was at least an intelligible one, and he seems to have kept before him with steadiness of purpose the idea of a despotic but reforming monarchy. Though his fate was immediately caused by his own deeds, the misfortunes of his career were in great part due to the events and policy of his grandfather's reign. "In personal appearance," it has been said, "he was handsome. There was a delicate beauty in his features which corresponded with a mode of life too luxurious for the age. He was a lover both of art and literature; the patron of Froissart, Gower, and Chaucer, and the builder of Westminster Hall. But he was thought too fond of show and magnificence, and some of his contemporaries accused him of too great love of pleasure. Yet of positive immorality we have no real evidence, and his devotion and tenderness to both his queens (child as the second was) is a considerable presumption to the contrary." Richard was twice married, first in 1382 to Anne of Bohemia, daughter of the Emperor Charles IV, and secondly in 1396 to Isabella, daughter of Charles VI of France. He left no issue.

Richard III, KING (b. October 2, 1452, s. June 26, 1483, d. August 22, 1485), was the son of Richard, Duke of York, who was killed at Wakefield, and brother to Edward IV, and George, Duke of Clarence. Born at Fotheringay in 1452, he was early inducted into state affairs. In 1461 he was recalled from Flanders, where he had been sent for safety, and created Duke of Gloucester and lord high admiral. He held faithfully to his brother during his reign, and showed himself a wise counsellor to him, a good soldier, and a vigorous administrator in the capacity of warden of the Scottish Marches and other posts. In 1470, on the outbreak of Warwick's insurrection, Richard left the kingdom with Edward, and returned with him to take part in the battle of Barnet (April 1471). Immediately afterwards he engaged in the campaign of the West, and contributed to the victory of Tewkesbury. In 1472 he married Anne Neville, the widow of Prince Edward, and in consequence became involved in a violent quarrel with his brother Clarence about the inheritance of the Earl of Warwick. The rivalry between the two brothers was keen, but it is not certain how far Richard was responsible for Clarence's downfall, or for his murder, if he was murdered. During the remainder of Edward's reign Gloucester was much occupied with Scottish affairs, and the management of the Border. In April 1483 he left the North, and on the 30th of the month got possession of the young king, Edward V, as he was being taken to London. In May Richard was appointed protector, and immediately entered upon the functions of government. A violent quarrel broke out between Richard and the queen's party in the council, which was headed by Lord Hastings. In June, Richard, at a sitting of the council, charged the queen and her friends with a plot against his life. Hastings was seized and beheaded without trial. Lords Grey and Rivers, the queen's relations, were beheaded, and the young prince, Richard of York, was surrendered to the custody of the protector. On June 22 Dr. Shaw, in a sermon at Paul's Cross, asserted the claim of Richard to the crown, on the ground that Edward V and his brother were illegitimate; and on June 24 Buckingham, joined by a crowd of the citizens of London, urged Richard to accept the crown. This Richard did on June 26, and on July 6 he was crowned. Richard now adopted a policy of conciliation, but there was considerable disaffection against him, especially in southern England. The young princes disappeared soon after, and though nothing certain has ever been discovered about their fate, it was believed, and it is extremely probable, that Richard had them put to death. The recent attempt of Sir Clement Markham to clear Richard of the charge and to fasten the guilt upon Henry VII does not carry conviction. The rumours of the fate of the young princes increased the feeling against Richard, and meanwhile a rapprochement took place between the queen's party and the Lancastrians, headed by Henry of Richmond, Richard's chief supporter, Buckingham, joined the conspiracy. In October Buckingham headed a rising in the West of England which came to nothing. The duke was captured and put to death without trial. But the conspiracy was not crushed, and active preparations were made by the Lancastrians during the next year. Meanwhile Richard was becoming thoroughly unpopular in England. His finances were in disorder, and he was obliged to have recourse to the raising of money by benevolences, though he had himself passed a bill through parliament the previous year to put an end to that system. In August 1485 Richmond landed at Milford Haven. The Welsh were in his favour, for they looked upon him as a national leader; the old nobility were alienated from Richard, and the new nobles disliked him; his own chief followers, the Stanleys, were in correspondence with the enemy; and the people were indifferent or favourable to the invaders. Richard met them at Bosworth (August 22, 1485). In the crisis of the battle Lord Stanley, with his troops, suddenly joined Richmond. The king was killed fighting desperately.

Richard has been represented as a monster of iniquity by Sir Thomas More and other historians who wrote under the Tudors. Unscrupulous, cruel, and violent as Richard was, he was, however, probably no worse than contemporary princes and statesmen; no worse, certainly, than his brother or his successor. His capacity was undoubted, and he seems to have made an effort at the beginning of his reign to govern well. He attempted to restore order, to check the tyranny of the nobles, and to develop commerce. He, however, lacked the astuteness which enabled Henry VII to accomplish in a great measure the work he had attempted.

Richard, Archbishop of Canterbury 1174-84, was prior of St. Martin's, Dover, and three years after the murder of Becket was chosen by the bishops, in opposition to the chapter, to fill the vacant see. His appointment was strongly opposed by the young king, Henry, and did not receive the papal confirmation until 1174. His great work was the rebuilding of Canterbury Cathedral, which had been destroyed by fire previous to his enthronement. He was unpopular with the extreme clerical party representing the Becket tradition; but it was probably well for both Church and State that he preferred a moderate to an heroic policy and kept on good terms with the king.

Richard, DUKE OF YORK (1472-83), was the second son of Edward IV. In 1478 he was married to Anne, daughter and heiress of John Mowbray, Duke of Norfolk. Soon after Edward IV's death his mother fled into sanctuary with him, but was subsequently induced to let him join his brother in the Tower, where he was probably murdered by his uncle's orders. [RICHARD III.]

Richard, EARL OF CORNWALL (1209-72), was the second son of John by his wife Isabella of Angoulême. He quarrelled with his brother, Henry III, and for a time led the opposition against the foreign favourites with whom the court was filled. In 1240 he led a crusade to the Holy Land, and succeeded in securing very favourable terms for the Christians by a treaty with the Sultan of Krak. His marriage in 1243 with Sanchia of Provence (q.v.), sister of Henry's queen, now bound him to the interests of the court. In 1252 he was offered, but declined, the crown of Sicily; in 1257 he was elected and crowned King of the Romans, but was never crowned emperor. During the long years of dispute between Henry III and his barons Richard tried to act the part of a mediator, but when war broke out he sided with his brother and commanded the left wing at the battle of Lewes, where he was taken prisoner, and he did not recover his liberty till after the battle of Evesham. He married first Isabel, daughter of William Marshal; secondly Sanchia, daughter of René of Provence; and thirdly Beatrice of Falkenstein. It is very difficult to obtain a true view of Richard's character, as, with scarcely an exception, all the contemporary writers are on the baronial side, and strongly prejudiced against him, but he must have been, on any showing, a man of much more enterprise and energy than his brother Henry. His influence in Germany was never great, and at no time extended beyond the Rhineland.

Richborough (RUTUPÆ) was a Roman town and citadel guarding the eastern entrance to the Wantsum—an inlet of sea between Thanet and the mainland. Richborough was the chief port for commerce with Gaul, and the starting-point for the great high road to Kent through Canterbury and Rochester to Dover. The fortress was the head-quarters of the legion protecting the Saxon shore (q.v.).

Richmond, HENRY FITZROY, 1ST DUKE OF (1519-36). [FITZROY.]

Ridings is the name applied to the three divisions of Yorkshire, and with the arrangement of the country appears to be of Scandinavian origin. The four things into which Iceland was partitioned were divided into thirds, thrihúngar; and the fylker, or petty kingdoms, of South Norway were similarly divided. As such a partition of the land is in England only found in Yorkshire and Lincolnshire (for Lindsey, one of the three "parts" of Lincolnshire, was at the time of Domesday divided into ridings, though the name afterwards dropped out of use), it seems natural to attribute it to the Danish occupation. The loss of the th of thrithing may be due to misdivision of the compound words "north-thrithing," etc. At the time of the Conqueror the ridings of Yorkshire and Lincolnshire seem to have had their own moots, though these do not appear later; at present each riding in Yorkshire has its own lord-lieutenant, and is treated as a distinct county for poor-law purposes. By the reform Bill of 1832 two members each were given to the east and north ridings and four to the west; this arrangement was modified in 1867, while under the act of 1885 the west riding returns nineteen members, the north four, the east three.

Ridley, NICHOLAS, Bishop of London (1500?-1555), was educated at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, where he gained a fellowship. After studying theology for a couple of years at Paris and Louvain, he returned to Cambridge, and became proctor and public orator. His learning and energy commended him to the notice of Cranmer, whose chaplain he became in 1537, and who speedily obtained for him the mastership of Pembroke (1540) and a royal chaplaincy (1541). In 1547 he became Bishop of Rochester, and took a considerable part in the preparation of Edward VI's first Prayer

Book, and in carrying out the changes which accompanied it. Upon Bonner's deposition by the privy council, Ridley was translated to London (April 1550). In the same year he vainly attempted to convince Joan Bocher of her errors, and assisted in the trial of Gardiner. As in Rochester Cathedral so in St. Paul's, he caused the altars to be destroyed; in St. Paul's he substituted a table for the high altar, and in 1557 placed it in the nave before the screen, setting it with its sides north and south. Like Cranmer and Latimer, he was disgusted by the violence of the council, and in a sermon before the king in 1552 spoke strongly of the distress caused by the seizure of the gild revenues. His fear lest Mary might restore the old worship led him to join in the attempt to secure the throne for Jane Grey, and on July 9, 1553, he preached at Paul's Cross that Mary and Elizabeth were bastards, and therefore without right to the throne. As soon, however, as Northumberland and the council had declared for Mary, he set out to meet the princess to obtain pardon, but he was taken prisoner at Framlingham, and sent to the Tower. Here he remained some eight months. Bonner meanwhile regained his bishopric. In April 1554 he was sent to Oxford, with Cranmer and Latimer, and committed to the charge of one of the aldermen. After being made to appear in a disputation, wherein he denied transubstantiation, and after being in consequence excommunicated, he was remitted to custody, and nothing more was done till September 1555, when he was tried for heresy before three bishops, commissioned by Pole as legate. On October 16 he was executed, together with Latimer, in front of Balliol College. One of the most careful modern investigators of the period writes:—"Ridley has left few remains to vindicate the reputation for theological learning which has been demanded for him by modern biographers, but he was a learned man; in his way he was a moderate man, and certainly he was a man of great resolution. His decision of character supported the primate; the gravity of his manners commended him to all who knew him, and he rose into notice at a very opportune time for the credit of the Reformation. But his temper had a vehemence which sometimes betrayed him into rashness, and in his nature there was something of severity, and even of hardness" (Dixon).

Ridolfi Conspiracy, THE (1571), so-called from one of the chief agents, Robert Ridolfi, a Florentine banker residing in London, was a plot formed by the Catholic party in England for the deposition of Elizabeth, the elevation of Mary Stuart to the throne by the help of Spain, and her marriage to the Duke of Norfolk. The chief conspirator was Leslie, Bishop of Ross, who was in communication with most of the Catholic nobles, whilst the Duke of Norfolk was involved in the scheme apparently against his will. During 1571 frequent negotiations were carried on between Mary Stuart, Philip II, the Duke of Alva, and the pope. Ridolfi was sent to Madrid to request the aid of Philip, which was at once promised. On his way he had an interview with the Duke of Alva in Brussels, but the messenger conveying the news was arrested at Dover in possession of a packet of treasonable letters. For these letters, however, the Bishop of Ross contrived, by the connivance of Lord Cobham, the warden of the Cinque Ports, to substitute others of a comparatively innocent nature, and although the messenger confessed on the rack that he had received the letters from Ridolfi, and although the Bishop of Ross was arrested, and Mary severely cross-examined, nothing definite was discovered. Suspicion had, however, been aroused, and in September 1571 the whole of the plot was discovered through the instrumentality of a Shrewsbury merchant, who had been employed by Higford, Norfolk's secretary, to convey money and letters. Several of the leading conspirators, including the Bishop of Ross, the Earls of Arundel and Southampton, and Lord Lumley, were at once arrested. The bishop made a full confession, and Norfolk, as the centre of the plot, was executed (June 1572).

Rigby, RICHARD (1722-88), was the son of a Bedford linen-draper, who had made a fortune as factor to the South Sea Company. He attached himself in early life to the Prince of Wales, but quarrelled with him before long. The Duke of Bedford became his patron, and on becoming lord-lieutenant in 1758 took him to Ireland as his private secretary. Next year Rigby became master of the rolls of that country. On returning from Ireland the duke procured the return of Rigby as member for Tavistock; and when the duke became president of the council in 1768 he procured for his faithful henchman the most lucrative of all offices—the paymastership of the forces. In 1765 he had acquired the sinecure office of vice-treasurer of Ireland. When county meetings were being held on all sides in 1769, to protest against the rejection of Wilkes by parliament, "Rigby made a summer tour through the east of England, and, by the admission of his opponents, checkmated the party of action in at least three counties." After his patron's death he succeeded in maintaining his position as "boat-swain of the Bloomsbury crew," according to one of the lampoons of the day; and still lived on his sinecure offices. He was, however, disturbed for a moment by being accused in 1778 of appropriating public money as paymaster-general, though as Lord North's administration had strong reason for not inquiring too deeply into cases of peculation, the matter was allowed to drop. Again, in 1782, when he opposed with imprudent warmth a motion for reconciliation with America, Pitt rebuked him sharply, and told him that the nation was tired of paying him. He lived till 1788, drawing money from the revenues of Ireland and England alike, and building up for himself a lasting reputation as the most notable placeman of the age.

Sir G. O. Trevelyan, "Early History of C. J. Fox," 1880.

Right, THE CLAIM OF, passed by the Scottish Estates in April 1689, declared that James VII had forfeited the crown for various offences committed against the constitution of the kingdom and the privileges of the subjects, and that no papist could ever in the future rule over Scotland; it further declared the necessity of frequent parliaments, and condemned prelacy as "a great and insupportable grievance." It was, in fact, a statement of the terms on which the Scottish crown was offered to William of Orange. [CONVENTION OF ESTATES.]

P. Hume Brown, "History of Scotland," 1911.

Right, THE PETITION OF, was the manifesto drawn up by the House of Commons in 1628, in the form of a petition to the king, stating the principles of the constitution which Charles had broken. The events leading up to the Petition of Right may be briefly summarized. Charles I had dissolved his first two parliaments before they had granted any supplies, and, as he was determined to retain his minister, Buckingham, and to carry out his policy of war with France and Spain, he was obliged to have recourse to a loan. Those persons who refused to subscribe were imprisoned, but five of them, of whom one was Sir Thomas Darnel, demanded their habeas corpus. The Crown lawyers fell back upon the king's prerogative power to imprison without showing cause whenever he deemed it necessary, and this doctrine was accepted by the judges. When, therefore, a new parliament met in 1628 it at once began to discuss the recent forced loan and the arbitrary imprisonments. Wentworth, at this time leader of the Commons, proposed that a short bill should be drawn up merely reciting and confirming Magna Carta, De Tallagio, etc., with the addition of a clause confirming Habeas Corpus; but the king objected so strongly even to this moderate proposal that it was resolved, upon the motion of Coke, that a Petition of Right should be drawn up. Not only would such a petition receive an immediate answer, instead of being sent up at the end of the session and almost certainly rejected by the king when he had gained supplies, but it would contain a definite statement that the king had broken the law. As finally drawn up, the petition demanded "that no man hereafter be compelled to make or yield any gift, loan, benevolence, tax, or such like charge, without common consent by act of parliament"; that no one should be imprisoned without cause shown, and that if imprisoned they should be entitled to their habeas corpus; that soldiers and sailors should not be billeted upon private persons without their consent; and that martial law should be abolished. Of these clauses the first two were

by far the most important, and it is clear that, however Charles may have abused his power, his predecessors had without remonstrance exercised the right of imprisonment without showing cause. The Lords accepted the measure, after in vain searching for a formula which should allow the king to imprison in cases of real emergency. Meanwhile Denbigh had been unsuccessful at Rochelle, and the king needed supplies. He demanded from the judges "whether, if the king grant the Commons' petition, he did not thereby exclude himself from committing a subject for any time or cause whatsoever without showing a cause." They answered that every act had its exposition, which can only be by the courts of law as each case occurs, "and, although the petition be granted, there is no fear of conclusion as is intimated in the question." Thereupon the king went to the House, and instead of the usual form of assent, read a meaningless declaration that the statutes should be duly executed. The Commons were bitterly annoyed, and proceeded to attack Buckingham. Charles at last yielded, and gave his assent in the accustomed formula (June 7, 1628). In the next session the Commons renewed the struggle on the ground of tannage and poundage (q.v.), which had been levied, although no act had as yet granted it to Charles. Its levy was, they declared, in violation of the Petition of Right. But the words of the petition, interpreted by the usage of the day, certainly did not carry that meaning. The question became involved with that of religion, and the struggle on these two points led to the dissolution of 1629.

S. R. Gardiner, "History of England"; F. H. Relf, "Petition of Right," 1917. [W. J. A.]

Rights, THE BILL OF. A committee appointed by the Commons in the Convention of 1689, to consider what measures should be taken to protect liberty against future sovereigns, recommended that the main constitutional principles violated by James II should be solemnly declared to be the ancient rights of the nation, and also that several new laws should be enacted. It was easy to carry out the former proposal; the latter would be a work of considerable difficulty, and might occupy years. After much discussion, therefore, it was resolved to fill the throne at once, but to insert in the instrument which conferred the crown on William and Mary a declaration of the fundamental principles of the constitution; all questions of further reform were postponed till a more suitable opportunity. Accordingly a committee, presided over by Somers (q.v.), was appointed to draw up a Declaration of Rights, which, when framed, was accepted by the Lords with some unimportant amendments. On February 13, 1689, this declaration was read before William and Mary, and the crown tendered to them; William, in accepting it, assured the two Houses that his conduct should be governed by those laws which he had himself vindicated. In the December of the same year, the Convention having meanwhile been declared by statute to be a parliament, the Declaration of Rights was confirmed in the form of a bill, with certain additions. The Bill of Rights, as finally adopted, was arranged as follows :—

Its first section recited the Declaration of Rights. It began by stating the various acts by which James did "endeavour to subvert and extirpate the Protestant religion, and the laws and liberties of this kingdom," and then, almost in the same words, proceeded to declare : That the pretended power of suspending of laws and the execution of laws, by regal authority without consent of parliament, is illegal ; That the pretended power of dispensing with laws by regal authority, as it hath been assumed and exercised of late, is illegal ; That the commission for creating the late court of commissioners for ecclesiastical causes, and all other commissions and courts of the like nature, are illegal and pernicious ; That levying of money for or to the use of the Crown, by pretence of prerogative without grant of parliament, for longer time or in any other manner than the same is or shall be granted, is illegal ; That it is the right of the subjects to petition the king, and that all commitments or prosecutions for such petitions are illegal ; That the raising or keeping a standing army within the kingdom in time of peace, unless it be with consent of parliament, is against law ; That the subjects which are Protestants may have arms for their defence suitable to their condition, and as allowed by law ; That election of members of parliament ought to be free ; That the freedom of speech and debates, or proceedings in parliament, ought not to be impeached or questioned in any court or place out of parliament ; That excessive bail ought not to be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted ; That juries ought to be duly empanelled and returned, and that jurors which pass upon men in trials for high treason ought to be freeholders ; That all grants and promises of fines and forfeitures of particular persons, before conviction, are illegal and void ; And that for redress of all grievances, and for the amending, strengthening, and preserving of the laws, parliament ought to be held frequently.

The second section declared the resolution of Lords and Commons that William and Mary should become king and queen, to be succeeded by their lawful issue if there were any such ; in default of that by the issue of the Princess Anne, etc. The third contained the new oaths of allegiance and supremacy. The fourth recorded the acceptance of the crown by the prince and princess ; who (v) were pleased that the Lords and Commons should continue to sit and make provision for the settlement of the religion, laws, and liberties of the country. Parliament, therefore, now again (vi) declared the above to be the indubitable rights of the English people ; recognized (vii) that James having abdicated, William and Mary had become their sovereign lord and lady, and fixed (viii) the succession as above. The ninth section contains an important addition : as it has been found by experience inconsistent with the safety and welfare of this Protestant kingdom to be governed by a popish prince, or by any king or queen marrying a papist, it is enacted that all persons who shall hold communion with the Church of Rome, or shall marry a papist, shall be excluded from the throne, and the crown shall descend to the next heir. Every king or queen therefore (x), on the first day of their first parliament, shall subscribe and audibly repeat the declaration mentioned in the statute 30 Charles II, i.e., the Test Act (a declaration against transubstantiation, adoration of the Virgin, and the sacrifice of the Mass). Finally in the twelfth section it is declared that no dispensation by non obstante of or to any statute shall be allowed, except such dispensation be allowed in the statute, or shall be specially provided for by one or more bills to be passed during the present session of parliament. The Lords had already softened the article of the Declaration of Rights against the dispensing power by the insertion of the words "as it hath been exercised of late," and now this last section was added to provide for cases where it might be desirable that the dispensing power should be used. Though, however, in the next parliament, the judges were ordered by the House of Lords to draft a bill for this purpose, the matter dropped. [REVOLUTION.]

Rinuccini, GIOVANNI BATTISTA (1592–1653), Archbishop of Fermo, was sent to Ireland in 1645 as the pope's nuncio, with a supply of arms and money. He opposed Glamorgan's treaty (q.v.) in 1645, and the Dublin treaty of 1646 (q.v.). In 1648 he opposed Lord Inchiquin's armistice, and after an unsuccessful tenure of office as president of the Kilkenny council, fled to Owen Roe O'Neill, and then to Galway. He was recalled in 1649.

Riot Act, THE (1715), was passed at a time when there were apprehensions of Jacobite risings. It declared that if twelve persons or more continued together for one hour after a proclamation bidding them disperse had been made to them by the magistrate, they were guilty of felony. The magistrate was required to apprehend persons refusing to disperse, and those who acted at his orders were indemnified for any injury which they might commit. This practically meant that an hour after the proclamation the military might be ordered to fire on the mob, or charge them. The question afterwards arose as to the legality of military interference without the order of a magistrate. It was decided by Lord Mansfield in a case arising out of the Gordon Riots (q.v.) in 1780, that it is the duty of every subject to resist persons engaged in treasonable or riotous conduct, and that this duty is not less imperative upon soldiers than upon civilians. This decision was confirmed in 1831 in a case arising out of the Bristol Riots.

Ripon, EARL and MARQUIS OF. [ROBINSON.]

Ripon, THE TREATY OF (1640), concluded the second Bishops' War. After the successful invasion of the northern counties the council of peers, assembled at York by Charles I, resolved, on the motion of Lord Bristol, to appoint sixteen commissioners to treat with the Scots (September 24). The first negotiations lasted from October 2 to 16. A cessation of arms was agreed upon, the two northern counties remaining in the possession of the Scots, who were to receive from the contributions of the inhabitants £850 a day for their maintenance. Further negotiations were removed to London, where peace was concluded on August 10, 1641.

Rizzio, DAVID (1533 ?-1566), a native of Turin, became musician to Mary, Queen of Scots, in 1561, and soon afterwards her private secretary. The queen's favour quickly rendered its recipient odious to the Scottish nobles, who banded themselves together against him, aided by Darnley, who had become jealous of the Italian. On March 9, 1566, Holyrood Palace, where Rizzio was at the time, was surrounded by an armed force under Lord Morton. Others of the conspirators, chief of whom was Lord Ruthven, entered the queen's apartment at the instigation of Darnley, and dragged her favourite from her presence. He was dispatched in Darnley's room, and with Darnley's sword, though not by his hand. His body received fifty-six wounds. It is extremely improbable that Rizzio was, as Darnley coarsely insinuated, the queen's paramour, or that he was any more than a confidential friend and faithful servant. His worst faults, in the eyes of the conspirators, were his arrogance and his religion.

Robert I (BRUCE), KING OF SCOTLAND (b. 1274, s. 1306, d. 1329), was the grandson of Robert de Bruce, the rival of John Baliol. In 1296 he joined the national party under William Wallace (q.v.) and laid waste the lands of Edward I's adherents. Later, however, he returned to his allegiance to the English king until 1298, when he again joined the national party in Scotland, and was chosen one of the guardians of that kingdom. In 1304 he entered into a secret alliance of mutual support with Lamberton, Bishop of St. Andrews, the friend of Wallace. In 1305 he attended the parliament in London, but hearing that the king, owing to some information that he had obtained from Comyn, intended to put him to death, he fled to Scotland. Having stabbed Comyn at Dumfries in a quarrel, he determined to assert his right to reign over Scotland as the representative of David of Huntingdon. He was accordingly crowned at Scone (March 27, 1306) by the Countess of Buchan, of the house of Macduff. Edward I at once procured from the pope the excommunication of Bruce, and was on his way to avenge the death of Comyn when he died at Burgh-on-the-Sands, in 1307. Before this, however, Bruce had been twice defeated (at Methven and Dulay). It is to this period of his life that the marvellous stories told by the Chroniclers about him mainly refer. There is no doubt that Bruce had to conceal himself in the fastnesses of the mountains, and to support himself as best he could. He withdrew for a time to the island of Rachrine, returning thence to Arran in the spring of 1307. In May he to some extent retrieved his fortunes at the battle of Loudon Hill. In 1308 he routed his old enemy, the Earl of Buchan, at Inverury and harried Lorne; and in 1310 he received additional support by a declaration of allegiance on the part of the clergy. A feeble incursion into Scotland, undertaken by Edward II in 1310, was avenged by Bruce in the two following years, when he invaded England and laid Durham waste. In 1313 Bruce ravaged Cumberland, and laid siege to the castle of Stirling, the attempted relief of which by the English led to the Scottish victory of Bannockburn in 1314, a battle in which Bruce displayed as much generalship and valour as he afterwards did moderation in the use he made of his victory. His attempts to bring about peace were, however, unsuccessful. In 1316, when he left Scotland for a time to aid his brother Edward in Ireland, his absence was made the occasion of many unsuccessful inroads by the English. An attempt at mediation on the part of the pope (John XXII) having failed, Bruce in 1318 took Berwick, and harried Northumberland and Yorkshire. The next year Edward II tried unsuccessfully to recover Berwick, only drawing down on his kingdom retaliatory raids on the part of Bruce, who, in 1322, entered into negotiations with the rebel Earl of Carlisle. At length, on March 30, 1323, a truce was concluded at Thorpe, in Yorkshire, for thirteen years, and was ratified by Robert Bruce at Berwick. The peace was, however, soon broken, and in 1326 Bruce again ravaged the north of England, evading the English army, which he reduced to great straits by destroying all its provisions. In 1328, another treaty very favourable to Scotland was made at Northampton, by which Robert's son David married Joanna, daughter of Edward II. "The good King Robert" died at Cardross, June 7, 1329, and by his patriotism, wisdom, and courage left behind him the character of a good man. He married, first, Isabella, daughter of the Earl of Mar, and, secondly, Elizabeth de Burgh, daughter of the Earl of Ulster.

Robert II, KING OF SCOTLAND (s. 1371, d. 1390), the first of the Stuart dynasty, was the son of Walter, lord high steward of Scotland, and Marjory, daughter of Robert Bruce. On the death of David II without children, Robert, then 55 years old, succeeded to the throne unopposed. In early life, as steward of Scotland, he had done good service against the English; had been present at the battle of Halidon Hill (q.v.), and had long acted as regent of Scotland. He married first Elizabeth Mure of Rowallan and secondly Euphemia Ross. In 1375 an act of parliament settled the crown on the king's sons by his first wife, a measure rendered necessary by the fact that these children were by ecclesiastical law illegitimate. England at this time was not in a position to be aggressive, and, although the usual border raids continued, Robert's reign was on the whole a peaceful one. A close alliance with France at the beginning of the reign, however, led in 1385 to a French army being sent to Scotland with the intention of attacking England from the north. The usual course of border devastation followed; but the French, dissatisfied with their reception by the Scots, soon returned home and Richard II exacted a heavy vengeance, burning Edinburgh, Perth, and Dundee. In 1388 an invasion of England was planned, resulting in the defeat of the English under the Percys at Otterburn. In 1390 Robert died, "leaving the character of a peaceful ruler over a quarrelsome people."

Robert III, KING OF SCOTLAND (s. 1390, d. 1406), was a man of weak and indolent character, ill fitted to cope with the turbulent spirits of the age. The early years of his reign were disturbed by quarrels amongst the Highland clans and by lawlessness in the Lowlands to such an extent that in 1398 the Scottish parliament appointed the Duke of Rothesay, his eldest son, lieutenant of the kingdom. In 1400 Henry IV of England invaded Scotland with the intention of exacting homage from Robert; he failed, however, to take Edinburgh Castle, and retreated without effecting anything. An invasion of England by the Scots was repelled by the Percys at Homildon Hill (1402). On the capture of his surviving son, Prince James, by the English, March 1406, Robert died, it is said of a broken heart.

Robert (1054?-1134), DUKE OF NORMANDY, called Curthose on account of his short stature, was the eldest son of William the Conqueror. He was betrothed to the heiress of Maine, which was to be held as a fief of Anjou, but her death prevented the completion of the match. In 1077 he rebelled against his father and demanded the duchy of Normandy. War ensued between father and son; after the siege of Gerberoi in 1079 peace was made, and the succession to Normandy secured to Robert. On the death of his father he claimed the English throne, but William Rufus's prompt action disconcerted him, and he was obliged to make a treaty by which the survivor was to succeed to the other's dominions if either died without heirs. In 1094 Robert again made war upon William, but shortly afterwards, being eager to join the first Crusade, he pledged Normandy to his brother for the sum of 10,000 marks. In the Holy Land Robert fought with great bravery, and was offered but refused the crown of Jerusalem. Soon after his return he learnt that William was dead, and determined to enforce his claims to the throne. He invaded England in 1101, but was induced by Henry to make a compromise whereby he resigned the crown of England and contented himself with the full possession of Normandy and 3,000 marks a year. Quarrels soon broke out again between the brothers, Henry complaining that the rebellious English nobles found a shelter in Normandy. A war ensued in which Henry won the battle of Tenchebrai in 1106 and took Robert prisoner. He was imprisoned in various castles and died in captivity at Cardiff in 1134. By his marriage with Sibyl, daughter of the Count of Conversana, Robert had one son, William le Clito.

Robert of Jumièges, Archbishop of Canterbury 1051-2, was a Norman who, after having been prior of St. Ouen's at Rouen, became abbot of Jumièges in 1037. Edward the Confessor formed a close friendship with him during his stay in Normandy, and two years after his return (1044) conferred upon him the bishopric of London—the first occupation of an English see by a foreigner since the Conversion. He at once became the leader of the French party at Edward's court, and the great enemy of Godwin and his family. In 1050, upon the death of Archbishop Eadsige, the monks of Christ Church elected in his place Ælfric, a kinsman of Godwin. The king, however, nominated Robert of London, and henceforth the latter's one object was to bring about the fall of Godwin, whose opposition to the French party had been embittered by this frustration of his kinsman's hopes as well as by Robert's refusal to consecrate the Englishman Spearhafoc to the see which he himself had left vacant. The archbishop claimed for the Church certain lands held by the earl, and even renewed the old accusation against him of complicity in the murder of Edward's brother, Alfred. The attack of the men of Dover upon the escort of Eustace of Boulogne and Godwin's refusal to punish them gave Robert his opportunity. By his advice Godwin was summoned before the witan to answer charges old and new. With Godwin's outlawry the archbishop's triumph seemed complete (September 1051). Spearhafoe was deposed and a Norman became Bishop of London; and, what was still more important, William of Normandy was invited to England. But in September 1052 Godwin returned, and the nation declared in his favour. Robert dared not remain in England, and with Ulf, Bishop of Rochester, fled to the continent. He was outlawed by the witan and deprived of his archbishopric. He died at Jumièges.

Roberts, Frederick Sleigh, 1st Earl Roberts of Kandahar and Waterford (1832-1914), was the son of General Sir A. Roberts. Entering the Bengal Army in 1851, he greatly distinguished himself in the Indian Mutiny, and gained the Victoria Cross. After further service in Abyssinia and in South-East Bengal, he successfully commanded the Kurum Valley column in the Afghan War of 1878. In his second campaign (1879-80) he made his celebrated march upon Kandahar, covering over 300 miles in twenty days. For this he was created a baronet and G.C.B. In 1885 he became commander-in-chief in India, was elevated to the peerage in 1892, resigned his command in 1893, and was appointed commander-in-chief in Ireland, with the rank of field-marshal, in 1895. In 1900 he commanded the army in South Africa. He was made commander-in-chief in 1901, created earl, and received the Garter. In 1905 he became head of the National Service League. He died on a visit to the western front in 1914, and was buried in St. Paul's.

Robertson, Sir William Robertson (b. 1860), entered the army as a private in 1877, and saw service in India, in the Chitral Expedition, 1895, and in the Boer War. In 1913 he became director of military training at the war office. He served under Lord French in France in 1914-15, returned to the war office as chief of staff in December 1915, and in May 1918 became commander-in-chief in Great Britain. From April 1919 to March 1920 he commanded the British troops in the Rhineland.

Robin Hood, the hero of a cycle of popular ballads, according to tradition an outlaw commanding a band of freebooters in Sherwood Forest in the reign of Richard I. John Stow, writing in 1590, and doubtless giving the popular story, tells us that "he suffered no woman to be oppressed . . . poor men's goods be spared, abundantly relieving them with that which by theft he got from the abbeyes, and the houses of rich old carles." It is, however, doubtful at what time he lived, or, indeed, whether he existed at all. No contemporary historian mentions him: he is first alluded to in "Piers the Ploughman," and the earliest chronicle which speaks of him is the "Scotichronicon" (of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries). An inscription is said to have been found on a tomb at Kirkstall in Yorkshire in which he is called Earl of Huntingdon, and the date of his death is given as 1247; but this is apocryphal. Thierry thought he was chief of a Saxon band warring against the Norman oppressor; Grimm that he was purely mythical. He has been identified with a "Robyn Hod" who served as "porteur" to Edward II in 1223, but the evidence is very weak. The earliest ballads concerning him date from Edward III; Wynnyn de Worde published the "Lytel Geste of Robin Hood" in 1495.

Robinson, Frederick John, Viscount Goderich and 1st Earl of Ripon (1782-1859), was the second son of Thomas, 2nd Baron Grantham. Entering parliament as member for Ripon in 1807, he received office under Portland as under-secretary for the colonies, but retired with Castlereagh in 1809. He subsequently became a lord of the admiralty in 1810, a privy councillor in 1812, a lord of the treasury in 1812, paymaster-general in 1813, and in 1818 president of the board of trade. Created chancellor of the exchequer in 1823, he assisted Huskisson in his free-trade measures, was made secretary for the colonies and Viscount Goderich in 1827, and was for a few months prime minister after Canning's death (August-December 1827). From 1830 to 1833 he was again colonial secretary, becoming in the latter year lord privy seal and Earl of Ripon. Though he afterwards became president of the board of trade under Peel, he had ceased to be of any political importance.

Robinson, George Frederick Samuel, 1st Marquis of Ripon (1827-1909), succeeded to the earldom of Grey and Ripon in 1859, and was created Marquis of Ripon in 1871. From 1859 to 1863 he was secretary for war and (for a short time) for India, from 1863 to 1866 war secretary, and from 1868 to 1873 president of the council. He was governor-general of India 1880 to 1884, first lord of the admiralty for a few months in 1886, and colonial secretary from 1892 to 1895. He was lord privy seal and leader of the House of Lords from 1906 to 1908.

Robinson, Sir Hercules George Robert, 1st Baron Rosmead (1824-97), son of Admiral Hercules Robinson, of Westmeath, became president of Montserrat in 1854, lieutenant-governor of St. Christopher's in 1855, governor of Hong Kong in 1859, of Ceylon in 1865, of New South Wales in 1872, of New Zealand in 1879, and of the Cape in 1880. In 1881 he presided over the commission which settled affairs in the Transvaal, and acquired such popularity, both with the Boers and in Cape Colony, that, although he had retired in 1889, he was prevailed upon to return to South Africa as high commissioner and governor of the Cape in 1895. The skill and firmness with which he dealt with the crisis arising out of the Jameson raid were generally admired. He was created Lord Rosmead in 1896, and retired from office in 1897.

Robinson, JOHN (1650-1723), Bishop of Bristol, and afterwards of London, went in 1680 as chaplain to the English embassy in Sweden, where he stayed more than a quarter of a century and filled the posts, during the absence of the ambassador, first of resident and afterwards of envoy extraordinary. Anne rewarded his political services and good churchmanship with the deanery of Windsor and the bishopric of Bristol. Upon the accession to office of the Tory ministry (1711), and the sudden deaths of the Duke of Newcastle and the Earl of Jersey, to whom the privy seal had been offered, the vacant place was given to Robinson, the last churchman to hold political office. Next year he was appointed English plenipotentiary, together with the Earl of Strafford, at the Congress of Utrecht, and signed the treaty on April 11, 1713. On the death of Compton, 1714, he became Bishop of London.

Robinson, SIR THOMAS, 1ST BARON GRANTHAM (1695-1770), was a politician of little ability, who, having been minister at Vienna for twenty years, and being acceptable to George II on account of his sympathy with the king's German policy, was chosen by the Duke of Newcastle, on the death of his brother Henry Pelham, to act as leader of the House of Commons, with the office of secretary of state. "The Duke," said Pitt to Fox, "might as well send his jack-boot to lead us." In 1755 Robinson retired to his former office of master of the wardrobe with a pension of £2,000 on the Irish establishment. In 1761 he was raised to the peerage as Lord Grantham.

Robsart, AMY or ANNE (1532?-1560), the daughter of Sir John Robsart, married in June 1550 Lord Robert Dudley, afterwards Earl of Leicester, by whom she is said to have been murdered at Cumnor, near Oxford, on September 8, 1560. The charge against her husband cannot be proved, and it is probable that the crime was committed by some of the earl's friends, who thought to derive benefit from his marriage with Queen Elizabeth, which, it was believed, would at once take place were he free.

Rochelle, EXPEDITIONS TO. In 1625 Rochelle, the chief stronghold of the Huguenots in the south of France, had rebelled against Louis XIII, but had made terms in the beginning of 1626. James I, who understood that Richelieu represented not the principle of religious intolerance, but that of national union, had promised to lend a certain number of English ships to assist in the attack. But on the accession of Charles I an attempt was made to escape from this promise, and though the English government were outwitted, and the ships were actually used against the town, the French king was annoyed by Charles's action. The dismissal of Henrietta Maria's attendants, and the attitude of protector of the Protestants assumed by Charles in his proposals of mediation, led to a declaration of war between England and France. In 1627 Buckingham commanded an expedition to Rhé, where he landed in July. [RHE.] In May of the next year another English fleet was sent, under Denbigh, to attempt the relief of the town, which was now blockaded by land and sea. But the English ships were unable to break through the barrier of palisades and vessels, and returned in May. In spite of the death of Buckingham another attempt was made in September. But there was no enthusiasm in the fleet, and the commander, Lindsey, could do nothing. Charles declared he would renew his efforts, but the Rochellese were now starving, and capitulated on October 18.

Roches, PETER DES (d. 1238), Bishop of Winchester (1205), was a Poitevin friend of John, appointed justiciar of England on the death of Geoffrey Fitz-Peter, in 1213. In 1216 he was associated with the Earl of Pembroke and Gualo the legate in the control of the person of the young king, Henry III. On the death of Pembroke (1219) Peter des Roches seems to have continued as guardian of the royal person; but he soon showed that his policy was at variance with that of Pembroke, for he steadily set himself to support the foreign influence which Langton and the regent had opposed so vigorously. He was soon looked upon as the head of the party of the strangers, and persuaded its members to resist the resumption of the royal demesne that the justiciar Hubert de Burgh was striving to accomplish. But in this he was unsuccessful, and in 1221 was glad to go abroad on the pretext of a crusade. Three years later his power was still further reduced by the fall of the great mercenary leader, Falkes de Breauté (q.v.), but only for a time. The young king continued under the tutelage of Peter des Roches till 1227, when he announced his intention of ruling himself, and his late governor departed once more on a crusade, from which he did not return till 1231. But on the Bishop of Winchester's reappearance all his old influence revived; the king, at his instigation, dismissed his old ministers on the plea of pecculation, and Hubert de Burgh suffered imprisonment and forfeiture. The new councillor, however, was soon overthrown; the barons, headed by Richard, Earl of Pembroke, refused to meet him, and a formidable revolt ensued. On the death of the marshal, Edmund Rich, Archbishop of Canterbury, put himself at the head of the national party, and declared himself ready to excommunicate even the king unless the Poitevins were expelled; and then Henry at last gave way. Peter des Roches was confined to his spiritual duties, and his friends fell with him (1234). He died at Farnham four years later.

Rochester early gained importance, during the Roman occupation, as commanding the point where the main high road of south-eastern England, that from Richborough to London, passed the Medway. So strongly was it fortified that the Jutes seem not to have ventured upon attacking it until they had conquered the rest of Kent. It is possible that Rochester was the capital of a West Kentish kingdom dependent upon the King of East Kent, a relation reflected in the dependence of the Bishop of Rochester on the see of Canterbury. The dedication of the church of Rochester to St. Andrew may possibly be due to the fact that it was from the monastery of St. Andrew at Rome that Augustine came. The town walls were strong enough to resist Ethelred when in 986 he attempted to punish the bishop, Ælfstan, with whom he had quarrelled; and also withstood an attack of the Danes. The cathedral was rebuilt by Bishop Gundulf, in the reign of Rufus, and, in spite of later additions, remains one of the smallest of English cathedral churches. Within the town walls, upon a cliff overlooking the Medway, had very early risen a fortress of earthwork and timber, and here Gundulf built for Rufus a castle of stone. It was probably the earliest fortress which was occupied by Odo of Bayeux when in 1088 he declared for Robert of Normandy against Rufus. The keep, which was built by Archbishop Walter of Corbeuil in the reign of Henry I, is one of the finest examples of Norman military architecture, and was in vain besieged in 1215 by John, and in 1264 by de Montfort. It was, however, taken by the peasantry in the revolt of 1381.

Rockingham, CHARLES WATSON-WENTWORTH, 2ND MARQUIS OF (1730-82). [WENTWORTH.]

Rockingham, THE COUNCIL OF (February 25, 1095), was held to discuss the question whether Anselm could acknowledge Urban II as pope in spite of the refusal of Rufus to recognize either of the contending pontiffs. Anselm himself had asked that a council should meet to decide whether obedience to Urban was consistent with allegiance to William; if it decided against him, he declared he would leave the kingdom. Rufus consented to summon a council of magnates, which met in the castle of Rockingham, in Northamptonshire. But when it had come together, the king's party, including most of the bishops, led by William of St. Calais, carefully evaded the real point at issue, and persisted in treating Anselm as a person on trial. Anselm rejected their advice to submit entirely to the king, and, greatly to the disgust of Rufus, who had been promised by his bishops that Anselm would easily be crushed, the laymen present distinctly showed their sympathy with the archbishop. Rufus vented his spite upon the prelates by demanding that they should abjure all obedience to Anselm, and those who would not go farther than to abjure such obedience as was claimed by the pope's authority could only re-win the royal favour by heavy bribes. Finally the king yielded to the proposal of the lay lords, and the discussion was adjourned till May 20. But before that date the legate, Walter of Albano, had induced Rufus to acknowledge Urban, and to agree to a reconciliation with the archbishop. [W. J. A.]

Rodney, GEORGE BRYDGES, LORD (1719-1792), entered the navy when very young, and in 1742 attained the rank of captain. In 1747 he commanded the Eagle in the action off Cape Finisterre. Two years later he was appointed governor of Newfoundland. On the outbreak of war with France in 1757 he served under Hawke and Boscawen on the French coast. In 1759 he was promoted to be rear-admiral of the blue, and made a most daring and successful raid upon the stores which had been collected in Havre with a view to the invasion of England. In 1761 he was on the West India station. On the conclusion of the war he was made a baronet, and in 1765 became governor of Greenwich Hospital. In 1768 he was returned to parliament for Northampton, but his resources were so crippled that he had to retire to France to retrench. While residing there, according to a very doubtful story, offers were made by the French to tempt him to desert his country; but he rejected them. On his return in 1778 he was promoted admiral, and in the following year served as commander on the Leeward Isles station. On his way to that station he conducted a convoy of supplies to Gibraltar, which was then in the midst of its long siege. While in charge of this convoy he captured off Cape Finisterre, on January 16, 1780, a valuable fleet of Spanish merchantmen on their way to Cadiz, and a week later encountered a powerful Spanish fleet, which he totally defeated. On his return to England he was elected with Fox to parliament for Westminster. Early in 1781 he was ordered to the West Indies, and captured St. Eustatius; but, failing to induce the French admiral, de Grasse, to try an engagement, he returned to England. Being appointed vice-admiral of Great Britain, he shortly afterwards sailed again for the West Indies. At length, on April 5, 1782, he obtained his long-wished-for opportunity of meeting de Grasse, who sailed out in the hope of effecting a junction with the French and Spanish fleets at Hispaniola. Rodney pursued, and, after a partial engagement, succeeded in overhauling the French fleet between Guadeloupe and Dominica. The fight on April 12 resulted in a decisive British victory. Rodney returned to England, to receive the title of Baron Rodney and a pension of £2,000 per annum. He survived his accession to these honours ten years.

Roebuck, JOHN ARTHUR (1802-79), was born at Madras, and in 1831 was called to the bar at the Inner Temple. Soon afterwards he entered the first reformed parliament as member for Bath, quickly making his mark as an incisive though often bitter debater. He several times lost and regained his seat, until in 1849 he was elected for Sheffield, which he represented with but one break (1868-74) up to his death. His greatest political achievement occurred when, on January 26, 1855, by a majority of 157, and in spite of the opposition of the Aberdeen government, he carried a motion for a committee to inquire into the conduct of the Crimean War, and was appointed its chairman. An advanced Radical, he always maintained his independence, and eventually diverged widely from the rest of his party.

Roger, BISHOP OF SALISBURY, was a poor priest of Caen, who, winning the favour of the Atheling Henry by the rapidity with which he performed Mass, became his chaplain and private adviser. When Henry gained the English throne Roger became chancellor, in 1107 Bishop of Salisbury, and at the same time justiciar. Under his guidance, whether as chancellor or as justiciar, the whole administrative system was remodelled, and the jurisdiction of the Curia Regis and Exchequer carefully organized. He swore to the succession of Matilda, though, according to the account he afterwards gave, only on condition that she should not be married to any foreigner without consent of the magnates. Stephen had little difficulty in gaining his support and the royal treasure which he guarded. But in a short time the king began to be jealous of his great minister. Roger and his family monopolized all the important offices in the administration. His son Roger was chancellor, his nephew Nigel was Bishop of Ely and treasurer, and a grand-nephew, Alexander, was Bishop of Lincoln. Moreover, Roger and his nephews had been building great castles in their dioceses, the most important being those of Roger at Sherborne and Devizes. In June 1139 Stephen caused Roger and other members of the family to be arrested at Oxford, and they were not released until the castles had been surrendered. This action on the part of Stephen led at once to the break-up of the administration, and was one of the main causes of the king's later difficulties. Roger died in December 1139.

Rohilkhand was so called from the Afghan Rohillas, who took possession of the country under Ali Mohammed Khan in the first half of the eighteenth century. About 1770 the Rohillas were unable to pay the Vizir of Oudh some forty lacs, for which he had become security to buy off the Mahrattas. The vizir gained the loan of a British force from Warren Hastings, with which the country was conquered. In 1801 a large part was ceded to Great Britain, instead of the tribute which the vizir had bound himself to pay. Rohilkhand is now a commissionership in the United Provinces.

Rolls Series is the name usually given to the collection known officially as "Chronicles and Memorials of Great Britain and Ireland during the Middle Ages." As early as 1822 the House of Commons urged, in an address to George IV, the advisability of publishing "a complete edition of the ancient historians of this realm." But nothing resulted from this address till 1857, when the government accepted a scheme laid before them in that year by the master of the rolls, Lord Romilly. The plan of the volumes is summed up in Lord Romilly's proposal "that each chronicle and historical document should be edited in such a manner as to represent with all possible correctness the text of each writer . . . and that no notes should be added except such as were illustrative of the various readings . . . that the preface to each work should contain a biographical account of the author . . . and an estimate of his historical credibility and value." The series includes many works and collections of a miscellaneous character, besides editions of the chief mediæval chroniclers of England.

Rolls, THE MASTER OF THE. The Master of the Rolls was originally the keeper of the rolls of Chancery—that is to say, of the administrative records belonging to that office. The first known keeper was John Langton, so described in 1286. At first the keeper, or master as he came in time to be called, was merely the chief clerk of Chancery. As such he normally had custody of the great seal during the absence of the chancellor from court. When the work of Chancery grew more judicial than administrative, the functions of the keeper of the rolls as judge became more important than his duties as clerk. The first lay keeper of the rolls was Thomas Cromwell. Early in the fourteenth century the almost deserted House of Converts (for Jews), in what is now Chancery Lane, was found to be a suitable place of storage for Chancery records. From 1307 the keeper of the rolls of Chancery was often, therefore, also keeper of the House of Converts, until in 1377

the mastership of this house was permanently annexed to his office. In modern times the duties of the Master of the Rolls, still a lawyer and a judge, and now president of the Court of Appeal, have been defined by an act of 1838, and by the Supreme Judicature Acts of 1873 and 1875. The first of these acts entrusted to the care of the master not only Chancery records, but also all the records of the Crown then in various places in London and Westminster. To accommodate them the present Public Record Office was built on the site of the House of Converts. The master's obligations as custodian are discharged by a deputy keeper of the records. [D. M. Sir H. O. Maxwell-Lyte, "Notes on the Great Seal."

Roman Roads, THE, constitute, perhaps, the most durable of the memorials which the Romans left behind them in Britain. The method of their construction varied greatly with the nature of the ground traversed, but they were usually raised above the surface of the neighbouring land, and ran in a straight line, almost regardless of hills, from station to station. The more important lines of communication were very elaborately constructed, with a foundation of hard earth, a bed of large stones, sometimes two or more layers of stones and mortar, and of gravel, lime, and clay, and on the top of all a causeway often certainly paved with stone. The study of the Roman road system in Britain has been much complicated by the persistence of the mediæval tradition of the four great privileged roads—Foss Way, Watling Street, Icknield Street, and Ermine Street—and much misdirected effort has been expended in the attempt to fit the actual Roman roads into a category of four main highways. Recent research has, however, demonstrated that the roads of Roman Britain fall in reality into three groups, radiating out from the centre of London, and differing markedly from the alleged Chimini Regis. One of these groups runs westward from London to Silchester, where it divides into branches running to Winchester, Bath and Exeter, Leicester, Gloucester and South Wales. A second series runs north-west from London past the municipality of Verulam to Wroxeter and Chester; while the third runs either from London or from Colchester to Lincoln, and is supported by a subsidiary line from the second route through Leicester. The purpose of these roads was originally military and their course may be taken as indicating the line upon which the conquest of south and eastern Britain was planned and effected in the first century A.D. Subsequently they served as highways of commerce, linking up the flourishing towns of the romanized south and east.

Romans in Britain. Direct intercourse between the Romans and Britons began with the two expeditions of Julius Cæsar in 55 and 54 B.C., but he rather prepared the way for future conquest, by exacting the submission of the tribes of the south-east, than began the conquest himself. Though British kings sought the protection of Augustus, it was reserved for Claudius to add Britain to the empire. The campaign of Aulus Plautius in A.D. 43, the emperor's own conquest of the stronghold of Cunobelin, Ostorius Scapula's completion of the conquest of the south and east and capture of Caratacus (50), Suetonius Paulinus's great campaign against the Ordovices of North Wales (60), and suppression of the revolt of the Iceni after the inactive governments of Aulus Didius and Veranius, the partial reduction of the Brigantes by Petilius Cerealis (71-74), and the final submission of the Silures to Julius Frontinus (c. 77), prepared the way for the final triumphs of Julius Agricola (78-85). That great general successively defeated the Ordovices and the Brigantes, and, advancing to the north, ravaged the district as far as the Tay, fortified the isthmus between the Forth and Clyde, visited the western Highlands, and finally, after a three years' war, defeated the Caledonians at "Mons Graupius." But these northern districts were never really subdued, and the building by Hadrian of the first Roman Wall between the Tyne and the Solway (c. 120) marks the northern limit of the organized province. But in 140-141 Lollius Urbicus, the governor for Antoninus Pius, built a second wall, or rather an earthen rampart, between the Forth and the Clyde, which now became the ultimate although not the effective northern boundary of the Roman dominions. A series of incursions of the northern barbarians necessitated the repair and strengthening of Hadrian's Wall early in the third century by Severus, from whom it sometimes takes its name. One remarkable feature in the later history of the province is the constant tendency of the legions in Britain to set up emperors of their own, such as Carausius, who governed the province from 286 to 293, when he was slain by Allectus, while Britain was reconquered in 296 by Constantius Chlorus. That prince effected important reforms in the government, and fought successful campaigns against the Picts, as the inhabitants of the unconquered north now began to be called. In 369 Theodosius restored the province, after it had been ravaged by Picts and Scots, Saxons and Attacots. In 383 the revolt of Maximus, and his unfortunate attempt to win for himself the whole empire, led to the withdrawal of the army, and to fresh barbarian inroads on the unprotected land. In 396 Stilicho sent a single legion to help the struggling provincials, but its withdrawal in 402 led to fresh invasions. In 406 Stilicho again restored the army, but the successive usurpations of Constantine and Gerontius showed the feeble Honorius that the army in Britain was a danger rather than an assistance to his struggling empire. In 410, in answer to a request for help, he bade the provincials defend themselves. Thereupon the Britons rose, expelled the civil governors, and set up some form of provincial government. The unity of the state rapidly disappeared, and Roman institutions were submerged by a wave of resurgent Celticism. But the imperial tradition was not forgotten, and many years later we find the Britons still claiming to be regarded as Roman citizens.

The nature of the rule which thus lasted for more than three centuries has given rise to much speculation and debate. The older school of historians, obsessed by analogies of British rule in India, and fortified by the negative evidence of law and philology, regarded the Roman rule in Britain as purely military in character. "A series of military posts, connected by a magnificent system of highways, a few commercial and mining centres, an occasional urban settlement, were all that could really be called Roman in Britain." The researches of the late Professor Haverfield, however, have profoundly modified opinion as to the character and extent of Roman influence in this country. His contention, based mainly on the evidences of archaeology, is that the romanization of Britain, though smaller in scale than, was similar in trend to the romanization of other western provinces of the empire, such as Gaul and Spain. Although admittedly the uplands of the north and west remained throughout the Roman period an almost purely military district, the south-eastern plain, bounded on the north by York, on the west by Wroxeter and Caerwent, and on the south by Exeter, was, he maintains, thoroughly permeated by Roman culture. The great roads, constructed originally for military purposes, became, under the beneficent influence of the pax romana, highways of commerce, along which sprang up towns planned on the established Roman model with fora, basilica, and public baths. In the rural districts farms and country houses were erected, and the Roman villa system of agriculture took root and flourished, even if it did not completely oust the older Celtic systems. Such fragmentary evidence as we possess tells the same tale with regard to administration. There were in Britain at least five municipalities of the privileged Italian type; while, although the old tribal organization was allowed to persist, it was given, as in northern Gaul, a Roman complexion. Inscriptions found at Venta Silurum show that the tribe or canton was organized around an old tribal centre, which became a civitas governed on the Roman plan by duoviri and a senate. The problem of language is one less easily solved by archaeology, yet even here a body of evidence is accumulating to prove that Latin was not merely the official language of Britain, but the speech of ordinary conversation. Casual scribbblings of amatory messages or tags from the Latin poets, found upon tiles and pottery, suggest that even the artisan classes must have been able to write as well as to speak and read the Latin tongue.

But if the romanization of Britain was so far complete, how comes it that the traces of Roman culture which have persisted are, apart from material remains, so few? The comparative immunity of the language of both the Celtic and the Anglo-Saxon inhabitants of post-Roman Britain from the influence of "imperial" Latin, and the absence of any conclusive evidence of institutional survival, have furnished the anti-romanizing" school with its strongest arguments. Yet even to these objections Professor Haverfield supplies an answer. The impermanence of Romano-British civilization he ascribes firstly to the existence outside the narrow limit of the fully-romanized area of a broad fringe of almost virgin Celticism which easily engulfed the enfeebled remnant of the Romano-Celtic population; and secondly to the peculiarly thorough nature of the Anglo-Saxon conquest—the work of a people untouched by Roman influences and proceeding to settlement only after a long period of purely destructive warfare.

It remains to speak of the military and political organization of the province of Britain. During the zenith of the Roman power by far the greater number of the troops were massed along the northern wall, the marches of modern Wales, and on the south-east coast, which was so exposed to the assaults of Saxon pirates. The sixth legion had its head-quarters at York, the twentieth at Chester, the second at Caerleon, for a time on the Wall, and afterwards at Rutupia (Richborough). Troops of nearly every known nation were comprised within their numbers. The practice of the same legion being stationed for a long time at the same place must have led to a good deal of intercourse between the Britons and their conquerors. Not infrequently the soldiers married native women, and settled down, when their term of service was expired, upon the lands allotted to them in their adopted country. The Roman soldiers took a prominent part in road-making, building dykes, working mines, and in the other great engineering operations which marked the Roman rule. The chief towns—most of which, such as York, London, Chester, Lincoln, Bath, Colchester, have continued to be centres of population—frequently owed their original importance to their position as military stations.

The system of government of the province more than once was radically changed. The province as a definite administrative district was begun under Aulus Plautius. Its exposed position naturally caused it to be an imperial rather than a senatorial province, and its governor was the legate. Its great extent and the difficulty found in properly defending it led to its division into two districts by Severus, which Dio calls Upper and Lower Britain. Their relative situations are not certainly known. Diocletian's reorganization of the empire involved the division of Britain into four provinces—Britannia Prima, Britannia Secunda, Maxima Caesariensis, and Flavia Cæsariensis—the positions of which are quite undetermined. In 369 a fifth province, called Valentia, the result of Theodosius's victories, was added. The two latter were consular, the three former each under a præses. The whole were under the Vicarius Britanniarum, and he was subject to the Præfectus Prætorii Galliarum. The troops were under the command of the Dux Britanniarum and the Comes Litoris Saxonici.

During the latter part of the Roman occupation Christianity crept silently into Britain. Before the legions left, it was the religion of the Roman State; but the Britons seem only to have been partially converted, and the traces of an organized British Church are few, though distinct. But the Roman Church in Britain depended on Gaul almost as much as, after Diocletian's reforms, the governors of Britain necessarily did.

Romans, KING OF THE. [RICHARD, EARL OF CORNWALL.]

Rom-feoh, or ROME-SCOT. [PETER'S PENCE.]

Romilly, SIR SAMUEL (1757–1818), the son of a jeweller of French extraction, was born at Westminster. He was called to the bar in 1783, but was at first much impeded by nervous diffidence. When he had overcome this difficulty he rose rapidly, and by 1797 he had come to be recognized as a brilliant leader of the bar. In 1800 he was made a king's counsel, and in 1806 was appointed solicitor-general by Fox, being returned to parliament for Queenborough. In this position he was one of the managers of the impeachment of Lord Melville, and also took an active part in procuring the abolition of the slave trade. When he had been successful in accomplishing this object he turned his attention towards the reform of the penal code; and though he was prevented from carrying out his reforms as he desired, he succeeded in mitigating some of its severity. In 1812 he was defeated at Bristol, but, being returned for Arundel, he continued to support every measure which tended to improve the condition of the people. He was returned for Westminster in 1818, but did not live long enough to take his seat. His wife died on October 29, and within four days he committed suicide. "Year after year," says Sir Erskine May, "he struggled to overcome the obduracy of men in power. The Commons were on his side; Lords Grenville, Lansdowne, Grey, Holland, and other enlightened peers supported him; but the Lords, under the guidance of Lord Eldon, Lord Ellenborough, and their other judicial leaders, were not to be convinced. He did much to stir the public sentiment in his cause; but little, indeed, for the amendment of the law."

Rooke, SIR GEORGE (1650–1709), entered the navy at an early age, and in 1690 became rear-admiral of the red. He took part in the battle off Beachy Head (q.v.), was made vice-admiral of the blue in 1692, and commanded under Russell at La Hogue (May 23–4). For the skill with which he led a night attack upon a part of the French fleet which had escaped into the harbour out of reach of the English ships, he was rewarded with knighthood and the post of vice-admiral of the red. Upon peace being made with France in 1697, Rooke gained a seat in parliament for Portsmouth, and supported the Tory party. In 1702 he was created by Anne vice-admiral and lieutenant of the admiralty under Prince George. When war was renewed Rooke took command of the English fleet, stormed Vigo, and in August 1704 took Gibraltar. In the same year he fought a great but indecisive battle off Malaga. On his return to England he found himself treated with coldness by the Whig government, and retired to his country seat in Kent, where he died. His Journal was published in 1897 by the Navy Records Society.

Root and Branch. This phrase was derived from a petition asking that episcopacy might be destroyed "root and branch," signed by 15,000 citizens of London, and presented on December 11, 1640, by Alderman Pennington. The party in the Commons which supported this petition was called from it the Root and Branch party. "Of the chief leaders," says Clarendon, "Nathaniel Fiennes and young Sir H. Vane, and, shortly after, Mr. Hampden (who had not before owned it) were believed to be for root and branch, which grew shortly after a common expression, and discovery of the several tempers, yet Mr. Pym was not to that mind, nor Mr. Hollis, nor any of the northern men, or those lawyers who drove on most furiously with them." The Root and Branch Bill was drawn by St. John, and then through Vane, Cromwell, and Haselrig handed to Sir Edward Dering, who brought it in on May 27, 1641. It was read a first and second time on the same day, and passed the second reading by 139 to 108 votes. The bill proposed to appoint in each diocese a number of commissioners, half lay, half clerical, to exercise ecclesiastical jurisdiction in place of the bishops. It was dropped in August 1641.

Rosamund Clifford (d. 1175 ?). [CLIFFORD.]

Rosebery, ARCHIBALD PHILIP PRIMROSE, 5TH BARON (b. 1847). [PRIMROSE.]

Roses, THE WARS OF THE, is the name commonly given to the dynastic civil war in the fifteenth century, which may be considered to begin with the first battle of St. Albans in 1455, and to end with Bosworth Field in 1485, though there were long intervals of peace. The name was given on account of the badges worn by the representatives of the houses of York and Lancaster, the Yorkists taking as their cognizance the white rose, the Lancastrians the red rose. The ostensible cause of the wars was the rival claims to the throne of the families of York and Lancaster, both descended from sons of Edward III; the former could show strict hereditary right, while the latter had possession and parliamentary title. But there were other causes, without which it may fairly be said that the struggle would never have occurred. It was not till some years after the first battle of St. Albans that York put forward his claims, and even then such a compromise as was come to in 1460 might very fairly have been adhered to, but the other causes which were at work prevented this, and the controversy was decided by the sword. The House of Lancaster had in great measure lost its hold on the sympathies of the people; the loss of France, the marriage with Margaret of Anjou, her haughty and overbearing spirit, the suspicious death of the popular favourite Gloucester, all combined to estrange the people from the Lancastrian dynasty. The two ministers of the latter part of Henry VI's reign, Suffolk and Somerset, were unfortunate and unpopular, and the one strong man who seemed at all able to restore good government to the country was the Duke of York. The nobles who for so many years had been ranging over France now found themselves cooped up in England, and mutual jealousies arose which made them only too ready to take part in a civil war, while the birth of Prince Edward in 1453 perpetuated the Lancastrian claims, and so rendered any compromise impossible. The "bastard feudalism" of livery and maintenance, itself largely a heritage from the wars with France, supplied their necessary following, and contributed to the general disorder and "lack of governance" which characterized the period. With regard to the character of the two parties: since the time of Richard II and earlier there had been some branches of the royal house which were opposed to the reigning branch; and the opposition princes usually found it convenient to associate themselves with the party in the country that cried out for reform and good government, as Thomas of Lancaster had done under Edward II, and Thomas of Gloucester and Henry of Lancaster under Richard II. In Henry VI's reign, besides the opposition branch of the royal house, the York princes who were naturally antagonistic to the rival Lancasters and Beauforts, there existed the great family of the Nevilles, which had absorbed the territorial possessions of the Beauchamps, and now held a semi-royal position in the country. They were allied by marriage with the family of the Duke of York. In the north of England the Nevilles were great rivals of the powerful family of the Percys; and since the latter were firmly Lancastrian, this alone would almost have sufficed to make the Nevilles Yorkist. The war was mainly a quarrel among these and the other great houses—the "over-mighty subjects" of whom Sir John Fortescue writes. But it is possible to find certain geographical and political issues. There was general discontent with the government of Henry VI, its failures abroad, and its close connexion with the clerical party; and on this account York was hailed as the champion of reform, and was very popular in the towns and among the mercantile population of the southern counties. The Lancastrians, more closely connected with the Church and the nobility, excluding a few of the great families, were stronger in the north, where feudalism was strong, trade undeveloped, and reforming ideas had made little headway.

The effects of these wars upon our history were very great. They did much to destroy the old nobility, and so paved the way for the absolutism of the Tudors, for the new nobility owed its rise entirely to the Crown, and so was extremely servile. The people had no leaders, and were moreover glad of a strong government to preserve them from the horrors of another civil war. The Church, too, which had rested on the support of the barons, became greatly weakened, and was unable to resist the Crown. The commercial classes and the great towns had taken but little part in the wars, but had steadily increased in power and influence, and with this goes the gradual rise of the House of Commons as one of the great powers of the realm, no longer to be dependent on the nobles, but, though at first apparently considerably weakened, in reality a gainer by having to stand alone. The following is a chronological list of the battles fought during the wars; a description of each of them will be found in its place.

First Battle of St. Albans	May 22, 1455
Battle of Blore Heath	Sept. 23, 1459
Battle of Northampton	July 10, 1460
Battle of Wakefield	Dec. 30, 1460
Battle of Mortimer's Cross	Feb. 2, 1461
Second Battle of St. Albans	Feb. 17, 1461
Skirmish at Perry Bridge	Mar. 1461
Battle of Towton	Mar. 29, 1461
Battle of Hedgeley Moor	April 25, 1464
Battle of Hexham	May 15, 1464
Battle of Edgecote	July 26, 1469
Battle of Losecoat Field	Mar. 19, 1470
Battle of Barnet	April 14, 1471
Battle of Tewkesbury	May 4, 1471
Battle of Bosworth	Aug. 22, 1485

Rosmead, SIR HERCULES ROBINSON, BARON (1824-97). [ROBINSON.]

Ross, JOHN MACDONALD, 11TH EARL OF (d. 1498). [MACDONALD.]

Ross Dependency. [NEW ZEALAND, DOMINION OF.]

Ross, Sir James Clark (1800-62), entered the navy in 1812, under his uncle, Sir John Ross, with whom he continued to serve in the Baltic, the White Sea, and on the coast of Scotland. He accompanied his uncle, as a midshipman, in his first voyage in search of the North-west Passage. Subsequently, from 1819 to 1825, he was engaged with Captain Parry in his three voyages, being promoted during his absence in 1822 to the rank of lieutenant. He again accompanied Captain Parry in 1827, and on his return was appointed commander. He also joined his uncle, Captain John Ross, from 1829 to 1833, on his second voyage in search of a North-west Passage, and on his return was elevated to the rank of a post-captain in recognition of his valuable services, among which was the discovery of the magnetic pole. He was afterwards employed by the admiralty in a magnetic survey of Great Britain and Ireland. In 1839 he was appointed to the command of an expedition in the Erebus and Terror to the Antarctic Seas, the chief purpose in view being magnetic investigations. This voyage occupied four years. In 1844 he was knighted, and in 1847 published the results of his discoveries and researches. In January 1848 he made a voyage in the Enterprise to Baffin's Bay in search of Sir John Franklin, but was unsuccessful.

Rotherham, Thomas, Archbishop of York 1480-1500, had been keeper of the privy seal to Edward IV, and in 1468 became Bishop of Rochester. In 1471 he was translated to Lincoln, and in 1474 was made lord chancellor. He held the great seal till 1483, when he was obliged to resign it by the Duke of Gloucester. He was imprisoned by Richard for some little while, and after his release does not seem to have taken any prominent part in public affairs. In 1480 he had been created Archbishop of York.

Roths, John Leslie, 7th Earl of (1630-81). [LESLIE.]

Rothsay, David, Duke of, the eldest son of Robert III of Scotland, was a man of great charm but of profligate and idle habits; in 1399 he was appointed lieutenant of the kingdom by the Scottish parliament, and a year afterwards successfully defended the castle of Edinburgh against the English; the same year he married Marjory, daughter of Archibald, Earl of Douglas. Soon afterwards he was seized at the instigation of his uncle, the Duke of Albany, and imprisoned in Falkland Castle, where he is said to have died of starvation (March 1402).

Rothschild's Case (1847). Mr. Lionel N. de Rothschild, a Jew (1808-79), was returned as one of the members for the City of London in 1847. His return was perfectly legal, but he was unable to take the oath because it contained the words, "on the true faith of a Christian." He therefore sat below the bar for four sessions in expectation of relief from the legislature. Being disappointed, he resolved to try his rights by the existing law. He therefore, in 1850, presented himself to be sworn. After some discussion he was allowed to be sworn on the Old Testament, but omitted the words, "on the true faith," etc. He was immediately directed to withdraw, and after a learned discussion it was resolved that he could neither sit nor vote till he had taken the oath in the usual manner. In consequence, he was prevented from sitting until 1858, when the disability was removed. [JEWS IN ENGLAND; OATHS, PARLIAMENTARY.]

Rotumah, a dependency of Fiji (q.v.).

Roundhead. The name of Roundhead took its rise at the same time as the name of Cavalier (q.v.), in the tumults which occurred during the discussion of the Bishops' Exclusion Bill at the end of 1641. Like Cavalier, it referred originally to the external characteristics of the men, whose party name it afterwards became. "These people, or citizens," says Lilly, "used to flock unto Westminster, were, most of them, men of a mean, or a middle quality. . . . They were modest in their apparel, but not in their language; they had the hair of their heads very few of them longer than their ears, whereupon it came to pass that those who usually with their cries attended at Westminster, were by a nickname called Roundheads." According to Rushworth the word was first used on December 27, 1641, by David Hide, a disbanded officer, who in one of the riots drew his sword, and swore to "cut the throats of those round-headed dogs that bawled against bishops," "which passionate expression of his, as far as I could ever learn, was the first mentioning of that term or compellation of Roundheads, which afterwards grew so general." "From these contestations," says Clarendon of the tumults, "the two terms, Roundhead and Cavalier, came to be received in discourse, and were afterwards continued for the most succinct distinction of affections throughout the quarrel." A different story of the origin of the name is given by Baxter. "Some say it was because the queen at Stafford's trial asked who that round-headed man was, meaning Pym, because he spoke so strongly." The name did not go out of use till after the Revolution.

Round Robin, THE (February 1789), was an engagement in writing between twenty Irish peers and thirty-seven commoners, with the Duke of Leinster at their head. It bound all who signed it to make government impossible if the viceroy punished any one of them by loss of office or pension for their conduct on the regency question. Lord Buckingham encountered them by an increase of the pension list, and the majority being frightened consented to give up their engagement. The Duke of Leinster and the Ponsonbys, however, held out and lost their places.

Rowan, ARCHIBALD HAMILTON (1751-1834), was a gentleman of fortune who became a United Irishman. In the year 1794 he was apprehended for sedition, sentenced to pay a fine of £500, and imprisoned. William Jackson, a French spy, corresponded with him. Rowan, however, made his escape from Newcastle as soon as he heard of Jackson's apprehension, and fled to America. He was sentenced to death in his absence, but his estates were saved; and in 1803 Castlereagh got him a pardon, and he then lived quietly in Ireland till his death.

Rowena is said to have been the daughter of Hengest, and to have become the wife of Vortigern. But there is absolutely no authority for her existence, and her name is certainly not Teutonic. The legend of Rowena and Vortigern is told by Geoffrey of Monmouth.

Rowton Heath, THE BATTLE OF, was fought during the Civil War (September 24, 1645). After Naseby Charles I took refuge in Wales, where he strove to collect fresh troops. In the middle of September he formed the plan of marching northwards to join Montrose, and raising the siege of Chester on his way. The king himself, with part of his forces, succeeded in entering Chester, which was not completely invested. The besiegers under Sir William Brereton were reinforced by a body of Yorkshire horse under Colonel Poyntz. Sir Marmaduke Langdale, who commanded the troops charged with the duty of raising the siege, attacked rashly, and was taken between the forces of Brereton and Poyntz and utterly routed. He lost 300 killed and wounded, and 1,000 prisoners. This defeat, and the news of Montrose's defeat at Philiphaugh (September 13), obliged the king to abandon his plan.

Roxburgh, one of the four burghs, was surrendered to the English (1174) as security for the fulfilment of the Treaty of Falaise, being restored to Scotland by Richard I (1186). In 1216 it was burnt by John. In 1296 it was given up to Edward I. In 1312 it was surprised by the Black Douglas, and having been regained by the English, was in 1342 stormed by Sir Alexander Ramsay. In 1346 it was retaken by the English, who, although the town was destroyed in the reign of James I, held the castle until 1460, when it fell into the hands of the Scots after a severe siege, in which James II was killed by the bursting of a cannon. The abbey of Roxburgh was destroyed by the Earl of Hertford (1545).

Royal Exchange. [GRESHAM, SIR THOMAS.]

Royal Society, THE, grew out of two small groups of friends who met occasionally in London and Oxford to discuss scientific questions as early as 1645. These were organized into a definite society in 1660; in July 1662 it was granted a charter by Charles II, and incorporated as the Royal Society. The king, as well as his brother James, placed their names in the list of members. Its early meetings took place in Gresham College, and afterwards in Arundel House (1666-1710) and Crane Court (1710-80). They were transferred in 1780 to Somerset House, and to Burlington House in 1857.

Rudyard, SIR BENJAMIN (1572-1658), was elected for Portsmouth in the parliament of 1621, after having recently been appointed surveyor of the Court of Wards (q.v.). He was one of "that band of politicians who hoped to reconcile a stirring foreign policy with the fullest devotion to the Crown." In 1623 he was put forward as the exponent of Buckingham's new policy of war with Spain, and in subsequent parliaments was "the usual mouthpiece of the government." At the beginning of the Long Parliament (1640) he was so far convinced of abuses in the government that he proposed the removal of evil counsellors from the king, though without punishing anyone; and when the Bishops' Exclusion Bill was being discussed he advocated in a vague way a return to primitive episcopacy. He seems to have been a well-meaning dealer in useless commonplaces, without any force of character.

Manning, "Memoirs of Rudyard," 1841.

Rullion Green, THE BATTLE OF (November 1666), resulted in a defeat of the insurgent Covenanters under Colonel Wallace at the hands of the royal troops led by General Dalziel. Rullion Green is a valley dividing the Pentland Hills.

Rumbold, RICHARD (1622?-1685), was an officer in Cromwell's regiment. He guarded the scaffold at Charles I's execution, and was present at Dunbar and Worcester. After the Restoration he settled down at the Rye House, near Hoddesdon in Hertfordshire. Here, in conjunction with others, he planned the assassination of Charles II and the Duke of York (1682). The conspiracy was discovered, and Rumbold had to flee. In 1685 he took part in Argyll's invasion, and was captured and put to death. Surrounded by cowardly and factious associates, he had, through the whole campaign, behaved himself like a soldier trained in the school of the great Protector, had in council strenuously supported the authority of Argyll, and had in the field been distinguished by tranquil intrepidity. Rump. [LONG PARLIAMENT.]

Runes, or Runic characters, comprise the early alphabet used by the Teutonic nations, and especially by the Scandinavians and the Anglo-Saxons. There were in the older form of the Runic alphabet twenty-four letters, sixteen in the newer. They are said to have been revealed to mankind by the god Odin. It has been suggested that they were introduced by Phœnician traders to the people living on the Baltic coast, and were copied from the inscriptions on Greek and Roman coins.

Runnime was the name of the small island in the Thames near Staines, on which John set his seal to the Great Charter, June 15, 1215. [MAGNA CARTA.]

Rupert, PRINCE (1619-82), was the third son of Frederick V, Elector Palatine, and Elizabeth, daughter of James I. Upon the outbreak of hostilities between king and parliament Rupert received the command of the Royalist cavalry, and took part in all the important engagements of the first Civil War. He showed impetuous courage, but little judgment, and to this defect the Royalist defeat at Marston Moor was chiefly due. His surrender of Bristol on September 11, 1645, caused Charles to deprive him of his command. In 1648, however, he was given command of the Royalist fleet, and showed considerable skill in eluding Blake. At last, in 1651, Blake inflicted on him a crushing defeat and destroyed most of his vessels. With the remnant Rupert escaped to the West Indies, where he carried on a buccannering warfare against English merchantmen till 1653, when he managed to reach France. After the Restoration he again obtained high naval command, and did good service under Monck in the war against the Dutch. The later years of his life were spent in scientific researches, and he took the greatest interest in the proceedings of the Royal Society (q.v.), of which he was a leading member.

Russell, THE FAMILY OF, was one of the most ancient in Dorsetshire. In 1506, during his brief stay on the coast of Dorsetshire, where he was compelled to put in by stress of weather, Philip of Austria made the acquaintance of John Russell, and recommended him for employment to Henry VII. Russell received an appointment in the privy chamber, and was henceforth constantly employed in the public service. In 1539 he was created Baron Russell, and in 1549 Earl of Bedford, receiving large grants of the confiscated lands of the abbey of Woburn and Tavistock. In May 1694 William, 5th earl, was created Duke of Bedford and Marquis of Tavistock.

Russell, EDWARD, EARL OF ORFORD (1653-1727), nephew of William, 1st Duke of Bedford, was a naval officer, but withdrew from active service when his kinsman was beheaded, and was one of the seven men who signed the invitation to William III. On the accession of William he was placed on the privy council. He began in 1691 to intrigue with James, and complained bitterly to William of the neglect of the Whigs. In May 1692 he fought the battle of La Hogue (q.v.). James had imagined that the English fleet was friendly to him, and trusted the assurances of Russell. But the ill-timed declaration of the exiled king, and the queen's spirited letter to the fleet, had quite changed the mind of the admiral. He went from ship to ship encouraging the crews, who fought bravely and won a great victory. He was temporarily superseded in his command, but soon recalled, made first lord of the admiralty, and sent to the Mediterranean with most of the English and Dutch ships (1693). On the accession of the Whig Junto to power in 1696 Russell again became first lord of the admiralty, and in 1697 Earl of Orford and Viscount Barfleur. In 1701 he was impeached, together with Portland, Somers, and Montagu, by the victorious Tories, and charged with complicity in the crimes of Captain Kidd (q.v.), an accusation so absurd that it soon fell to the ground. During the reign of Anne he was excluded from office until 1709, when he became first lord of the admiralty till 1710. On the accession of George I he was again placed at the head of the admiralty commission, but henceforth he took but little part in politics.

Russell, FRANCES CROMWELL, LADY (1638-1721). [CROMWELL.]

Russell, FRANCIS, 2ND EARL OF BEDFORD (1527-85), was one of Elizabeth's most trusted counsellors in the early part of her reign. In 1561 he was sent on a special embassy to the court of France, and three years later to Scotland in conjunction with Sir Thomas Randolph. He subsequently commanded the Northern army at Berwick, and in 1566 was sent to represent Elizabeth at the baptism of James VI. In the course of his negotiations in Scotland he managed to incur the displeasure of the queen, who accused him of taking part with the Scottish lords against Mary, whose marriage with the Duke of Norfolk he subsequently opposed.

"Burghley Papers."

Russell, FRANCIS, 4TH EARL OF BEDFORD (d. 1641), was the only son of Lord Russell of Thornhaugh, and on the death of his cousin, the 3rd earl, in 1627, succeeded to the earldom of Bedford. He was one of the chief promoters of the great work of draining the Great Level, afterwards, in his honour, known as the Bedford Level. In politics he occupied a moderate position. He was a personal friend of Pym, but was desirous of devising a modus vivendi between king and parliament. He was the head of the commissioners who negotiated the Treaty of Ripon (q.v.) with the Scots in 1640, and in the early part of the next year, when Charles conceived the idea of forming a ministry from the more moderate of the opposition leaders, he offered Bedford the post of lord treasurer and practically that of prime minister. This scheme, which seemed to promise success, was frustrated by the sudden death of the Earl of Bedford from small-pox. Clarendon sums up his character thus:—"He was a wise man, and would have proposed and advised moderate courses; but was not incapable, for want of resolution, of being carried into violent ones if his advice was not submitted to; and therefore many who knew him well thought his death not unseasonable, as well to his fame as his fortune."

Clarendon, "History of the Rebellion," 1702-4.

Russell, JOHN (d. 1494), was frequently employed in affairs of state by Edward IV, and in 1476 was made Bishop of Rochester. He was translated to Lincoln in 1480, and was one of the executors of Edward's will. In 1483 Gloucester appointed him chancellor, which office he held till 1485, when Richard, suspecting him of treachery, took the great seal from him. Russell was employed by Henry VII on various diplomatic missions, but the later years of his life were spent in the affairs of his bishopric.

Russell, JOHN, 1ST EARL OF BEDFORD (d. 1555), was a gentleman of Dorsetshire attached to the court of Henry VIII. He obtained considerable grants out of the monastic spoils, and thus laid the foundation of the wealth of his family. In 1536 he co-operated energetically with the Duke of Suffolk in repressing the first seeds of discontent in Lincolnshire. Later on in his career Russell again distinguished himself by the complete suppression of the revolutionary outbreak of 1549 in the western counties. Defeating the insurgents in a pitched battle at St. Mary's Clyst, he succeeded in relieving the city of Exeter, which had just previously been hard pressed by the rebel forces, and in entirely destroying their hopes in Cornwall and Devonshire, which were at once placed under martial law. In the council Russell, after these events, took part with Warwick against Somerset, and materially contributed to the Protector's fall. For his services on this occasion Russell, who had been made a peer in 1539, was now, in 1550, created, by Northumberland's influence, Earl of Bedford. On the death of Edward VI he thought it prudent to conform to the Catholic mode of worship. He continued accordingly under Mary to enjoy the royal favour, and he was employed by her on several embassies of importance.

Russell, JOHN, 8TH EARL and 4TH DUKE OF BEDFORD (1710-71), succeeded to the dukedom in 1732. Ten years later he took an active part against Sir Robert Walpole. In 1744 he was appointed a lord commissioner of the admiralty, and a member of the privy council. He was soon afterwards appointed first lord of the admiralty. In 1748, on the resignation of Lord Chesterfield, he was appointed secretary of state for the Southern department, but resigned in 1751, on the dismissal of Lord Sandwich. Five years later he was sent to Ireland as lord-lieutenant. In that office he did not succeed, and exasperated the Irish by asking for his sister-in-law a pension on the Irish establishment. His principle of government was to silence opposition by donatives: nor did he forget his friends, especially Rigby, in the general distribution of Irish money. In 1761 he resigned on Bute's accession to power. In the following year he went to Paris as plenipotentiary to negotiate for peace. In the Grenville ministry he became president of the council. He seems to have acted an independent part in the king's closet, and to have insisted as firmly as Grenville himself on the dismissal of Lord Bute, to whom he was now thoroughly opposed. He was in advance of his age in the knowledge of political economy, and incurred the most violent hatred by opposing a bill to impose duties on foreign silks. In 1765 he was summarily dismissed from office along with Grenville, and, refusing the overtures alike of Lord Chatham and the Duke of Grafton, remained for the rest of his life out of office. But he continued to take an active part in politics, and in 1769 proposed to resuscitate a statute of Henry VIII in order to dispense with juries in the American colonies. Walpole calls the duke "a man of inflexible honesty and good-will to his country," but says that "his manner was impetuous." To this unfortunate trait was probably due his almost universal unpopularity. His portrait has been drawn by Junius, exaggerated and distorted by the rancour of personal animosity.

Russell, LORD JOHN, 1ST EARL (1792-1878), was the third son of John, 6th Duke of Bedford. He was educated at Edinburgh, and entered parliament in 1813 as member for Tavistock in the Whig interest. In December 1819 he took up the question of parliamentary reform and moved four moderate resolutions, henceforth specially associating himself with the reform movement, and annually moving a resolution on the subject. In February 1828 he carried a motion for the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts, and a bill was subsequently passed to that effect. In 1830 he became paymaster of the forces under Lord Grey, and was entrusted with the presentation of the Reform Bill to the House (March 31, 1831). His reputation was greatly increased by the ability which he displayed in the passage of the bill; and when Peel gained office Russell was recognized as leader of the opposition. In 1835 he became home secretary under Melbourne, and in 1839 secretary for war and the colonies. At the general election of 1841 he was returned for the City of London, a seat which he retained for twenty years. In 1845 he declared himself in favour of the repeal of the Corn Laws, in the letter of November 22 to his constituents, and in July 1846 he became prime minister. Four years later, in 1850, he made the great mistake of countenancing the No-Popery agitation by his "Letter to the Bishop of Durham" upon the creation of a Catholic episcopate in England, and by his Ecclesiastical Titles Bill, which, however, remained a dead letter. At the end of 1851 he quarrelled with and dismissed Palmerston, who in the next year brought about the fall of the Russell ministry. In Aberdeen's ministry Russell was at first foreign secretary and afterwards president of the council; in 1855 he resigned, and came back to the foreign office under Palmerston in 1859. In 1861 he was created Earl Russell, and became again prime minister on Palmerston's death in 1865. He was defeated in 1866 on the second Reform Bill, and resigned. He never afterwards held office, though he continued to take an active part in politics, and in 1869 introduced a bill empowering the Crown to confer life-peerages. Earl Russell was a voluminous writer, and edited himself selections from his speeches and dispatches (1870).

Russell, WILLIAM, 5TH EARL AND 1ST DUKE OF BEDFORD (1614-1700), was the son of the 4th Earl of Bedford. He was an opponent of the arbitrary policy of Charles I and Strafford, and a moderate supporter of the Parliament. When the Civil War broke out he joined the Parliamentary standard with a body of horse, and took part in the battle of Edgehill; but he separated from the Parliament in 1643, and joined the king. He was present at the battle of Newbury, on the Royalist side, and greatly distinguished himself. His estates were confiscated, but he succeeded in making his peace with the Parliament and getting them restored. He took some part in the Restoration, and was a prominent supporter of William of Orange at the Revolution of 1688, after which event (in 1694) he was created Duke of Bedford.

Russell, WILLIAM, LORD (1639-83), third son of William, 5th Earl of Bedford, was one of the leaders of the opposition towards the close of the Long Parliament of Charles II. He began the attack upon the Duke of York which led up to the Exclusion Bill, by moving an address in the House of Commons, on November 4, 1678, that the duke should be removed from the royal councils. So popular was he in the country that at the general election in 1679 he was chosen for two counties—Bedfordshire and Hampshire. He was nominated a member of the privy council as reorganized by Temple, but it was impossible that a council containing such discordant elements should work smoothly, and the Whig leaders speedily sought their dismissal. During the Exclusion Bill debates Russell was practically leader of the House, and it was he who took the bill up to the Lords (November 19, 1680). But the court was victorious, and in 1683 took revenge by accusing Russell of participation in the Rye House Plot (q.v.), though it is almost certain that he and his friends had merely discussed the possibility of a popular agitation for a new parliament, and did not contemplate the employment of force. He was tried for high treason at the Old Bailey on July 13, 1683, found guilty, and executed on the 21st, refusing to the last, in spite of the arguments of Tillotson and Burnet, to assent to the doctrine of non-resistance.

Russia, RELATIONS WITH. During the Middle Ages there were practically no relations between England and the barbarous kingdom of the Tsars. The English captain, Chancellor, began in 1553 both commercial dealings by his voyage to the White Sea and diplomatic intercourse by bearing to Moscow a letter from Queen Mary to Ivan the Terrible. In 1568 this mission bore fruit in Ivan's proposal for a commercial treaty giving exclusive rights to English merchants, and a political alliance against Poland and Sweden; but neither of these was ever executed. In 1645 Alexis Mikhailovitch sent Gersim Doktourof to England; but on finding the king to whom he was accredited a prisoner of his own subjects, the envoy withdrew in disgust, and the execution of Charles was followed by the expulsion of English merchants from Russia. After the Restoration the embassy of Lord Carlisle restored diplomatic relations (1663); but nothing of any importance happened until Peter the Great's famous visit to England in 1697. The distant friendship of the two nations was readily broken in 1717 by the coalition of Peter with Charles XII and Alberoni, with the intention, among other objects, of depriving Hanover of Bremen and Verden, and of helping the Pretender to the English throne. But these projects soon passed away, and on the whole friendly relations between the two countries were maintained for the greater part of the eighteenth century. The close alliance of Russia and Austria, the notion that the development of Russia would help in keeping down France and its northern ally Sweden, the common policy of maintaining the Cap faction in power in the latter country, and the importance of the trade between the two nations, all helped to establish their alliance. In 1748 the advance of a Russian force secured for Great Britain and her allies the Peace of Aachen. But in the Seven Years' War Russia did her best to overthrow Great Britain's ally, Prussia. Yet Chatham always maintained the policy of the Russian alliance, and in 1769 Great Britain assisted the fleet of Alexis Orlov in its long voyage from the Baltic to the aid of the revolted Greeks, and an Englishman conducted the fire-ships which destroyed the Turkish fleet in the Bay of Tchesme. Less justifiable was the acquiescence of Great Britain in the first partition of Poland in the year 1772; which was ill requited by Catherine II's abandonment, in the latter part of her reign, of the British alliance in favour of a connexion with France. Thus, in 1780, Catherine joined the Armed Neutrality (q.v.). Little less offensive to Great Britain was her close alliance with Joseph II, whose policy in the Netherlands was diametrically opposed to that of the British. The younger Pitt was the first British statesman who took up the position of hostility to Russia which in later times became so general. While Fox eloquently pleaded for a continuance of the old connexion, Pitt formed an alliance with Poland, Prussia, and Sweden against the "Colossus of the North"; but his threats were unable to prevent Russia's triumph in the Turkish war and the inglorious defeat of Gustavus III of Sweden. The struggle against revolutionary France brought back, however, the old relations. Catherine in her old age was content with denouncing the Revolution. Paul I joined the Second Coalition, and in 1799 British and Russian troops joined to fight an unsuccessful campaign in Holland which led to mutual jealousies and recriminations. As a result Paul formed a close connexion with his hero Napoleon, and established a second Armed Neutrality in the north. After Paul's murder, Alexander I joined the next coalition, but from 1807 to 1812 his alliance with Napoleon isolated Great Britain and allowed the establishment of the Continental System. After 1815 the Tory government kept up a friendship with the instigator of the Holy Alliance. The judicious policy of Canning of joining with Russia to obtain the liberties of Greece was followed with much reluctance, however, by the Wellington ministry which called Navarino (q.v.) an untoward event. The triumph of Liberalism in Great Britain, the sympathy excited by the Polish insurgents, the antagonism of interest in the Levant, and, before long, in Asia as well, gradually produced a settled divergence between the two countries.

[T. F. T.]

[The presentation of the Russian demands at Constantinople for a protectorate over the Christian subjects of the Porte and for a dominant influence in the Straits led to a period of stormy negotiations culminating in the Crimean War (q.v.). The Russian pretensions suffered at the Peace of Paris in 1856, but fifteen years later the preoccupation of Europe in the Franco-Prussian War enabled the Tsar summarily to abrogate the clauses of that treaty which had neutralized the Black Sea. A more acute situation arose in 1878 after the Treaty of San Stefano, when Disraeli, pursuing Palmerston's policy of resolute opposition to Russia, sent troops to Malta to emphasize his demand for a congress of powers. War was averted, however, and the crisis dissolved by the Treaty of Berlin (q.v.). Lord Salisbury subsequently reversed the pro-Turkish policy of Disraeli, and the Liberals revived Canning's policy of watchful co-operation with Russia. Relations remained unsatisfactory for several years, nevertheless. By 1900 Great Britain and Russia were at loggerheads in India [PANJDEH], Persia, Tibet, Afghanistan, and elsewhere. The Anglo-Japanese alliance of 1902 served only to aggravate the differences, and the North Sea outrage of 1905

(q.v.) tended in the same direction. Not until 1907, following the Franco-Russian alliance of 1894 and the Anglo-French entente of 1904, did the Pact of Petersburg resolve all outstanding Anglo-Russian differences and establish the Triple Entente (q.v.). Tension in the East was relieved. During the Great War the two governments were in active co-operation, Great Britain launching the Dardanelles Expedition of 1915 (q.v.) in an endeavour to relieve pressure on the Russian front. But the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics (established in March 1917 on the fall of the Tsardom) remained unrecognized by Great Britain until the advent of Mr. Ramsay MacDonald's first Labour government in 1924, though a Trade Agreement was concluded in 1921. Russia, however, remained antagonistic to the League of Nations, and the continued growth of Bolshevik propaganda in England led to a rupture of relations in May 1927.

Ruthven, ALEXANDER (1580 ?-1600) (the Master of Gowrie), conspired, with his brother John, 3rd Earl of Gowrie, to kidnap King James VI at Gowrie House, and to convey him by sea to Fast Castle (1600). Ruthven, having prevailed upon the king to visit his brother's castle, attacked him there, but was himself slain. This affair is known as the Gowrie Conspiracy (q.v.).

Ruthven, JOHN, 3RD EARL OF GOWRIE (1578 ?-1600), son of William Ruthven, 1st Earl of Gowrie (q.v.), joined with his brother in the Gowrie Conspiracy of 1600 (q.v.), to kidnap King James VI. In the struggle which ensued he was killed by Sir Thomas Erskine, a retainer of the king. He was provost of Perth, and very popular with the citizens, who threatened to make the "king's green coat pay for their provost."

See authorities for Ruthven, Alexander.

Ruthven, PATRICK, EARL OF BRENTFORD (d. 1651), having served in many foreign armies, joined the Royalist troops, and was at once made a field-marshal by Charles I. He had an important command at the battle of Edgehill, and on the death of the Earl of Lindsey was made commander-in-chief of the forces. He was created Earl of Forth, and subsequently Earl of Brentford, by the king, who had a high opinion of his military ability. He was severely wounded in the second battle of Newbury, and obliged to resign his command, being succeeded by Prince Rupert. Clarendon remarks that, "both by reason of his age and his extreme deafness he was not a man of counsel or words; hardly conceived what was proposed, and as confusedly and obscurely delivered his opinion."

Clarendon, "Great Rebellion," vol. viii.

Ruthven, WILLIAM, 1ST EARL OF GOWRIE (1541?-1584), was the leader in the plot to capture James VI known as the Raid of Ruthven (1582), for which act of violence he obtained an indemnity. On the defeat of his party, 1583, he was induced by false promises of pardon to write a letter to the king confessing his guilt. On this evidence he was executed at Stirling, May 1584.

Ruthven, THE RAID OF (August 1582), was the name given to a plot formed against Lennox and Arran, the favourites of James VI, and carried out by seizing the young king and conveying him to Castle Ruthven, and committing him to the charge of the conspirators, chief of whom were the Earls of Mar and Gowrie and the Lords Lindsay and Boyd. In 1582 an Act of Indemnity was passed in which the thanks of the nation were voted to the Earls of Gowrie, Mar, and Glencairn for their rescue of the king from his obnoxious ministers. In 1583, however, James defeated the Ruthven party; Mar and Glamis fled from Stirling, and Gowrie was executed.

Ryder, DUDLEY, 1ST EARL OF HARROWBY (1762-1847), entered public life in 1784 as M.P. for Tiverton. He was a strong supporter of Pitt, under whom he held many offices in succession, till he succeeded to the peerage in 1803. The following year he was appointed foreign secretary, and in 1805 was dispatched to Berlin, Vienna, and Petersburg with a view to forming an offensive alliance against Bonaparte. The battle of Austerlitz, however, put an end to all hopes of uniting Europe against Napoleon, and Harrowby returned home. Three years later he became president of the board of control, and was created an earl (1809). In 1812 he became president of the council, an office which he continued to hold for sixteen years. In the days of the first Reform Bill he was requested to form a cabinet, but declined to undertake so responsible a duty, and it consequently devolved on the Duke of Wellington. On the question of reform he became leader of that section of the peers known by the title of "the Waverers," who, though disapproving of the new measures, felt that obstinate resistance to so popular a movement would entail disaster. From this time he took little part in politics.

Rye House Plot, THE (1683), is the name given to a conspiracy formed by some of the extreme Whigs late in Charles II's reign, after the failure of the Exclusion Bill. Its object was the murder of the king and the Duke of York on their return from Newmarket in April. The king was to have been murdered at a place called the Rye House, near Hoddesden, in Hertfordshire; but the plot never came to anything. It was postponed, and ultimately revealed to the court in June by traitors among those concerned in it. It is improbable that the prominent Whig leaders were privy to this scheme, which was formed chiefly by Richard Rumbold and some of the more violent and obscure members of the party, notably Colonel Ramsey, Robert Ferguson, Walcot, West, Goodenough, and Shepherd. But William, Lord Russell, Algernon Sidney, and the Earl of Essex were arrested for complicity in it. Essex died in the Tower, probably by his own hand; Russell was condemned on the evidence of one witness and executed, together with Sidney (July 21, 1683), at whose trial unpublished writings of his own were admitted as evidence against him.

Rymer, THOMAS (1641-1713), was born at Yafforth, and educated at Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge. In 1692 he received the appointment of historiographer royal, but he died in poverty. Rymer's chief interest to the student of English history is his connexion with the work called "Fœdera." Early in the seventeenth century began the publication upon the continent of general collections of treaties. Such works became very popular, and the "Codex Juris Gentium Diplomaticus" of Leibnitz (1693) seems to have suggested to Halifax and Somers the advisability of publishing a similar collection for England at the national expense. The government accepted the proposal, and entrusted the work to Rymer. Fifteen volumes appeared during his lifetime, and five subsequently, covering the period 1101-1654. The work contains an immense number of treaties, charters, etc.

It is necessary carefully to distinguish the various editions:—(i) Original, 15 vols., ed. Rymer (1704-1713), the later volumes departing from the original plan, and including a large number of documents which touch only domestic affairs; 16th vol. (1715), prepared from Rymer's papers by his assistant, Sanderson, who edited the remaining volumes; 17th (1717), the last two being still more miscellaneous in the character of their contents. An 18th vol. appeared first in 1726, but was withdrawn on account of the remonstrances of the Commons against the breach of privilege committed by printing part of their "Journal"; it was recalled and reissued (1731). Two more volumes were published in 1732 and 1735. Churchill published the first 17 vols.; Tonson the last three. (ii) Tonson's (1727-1729), a reprint of the first 17 vols. (ed. Holmes), published by Tonson through subscription. (iii) Hague (1737-1745), an edition of the first 17 vols., with Holmes's corrections and of Sanderson's three last vols., published in 10 vols. at The Hague, with an important abridgment by Rapin. (iv) Record Commission (1816-1830), 3 vols. in 6 parts, and a portion of 4th vol. covering the period down to 1383, with additions. To these must be added: (v) Syllabus of Fœdera, in English, by Sir Thos. Hardy, 2 vols. (1869-1872), for Record Commission. In the prefaces to this most valuable work a full account and criticism is given of the various editions. [W. J. A.]

Ryswick, THE TREATY OF (September 21, 1697), terminated the war which had begun in 1689 between France and the coalition composed of the Empire, Spain, England, Brandenburg, and Holland. Louis XIV had opened negotiations in 1696, but the other powers had broken them off. At length, in March 1697, the French plenipotentiaries assembled at The Hague, and those of the coalition at Delft, and conferences were opened at Ryswick in May. But, impatient of delay, Louis and William appointed Marshal Boufflers and the Duke of Portland to hold private meetings together. Terms of peace were concluded (July 6). Spain and the emperor refused to agree to them; but Spain soon gave way, and on September 21 three treaties was concluded between France, Holland, Spain, and England. The terms were that France should acknowledge William as King of England, and Anne as his successor, and that all assistance should be withdrawn from James II. France also surrendered all conquests made since the Treaty of Nimeguen, and placed the chief fortresses of the Low Countries in the hands of Dutch garrisons. In November a treaty was concluded between Louis and the emperor. France restored all towns captured since the Treaty of Nimeguen, with the exception of Strassbourg, together with Freiburg, Breisach, Philipsburg, and the French fortifications on the right bank of the Rhine. Lorraine was restored to its duke, who, however, granted a passage through his dominions for French troops. The Elector of Cologne was recognized, and the rights of the Duchess of Orleans upon the Palatinate compromised for money.

Sa, DOM PANTALEON, brother of the Portuguese ambassador in London, killed a man named Greenaway following a fray in the New Exchange (November 22, 1653). He took refuge at the embassy, where it was maintained that he was responsible only to his own sovereign. Arrested and tried, and induced to plead by the threat of the peine forte et dure, he was condemned. Cromwell, while pardoning his accomplices, was inexorable against the principal. On July 10 Sa was executed, amidst great popular rejoicings. Cromwell's firm government was no respecter of persons, and not even the divinity which hedged ambassadors suffered them to violate the municipal law of the state in which they were sojourning.

Saadut Ali (d. 1814), the brother of Asaf-ud-Dowlah, was by a treaty made by Sir John Shore in 1788 assigned the vacant throne of Oudh, upon terms which gave the British the right of garrisoning the important places, and completely subjected Oudh to the British power. Saadut Ali rapidly became so unpopular that he lost all control over his own troops, who, while useless for the defence of Oudh, remained a source of great expense. After the insurrection of Vizir Ali, which had to be put down by British troops, Lord Wellesley insisted peremptorily on their dismissal. In 1800 the nawab announced that he intended to abdicate in favour of one of his sons. Lord Wellesley informed him that he would consent to the abdication provided it was made in favour of the company. The nawab thereupon withdrawing his abdication, Lord Wellesley ordered him to choose between the cession of the whole or part of his dominions. After trying every possible means of escape, the Treaty of Lucknow was concluded (November 10, 1801). Its provisions were that the vizir should cede a large territory, and in return should be released from all future demands on account of Oudh or its dependencies; that the company should always protect and defend the vizir, and that he should only support a few of his own troops for revenue purposes; that the British should guarantee to him his remaining territories; that in the exercise of his authority he should in all cases be guided by the advice of the officers of the company. On January 10, 1802, Lord Wellesley and the vizir met at Cawnpore, where the former insisted on such a reform in the administration of Oudh as should remove the evils and abuses which had so long corrupted all the state machinery. Various remonstrances were at intervals addressed to him on his government, especially during Lord Minto's administration, but he had no mind for reforms which would embarrass his arrangements and curtail his revenue.

Sabert, King of the East Saxons, and nephew of Ethelbert, King of Kent, received Christianity from Augustine, and, with his uncle, instituted the bishopric of London with Mellitus for its first bishop. On his death his sons relapsed into heathenism.

Sac and Soc was an Anglo-Saxon phrase, also extensively used in the Norman period, meaning one of the rights of jurisdiction possessed by private individuals. When extensive grants of land and jurisdiction were made, certain words and phrases were used to denote the types of case which a private court might try. The usual words were sac and soc, toll and team, infangthef and utfangthef, and frithsoken. "Sac seems to mean a cause or matter before a court—that which in later Latin is termed placitum. Soc has a similar meaning. It is apparently derived from a word which means seeking. It means either that a man may seek, investigate or inquire into certain causes; or that certain litigants must seek or make suit to a certain court" (Holdsworth). Where previously the royal officers had sat in judgment, the lord or the lord's reeves now sat. The grants of sac and soc did not as a rule give immunity from the county courts, though they did from the hundred courts. According to Stubbs, "the form is an alliterative jingle which will not bear close analysis."

Sacheverell, HENRY (1674 ?–1724), the son of a Low Church clergyman, entered the Church, and early attached himself to the school of Laud. He became a fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford. In 1705 he was elected chaplain of St. Saviour's, Southwark. In August 1709 he preached a violent assize sermon at Derby, and on November 5, 1709, one at St. Paul's Cathedral before the civic dignitaries on "The Perils of False Brethren both in Church and State," a tirade against the Revolution principles, Dissenters, and the Whig ministry, especially Godolphin, whom he attacked under the name of Volpone, or Old Fox. It is said that 40,000 copies of this sermon were sold. The ministry were naturally angry, and Sunderland proposed that Sacheverell should be impeached. The idea was taken up by Godolphin, but opposed by Somers and Marlborough. Sacheverell's answer to the articles was uncompromising. When it was decided to bring him to trial, the Commons resolved to attend Westminster Hall in a body. Popular sympathy was strongly on his side. "Sacheverell and the Church" was the cry. He read an eloquent defence, supposed to have been written for him by Atterbury. The Lords declared him guilty by sixty-nine to fifty-two (March 20, 1710). He was suspended from preaching for three years, and his sermon was burnt by the common hangman; but a motion that he should be incapable of preferment was thrown out. The sentence was considered an acquittal; a living was bestowed on him in Shropshire, and his journey thither was like a royal progress. The queen saw how unpopular the ministry had become, and hence was encouraged to carry out her plans for its overthrow. [ANNE, QUEEN.] After the period of Sacheverell's suspension was over, the queen presented him with the living of St. Andrew's, Holborn. His first sermon, delivered on Palm Sunday, on the text, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do," he sold for £100. The Commons, to mark their disapproval of the conduct of the previous ministry, appointed him to preach before them on Ascension Day. Burnet's views of his character are hardly overdrawn: "He was a bold, insolent man, with a very small measure of religion, virtue, learning, or good sense; but he resolved to force himself into popularity and preferment by the most petulant railings at Dissenters and Low Churchmen in several sermons and libels, written without chasteness of style or liveliness of expression."

Sacket's Harbour, THE BATTLE OF (May 27, 1813), was fought on Lake Ontario, between the British and Canadians under Sir George Prevost, and the Americans under the command of General Brown. The victory went to the Americans.

Sackville, CHARLES, 6TH EARL OF DORSET (1638-1706), sat as M.P. for East Grinstead as Lord Buckhurst in 1660, but declined all public employment. In 1675 he became gentleman of the bedchamber, and next year succeeded to his father's title. In the reign of James II he was dismissed from the lord-lieutenancy of Sussex. He entered into communication with the Prince of Orange, and on the landing of William assisted the Princess Anne in her flight from Westminster. He became lord chamberlain, and employed his patronage in helping genius and misfortune. On the departure of William for Ireland he was appointed in Mary's Council of Nine. In 1691 he accompanied William to Holland. He was declared by Preston, on the detection of his plot, to be in communication with the Jacobite court of St. Germain. The accusation was probably untrue, although Dorset was no doubt angry at William's leanings towards the Tories. Dorset is better known as the patron of Prior, Dryden, Congreve, and Addison, than as a politician. Macaulay thinks that "had he been driven by necessity to exert himself, he would probably have risen to the highest posts in the State."

Sackville, GEORGE SACKVILLE GERMAIN, 1ST VISCOUNT (1716-85). [GERMAIN.]

Sackville, SIR RICHARD (d. 1566), the father of the famous Thomas, Lord Buckhurst, and a cousin of Anne Boleyn, was a man of great financial abilities, which he so made use of to his own advantage as to gain the nickname of "Fill Sack." Under Queen Mary he was a Catholic, and chancellor of the Court of Augmentations; under Elizabeth a Protestant, and chancellor of the exchequer.

Sackville, THOMAS, 1ST EARL OF DORSET (1536-1608), was the son of Sir Richard Sackville. He was educated at Oxford and Cambridge, studied at the Inner Temple, and served in various diplomatic employments on the continent. In 1567 he was created Lord Buckhurst. In 1587 he was ambassador to the United Provinces, and succeeded Burghley as lord treasurer. In 1604 he was created Earl of Dorset. He was the joint author with Thomas Norton of the tragedy of "Gorboduc" (1561), the earliest blank-verse drama in our language.

Sadleir's Case (1857). James Sadleir, member for Tipperary, had been deeply concerned with his brother, John Sadleir, member for Sligo, in a series of fraudulent banking transactions connected with the Tipperary Bank. When they were discovered John Sadleir committed suicide and James Sadleir fled. The latter was thereupon formally expelled from the House of Commons (February 19), on the motion of the attorney-general for Ireland.

Sadler, SIR RALPH (1507-87), a protégé of Thomas Cromwell, was much thought of by Henry VIII for the skill and ability which he displayed as a diplomatist. In 1537 he was sent on an embassy to James V of Scotland, to endeavour to detach him from his alliance with France, and to aid the cause of the Reformed religion in Scotland. He fulfilled his mission with such discretion that Henry appointed him one of the twelve councillors who were to assist his executors in the government during the minority of Edward VI. In 1547 he was present at the battle of Pinkie, and greatly distinguished himself; while in 1549 he aided in suppressing Ket's rebellion. "The able and truthful Sir Ralph Sadler" became one of Elizabeth's most trusted diplomatic agents, and a strong Puritan, and was often employed in Scottish negotiations. In 1559 he was sent to the Scottish border with instructions "to treat in all secrecy with any manner of persons in Scotland for the union of the realms," and to assist the Protestant party with secret sums of money. He was one of the English commissioners at the Treaty of Leith (1560), and in 1568 served on the commission of York on the occasion of the inquiry into the murder of Darnley. In 1580-1 he acted as jailer to Mary, Queen of Scots, at Wingfield; but found the charge of her whom "he had held in his arms as a baby" so irksome that he petitioned to be removed. After the execution of Mary, in whose trial he took part, he was again sent on a diplomatic errand to Scotland to announce to James VI his mother's death, and to explain that Elizabeth was in no way to blame. This delicate mission, which he successfully accomplished, was his last, as he died a month or two later.

Sadulapur, THE BATTLE OF (December 3, 1848), was fought during the Sikh War. After the failure at Ramnagar (q.v.), Lord Gough ordered Sir Joseph Thackwell to cross the Chenab at Wuzirabad and turn the Sikh position. Shere Singh thereupon withdrew from Ramnagar, and the two armies met at the village of Sadulapur. For two hours the British sustained the fire of the enemy without returning till they were fully in range, when their artillery opened with deadly effect. The Sikhs retired slowly, and Sir Joseph did not deem it wise to follow. The advantage of the action doubtless rested with Shere Singh (q.v.), who had marched away at his own will to a better position, but Lord Gough thought fit to claim the victory. [SIKH WARS.]

Sadusam, THE BATTLE OF (July 1, 1848), was fought during the second Sikh War. After Kineyri, Lieutenant Edwardes was reinforced by 4,000 men from Kashmir. Mulraj, alarmed at the growing power of his opponents, drew together his whole force, which had been augmented by 11,000 deserters, and attacked them near Sadusam. The battle began with a furious cannonade, which lasted several hours, but at last a charge by one of Colonel Cortland's regiments broke the ranks of the Sikhs. Mulraj fled, and was followed by his whole army to Multan.

St. Albans, in the immediate neighbourhood of the famous Roman municipium of Verulamium, is famous as the site of one of the greatest Benedictine abbeys. It gains its modern name from Alban, said to have been martyred there under Diocletian. The abbey was founded in his honour by Offa of Mercia in 793. The town is said to date from the days of Abbot Wulsin, to whom is attributed the erection of the three parish churches. The St. Albans villeins joined in the Peasants' Revolt of 1381 (q.v.), their rebellion constituting one of the most famous incidents in the abbey's history. In 1455 and 1461 two battles of more political than military importance were fought at St. Albans between the Yorkists and Lancastrians. The abbey church, made parochial at the Dissolution, is the cathedral church of the new diocese of St. Albans.

W. Page, "St. Albans," 1920.

St. Albans, BATTLES OF. I. The first engagement of the Wars of the Roses was fought at St. Albans in May 1455. It was brought about by the recovery of Henry VI from his fit of insanity (Christmas 1454), and the consequent termination of the protectorate of Richard, Duke of York. The Somerset party were again in power, and York, seeing his influence at an end, determined to secure by force of arms the downfall of Somerset. Accordingly he collected troops in the north and marched towards London. The king advanced in force to meet him, and after a vain attempt at negotiation a battle followed which, though only lasting half an hour, had most important results. Somerset was slain, together with other Lancastrian nobles, the king wounded, and York completely victorious.

II. The second battle of St. Albans was fought on February 17, 1461, by Queen Margaret and the Lancastrians against the Earl of Warwick. After the victory at Wakefield Margaret marched towards London, and was met at St. Albans by Warwick. The Lancastrians gained the day, the king was released, and Warwick compelled to retire. But the results of the battle were altogether thrown away. London was not occupied, nor was the Earl of Warwick prevented from effecting a junction with Edward. The Lancastrians, through the influence of Henry, who shrank from exposing the capital to pillage at the hands of his unruly northerners, retired to the north, and within a fortnight the Yorkists were in possession of London, and Edward recognized as king.

St. Albans, THE COUNCIL OF (August 4, 1213), was one of the general councils of John's reign. It was regarded by Stubbs as extremely important in constitutional history and as a step in the progress of the representative system, since, according to Roger of Wendover, there were summoned to it not merely the great barons, but representatives (the reeve and four others) of the people of the towns in the royal demesne. Stubbs's interpretation has, however, been much criticized of recent years. The passage in Wendover is obscure; and, as a recent investigator of the subject has written: "To see in it the origin of the representation of the towns in parliament... is an error too evident to need refutation." The council was called by the justiciar, Geoffrey Fitz-Peter, who promised to abide by the laws of Henry I henceforth. The summons to a council at Oxford in the same year, in which each of the sheriffs is ordered to send four discreet knights from his shire, is of much greater historical significance; although no record of the proceedings of the assembly has been preserved, and it is possible that it never actually met. [COMMONS, THE HOUSE OF.]

St. Albans, FRANCIS BACON, VISCOUNT (1561-1626). [BACON.]

St. Aldwyn, SIR MICHAEL EDWARD HICKS-BEACH, VISCOUNT (1837-1916). [HICKS-BEACH.]

St. Brice's Day, THE MASSACRE OF (November 12, 1002), is said to have been occasioned by the report that the Danes in England (i.e., presumably the mercenaries in the service of Ethelred, and not the Danes of the Danelagh) had formed a plot for murdering the king and the witan. Accordingly orders were sent forth by the king that all should be slain; and although the story of the massacre has probably been greatly exaggerated, there is no reason to doubt that a considerable slaughter took place. Sweyn's sister Gunhild is said to have been one of the victims.

St. Carilef, of SAINT CALAIS, WILLIAM OF, was first prior of St. Calais in Maine, and then abbot of St. Victor's in Le Mans, and ultimately became Bishop of Durham in 1080. Famous in the history of his see for substituting monks for secular canons in his cathedral church, he has a place in history as the foremost adviser of William Rufus in the beginning of his reign. The chronicler of Peterborough says (s.a. 1088), "So well did the king to the bishop that all England followed his counsel and did so as he would." But in a few months he joined the feudal movement against William, apparently in circumstances of great treachery. He was involved in the general failure, his temporalities were seized, his lands were ravaged, and he himself brought to trial before the king's court. His trial is of great constitutional importance, both as illustrating the procedure of the Norman courts at an early stage of development, and because in the course of it William made the first recorded appeal to Rome against the judgment of the great council. After every legal subtlety had been exhausted, William was banished to Normandy. In 1091 he was restored to his see, and again exercised great influence over Rufus, figuring as the king's adviser against Anselm. But in 1095 he reverted to his old policy by joining the feudal rising of Mowbray, and only his death on January 1, 1096, saved him from a second trial. He was buried in the chapter-house, that the monks who loved their founder might ever have his tomb before their eyes. Apart from his liberality to his church, he appears in history as a thoroughly unscrupulous man.

There is a full account of William of St. Calais in Freeman's "William Rufus," vol. i, and vol. ii, note C.

St. Charles, in Lower Canada, was the scene of the defeat of the Canadian rebels on November 25, 1837, by Colonel George Augustus Wetherall.

St. Christopher's is the original name for the West Indian Island now called St. Kitt's (q.v.).

St. Denis, in Lower Canada, was the scene of a partial victory of the Canadian rebels in 1837 over the government troops under Colonel Gore.

St. Eustache, in Lower Canada, was the scene (1837) of the total defeat of the rebel Canadians under Girod by Sir John Colborne. This was the last skirmish in the Canadian insurrection.

St. Giles's Fields, THE MEETING IN (January 9, 1414), was planned by the Lollards. A large body (report said a hundred thousand in number) was to assemble in St. Giles's Fields outside London, where they would be met by thousands of city apprentices, and headed by Sir John Oldcastle (q.v.). Their design, it was said, was to seize the king and his brothers, make Oldcastle regent, and set up a new government. The vigilance of Henry V defeated their designs; the gates of the city were closed, and St. Giles's Fields occupied by troops, who easily put the insurgents to flight.

St. Helena, an island in the South Atlantic, was discovered by Juan de Nova Castella, a Portuguese navigator, on St. Helena's day, May 21, 1502; in 1513 a small settlement was formed by some Portuguese, but had only a short existence. In 1588 the island was visited by Captain Thomas Cavendish, and in 1645 was occupied by the Dutch, who, however, relinquished it in 1651 for the Cape of Good Hope. In 1661 the East India Company obtained a charter for the occupation of the island from Charles II, and a large settlement was speedily formed. In 1673 the island was surprised and captured by the Dutch, but was retaken in the same year. It was held by the East India Company until 1834, when it was surrendered to the British government. Slavery in the island was abolished between 1826 and 1836. St. Helena is celebrated as having been the place of imprisonment of Napoleon Bonaparte, who died there (1821). General Cronje, Colonel Schiel, and a large number of Boers were shipped to St. Helena in 1900 as prisoners of war. The garrison was withdrawn from the island in 1906. St. Helena was a station of great importance so long as the ordinary route for India passed round the Cape of Good Hope.

After the opening of the Suez Canal it became a place of historic interest only.

St. John, HENRY, VISCOUNT BOLINGBROKE (1678-1751), the son of Sir Henry St. John, was educated at Eton and Christ Church. In the year 1700 he married, and in the following year entered parliament for Wootton Bassett, and attached himself to Harley and the Tories. When Harley was appointed secretary of state in 1706 St. John was made secretary for war. He retired with Harley in 1708, and returned with the Tories after the Sacheverell episode, in 1710, as one of the secretaries of state. The position of his party was a doubtful and dangerous one. Peace was loudly called for by a section of the people, and was in itself a desirable enough object. But there is little to be urged in excuse of the steps by which it was brought about. Under St. John's conduct England deserted her allies, and, in violation of all her agreements, proceeded to enter into private negotiations with France. [UTRECHT, TREATY OF.] At home the Tory leaders were engaged in a course of intrigues, with the object of counteracting the predominance which the Whigs were sure to gain under the house of Hanover. The army and the civil service were being gradually filled with men who were really Jacobites, and the design seems to have been entertained of changing the succession. The struggle for power between Harley, now Earl of Oxford, and Bolingbroke (called to the Upper House as Viscount Bolingbroke in 1712) interfered with this project, and very greatly weakened the party. Through the influence of Lady Masham with the queen, Oxford was dismissed on July 2, 1714. But Bolingbroke's tenure of undivided power was very short. On July 30 the queen was seized with the attack of apoplexy which was to prove fatal to her. At the council which was summoned on the emergency the Whig dukes of Argyll, Somerset, and Shrewsbury succeeded in carrying the resolution by which the last-named became lord treasurer. On the death of the queen (August 1) Bolingbroke deliberated, and was lost. The Whig dukes seized the reins of government, proclaimed the Elector king, and sent special messengers summoning him to England. The new parliament was violently Whig. Bolingbroke, knowing that he would be impeached, fled to France (March 25, 1715). On June 10 he was impeached, and on September 16 his name was struck off the list of peers and sentence of banishment was passed upon him. He now entered the service of the Pretender, and was nominated by that prince his secretary of state; but in 1716 he was dismissed from the prince's employment, and a breach took place between him and the extreme Jacobites. For some years he remained in France, devoting himself chiefly to study and to the society of the Marquise de Villette, a niece of Madame de Maintenon, whom he ultimately married. In 1723 he was permitted to return to England, and an act of parliament was passed allowing him to enjoy his property; but he was still excluded from the House of Lords. He joined the opposition against Walpole, and for many years carried on relentless hostilities against that minister by means of intrigue and political journalism. He contributed largely to the Craftsman, a periodical which had a large circulation, and a reputation very damaging to Walpole's cause. In 1735, however, he found it prudent once more to withdraw to France, where he remained till 1742. On the fall of Walpole he found that his allies in opposition were not disposed to admit him to any share of power. He withdrew altogether from politics, and spent the remaining nine years of his life in philosophical retirement at Battersea. Bolingbroke's writings produced more effect on the thought of the eighteenth century than their intrinsic merits seem to warrant. His political and historical works, of which the chief are "Letters on the Study of History," "Remarks on the History of England," "A Dissertation upon Parties," "The Idea of a Patriot King," and "A Letter to Sir William Windham," are evidently composed in great part to justify his own action in public life; but they contain a good deal of suggestive disquisition, and some fine passages of declamatory eloquence.

Bolingbroke's "Works" were published by Mallet in 1754 in 5 vols. His "Correspondence" appeared in 1798, edited by Gilbert Parke. Biographies by MacKnight, 1863; W. S. Sichel, 1901, and A. Hassall, 1889 and 1915; J. M. Robertson, "Bolingbroke and Walpole," 1919. [S. L.]

St. John, OLIVER (1598?-1673), a prominent lawyer and politician of the time of Charles I, was called to the bar in 1626, and soon identified himself with the popular party. He distinguished himself by his defence of Hampden in the question of ship-money. He was an active member of the Short and Long Parliaments, and in January 1641 the king, with a view to conciliating the popular party, made St. John solicitor-general. Notwithstanding this, he was one of the managers of Strafford's impeachment, and on every occasion opposed the wishes of the king, till at last, in 1643, he was removed from his office. He was made by parliament one of the commissioners of the great seal in 1643, and held this office till 1646. In 1648 he was appointed chief justice of the Common Pleas, and was soon afterwards made a member of the council of state. He was closely connected with Cromwell by marriage, and supported him in his expulsion of parliament, but was opposed to the protectorate, though he favoured the idea of kingship, and was later one of the members of Cromwell's House of Lords. After Cromwell's death he supported the parliament against the army, and on the Restoration he very narrowly escaped being excepted from the Act of Indemnity. The rest of his life was passed in retirement. His character is painted in unfavourable colours by all historians. Carlyle speaks of him as "a dusky, tough man, whose abstruse fanaticisms, crabbed logics, and dark ambition issue all in dreaded avarice at last"; and Clarendon describes him as being "a man reserved, of a dark and clouded countenance, very proud and conversing with very few, and those men of his own humour and inclinations."

Carlyle, "Cromwell's Letters and Speeches."

St. Kitt's (or St. Christopher, called after Columbus, who discovered it in 1493) was colonized simultaneously by French and English under Warner and D'Esnambue in 1625. Expelled by the Spaniards in 1629, the colonists returned and flourished. A partition treaty of 1628 formed the basis of repeated agreements of mutual neutrality even in time of war between the two nations despite the French conquests in 1666 and 1689. The whole island was ceded to Great Britain in 1713, only to be ravaged in 1782 and 1805, but remaining ultimately British. It is now governed as a Crown colony by a governor assisted by a legislature of 14 nominated members, half of whom are unofficial, and a nominated executive council.

St. Leger, SIR ANTHONY (1496?-1559), was sent over to Ireland in 1537 as commissioner of forfeited lands, and in August 1540 became lord deputy. His government was vigorous and successful. He subdued the Kavanaghs, and their chief had to give up the title of "The MacMurrough." At a parliament held by him about this time even Desmond attended, and this was considered a great achievement. He was able to send Irish troops to Scotland and France to take part in the king's wars. In 1546 he subdued the long refractory clans of the O'Moores and O'Connors. In 1551 Sir James Croft succeeded him as lord deputy, but he again held the office from 1553 to 1556. Both his sons became in turn lord president of Munster.

St. Leger, SIR WARHAM (1525?-1597), son of Sir Anthony St. Leger, succeeded in relieving Haddington, 1548, when besieged by the French and Scots. In 1566 he defeated Shane O'Neill, and in 1579 did good service in the Desmond rebellion in spite of Ormonde's opinion of him, that he was "an old alehouse knight, malicious, impudent, void of honesty; an arrogant ass that had never courage, honesty, or truth in him."

St. Leonards, EDWARD BURTENSHAW SUGDEN, BARON (1781-1875). [SUGDEN.]

St. Lucia, the largest of the British Windward Island group, was discovered by Columbus in 1502, and was visited in 1605 by Englishmen who were expelled by the Caribs. The island was included in a British royal grant (1627) to Carlisle and a French one in 1635, but English settlers from St. Kitt's and Bermudas in 1638 were driven out by the Caribs by 1641. In 1650 Du Parquet bought it from the French West India Company, formed a settlement with Martinique settlers, made a treaty with the Caribs, only to be overcome by Warner in 1664. Shortly evacuated, it was restored by the Treaty of Breda (1667) to France, who made it a dependency of Martinique. A British treaty with the natives in the following year ignored facts, and in 1718 it was granted to d'Estrée by the French king. In 1723 Martiniquers expelled the British who settled there under George I's grant to Montague, but both nations agreed to an evacuation in 1730, followed by a joint guarantee of neutrality by the Peace of Aix-la-Chapelle in 1748. Seized, however, in 1756 by the French, it was surrendered in 1762 to Rodney, ceded to the French by the Peace of Paris (1763) and populated from St. Vincent and Grenada. It enjoyed separate government until it was attached to Martinique in 1768. Again captured by the British in 1778, it was restored in 1783 (Peace of Versailles), to change hands successively in 1794 to Lord St. Vincent, having adopted revolutionary principles; in 1795 being recovered by Victor Hughes; reduced in 1797 by Abercromby and Moore; restored to France at the Peace of Amiens (1802); capitulating in the following year; finally being ceded in 1814 to the British, who abolished slavery twenty years later. It was attached to the Windward Islands (q.v.) government in 1818 and is governed now as a Crown colony by an administrator with a nominated non-executive council, a nominated legislative council of 5 official and 5 unofficial members, under a system of modified and codified French law.

St. Mary Clyst, THE BATTLE OF (August 4-5, 1549), was fought between the royal troops under Lord Russell and the Devonshire insurgents under Humphrey Arundell. After a severe engagement the rebels were defeated, and on August 6 the siege of Exeter was raised.

St. Ruth (d. 1691), a distinguished French general, arrived at Limerick in 1691, to take command of the Irish army. Unfortunately he quarrelled with both Sarsfield and Tyrconnel. Irritated at the capture of Athlone, he determined to give battle to the English in opposition to the advice of his Irish officers. At Aghrim, at the critical moment of the battle, his head was carried off by a cannon-ball.

St. Vincent, one of the Windward Islands, was discovered by Columbus (1498). In 1627 it was granted by Charles I to Lord Carlisle, and in 1672 to Lord Willoughby, but no permanent settlement was made in the island until 1719, when some French colonists came from Martinique. The neutrality of St. Vincent was recognized in 1660 and later by the Peace of Aix-la-Chapelle (1748), but in 1762 the island was taken by the British and confirmed to them by the Treaty of Paris in the following year. In 1773 the Caribs were granted reserves. In 1779 it again fell into the hands of the French, but was restored to Great Britain by the Treaty of Versailles (1783). In 1794 an insurrection broke out amongst the natives owing to the intrigues of the French planters, and on its suppression 5,000 negroes were sent out of the island. Emancipation in 1838 was followed by the introduction of Portuguese labourers in 1846 and coolies from the East Indies in 1861. The government of St. Vincent, which extends to some of the Grenadine Islands, is vested in an administrator, an executive council, and a legislative council of four official and three unofficial members, which was granted in 1877.

St. Vincent, JOHN JERVIS, EARL OF (1735-1823). [JERVIS.]

St. Vincent, THE BATTLE OF CAPE (February 14, 1797), ended in the complete defeat of the Spanish fleet. The Spanish admiral, having been falsely informed that Sir John Jervis had only 9 ships (he had actually 15), determined to attack him with his 27. Nelson, sailing to join the British fleet, had fallen in with the Spaniards, and on arriving at Sir John's station off Cape St. Vincent on February 13 informed him of the enemy's movements. The next morning the Spaniards hove in sight, and were attacked before they could form in line. By a rapid movement Sir John passed through their fleet, and thus at once cut off nine ships, which were unable to join their companions, and soon took to flight. The admiral then devoted his attention to the main body, and gave the signal to attack in succession. Nelson, in the rear, using his own judgment, disobeyed the order, and at once came into action with seven Spanish ships at once. He was joined by Trowbridge, and together for nearly an hour they supported this unequal contest. Then Collingwood came up, and took two of the ships off his hands. By these tactics Nelson prevented the main body from joining the nine separated ships, or from getting off without an engagement. The battle was confined chiefly to the part of the fleet which Nelson had engaged. These, however, formed the most important part, and they were nearly all captured. The greater number of the enemy's ships got safely away without being severely engaged. Sir John Jervis fully recognized the great service rendered by Nelson, and publicly thanked him. The victory was decisive, and for some time rendered the Spanish fleet almost powerless. The news of it was received in England on March 3 with rapturous applause, and Jervis was created Earl of St. Vincent.

"Saints," THE BATTLE OF THE (April 12, 1782), fought off the Îles des Saintes in the West Indies, resulted in a victory for the British fleet (under Rodney) over the French fleet of de Grasse, which had been making from Fort Royal to San Domingo to join the Spanish fleet. The battle was preceded by a short skirmish on April 9. In numbers the British fleet was superior, and did considerable damage to the French vessels crowded with troops intended for an attack on Jamaica. Rodney brought the action to a decision by the manœuvre known as breaking the enemy's line. The engagement lasted nearly twelve hours, and resulted in the capture of de Grasse's flagship and four other vessels. It also saved Jamaica from the French invasion.

Salabut Jung (d. 1782), son of the Nizam-ul-Mulk, was appointed to the sovereignty of the Deccan on the death of Mirzapha Jung, in 1751, without grown-up children. His elevation was the result of Bussy's influence, and his close adherence to the enterprising Frenchman made the French masters of the whole Deccan. A quarrel soon broke out between the Nizam and Bussy, which, though healed for a time, became permanent in 1759. This threw Salabut Jung into the hands of the British, with whom he speedily concluded a treaty, and he was recognized as lawful Nizam by the Treaty of Paris.

Saladin Tithe, THE, was levied in 1188 on the authority of a council held at Geddington (q.v.), for the support of the crusaders against the powerful Saracen chief, Saladin. Its chief importance lies in the fact that it is regarded as the first instance of a tax on personal property, a tenth of all movables being exacted from clergy and laity alike, except those who had themselves taken the cross. It is also interesting as illustrating the employment of a jury to assess doubtful cases.

Stubbs, "Select Charters," ed. H. W. O. Davis, 1913.

Salamanca, THE BATTLE OF (July 22, 1812), was one of the most decisive of Wellington's victories in Spain. At noon Marmont, whose object was to cut off the British retreat, dispatched the whole of his left wing to seize the road from Salamanca to Ciudad Rodrigo, while many of his troops were still marching through a thick forest of cork trees. Wellington at once perceived the opportunity of cutting off the entire left wing thus separated from the rest of the army. The British hurried down from their vantage-ground on the hills, and at five o'clock Pakenham fell upon the head of Marmont's division, which was marching in disorder, under the idea that the British were in full retreat. In half an hour the French left was utterly overwhelmed, and fell back in hopeless confusion upon the centre and right, both of which were already retiring before the attacks of the fourth and fifth divisions. The chief French generals had fallen, and the command devolved on Clausel, who tried to form a connexion with the remnants of Mar-mont's division. But before the French could rally, the British cavalry, supported by infantry, were upon them; and what the former left undone, the latter completed. Even now Clausel attempted to retrieve the disaster. Bringing up fresh troops, he made so fierce an attack on the fourth and fifth divisions, already exhausted by their previous struggles, that they were only saved from destruction by the arrival of Clinton with the sixth division, which had been hitherto unengaged. Their arrival finally decided the battle. The French were hopelessly routed, and it required great skill on Foy's part to save even the relics of his army. Meanwhile the road to Madrid was now open to Wellington. [PENINSULAR WAR.]

Salar Jung, Sir (1829-83), was descended from the great Mir Allum. In 1853 he was appointed minister to the nizam. Under his able management the Hyderabad state continued to prosper. He never swerved in his allegiance to Great Britain, even during the Mutiny. In 1860 he was made a Knight of the Star of India.

Saibai, The Treaty of (May 17, 1782), was concluded between the East India Company and Sindhia on behalf of the Mahrattas. Its stipulations were that all territory acquired by the British since the Treaty of Poorunder (q.v.) should be restored; that the Gaekwar should be replaced in his original position in Gujarat; that Ragoba should be allowed three lacs of rupees a year; that Hyder should be required to relinquish all his conquests in the Carnatic, and to release all his prisoners within six months; and that in the event of refusal, he should be attacked by the forces of the Peshwa.

Sale, Sir Robert Henry (1782-1845), after a long and distinguished military career, commanded a column in the second Burmese War (1824). He went with the Afghan expedition in 1839, and was present at the siege of Ghazni, where he was severely wounded in a hand-to-hand encounter. After the occupation of Kabul and the evacuation of Afghanistan, he retired into Jalalabad (q.v.) for winter quarters. Here he was besieged by Akbar Khan (January-April 1842), but raised the siege before the arrival of General Pollock's relieving force. He was killed at Mudki.

Salisbury was the seat of a bishopric which was transferred to it from the adjacent town of Old Sarum early in the thirteenth century. The Sarum bishopric had been founded in 1075. In 1295 Old Sarum returned a member to parliament, though Salisbury, or New Sarum, was even then a more important place, and did so regularly from 1360 to 1832, till disfranchised by the Reform Act of the latter year. The cathedral of Salisbury was begun in 1220. In 1086, after the completion of the Domesday Survey, William I summoned to Salisbury a meeting of all the landowners of England, "of whomsoever they hold their lands," to take the oath of allegiance to himself. This was the famous "Sarum oath." In 1116 a similar gathering was convoked by Henry I to swear to the succession of the Atheling William. These councils were of great constitutional importance as illustrating the permanence of the national element in the English state during the most flourishing period of feudalism.

Salisbury, Earls and Marquis of. [CECIL; MONTACUTE; NEVILLE.]

Salisbury, John of (d. 1180), studied at Paris under Abelard, and other great philosophers of the day. On his return to England he was made secretary to Archbishop Theobald, and through his influence was employed by the king on diplomatic errands. He was the confidential adviser of Becket, and shared his disgrace and exile. In 1176 he was made Bishop of Chartres, which see he held for four years. His most important work is the "Polycraticus," in which he attacks the vices of the age, and particularly those of the court. Besides this, he wrote a life of his friend Becket, and numerous letters of his have been preserved which are of considerable historical value.

Salisbury, Thomas (1555?-1586), one of the six conspirators in Babington's conspiracy (q.v.) who were specially told off to assassinate Elizabeth, was executed at Tyburn (September 21, 1586).

Salomons' Case. In 1851 Alderman Salomons, a Jew, was returned for the borough of Greenwich, made his appearance in parliament and took the oaths, omitting the words "on the true faith of a Christian." He was directed to withdraw. Later, however, he entered the House and took his seat above the bar, and was only removed by the interposition of the serjeant-at-arms. The House of Commons agreed to a resolution in the same form as in the case of Mr. de Rothschild. [ROTHSCHILD'S CASE.] "In the meantime, however," says Sir Erskine May, "he had not only sat in the House, but had voted in three divisions; and if the House had done him an injustice, there was now an opportunity for obtaining a judicial construction on the statutes by the courts of law. By the judgment of the Court of Exchequer affirmed by the Court of Exchequer Chamber, it was soon placed beyond further doubt that no authority short of a statute was competent to dispense with those words which Mr. Salomons had omitted from the oath of abjuration." Salonika Campaigns, The (1915-1918), were undertaken in order to bring relief to the Serbian army, which had suffered disastrously in 1915, particularly in view of the approximation of Bulgaria to the central powers. Bulgaria mobilized on September 22, 1915, and on October 5 a Franco-British force disembarked at Salonika under Generals Mahon and Sarraill. After a short offensive which resulted in a retreat to Salonika to avoid isolation (Serbia having resolved to retire towards the Adriatic), the allied force was reinforced early in 1916, and by July numbered 300,000 men, opposed to 280,000 German and Bulgarian troops. Its action was hampered by political disputes with Greece, uncertainty as to the attitude of Rumania, and the fact that Sarraill's orders from Paris were issued without prior consultation among the allied powers. The first allied offensive began, however, on September 10, 1916, west of the Vardar, following a Bulgarian attack in August. The Serbian troops entered Monastir on November 19. On December 11, in view of the collapse of Rumania, a defensive line was established from Monastir to the sea through Dorrain. The second offensive opened on March 12, 1917, the allied forces now numbering 600,000, including Russian and Italian troops. It soon came to an end (May) through the delay in developing French and Serbian advances to support the British. The campaign degenerated into stagnation, and at the close of the year Sarraill was replaced by General Guillaumat until July 1918, when General Franchet d'Esperey took command. Under his direction the final allied offensive of September 1918 opened on a concentrated front of seven miles. Within three weeks the Bulgarian front west of the Vardar collapsed. By September 26 the British troops had penetrated into Bulgarian territory. On the 29th Bulgaria sued for and obtained an armistice. The re-occupation of Serbia followed rapidly.

Sampford Courtenay, THE BATTLE OF (August 1549), was fought between Lord Russell and the Western insurgents, resulting in the final defeat of the latter. Sampford is a village on the slopes of Dartmoor. On Whit-Sunday the revolt had begun at the same place by the people compelling the priest to read Mass in Latin instead of the new service book.

Sampson, THOMAS (1517 ?-1589), one of the reformers of the reign of Edward VI, was compelled to live at Strasburg during the Marian persecution on account of his religious opinions. After the accession of Elizabeth he returned to England and became dean of Christ Church in 1561. In 1567 he was imprisoned for Nonconformity.

Sanchia, second wife of Richard Earl of Cornwall (q.v.), King of the Romans, to whom she was married in 1242, was the daughter of Count Raymond of Provence, and the sister of Eleanor, wife of Henry III.

Sancroft, WILLIAM (1617-93), Archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Fressingfield, in Suffolk, and educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge. Ejected from his fellowship in 1651 for royalism, he remained in exile till Charles II's accession. In 1662 he was made master of his college, in 1664 dean of York and dean of St. Paul's, and in 1677 archbishop. Soon after the accession of James II he came into collision with the king. On the promulgation of the Declaration of Indulgence (q.v.) Sancroft and six of his suffragans presented a petition to the king against the measure. In consequence the seven prelates were committed to the Tower (June 8, 1688), and tried in the court of King's Bench for misdemeanour (June 29); but the jury, in spite of pressure from the government, acquitted them next day. Sancroft was an honest but narrow-minded man, a strong Tory and High Churchman. Though he led the Seven Bishops against James II, he advocated the regency scheme in the Convention Parliament, and ended by refusing to take the oaths to William and Mary. He was deprived of his see in 1690 in favour of Tillotson, and died three years later at Fressingfield.

Sanctuary was the name given to a place privileged as a safe refuge for criminals and political offenders. All churches and churchyards were, down to Henry VIII's time, invested with this protective power. The possible stay in sanctuary of any fugitive was limited to a period of forty days, at the expiration of which time he was bound to take the oath of abjuration and to quit the realm by the nearest port assigned him by the coroner to whom he had communicated the circumstances of his case. During his journey to the sea-coast for the purpose of carrying out this self-banishment the claimant of sanctuary privileges was guaranteed immunity from molestation as he journeyed on, cross in hand, but he was obliged to follow without deviation the route assigned to him. In Henry III's reign Hubert de Burgh's non-compliance with the forty days' sanctuary regulation placed him in the hands of his enemies. In the case of certain specially privileged sanctuaries, such as that of St. John of Beverley, the criminal was, however, allowed, on taking the oath to the lord of the liberty, to remain for life. By Henry VII's time the custom of sanctuary was very much abused, having become the means of shielding criminals of all kinds from justice, and at his request Pope Innocent VIII made three important alterations in it. First, that if a man, while enjoying the privileges of sanctuary, should take advantage of his position to commit some further offence against the laws of his country, he should at once and for ever forfeit the benefit of sanctuary; secondly, that the benefit of sanctuary should be strictly limited to a man's personal safety, and in no degree apply to the protection of his private property; thirdly, that when treason was the motive for seeking sanctuary, the king might have the offender specially looked to. Under Henry VIII several further important modifications were effected. In 1529, since banishment was proving ineffectual, it was enacted that persons who had abjured should go to such sanctuary as they should choose and remain there for life. In 1535-6 (27 Henry VIII, c. 19), sanctuary men were ordered to wear distinctive badges, and were forbidden to carry weapons, or to be out at nights, on pain of forfeiture of their privileges. Finally in 1540 (32 Henry VIII, c. 12) the places which should be regarded as sanctuaries were defined by the act, and further rigid restrictions were placed upon the exercise of their rights. Until the twenty-first year of James I the custom still persisted, and criminals continued to seek refuge in the places to which the privilege of sanctuary was attached. In 1623-4, however, a statute was passed abolishing sanctuary privileges altogether.

Sanders, NICHOLAS (1530 ?-1581), was educated at Winchester, and afterwards became fellow of New College, Oxford. An ardent Romanist, he left England in 1559, and was present at the Council of Trent. In 1572 the English refugees sent him to Rome to try to get help, but in 1575 he had to leave Rome without having accomplished anything. In 1577 he was in Spain, but was again unsuccessful. In the same year he wrote a book called "The Origin and Progress of the English Schism." He accompanied Stukeley, but, unable to persuade Philip II to send more men, he remained in Spain. On July 17, 1579, he, as legate, landed with Fitzmaurice at Smerwick. He attached himself to the Earl of Desmond, had many narrow escapes, and left Smerwick (q.v.) before the siege, and died, possibly of want and exposure, in Ireland. His Latin history of the "Anglican Schism" called forth Burnet's "History of the Reformation."

San Domingo is the name given by the Spaniards to the island of Hayti. It was discovered by Columbus about 1493, and soon became a valuable plantation. In 1586, war having broken out between England and Spain, Sir Francis Drake took the town of San Domingo. Meanwhile the western part of the island had been colonized by the French, and was ceded to them by the Treaty of Ryswick (q.v.). It was off San Domingo that Admiral Rodney, in 1782, defeated and captured the French admiral, de Grasse. After the English expeditions against the island ceased it was contended for by the French and Spaniards, the native population being ready to rebel whenever a chance presented itself. The struggle for freedom on their part, under Toussaint L'Ouverture, in 1801, aroused great admiration in this country. The island is now divided between two republics, Hayti and Santo Domingo, founded in 1844.

Sandys, EDWIN (1516 ?-1588), Archbishop of York, was at the time of Edward VI's death vice-chancellor of Cambridge University and a zealous Protestant. He favoured Northumberland's scheme, and preached a powerful sermon in favour of Lady Jane Grey (q.v.), for which he was sent to the Tower and subsequently compelled to leave the country. On the accession of Elizabeth he returned to England and became Bishop of Worcester, and in 1570 Bishop of London, in which latter capacity he exhibited much rigour towards the Nonconformists. In 1576 he was made Archbishop of York in succession to Grindal.

Sandys, SAMUEL, 1ST BARON (1695 ?-1770), was first returned for Worcester in 1718, but did not become prominent in parliament until 1740, when he introduced his abortive Place Bill (q.v.). In 1741 he was chosen to bring forward a motion for the removal of Sir Robert Walpole from the king's council. His speech, "probably concerted with the principal opposition leaders, was elaborate and able." But the motion was lost by 290 to 106. On the fall of Walpole he became chancellor of the exchequer under Wilmington, but soon afterwards resigned office, being raised to the peerage with a place in the royal household.

San Juan Award (1872). The question as to the boundary westwards between Canada and the United States having been submitted to the arbitration of the German Emperor William, the following award was given (December) :—That according to the Treaty of Washington (1846) the boundary, after it had been continued westward along the forty-ninth parallel of north latitude to the middle of the channel which separates the continent from Vancouver Island, and had further been drawn southerly through the middle of the said channel and of Fuca Straits to the Pacific, should run through the canal of Haro as claimed by the United States, and not through the Rosario Straits as claimed by the British government. San Juan itself was a small island near Vancouver Island, in the centre of the channel defined by the Treaty of Washington. By this award it became American territory. It was evacuated by Great Britain in consequence.

Sanquhar Declaration, THE, was issued by Richard Cameron, Donald Cargill, and others of the extreme Covenanters at Sanquhar in Dumfriesshire (June 1680). It declared that Charles II had forfeited the crown of Scotland "by his perjury and breach of covenant both to God and His kirk." Charles was at the same time excommunicated by Cargill. [CAMERONIANS.]

San Sebastian, THE SIEGE OF (August 1813), undertaken during the last campaign of the war in the Peninsula, was necessary to enable Wellington to cross the Pyrenees and conduct the war in France. The first siege was begun on July 14, 1813; but an assault on the town on the 25th was repulsed with terrible loss. Wellington, repaireing to San Sebastian, ordered Graham to turn the siege into a blockade. During nine days of ceaseless movement ten engagements had been fought, the effect of which was that Soult was in retreat, while Wellington's position was so strong that he was secure from offensive action on the part of the French, and could resume the siege of San Sebastian under the direction of Graham. The natural and artificial difficulties of the siege were very great, but they were intensified by the negligence of the government at home, who would not supply a sufficiently large fleet or suitable ammunition. Still the works went on gradually, under the energetic commander; various positions were successively won, and on the 30th half the length of the eastern sea-front was laid open. On the morning of the 31st the assault was made, and after a terrible attack the town was carried, though the castle held out. For some days the town became the scene of atrocities "which would have shamed the most ferocious barbarians of antiquity." When the troops had in some measure recovered, batteries were raised against the castle, which surrendered on September 8, leaving Wellington free to transfer the war into the south of France.

Santal Revolt (1855). The Santals were a tribe inhabiting the hill ranges of Rajmahal. Being harassed by the processes and bailiffs of the courts and by the demands of Bengali money-lenders, they suddenly rose in rebellion (July 1855), and carried fire and destruction among the villages of the Europeans. No troops were available but the hill rangiers, who were driven back. The railway now for the first time brought up troops; the rebels were hemmed in and hunted down; cholera likewise made great havoc among them. The rebellion was extinguished on the last day of the year. The district was now converted into a non-regulation province, and placed in charge of a commissioner.

Saragossa, THE BATTLE OF (August 19, 1710), was fought during the War of the Spanish Succession. After the defeat of Almanza, King Philip V hastily retreated on Saragossa. The allies followed with difficulty. On August 19 Stanhope found the Spaniards drawn up before Saragossa, with the Ebro on their left, a range of hills upon their right, and a deep ravine on their front. The Archduke Charles determined to risk a battle. Stanhope commanded the left of the allies, formed of British, Dutch, and Palatines, and eked out his cavalry by interspersing among them some battalions of foot. The allies' right wing consisted of Portuguese foot and a part of the Germans under Count Alatalaya. The Spaniards had about 22,000, and the allies about 24,000 men. The left was the first to engage. Then the Portuguese at once made off, attracting large bodies of the enemy in pursuit. The remainder of the allies steadily stood their ground, and at length drove back the enemy. On the right the Dutch and Germans soon threw the enemy into confusion. In the centre the veteran Spaniards, after a steady resistance to Stahremberg, retreated in good order. Four thousand prisoners were taken, with a large number of cannon, and possession of Saragossa was secured to the victors. After considerable debate the allies, in accordance with Stanhope's desire, advanced on Madrid.

Saratoga, THE CONVENTION OF (October 17, 1777), during the American War of Independence, was the closing scene of General Burgoyne's disastrous campaign, which resulted in his retreat on Saratoga, where he found himself (October 10, 1777) with 3,500 men opposed to Gates with about 16,000 men. Burgoyne, receiving no tidings of Clinton, with scarcity in his army developing almost into famine, made proposals for negotiations (October 13). Gates offered terms which were at once rejected as degrading, and, not wishing to drive to despair a body of brave men, he finally agreed to the terms proposed by Burgoyne (October 17). The chief of these were that the troops should lay down their arms, and should be allowed a free passage to England, on condition that they would not again engage in the war, and that the treaty should be called a convention and not a capitulation. On the same day the British troops marched out. The importance of the surrender was felt throughout the world, as was shown by the fact that France at once acknowledged the "Independent United States of America," and concluded a treaty with them. Spain followed the lead of France, and Holland did not long remain neutral.

Sardinian Convention, THE (1855), occurred during the Crimean War, and resulted in Sardinian support for the British and French armies in the Crimea. On January 26 the King of Sardinia acceded to the convention between the British and French governments of April 10, 1854, and agreed to furnish and maintain at full for the requirements of the war 15,000 men under the command of a Sardinian general. By a separate article Great Britain and France agreed to guarantee the integrity of the king's dominions. Great Britain undertook the charges of transporting the troops to and from the Crimea, and under the treaty a recommendation was to be made to parliament to advance a million sterling to the King of Sardinia at 4 per cent. [CRIMEAN WAR.]

Sarsfield, PATRICK, titular EARL OF LUCAN (d. 1693), was an Irish Jacobite of great military genius. He held a commission in the English life-guards, and served under Monmouth on the continent. He fought brilliantly at the battle of Sedgemoor against his former general. Soon after the landing of the Prince of Orange he was defeated in a skirmish at Wincanton. He sat for the county of Dublin in the Irish parliament of 1688. In 1689 he was sent by James II as commander into Connaught. He secured Galway, and drove the English from Sligo. Shortly afterwards James created him Earl of Lucan. He was present at the battle of the Boyne, and insisted on making a stand at Limerick against the advice of Tyrconnel. He surprised the English artillery and compelled William to raise the siege (August 1690). His administration of that town was not altogether successful. On the arrival of the French general, St. Ruth, he soon quarrelled with him; and his advice to avoid a battle, given after the fall of Athlone, was pertinaciously disregarded. At the battle of Aghrim he commanded the reserve, and through some misunderstanding never received orders to charge. He covered the retreat. Once more his arrangements for making a stand at Limerick were hampered by his colleagues. The death of Tyrconnel, however, left him in supreme command, but he soon despaired of the defence. He therefore opened negotiations with Ginkel. A cessation of hostilities was arranged on September 24, 1691, and the majority of the garrison chose to follow Sarsfield into the French service. He was given a command in the intended French invasion of England in 1692. He fought with great gallantry in the French ranks at the battle of Steinkirk (August 3), and was mortally wounded at Landen (August 19).

Sarum, Old, is generally identified with the Roman Sorbiodunum. According to tradition it was captured by Cerdic, the founder of the West Saxon kingdom, who made there his headquarters in the sixth century. In the Anglo-Saxon period it was a centre of some importance, and there a witenagemot was held by Edgar to concert measures against the Danes. The barons were assembled there by William the Conqueror in 1086 to take the famous Oath of Salisbury. From the reign of the Conqueror till the thirteenth century it was the seat of a bishop, but the town then followed the church, which was rebuilt in the plain; ever since Old Sarum has remained almost deserted. Nevertheless, it sent two members to parliament from the end of the thirteenth century onwards, and it was for Old Sarum that William Pitt, Earl of Chatham, first sat (1735). In 1832 it was disenfranchised by the Reform Bill.

Sauchie Burn, THE BATTLE OF (June 1488), resulted in the defeat and death of James III of Scotland at the hands of his insurgent barons, headed by Archibald "Bell the Cat," Home, Hepburn, and Bothwell, who had plotted to get hold of James's son to make use of him against his father's authority.

Saunders, ADMIRAL SIR CHARLES (1713?-1775), served under Anson in his expedition to the South Seas (1739). In 1741 he became post-captain. In 1747 he aided Hawke in his victory over the French, and in 1750 was returned to parliament for Plymouth. He became treasurer of Greenwich Hospital (1754), and comptroller of the navy (1755). In 1757 he was appointed commander-in-chief of the Mediterranean squadron, and in the following year became rear-admiral. In 1759 he commanded the fleet which conveyed Wolfe to Quebec. He received the thanks of the House of Commons for his co-operation, Pitt calling him a man "equalling those who have taken armadas." In 1760 he went to the Mediterranean as commander-in-chief. He was made vice-admiral, and in 1765 he became lord of the admiralty. Saunders subsequently became first lord of the admiralty (1765), privy councillor (1766), and admiral (1770). He was buried in Westminster Abbey.

Savile, GEORGE, MARQUIS OF HALIFAX (1633-95), was a member of an old Yorkshire family conspicuous for its loyalty during the Civil War. After the Restoration he was raised to the peerage for the assistance he had rendered in bringing about that event. He was created a marquis in 1682 and made lord privy seal. He opposed the Exclusion Bill (q.v.) in 1680, though he was suspected of intriguing in favour of the Duke of Monmouth. At the accession of James II he became president of the council; but he showed himself altogether averse to the Romanizing measures of the king, and most strenuously opposed the repeal of the Test Act (q.v.). For this he was dismissed from his offices, October 1685. He gave his adhesion to the Prince of Orange in December 1688, and became Speaker of the House of Lords in the Convention Parliament, 1689, and lord privy seal in February of this year. He subsequently joined the opposition, however, and resigned in October 1689. He offered a violent opposition to the censorship of the press in 1692. The marquis refused to join himself absolutely to either party, and, in a tract called the "Character of a Trimmer" (printed 1688), defended his position as one who "trims" from one side to the other as the national interest requires.

Biography by H. C. Foxcroft, 1898; Halifax, "Works," ed. W. Raleigh, 1912.

Savile, SIR GEORGE (1726-84), came of an old Yorkshire family, and represented Yorkshire through five successive elections. He did not often speak in parliament, but there was perhaps no one in the House more thoroughly respected as a man of liberal principles and unbending integrity; and he was one of the most reliable bulwarks of the Whig party. He was a strenuous and consistent opponent of the American War in all its stages, and of the prosecution of Wilkes. He was the first to relieve in some measure the disabilities of Roman Catholics, by carrying a bill for that purpose in 1778; and he was consequently one of the principal sufferers in the Gordon Riots (q.v.). Later, he brought in a bill against Popish conversions. But perhaps the most celebrated measure connected with his name is the Nullum Tempus Bill (passed 1768), which had its origin in an attempt on the part of the ministry and the Crown to put into force against the Duke of Portland the old maxim "Nullum tempus occurrit regi"—"that no length of continuance or good faith of possession is available against a claim of the Crown." Savile's bill abolished this maxim—"the opprobrium of prerogative and the disgrace of our law"—by providing that an uninterrupted enjoyment for sixty years of an estate derived from the Crown should bar the Crown from reclaiming its gift under pretence of any flaw in the grant or other defect of title.

Savoy, BONIFACE OF, Archbishop of Canterbury (1241-70), was a prince of the reigning house of Savoy, and uncle of Henry III's queen, Eleanor of Provence. To this he owed his early advancement to the archbishopric, for which he had very few qualifications. His rule was intensely unpopular, as that of a foreigner and dependent of the court, and his attempt to carry out a visitation of the whole province of Canterbury provoked violent and successful opposition (1249-50). In the conflict between king and baronage he showed at first some leanings towards the national party, but eventually espoused the royal cause. He left little mark on the history of his see. The palace of the Savoy in the Strand took its name from his brother Peter.

Savoy Conference, THE (1661-2), was held in Sheldon's lodgings in the Savoy for the purpose of discussing the relations of the Puritans towards the Church, and the proposed changes in the Liturgy. It consisted of twelve bishops, among whom were Cosin,

Sanderson, Pearson, and Sparrow; and twelve Puritan divines, including Baxter, Calamy, Reynolds, and Lightfoot. After sitting from May 8 to July 30 they came to no practical conclusion, and reported that "The Church's welfare, unity, and peace, and his majesty's satisfaction, were ends upon which they were all agreed; but as to means, they could not come to any harmony." The failure of the Savoy conference (it broke up in May 1662) excluded a large number of Puritans from the Church. [For the alterations in the Liturgy, which so far as they had any effect emphasized rather than minimized the differences between Anglican and Puritan, see PRAYER BOOK.]

E. Cardwell, "History of Conferences connected with the Book of Common Prayer," 1840.

Sawtre, WILLIAM (d. March 2, 1401), a clergyman at one time beneficed at Lynn, and later in London, was the first person burnt in England for Lollardy. Proceedings were taken against him during the same session in which the statute De hæretico comburendo (q.v.), which received the royal assent after the dissolution of parliament on March 11, was passed; but his execution on the simple authority of the king's writ has given some occasion for controversy as to whether, before the passing of the new act, the king had power to issue writs De hæretico comburendo. The absence of precedent, however, makes the supposition improbable.

Sawyer, SIR ROBERT (1633-92), an eminent Tory lawyer, was attorney-general at the time of the Rye House Plot (q.v.) and distinguished himself by his zeal, if not rancour, in prosecuting the Whigs concerned in that measure. He convicted Titus Oates (q.v.) in 1685. Continuing long in office, he refused in 1686 to help James II in vindicating the dispensing power, yet such was his fame, and the difficulty of getting a successor, that he was not dismissed till 1688. He was leading counsel for the Seven Bishops, and after raising difficulties, accepted the Revolution. In 1690 he was violently attacked for his conduct in relation to the trial of Sir Thomas Armstrong, a Rye House plotter, was excepted from the Act of Indemnity, and expelled the House of Commons.

Saxons, THE. The earliest contemporary reference to Saxons in extant literature—that of the geographer Ptolemy, who wrote in the second century A.D.—describes them as dwelling in the country now called Holstein, and three adjoining islands. They are mentioned as fringing the sea-board of the ocean. In 286, when the first authentic notice of their piracies and plunderings was written, they had not only stamped their name on the British coast [SAXON SHORE], but extended it over the northern lands between the Elbe and the Ems; and in the seventh century broad tracts of Britain, and broader tracts of Germany between the Rhine and the Oder, were in the possession of people called by their name. Those who stayed in Germany were long known as Old Saxons, to distinguish them from the settlers beyond the sea. This branch clung tenaciously to its primitive usages and national forms of rule after the others had begun to abandon them. Whether the expansion of the Saxon name on the continent was due to immigration and conquest, as it was in Britain, is, though possible, extremely doubtful. It is thought more likely that it was merely extended to a number of separate but neighbouring tribes already inhabiting those regions, as the common designation of a huge confederacy. Such peoples as the Chauvi and Cherusci, while keeping their proper tribe names among themselves, would be called Saxons by those that were outside the confederacy, just as Salii and Ubii were known as Franks. This is the readiest way of explaining the sudden spring of the Saxons from an obscure tribe, confined to a narrow territory, into a greatness and notoriety that have left a broad mark on human destiny. From the third to the sixth centuries these Saxons were swarming in their "keels" over and up and down the narrow seas, spoiling and wasting the property, and at length depopulating and seizing the soil of civilized peoples within their reach. If Claudian be believed, they watered the Orkneys with their blood; they certainly founded several kingdoms (Wessex, Essex, Sussex, Middlesex) in Britain, and at least one settlement in Gaul in the region of Bayeux. So deep was the impression made by their strength, ferocity, and persistence on the men whose lands they took that these men gave their name to all the German invaders, and, later still, their subjugation in their native homes cost Charlemagne a generation of effort. Ethnology classes them as a Low German race, with fewer and fainter affinities of language and character to the High German than their partners in conquest, the Angles. The fair hair, blue eye, and robust animal nature, characteristic of the southern English peasant, are ascribed to his Saxon origin. The derivative meaning of the name is disputed; it has been variously interpreted as seamen, users of the short knife (seax), settlers (sas), adversaries (sachs), and other things. Their efficiency as makers of history in early days is traced to their having been untouched by Roman civilization; to their long continuance "in a state of healthy barbarism."

Saxon Shore, THE, was the name applied in Roman times to those parts of Britain and Gaul especially liable to the inroads of the Saxon pirates. A special system of defence in this area was established in the third and completed in the fourth century. A naval force was stationed in the channel and fortifications were erected along the coast of south-east Britain from the west of Southampton

Water. The command was entrusted to an officer bearing the title of Comes Litoris Saxonici (Count of the Saxon Shore); and a legion was quartered at Rutupia (Richborough) in Kent. There is no reason for believing, as some have maintained, that the Saxon Shore was inhabited in Roman times by "Saxon" colonies. The expression "Litus Saxonicum" is exactly analogous to the Welsh March of later times, which meant the district specially open to Welsh attacks.

Saye and Sele, BARONS. [FIENNES.]

Scales, THOMAS, 7TH BARON (d. 1460), distinguished himself in the French wars and in repressing Jack Cade's rebellion (q.v.). He was a faithful follower of the Lancastrian cause, and in 1460, after the battle of Northampton, was captured by the Yorkists while going to seek sanctuary at Westminster, and put to death.

Scandalum Magnatum was the use of language derogatory to a peer or great officer of the realm. It was created a special offence with special punishments in 1275. Though it had long been obsolete, the offence of scandalum magnatum was not formally abolished till 1888.

Scarlett, JAMES, BARON AINGER (1769-1844), the second son of Robert Scarlett of Jamaica, after gaining great reputation as an advocate, entered parliament in 1819 as member for Peterborough. He resisted the plans of Castlereagh and Vansittart for increased taxation, and supported Romilly and Mackintosh in their attempts to ameliorate the Penal Code. He also unsuccessfully endeavoured to bring in a bill for amending the Poor Laws. In 1827, when Canning sought the assistance of the Whigs, Scarlett became attorney-general. He now gradually drifted over to Conservatism. He retained his office under Lord Goderich, and, on the dismissal of Sir Charles Wetherell by the Duke of Wellington, took office again under the latter. In 1830 he resigned with his party. In 1834 he was made chief baron by Sir R. Peel, and raised to the peerage (1835).

Memoir by P. C. Scarlett, 1877.

Schaub, SIR LUKE (d. 1758), was a Swiss in the British service. He first appears in 1718 as confidential secretary to Stanhope in Spain. In 1720 he was knighted, and sent as minister to Paris in 1721, and in the following year received from the regent communications concerning Atterbury's Jacobite plot (q.v.) which led to its detection. He returned to England in 1724, having attempted, as the friend of Carteret, to obtain a dukedom for the intended husband of a daughter of Madame de Platen, the sister of the King's mistress, the Countess of Darlington. Horace Walpole (Sir Robert's brother) was sent by Townshend to counteract his designs, and, as the affairs were at a deadlock, George was compelled to recall him. His subsequent diplomatic career was unimportant.

Schism Act, THE, was passed in June 1714. It was a measure devised by the extreme High Church party, encouraged by Bolingbroke as a party move against Oxford, and introduced by Sir William Wyndham. Its object was to confirm a clause in the Act of Uniformity which precluded schoolmasters and tutors from giving instruction without previously subscribing a declaration of conformity to the Established Church. This restriction, although not abolished by the Toleration Act, had long been practically suspended. The Schism Act therefore imposed severe penalties on all tutors and schoolmasters who presumed to instruct without having first received a licence from a bishop. It easily passed its two first stages, but at the third reading it was vigorously opposed by the Whigs under Walpole and Stanhope. In the Upper House several amendments were made in committee. Teachers merely of reading, writing, arithmetic, and navigation were excluded from its operations; the power of convicting offenders was lodged in the superior courts alone; and by an absurd clause, the tutors of the sons of noblemen were declared exempt from its restriction. But the bill was most unjustly extended to Ireland. This iniquitous measure was repealed, together with the Occasional Conformity Act (q.v.), in spite of much opposition, on January 7, 1719.

Schleswig-Holstein Question, THE (1863), arose on the death of Frederick VII of Denmark, between Denmark and the Germanic Confederation; whose conflicting claims to possession of the duchies of Schleswig and Holstein had caused friction in 1848. The situation was only eased by Frederick's incorporation of Schleswig in Denmark, leaving Holstein to the Germanic Confederation; followed by a conference of the five great powers in London in 1850, which confirmed the confederation in possession of Holstein—Palmerston played the most prominent part in the conference—and embodied the settlement in a treaty in 1852. The crisis came in 1863 when the new King of Denmark, Christian IX, confirmed on his accession a law passed by Frederick VII in 1862 virtually uniting Schleswig with Denmark while conceding autonomy to Holstein. The German Diet forthwith drafted federal troops into Holstein. Lord John Russell had all along advised the Danish government to pursue a just policy towards the German populations of the two duchies, and avoid irritating the German Diet. But in reply to a question as to the course Great Britain would adopt in the event of war between the contending parties, Palmerston made his memorable reply (July 23) that "We are convinced—I am convinced, at least—that if any violent attempt were made to overthrow the right and interfere with the independence of Denmark, those who made the attempt would find in the result that it would not be Denmark alone with which they would have to contend." This reply, which Palmerston explained away later as merely his personal impression, was open at the time to only one interpretation, as a statement of official British policy. It was an unfortunate mistake. For not only had the British government no intention of resorting to arms, but the British proposal to Napoleon III for a joint representation to Austria, the German Diet and Russia, in favour of Denmark, was rejected (Louis Napoleon being piqued at the lukewarm support afforded by the British government in 1862 to his desire to intervene on behalf of the insurgent Poles). Thus Denmark, encouraged by Palmerston's words to expect British armed assistance, which the attitude of the queen and of British public opinion rendered quite impossible, was left to herself and badly defeated. The result at home was a motion of censure in both Houses, which was carried in the Lords by 177 to 168, and only defeated in the Commons (by 313 to 295) through the popularity of the prime minister and an amendment introduced by Kinglake which evaded the issue (1864).

[A. C. F. B.]

Schomberg, FREDERICK HERMAN, COUNT OF (1615-90), was born at Heidelberg. His father was an officer in the household of the Elector Palatine, his mother an English lady of the Dudley family. As a Protestant, he fought against the Imperialists in the Thirty Years' War, for the Dutch, Swedes, and French. After the Peace of Westphalia (1648) he became chamberlain to William II, Prince of Orange. In 1650 he repaired to France, and served under Turenne until the Peace of the Pyrenees (1659). He then entered the Portuguese service, and it was chiefly by his assistance that that country compelled Spain to recognize the sovereignty of the house of Braganza (1668). He then returned to France, where he was naturalized and obtained the baton of a marshal of France (1675). During the next years he served in Flanders. The revocation of the Edict of Nantes (1685) caused a complete change in his fortunes. After a short visit to Portugal to negotiate a marriage between Pedro II and Maria Sophia, daughter of the Elector Palatine, he entered the service of Frederick William, the "Great Elector" of Brandenburg. On the death of that prince his successor, Frederick III, generously gave up the great commander to aid William of Orange in the execution of his plans. He was immediately made William's second in command, and rode side by side with him through the streets of London. He was made knight of the Garter, created duke, and appointed master of the ordnance. The Commons voted £100,000 to him in gratitude for his services. In 1689 he was placed at the head of an expedition to Ireland, his forces consisting mainly of raw recruits. He landed in the north of Ulster, took Carrickfergus, and marched into Leinster. Outside Dundalk he declined battle with the enemy, who were greatly superior in numbers. Still James's army did not attack, and the duke retired into Ulster for winter quarters. His conduct was severely but unjustly criticized in England. In June 1690 William landed at Carrickfergus at the head of a large army. Schomberg met him near Belfast, and the united troops marched on the Boyne. He pronounced strongly against William's intention of attacking the Irish there. The battle was won; when Schomberg, seeing the enemy's cavalry making a gallant resistance, rushed at them, crying aloud to his Huguenot troops, "Come on, gentlemen; there are your persecutors." They were his last words.

Kayner, "Leben Friedrich von Schomberg," 1789.

Schomberg, MEINHARD, DUKE OF LEINSTER (1641-1719), third son of Marshal Schomberg, commanded William III's right wing at the battle of the Boyne. He marched some miles up the river, and crossed it by the bridge of Slane, thus turning the French flank and rear. In 1692 his father's services and his own were rewarded by creating him Duke of Leinster. In 1693 he was placed at the head of an expedition against the coast of Brittany. But Russell and the other English admirals decided that the year was too far advanced for such an enterprise. Consequently the armament never set out. After the outbreak of the War of the Spanish Succession he was placed at the head of an English and Dutch force, which disembarked at Lisbon. He proved inefficient, and was soon afterwards recalled (July 1704) and Galway sent out in his stead.

Schulenberg, ERMENGARD MELUSINA VON DER, DUCHESS OF KENDAL (1667-1743), was one of the mistresses of George I. In 1716 she was created Duchess of Munster in the Irish peerage, and in 1719 Duchess of Kendal. She affected great devotion, and sometimes attended several Lutheran chapels in the course of the day. On the death of the Duke of Somerset no master of the horse was appointed for several years, the profits of the place being paid to the duchess. She seems now to have been looked upon as the dispenser of the king's favours, and was bribed accordingly. She received £10,000 from the South Sea Company. In 1722 she was granted the monopoly of coining halfpence for Ireland, and sold it to Wood (q.v.). In 1727 she was gained over by Bolingbroke and became the leader of a powerful combination against Walpole, although the king handed a memorial, conveyed to him through her hands, over to the minister. She is said to have been overwhelmed with grief on hearing of the death of George, and to have imagined that a raven which flew in at her window was the spirit of the king. She seems to have possessed neither beauty nor intellect, and Lord Chesterfield, who had married her niece, said that she was little better than an idiot.

Schwarz, MARTIN (d. 1487), was a German veteran, commanding the foreign auxiliaries of Lambert Simnel. He was slain, with most of his followers, at the decisive battle of Stoke, which ruined the Yorkist cause.

Scilly Islands, THE, were inhabited in the earliest times, as the abundance of prehistoric remains found there shows. Their early history is shrouded in obscurity. They have been erroneously identified with the Cassiterides of the Greek writers, and have been represented as the object of an expedition on the part of Athelstan. In 938 they are said to have been conquered by him, and granted to the monks of Tresco. Afterwards they were transferred by Henry I to the Abbey of Tavistock. They became part of the earldom of Cornwall. Queen Elizabeth granted them on lease to the Godolphin family. They afterwards were leased by the Duke of Leeds. The lessee has very considerable powers. In the Civil War they held out for Charles under Sir John Granville, and became a centre for privateers. In 1651 Blake reduced them to obedience to the Commonwealth.

Scone, situated on the east bank of the Tay in the old district of Gowrie, became the capital of the Pictish kingdom and continued to be regarded as the seat of royalty in later history. The Moot Hill, or Hill of Belief, at Scone was the place of assembly for the king's counsellors, and it was at Scone that the Coronation Stone, or Stone of Destiny, was "reverently kept for the consecration of the Kings of Alban" until it was removed to Westminster by Edward I (1296). In 729 Scone was the scene of a conflict between Alpin, King of the Picts, and Nectan. Many of the later kings of Scotland, notably Malcolm Canmore, Alexander III, Robert Bruce, Robert II, and James I, were crowned there, as well as Charles II in 1651.

Scory, JOHN (d. 1585), Bishop of Hereford, obtained the see of Rochester (1551) as a reward for his strictures on ecclesiastical discipline and the enclosure movement. He was afterwards translated to Chichester (1552), but was deprived of his preferment on the accession of Mary. He subsequently assisted at the consecration of Bishop Parker in 1559, receiving earlier in the same year the see of Hereford. He then, in conjunction with Bishop Barlow, assisted the archbishop to consecrate the other prelates appointed by Elizabeth. He was a man of indifferent character, and of no very great influence.

Scot and Lot literally signifies "taxes in general," and "the share paid by each householder." In many towns, before the Reform Acts of the nineteenth century, municipal privileges were vested in all those who paid "scot and lot," i.e., those who bore their rateable proportion in the payments levied from the town for local or national purposes.

Scotale was an "ale" or festival at which ale was drunk at the invitation of the lord of the manor or of a forester or other bailiff, and for which a forced contribution was levied. The obscure nature of this contribution is unsolved. Some have thought that the sheriff or other official could compel the men within his bailiwick to grant him quantities of malt, from which the Scotale was brewed, and which belonged to him. Others maintain that the name simply indicates a meeting in which the men were forced to contribute to the same object, or at which heavy fines were exacted on those absent. To obtain exemption from scotale was a great object for towns in the early stages of the history of corporate town-life; since exemption probably marked a stage in their emancipation from the jurisdiction of the sheriff.

Scotland. The history of Scotland has been more influenced than that of most other countries by the physical features of the land. The southern part of the modern kingdom differs little in character and conformation from the north of England. This part, known as the Lowlands, is pleasantly diversified with hill and dale, well watered and well wooded, affording rich tracts of pasture and arable land. North of the Lowlands the country is almost intersected by the Firths of Forth and Clyde, and beyond the firths it wholly changes its character and becomes barren and mountainous in the west and north. A strip of lowland runs north along the eastern coast. The early inhabitants of these districts differed as much in race as the country in aspect. While the indigenous Celts inhabited their native mountains, the southern and eastern lowlands were peopled by English or Scandinavian invaders. When first Scotland emerges from prehistoric obscurity, it is as Caledonia, a country of woods and mountains, so stern and wild that the Romans abandoned their attempted conquest, and had great difficulty in protecting the southern province from the inroads of the fierce inhabitants. They were of the Celtic race, and are vaguely spoken of as Picts and Scots. The first event of which we have any certain knowledge is the introduction of Christianity. It came in the wake of the Scots from Ireland. In the sixth century these Scots settled on the western coast, and founded the nucleus of the Scottish kingdom. Columba, Abbot of Durrow, came over to join them. The King of the Scots gave him the islet of Iona to settle on. Here he, and the twelve monks who shared his fortunes, made a monastery of the rudest kind—a few wattle huts clustered round a wooden church. From this centre they went forth on missionary journeys to the neighbouring mainland and island. By this means the Picts and the English of Northumbria were converted to Christianity. In 843 the King of Scots, Kenneth MacAlpin, became king of the Picts also. Thus the Celtic peoples north of the firths were nominally united into one kingdom, though the chiefs of the north, whether Celts or Norsemen, were virtually independent sovereigns. In the tenth century Malcolm I, the King of Scots, got possession of Strathclyde. It was granted to him as a territorial fief by Edmund of England. His grandson, Malcolm II, was invested with Lothian, hitherto part of the English earldom of Northumbria (1018). This acquisition influenced the whole after-history of the kingdom. At first merely a dependence of the Celtic kingdom, Lothian finally overshadowed it. The kings of the Scots identified themselves with this, the richest part of their dominions, and with its Teutonic inhabitants, while the Celts of the original kingdom came to be looked on as a subject-race, the natural enemies of the richer and more civilized people of the Lowlands. The reign of Malcolm III, surnamed Canmore (1057-93), is a turning-point in the history of Scotland. His marriage with Margaret, sister of Edgar Atheling, introduced an English element which gave its colour to the national development. There were also other influences at work which all turned in the same direction. The Norman Conquest displaced many Englishmen. Such of these exiles as turned northward were well received at the Scottish court. Territorial grants were conferred upon them. The English system of land tenure was introduced, and led to the ecclesiastical division into parishes. The Scottish clergy were induced to give up their distinguishing peculiarities, and were brought into conformity with Rome. Malcolm repeatedly invaded England, and his army brought back so many captives that English slaves fell to the lot of the poorest households. These slaves, more civilized than their Celtic masters, influenced the domestic manners of the people. The frequent aggressions of the Scots provoked retaliation from the Normans. William the Conqueror invaded Scotland (1072), and at Abernethy he compelled Malcolm to acknowledge him as over-lord. This submission was a fertile source of dissension in later times. On the strength of it the English sovereigns laid claim to supremacy over the whole kingdom of Scotland, while the Scots maintained that Malcolm did homage for Strathclyde and Lothian, which he held from the English Crown, but in no respect violated the independence of his hereditary kingdom. The purely Celtic period of Scottish history concludes with the accession of Edgar, son of Malcolm (1097). The second period, during which English influence was in the ascendant, was one of continued development. The three sons of Malcolm, Edgar, Alexander, and David, reigned in succession, and carried out more fully the anglicizing policy of their parents. The marriage of their sister Matilda with Henry I of England strengthened the friendly relations between the kingdoms. The accession of David (1124), who held also the English earldom of Huntingdon, led to a great influx of Normans, to whom the king made large territorial grants. Thus the feudal system was introduced, and took firmer root in Scotland than it ever did in England. Most of the ecclesiastical foundations, as well as the social and political institutions of the later kingdom, date from the reign of David. He founded or restored the six bishoprics of Dunblane, Brechin, Aberdeen, Ross, Caithness, and Glasgow. He endowed many religious houses affiliated with the great monastic orders. Among his foundations was the Abbey of the Holy Rood, which afterwards became the favourite palace of the Scottish sovereigns. He introduced a new code of laws, framed on the English model, appointed sheriffs for the maintenance of order, favoured and encouraged the royal burghs, and added to their number and their privileges. Under Malcolm IV (1153), David's grandson and successor, Galloway was reduced to direct dependence on the Crown, and the isles and western coast were brought to subjection by the defeat and death of Somerled, Earl of Argyll, so that the kingdom now extended to the boundaries of modern Scotland. William the Lion (1165), Malcolm's brother, in his efforts to regain the English earldom of Northumberland was taken prisoner, and to regain his liberty sacrificed the independence of his kingdom, agreeing in the "Convention of Falaise" to hold it as a fief from the English king. About the same time the Scottish Church rejected the claim to superiority over it put forward by the Archbishop of York, and procured a papal bull (1188) confirming their claim of independence of any spiritual authority save that of Rome. The reigns of the Alexanders (II and III) were a period of peace and social improvement. The border line between Scotland and England was fixed for the first time (1222). The last and most formidable invasion of the Northmen was repelled in the battle of Largs (1263). The long peace with England, which lasted nearly a century, was marked by rapid internal development. Agriculture flourished, and the proportion of arable land was much increased. The country was opened up by the making of roads and bridges. The extension of trade and commerce brought wealth and consequence to the trading towns. This prosperity was checked by the sudden death of the king (1286). His grandchild and heir, Margaret, was a young child, absent in her father's kingdom of Norway. This child-queen died before she reached her kingdom. A swarm of competitors appeared to claim the crown. Edward of England, who was appealed to as arbiter, placed it on the head of John Baliol (1292), whom he compelled to acknowledge him as over-lord. John's weakness and incapacity soon embroiled him with his subjects, who compelled him to revolt against England. This gave Edward a pretext for carrying out his cherished scheme of conquering Scotland. With a large army he crossed the Border, deposed the king, received the homage of the nobles and prelates, placed English garrisons in the strongholds, and entrusted the government to Englishmen.

These measures roused a spirit of patriotism among the people and the War of Independence began. They revolted against the English authority, and under the leadership of William Wallace (q.v.) defeated the English at Stirling (1297), and slew or expelled the English governors. A second time Edward in person subdued Scotland, Wallace was defeated at Falkirk (1298), taken and put to death; the English rule was re-established. Henceforth Scotland was to be incorporated with England. But just when the subjection of the Scots was deemed complete they rose again under Robert Bruce [ROBERT I], the next heir to the crown after Baliol. Had Edward lived, it is most likely that this effort would have been crushed like the former one. But he died on the Border (1307) just as he was about to enter Scotland for the third time, to subdue it more utterly than before. For seven years the struggle lasted, till the total rout of the English at Bannockburn (1314) re-established the national independence. The War of Independence had lasted twenty years, and during that time Scotland had suffered fearfully. Thrice she had been laid waste by foreign invasions; she had been torn in pieces by internal contests, for the struggle had much of the character of a civil war, as many of the Scottish nobles fought on the English side. This war completely changed the current of Scottish history by implanting among the people that bitter hatred of England and everything English which was the most strongly marked feature of the national character for centuries to come. This drove them into close alliance with France, the sworn enemy of England. France became the model for imitation, which England had been during the previous period, and French influence tinged the manners, the arts, the learning, and the laws of the succeeding centuries.

This French alliance involved Scotland in the frequent wars between the French and English. Whenever war broke out Scotland took up arms and invaded England in favour of her ally. By the Treaty of Northampton (1328) England acknowledged the independence of Scotland. By this treaty the old vexatious claims of superiority were swept away. Henceforward the Lothians and Strathclyde were on the same footing as the Celtic kingdom. The war had welded more firmly into one the different races of which the nation was composed. Throughout the contest it was the Lowlanders who were most determined not to be annexed to England, but to maintain the independence of the Celtic kingdom to which they were joined.

The Celts in the north cared little whether the king, to whom they owed a nominal allegiance, reigned in Edinburgh or London. The struggle also brought the people, for the first time, prominently forward in the State. It was by the support of the people and the Church that Robert Bruce succeeded in winning the crown. This had two important results. The people obtained a voice in the national assembly. In the Parliament of Cambuskenneth (1326) the third estate, the deputies of the burghers, appear for the first time. The baronage was in great part renewed, as Bruce granted to his friends the forfeited estates of his opponents. A law passed to prevent the taking of the produce or revenue of the land out of the kingdom compelled the holders of land in both England and Scotland to make a definite choice of nationality. Those whose estates in England were the richer left Scotland altogether. Bruce also greatly increased the power of the baronage by granting powers of regality along with the lands. During his life Bruce did what he could to consolidate the kingdom and repair the ravages of the war. But his death (1329) placed a child, his son David, on the throne, and left the country a prey to invasion from without and anarchy within.

The next stage in the history of Scotland extends to the Reformation. During that period reliance on France and distrust of England were the principles of foreign policy. Within the kingdom there was a constant struggle between the Crown and the baronage, under whose tyranny the people groaned in vain. The Crown was too weak to redress grievances or to maintain law. The king was little better than a chief with a nominal sovereignty over other chiefs, often more powerful than himself. His only means of reducing a rebel baron to subjection was by empowering another to attack him. In a country thus torn by the feuds of a lawless and turbulent baronage there was little room for social improvement. Hence Scotland at the Reformation was little if at all beyond the point of civilization reached before the outbreak of the War of Independence. The accession of the infant son of Robert Bruce was the signal for the revival of the claims of Baliol. His son Edward was crowned king by his adherents, and civil war again broke out. David was taken by the English, and as he passed most of his life either in captivity or in France, he was the mere shadow of a king, and the government was carried on by a regency. On his death, Robert, the grandson of Bruce by his daughter Margery, and the first sovereign of the family of Stuart, mounted the throne. In this family the crown passed from father to child without a break for nearly three centuries. Robert III succeeded his father. He was so weak both in mind and body that his brother Albany held the reins of government. To maintain himself in power he contrived that his nephew, the heir to the kingdom, should fall into the hands of the English, and on the death of Robert acted as regent in his nephew's name. To maintain his own position he winked at the misdeeds of the barons, and when James I was at length released and came to claim his crown (1424) he found himself surrounded by hostile subjects, each one of whom was as powerful as himself. His first care was to break their power by numerous executions. He then turned his attention to maintaining effectively law and judicial reform. By summoning frequent parliaments he gave importance to the national assembly, which in his reign first became defined in the form of the "Estates." The lesser barons who felt the duty of attending parliament a grievous burden were relieved of it, and allowed to send commissaries, two for every shire. These, with the numbers for the burghs, formed the third Estate. But they were in no sense representatives of the commons. Indeed, the commons of Scotland, outside the burghs, could not be said to be represented in parliament until the passing of the Reform Bill. The Estates met in one chamber. In this reign the custom of delegating the chief business of the parliament to a committee became recognized as a regular part of parliamentary procedure. This committee was called the Lords of the Articles. Its members were elected by the three Estates, and to it was confided the work of maturing the measures to be passed, which were then approved and confirmed in a full parliament.

From this reign dates also the publication of the acts of parliament in the spoken language of the people, and the beginning of statute law. The king caused a collection of the statutes to be made, and separated those which had fallen into disuse from those still in force. He also established the office of treasurer, and set up the Supreme Court of Law, which afterwards developed into the Court of Session. This court, which met three times a year, consisted of the chancellor, who was president, and three other persons chosen from the Estates. They were deputed to hear and decide the causes which until then had come before the parliament. James also established schools of archery and patronized and encouraged learning and letters. He was barbarously murdered by a band of malcontents on the verge of the Highlands (1436). Four kings of the same name succeeded James I. There is little to distinguish one reign from another. The general characteristics of all are the same. Each was ushered in by a long minority, and closed by a violent death. These frequently repeated minorities were very disastrous to Scotland. The short reign of each sovereign after he reached manhood was spent in struggling to suppress the family that had raised itself to too great a height during the minority. He could only do this by letting loose on the offender a rival, who in turn served himself, becoming heir not only to the former's estates but to his arrogance, and proving himself the disturber of the succeeding reign. Fruitless invasions of England and abortive attempts to bring the Celts of the north within the power of the law alternated with the feuds of the rival barons. Under James III the Orkney and Shetland Isles were annexed to Scotland. They had hitherto belonged to Norway, and were made over to the King of Scots as a pledge for the dowry promised with his wife, Margaret of Norway, but they were never redeemed.

James V worked out more fully the project of his ancestor, James I, of establishing a supreme court of law by founding the Court of Session or College of Justice. It was formed on the model of the parliament of Paris, and was composed at first of thirteen judges, though the number was afterwards increased to fifteen. As the members of the court were chosen from the Estates it was supreme in all civil cases, and there was no appeal from its decisions to parliament, nor could it be called upon to review its own judgments. Scottish law was, like the French, based upon the Civil Law, which was adopted and received as authority except where the feudal law had forestalled it. The three universities (St. Andrews, Glasgow, and Aberdeen) which were founded during this period were modelled on that of Paris, which differed widely from the English universities. Provision had also been made for the advancement of elementary education. Grammar schools were founded in the burghs, and by act of parliament (1496) all "barons and freeholders" were commanded to make their sons attend these schools until they were "competently founded," and have "perfect Latin," under penalty of a fine of £20. The introduction of the printing press by Walter Chapman gave a further stimulus to the pursuit of letters. A purely mythical history of Scotland was fabricated, which was supposed to add to the dignity of the kingdom by assuming for it an important position in times of remote antiquity. These ridiculous legends were put into form by Hector Boëce, first principal of the University of Aberdeen, whose "History of Scotland" is wholly unworthy of belief. Unfortunately these legends took root in the national mind, and were accepted as fact by all subsequent historians, who based their works upon them, and it is only in our own days that research has sifted fact from fiction.

In the front rank of the Scottish poets stand the two kings, James I and James V. The favourite themes of the poet's satire were the backsliding and corruption of the priesthood. The Church had become too powerful to be popular. All classes of the community were eager to attack it, and tried to incite the king to follow the example of his uncle, Henry VIII. The danger was only warded off by the adroitness of Beaton, who was the most powerful man in the state. He turned to account the long-cherished jealousy of England to spoil the schemes of Henry, and induced the king to turn a deaf ear to all their suggestions of religious reformation. The discussion of the subject ended in an outburst of war. The attack on the temporalities of the Church had already begun. The benefices in the gift of the Crown were conferred on laymen, generally the king's natural children, who held them in commendam with the title of Commendator. Since the War of Independence the Church had totally changed its character. In the incessant internal struggles that disturbed the ensuing period the Church always supported the Crown, which in return conferred estates and privileges on the Church. On account of their superior learning the great offices of state were filled by churchmen. This gave them a political influence which in addition to their wealth was a constant cause of offence to the barons. The two principal sees—St. Andrews (1471) and Glasgow (1492)—had been raised to the dignities of archbishoprics, and their holders vied with each other in an arrogant display of pomp and state to support their dignity as princes of the Church. The two Beaton (uncle and nephew), who succeeded one another in the primacy, swayed the affairs of the state during the entire reign of James V and the beginning of that of Mary. They held a great number of benefices in France as well as in Scotland. This gave them wealth far beyond that of any of the temporal peers, and corresponding power. They used this power to retard the movement of religious reform by persecuting the teachers of the new doctrines, which had made their way into the kingdom from England and Germany, and were rapidly becoming popular. The first sufferer for liberty of opinion in Scotland was Reseby, a Lollard, who was burnt to death in 1408. After this there are casual notices of persons being called in question for alleged heresy. But Patrick Hamilton, who was burnt by Beaton, is called the proto-martyr, as he was the first to suffer for the doctrines which were afterwards embodied in the Established Church. His death did more than any other measure to hasten the impending Reformation. The unexpected death of the king just after a disastrous defeat on the Border, leaving only an infant of a few days old to succeed him, gave it an opportunity for breaking forth. The first open act of violence was the murder of the primate Cardinal Beaton (1545). The doers of the deed were taken after sustaining a long siege in the cardinal's own castle, but it was only a manifestation of the ferment that could be no longer controlled, and which now broke forth into the civil war which effected the Reformation.

The Reformation effected a complete revolution in the policy of Scotland, and in the current of popular opinion. With the change of religion the French influence came to an end, and religious sympathy did much to stifle the hatred of England that had become hereditary. This great national movement had much of the character of the peasant wars of France and England. It was the protests of the oppressed peasantry against the exaggerated feudalism under which they groaned: the struggle of the people for life and liberty disguised under a show of religious opinions. The movement in the beginning was a popular one. But the barons turned it to their own advantage by taking the lead under the specious title of Lords of the Congregation, and appropriating the greater part of the spoil. The refusal of the regent, Mary of Lorraine, to reform the Church in accordance with the principles of the First Covenant (1557) was followed by the Reformation riots, in which the religious houses and cathedrals were sacked by the mob. The regent employed French troops for the restoration of order. The congregation called English auxiliaries to their aid. Scotland was turned into the battle-field on which French and English fought out their differences. The death of the regent brought a temporary lull. The foreigners withdrew. The Estates seized the opportunity of passing the Reformation Statutes, so that by the time Queen Mary returned from France the old Church had been formally overthrown, and the faith of Geneva established in its stead.

Mary was an ardent Romanist, and would not give up her own form of worship, although she did not interfere with the form her subjects had chosen. Though she did not confirm she did not reverse the Reformation Statutes, nor did she openly favour her co-religionists. Still she did not choose her advisers from among the Protestants. Moray and some other leaders of the congregation rose in open rebellion on the queen's marriage with her cousin Henry, Lord Darnley, and finally withdrew to England. Mary's suspected complicity in the murder of her husband, the favour she lavished upon Bothwell, and her marriage with him, gave the disaffected among her subjects an excuse for her deposition (1567). They placed her infant son upon the throne, while Moray, as regent, was at the head of the government. For eighteen years Mary was held a prisoner in England. This kept the two countries at peace. The government of Scotland dared not disagree with England for fear of having the queen let loose upon them. Four regents, Moray, Lennox, Mar, and Morton, three of whom died deaths of violence, held the reins of government in succession until the majority of James VI. Though Protestantism was still in the ascendant, the episcopal form of Church government was restored under the regency of Mar. In 1588 the Protestant reaction, excited by the Spanish invasion of England, found vent in once again abolishing Episcopacy, and the Presbyterian polity was re-established. After the accession of the king to the English throne (1603), he again restored Episcopacy. And on the one occasion, after the union of the crowns, when he revisited his native kingdom, he gave great offence by reviving a ritualistic service in his private chapel. He also made the assembly pass the "Five Articles of Perth." These enjoined kneeling at the Sacrament, the keeping of saints' days and holy days, and other observances considered popish. The attack thus begun on the liberty of the people through their religion was continued by Charles I.

The attempt to displace the liturgy of John Knox by that of England drove the Scots to rebellion (1637). The Covenant was renewed and signed all over the land. It became the war-cry of the Protestant party. The flame kindled in the north soon spread to England, and both countries were once more plunged into the horrors of civil war. The attempt of the Scots to place Charles II on his father's throne failed, and Cromwell accomplished what had baffled an earlier conqueror—a legislative union of the two kingdoms of Britain (1654). But under the Commonwealth the Scots did not enjoy perfect religious liberty. The assembly was closed, and the power of the Church courts abolished. At the same time the obnoxious bishops were removed. The Restoration (1660) threw the country into a ferment by reinstalling the bishops and the episcopal clergy. No change was made in the form of the service, and as the service-book of John Knox had fallen out of use, the Church now presented the anomaly of a Church with bishops but without a liturgy. Party spirit ran high, and though the cause of dispute was really little more than a question of words, it roused a spirit of persecution on the one side, and obstinacy on the other, that set the whole country in a flame. When the Revolution (1688) set William on the throne the episcopal clergy were in their turn ejected, and the Presbyterian polity finally established. The union of the crowns had not been beneficial to the people of Scotland, for the kings identified themselves with the richer kingdom, and only used the increase in their power to assume despotic power and influence on the liberty of Scottish subjects. This state of things could not continue. It was imperatively necessary, to preserve peace between the two nations, that they should become one in law and in interest. This could only be done by a legislative union, which was effected in 1707. By this Union (q.v.) Scotland was in every respect the gainer. She was allowed to share in the English trading privileges. The energy of the Scottish people had now for the first time free scope for development. The rebellions in favour of the Stuarts, twice in the eighteenth century, disturbed the peace of the country. Good, however, here came out of evil. The Highlanders were still half savages and looked on by the Lowlanders as an alien race, and their country as an unknown region. The breaking-up of the clan system and the making of roads which followed the rising of 1745, first opened up these wild regions for the entrance of civilization. The abolition of heritable jurisdictions (1748) at last broke the chain of feudalism, which till then had curbed the progress of the people. [HIGHLANDS.] Since the interests of Scotland and England have become one, Scotland has risen to the level of the sister kingdom in agriculture, commerce, and manufactures.

Scot's Water was a name given to the Firth of Forth, the old boundary between the Anglian Lothians and the Celtic kingdom of Scotland.

Scots, THE, was a name originally bestowed upon the inhabitants of Ireland, a fact which until recently has hardly been sufficiently appreciated by historians. After numerous previous expeditions a colony of Scots from Ulster under Fergus Mor crossed over to Argyll in the late fifth or early sixth century, and there established the kingdom of Dalriada. There was for long a close connexion between the Irish and Scottish Dalriadas, two members of the same family often ruling in Irish and Scottish Dalriada at the same time. The independence of the Scots was asserted by Aidan (575) at Drumcat. It was not, however, till the tenth century that the name Scotia ceased to be applied to Ireland and was transferred to Scotland; and it was even later before the term Scot acquired a national significance. In the middle of the eighth century Dalriada was temporarily subjugated by Angus Macfergus, the vigorous king of the Picts; and with the accession of Kenneth MacAlpin in 844 the Picts and Scots were united in a partnership never after to be broken. In the early tenth century Constantine III procured the throne of Strathclyde for his brother Donald, thus paving the way for the amalgamation of the Britons with the Scots, and for the subsequent annexation of the British kingdom. A branch of the MacAlpin family long continued to rule in Strathclyde. In 945 Cumbria was harried by Edmund of England, and given up by him to Malcolm I to be held on the condition that he should become Edmund's "fellow-worker" by land and by sea. The evolution of the kingdom of Scotland was completed when the Anglian district of Lothian was ceded by the English to Malcolm II (1018). Edgar, on his death in 1107, left Strathclyde to his youngest brother David, to the chagrin of Alexander I, who saw that his kingdom would be much weakened in consequence. Alexander, however, died without heirs, and David succeeded to the whole kingdom.

Scott, JAMES, DUKE OF MONMOUTH (1649-85), was the natural son of Charles II by Lucy Walter, and was born at Rotterdam. During the king's exile he was generally known as James Crofts, but in 1662 he was brought over to England, and in 1663 created Duke of Monmouth and Orkney, recognized by Charles as his son, and apartments in Whitehall given to him. In the same year he was married to Lady Anne Scott, daughter and heiress of the Duke of Buccleuch. In 1665 he took part in a naval engagement with the Dutch, and in 1668 he was made captain of the first troop of Life Guards. In 1672 he was appointed to an important military command in the Dutch War, and distinguished himself by his bravery and discretion. In 1678 he fought in the army of the Prince of Orange, from whom he earned high praise. In 1679 he was sent to Scotland to repress the Covenanters, whom he defeated at Bothwell Bridge, but earned a name for humanity by preventing the indiscriminate slaughter of the insurgents. From this time he enjoyed great popularity and the friendship of Shaftesbury and other leaders of the Protestant or Presbyterian party. A design was formed whereby Monmouth should succeed to the throne; but Charles sternly refused to countenance such an idea, and expressly declared that Monmouth was not his legitimate son, while, to prevent these intrigues from being carried on any longer, he banished Monmouth to Holland in 1679. In 1680 he returned, was received by the people with the greatest enthusiasm, and made a progress through England, being hailed everywhere with demonstrations of popular joy. In the midst of his progress he was arrested at Stafford by the king's orders. He quickly made his peace with his father, and lived quietly in London till 1683, when he joined in the Revolution plot, though probably not in the Rye House conspiracy. Charles, however, treated Monmouth with the utmost kindness, but finding that he still consorted with men who were suspected of designs against the government, he was compelled to banish him once more to Holland. Here he remained till the accession of James II, when he was expelled from Holland by William of Orange and returned to Brussels, where the invasion of England was planned. On June 11 (1685) he landed at Lyme Regis in Dorsetshire and issued a proclamation against "the Duke of York," as he termed James II, asserting his own legitimacy, but at the same time promising that he would leave his claims to be decided by a free parliament. From Lyme he marched to Taunton, Bridgwater, Wells, and Frome, at all of which places he was solemnly proclaimed. The royal troops under Feversham and Churchill encountered his levies at the battle of Sedgemoor, and Monmouth was utterly routed (July 5, 1685). After wandering about for some days he was discovered near Holt-bridge, in Dorsetshire, in a dry ditch, covered with fern. He now exhibited the greatest cowardice and terror, and entreated James to grant him an interview, which the king did; but, finding that he would not betray his accomplices, all his appeals for mercy were rejected, and he was executed on Tower Hill on July 15. He left three children—James, Earl of Dalkeith, Henry, Earl of Deloraine, and Anne, who died of grief shortly after her father.

Scott, JOHN, 1ST EARL OF ELDON (1751-1838), was born of humble parents at Newcastle-on-Tyne. At school he evinced such remarkable ability as to awaken the interest of a wealthy neighbour, who assisted in sending him to Oxford. He obtained a fellowship at University College, and was called to the bar in 1776. He rose rapidly, and was assisted by the friendship of Lord Thurlow. In parliament he warmly opposed Fox's East India Bill, and on Pitt's accession to office gave him really important support. In 1788 his services were rewarded by his appointment as solicitor-general. In 1793 he became attorney-general, and in that office he found ample employment in the prosecutions which were shortly afterwards instituted against Horne Tooke and other supposed revolutionary characters. In 1799 he succeeded Eyre as chief justice of the Common Pleas, and was raised to the peerage as Baron Eldon. When Pitt resigned, two years afterwards, on the Catholic question, Lord Eldon accepted the great seal at the king's express desire, and while holding that office he gained the entire confidence of George III. On the accession to power of Fox and Lord Grenville he resigned, but again became lord chancellor in 1807. For the next twenty years he remained in uninterrupted possession of the woolstack. He warmly took the part of the Duke of York in 1809, and vigorously opposed alike any relaxation in the severities of the penal code and any concessions to the Roman Catholics. On the question of regency, in 1811, Lord Eldon incurred very warm censure from Lord Grey, for having on several occasions forged the king's signature, when the king was himself incapable of signing his name. On the Prince of Wales becoming regent, Lord Eldon soon ingratiated himself with his new master by taking a very decided part against the Princess Caroline. In 1814 he became an object for the vengeance of the mob in the Corn Law riots. As the outcry for Catholic Emancipation became stronger, he more strongly than ever opposed the measure; and when Canning became prime minister (1827) he resigned the seal to Lord Lyndhurst. He never held office again, though to the very last he continued to oppose the measures of the Whigs. As a judge, Lord Eldon holds high rank, and contributed much towards making our system of equity into a perfect whole. Sir H. Maine calls him "the first of our equity judges who, instead of enlarging the jurisprudence of his court by indirect legislation, devoted himself through life to explaining and harmonizing it." His great fault was his hesitation in deciding cases, the result being an enormous increase in the cost of litigation, and a general feeling among the public that Chancery proceedings were interminable. But the country owes a debt of gratitude to him for having instituted the office of vice-chancellor, and thus relieving the stagnation on the Chancery side.

H. Twiss, "Life of Eldon," 1844. [W. R. S.]

Scott, SIR WALTER, of Buccleuch, tried unsuccessfully to rescue James V from the custody of Angus in conjunction with the Earl of Lennox (1526). He was murdered at Edinburgh by a member of the Clan Ker, his hereditary enemies.

Scott, WILLIAM, BARON STOWELL (1745-1836), was the elder brother of Lord Eldon. From the Grammar School of Newcastle-on-Tyne he went up to Corpus Christi College, Oxford, as a scholar, and obtained a fellowship. In 1773 he was appointed Camden reader in ancient history, while in the meantime he was studying for the bar. He proved an admirable lecturer, but, leaving Oxford in 1777, practised in the Ecclesiastical and Admiralty Courts. Practice flowed in to him at once. In 1783 he was appointed registrar of the Court of Faculties, and five years later judge of the Consistory Court and advocate-general, with the honour of knighthood, and, ten years later, he became judge of the High Court of Admiralty. In 1790 he was returned to parliament for Downton, but during a long career in parliament he scarcely ever made a long speech. In 1821 he was raised to the peerage. As a judge he cannot be too highly praised. He ranks even higher than his distinguished brother. He was painstaking, clear, and logical in his decisions, and displayed a breadth of learning and research which has done much to form our international law. "He formed," says a contemporary writer, "a system of rational law from the ill-fashioned labours of his predecessors, erecting a temple of jurisprudence, and laying its foundations not on fleeting policy, or in occasional interests, but in universal and immutable justice."

Scottish Church. [CHURCH OF SCOTLAND; FREE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.]

Scroggs, SIR WILLIAM (1623 ?-1683), of whose birth and parentage little is known, was called to the bar in 1653. In 1676 he was appointed by Danby to a judgeship in the Common Pleas, and in 1678 was advanced to the chief justiceship of the King's Bench. He was one of the worst judges that ever disgraced the English bench. While the national madness of the Popish Plot (q.v.) lasted he made a point of accepting all the evidence of the most infamous informers without question. To be brought before him in 1679 and 1680 was invariably the prelude to being convicted. His inhuman conduct towards the supposed conspirators in the Popish Plot was only equalled by his gross brutality towards the other party when he discovered that the tide was turning against Shaftesbury and his associates. In 1680 he was impeached by the Commons. The Lords refused to commit him, but the king, perceiving how unpopular the chief justice had become, removed him from his office in 1681, though allowing him a pension of £1,500 a year.

Scrope, HENRY LE, 3RD BARON SCROPE OF MASHAM (d. 1415), was one of Henry V's most intimate friends. He was employed by the king on many diplomatic errands, but in 1415 was implicated in the conspiracy of Cambridge to place the Earl of March on the throne. His guilt is somewhat doubtful, but he was convicted by his peers and executed.

Scrope, HENRY LE, 9TH BARON SCROPE OF BOLTON (1534-92), warden of the West Marches under Queen Elizabeth, and governor of Carlisle, was entrusted for a short time (July 1568—February 1569) with the charge of Mary, Queen of Scots, at Bolton Castle. He aided in crushing the rebellion of 1569, and in the following year was one of the commanders in the raid on Scotland.

Scrope, RICHARD LE, Archbishop of York (d. 1405), was the cousin of Richard II's minister, the Earl of Wiltshire. He was made Archbishop of York in 1398. He was strongly opposed to Henry's accession, and advocated the claims of the Earl of March. In 1405 he joined Northumberland and others in a conspiracy against the king. He was entrapped into a conference with the Earl of Westmorland, when he was seized and beheaded at York. He was regarded by the people as a martyr, and pilgrimages were made to his tomb. The execution of Scrope was the first instance in England of the execution of a prelate by the civil power.

Scrope, RICHARD LE, 1ST BARON SCROPE OF BOLTON (d. 1403), after distinguishing himself by his gallantry in the French and Scottish wars of Edward III's reign, was, on the accession of Richard II, appointed steward of the household, and in 1378 he held the chancellorship for a brief period, and again in 1381-2. He conducted himself with great moderation during the troubles of Richard's reign, and though he took part in the trial of Tresilian and the other royal ministers in 1387, he was declared innocent in 1397.

Scrope, WILLIAM LE, EARL OF WILTSHIRE (d. 1399), was the son of Richard le Scrope, chancellor of England. He was highly in favour with Richard II, who made him chamberlain of the household, and created him Earl of Wiltshire in 1397 as a reward for his services in furthering the coup d'état of that year. He was one of the king's chief advisers during the latter years of his reign, and on the landing of Henry of Lancaster in 1399 he was seized at Bristol and beheaded without trial.

Scullabogue, THE MASSACRE AT, took place on June 5, 1798, during the Irish Rebellion, while Bagenal Harvey (q.v.) and Father Roche were attacking New Ross. All the Protestants taken prisoners by insurgent bands were here confined in a barn, some 300 men being left there to guard them. At nine in the morning thirty or forty of the men were murdered, but those in the barn were as yet spared. When, however, the rebels had been finally repulsed at New Ross the rabble set fire to the barn, and over a hundred old men, women, and children (some twenty Catholics amongst them) were either burnt to death or piked as they tried to escape.

Scutage was the commutation for knight service, assessed by the Crown at a fixed rate upon the basis of the knight's fee. The view that it originated in 1156 has now been definitely disproved. There is evidence to show that it was in existence at least as early as the reign of William Rufus, although it may possibly have been limited in the first instance to the fees of the Church. So far from being a consciously anti-feudal measure, it was probably an expedient forced upon the Crown by the increasing difficulty of securing the services of its tenants. Four phases can be distinguished in the history of the levy. (1) Down to the end of the reign of Henry II scutage was apparently the sole method of commutation. Given the opportunity by the Crown, the tenant-in-chief might choose between (i) personal service in the host (his servitium debitum); and (ii) payment of scutage at the rate determined upon by the king. (2) The second phase is roughly coincident with the reign of Richard I. As a result of the enhanced value of a knight's services, scutage no longer compensated the Crown for the absence of its military tenants; and the Exchequer therefore began to exact from those who wished to avoid personal attendance with the host sums larger than scutage under the name of finés. These finés supplemented but did not supplant the scutage. They merely added a third alternative to those already open to the tenant-in-chief, who might now, at the royal discretion, discharge his obligations by either (i) service, or (ii) scutage, or (iii) a fine. (3) With the reign of John there opens a third phase in the history of the levy. As a measure of expediency the Crown began to accept on occasion a mere fraction of the service nominally due from its tenants. What was at first an occasional expedient gradually hardened into a custom, and by the middle of the thirteenth century the Crown had lost all option in the matter. A new servitium debitum had in effect been created. The reduction did not, however, extend to fiscal matters, for we find that the alternatives to (i) attendance in the host, with the recognized quota, were (ii) payment of scutage on the full traditional number of fees, or (iii) payment of a fine. Throughout this period the tenant-in-chief who discharged his obligations by any one of these three methods was entitled, under sanction of a royal writ, to reimburse himself by collecting scutage for his own use, from his sub-tenants. (4) The last phase in the history of the scutage opens under Edward I. After 1257 a period of more than twenty years elapsed during which no scutage was levied, the relations between the king and his immediate tenants being determined by either (i) the performance of service with the new reduced contingent or (ii) the payment of a fine. When, therefore, Edward in 1279 determined to revive the scutage in connexion with his Welsh campaign of two years earlier, he found that he could only maintain his interest in the levy by assessing it as a general tax, irrespective of the service or fines already proffered. His attempt thus to revolutionize the incidence of the scutage, though justified in some degree by the disparity between the number of fees for which service was rendered and the number traditionally assessed for fiscal purposes, was hotly contested by the tenants-in-chief; and a struggle ensued which ended at length in 1340 in the tacit surrender of the Crown. The last attempt to exact a scutage was made by Edward III in connexion with his Scottish expedition of 1327, but it was soon abandoned; and in 1385 parliament was careful to guard against a revival of the royal claims, by petitioning that any scutage due for the war in Scotland might be pardoned. The later scutages were invariably put in charge in consultation with council or parliament. John's abuse of his feudal rights had led to the inclusion in the Charter of 1215 of the famous clause providing that scutage should henceforth be imposed only "per commune consilium regni." The clause, which was an infringement of strict feudal principle, was omitted from subsequent issues, but its main intention was realized in practice.

Seal, THE GREAT, is the emblem of sovereignty, and is used on all solemn occasions when the will of the sovereign is to be expressed. A new great seal is provided by the king-in-council at the beginning of a new reign, or whenever a change is made in the royal arms or style, and the old one is publicly broken. It was introduced into England by Edward the Confessor, who, following the example of the

Carlovingian kings, placed it in the keeping of a chancellor. From the time of Becket and onwards the office was one of varied importance, and accordingly we find that the personal custody of the seal was not infrequently placed in the hands of a vice-chancellor. Richard I violently took possession of the seal, ordered a new one to be made, and proclaimed that all charters which had been sealed with the old one were null and void. In order to prevent this practice a statute was passed in 28 Henry III proclaiming the nullity of any document sealed with the great seal during its absence from the hands of the chancellor. This law was, however, often broken, and it was not unusual for the chancellor to entrust the seal to one or more vice-chancellors when he was engaged on the business of his diocese, or absent from England. Also during the interval between the death or resignation of one chancellor the great seal, instead of reverting to the sovereign, passed into the hands of a temporary keeper. Gradually this official acquired the right of discharging all the duties connected with the great seal, and in the case of Sir Nicholas Bacon, lord keeper during the earlier part of Elizabeth's reign, a statute was passed declaring him to have "the same place, pre-eminence, and jurisdiction as the lord chancellor of England." During the following reigns the great seal continued in the custody of the lord keeper in the first instance, but this official was generally raised to the title of lord chancellor and kept the seal; since the accession of George III, however, the office of lord keeper has been discontinued. The great seal was also occasionally placed in commission. Under the Tudors and Stuarts the earlier ordinance passed in 1443, requiring that the chancellor should not fix the great seal without authority under the privy seal (q.v.), was seldom observed. When Lord Keeper Littleton fled to Charles I at York in 1642, taking with him the great seal, the Long Parliament illegally ordered a new great seal to be made, to which after some delay the Lords gave their consent, in spite of a proclamation by the king, charging those concerned in making it with high treason. In 1648 a new great seal was ordered with Republican insignia, and soon afterwards it was declared high treason to counterfeit it. A rival great seal was, however, used by Charles II immediately after the death of his father. This was lost after the battle of Worcester. James II on his flight from London threw the great seal into the Thames, but it was fished up again near Lambeth. Since the Revolution the use of the great seal has been strictly confined to the lord chancellor, lord keeper, and lords commissioners, and the regulations for its employment have been carefully observed. By the Act of Union with Scotland one great seal for the United Kingdom is used for the writs by which parliament is summoned, for foreign treaties, and for all public acts of state, while a seal in Scotland is used for private grants. The Act of Union with Ireland, however, made no express provision for establishing one great seal for the United Kingdom. By the Great Seal (Offices) Act of 1874 a number of offices connected with the great seal were abolished, having become obsolete.

Seal, THE PRIVY. A small or privy seal, more personal to the king than the great seal (q.v.), was in existence in the reign of John, being used especially for business connected with the chamber. In origin neither a duplicate of, nor a substitute for, the great seal, the privy seal was in effect complementary to it, and was even sometimes used for the same purposes when the great seal was not available. Its permanence was secured by Chancery's growing preoccupation with public business. At first the privy seal was kept by chamber clerks, but in the reign of Henry III the wardrobe took charge of it, and in Edward I's reign the controller of the wardrobe was its keeper. It authenticated certain types of royal letters and also authorized the issue of writs of great seal. In 1312, as a result of the ordinances of 1311, a special clerk, not the controller of the wardrobe, was assigned to keep the privy seal. From 1312 to 1318 two clerks, and from 1318 to 1399 four, assisted the keeper. The last period saw the evolution of the privy seal office from a department of the wardrobe into a separate department of state. Up to 1350 the privy seal was dependent on the wardrobe for wages and expenses, but these were paid more and more by the Exchequer (q.v.), until, before the end of the fourteenth century, the keeper's wages and all other costs were a direct Exchequer charge. A distinct advance was marked by the Walton ordinances of 1338, which aimed at making privy seal warrants obligatory for all Chancery and Exchequer action not part of routine. At the same time the privy seal began to follow the example of Exchequer and Chancery in going "out of court." The development of the secret seal, and later of the signet [see CHAMBER], gradually relieved the privy seal of the necessity of accompanying the king. After 1360 there was always an office in Westminster. Although the keeper was still regarded as a household officer in mid-fourteenth century, he was in fact becoming the third minister of state, and his office the third public department. The fact that the keepers who attended Edward III on his foreign expeditions frequently had custody of the great seal added to their power and dignity. With the exception of Nicholas Carew, 1371-7, the keeper was a clerk until the sixteenth century, when lay nobles began to hold the office. The position of the keeper, or of the lord privy seal as he came to be called, increased in importance, but the status of the office did not. Although the use of the seal was abolished in 1884, the lord privy seal was continued and is still a member of the cabinet.

Sebastopol was a strongly fortified city in the Crimea, which the Tsar Nicholas made the head-quarters of the Russian fleet. When the Crimean War broke out its siege was resolved upon (June 28, 1854). When the southern side of it was evacuated by the Russians, and the town was occupied by the allies, the Crimean War practically ended (September 9, 1855). [CRIMEAN WAR.]

Secker, THOMAS (1693-1768), Archbishop of Canterbury, was born of dissenting parents at Sibthorpe, in Nottinghamshire. Abandoning the dissenting ministry for medicine, and ultimately persuaded by his school friend, Butler, to join the ministry of the Established Church, he entered Exeter College, Oxford, was ordained in 1723, and was made in 1735 Bishop of Bristol; was translated in 1737 to Oxford, and in 1758 made archbishop.

Secretary of State, THE OFFICE OF.

Before Tudor times the king's secretary was an official of small importance, hardly regarded as a serious rival by the great officers of state. The rapid development of the secretariat in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries is to be ascribed in part to the decline, at that period, of the Chancery as an administrative office; in part to the peculiar needs of the new monarchy; and in part to the work of individual secretaries such as Thomas Cromwell—under whom the first great expansion of the office was effected—and his great successors the Cecils and Walsingham. There was but one principal secretary of state until towards the end of the reign of Henry VIII, when two were appointed of equal powers (1539). In the same reign the secretaries, who had previously been mere clerks who prepared business for the privy council, but were not admitted to its debates, became members of that body. Sir Robert Cecil had the recognized title of "Our Principal Secretary of State," but the office of secretary only attained its present importance when after the Revolution the cabinet began to displace the privy council. On the union with Scotland a secretary of state for Scottish affairs was created, among those who held the office being the Earl of Mar, but it expired in 1746. The office of secretary of state for Scotland was re-established in 1885, although its holder does not rank among the principal secretaries. In 1768 a secretary was appointed for American and colonial affairs, which from 1660 had been managed by the council of trade, but this office was abolished in 1782. In the same year an important change took place. Hitherto the two secretaryships had been known as those of the Northern and the Southern departments, of which the former, besides having the superintendence of the foreign affairs of northern Europe, was supposed to be concerned with those of Ireland. This clumsy arrangement was now abolished, and their duties devolved upon home and foreign secretaries. In 1794 a secretary at war was appointed, and he received in addition the business of the colonies in 1801, but the two functions of colonial and military administration were finally separated in 1854. The secretaryship for India was created in 1858 on the abolition of the double system of government. The chief secretary for Ireland did not as a rule have a seat in the cabinet, and was not reckoned as one of the principal secretaries of state. His official title was the chief secretary to the lord-lieutenant. The office disappeared with the creation of the Irish Free State in 1921. In 1918 a fifth secretaryship was created with the establishment of the air ministry. There are also parliamentary under-secretaries, and permanent secretaries, who are the heads of the working staffs of the government departments. [COLONIAL OFFICE; FOREIGN OFFICE; HOME OFFICE.]

Security, THE ACT OF (SCOTLAND), was passed in 1703 by the Scottish parliament during the agitation that preceded and necessitated the union of the two kingdoms. It provided that parliament should fix a successor to the Scottish crown on the death of Anne from among the Protestant members of the royal family, provided that he should in no circumstances be the same person as the successor to the English crown, unless full security was given for the religious and commercial independence of Scotland, and its equality in trade with England. The royal assent was naturally refused to such a measure by the queen's commissioner, the Duke of Queensberry; but this step proved so unpopular that parliament had to be immediately dismissed without hope of subsidy. In the next session the act was passed again (July 1704), together with measures providing for the calling out of the militia and the granting of six months' supply for the army. In August Anne was induced by Godolphin to pass the act.

Sedasseer, THE BATTLE OF (March 6, 1799), was a British victory in the Mysore War against Tippoo Sultan. General James

Stuart, with the Bombay division, had ascended the Ghauts, and posted himself at Sedasseer. On the morning of March 5 Tippoo was found to be approaching. Preparations were instantly made to receive him by General Hartley, second in command. On the morning of the 6th the advanced brigade was assailed vigorously by the Sultan's entire force, and three battalions under Colonel Montresor sustained the assault for six hours with such determination that Tippoo's officers could do nothing. General Stuart, who was ten miles in the rear, hastening up, found them exhausted and reduced to their last cartridge. In half an hour Tippoo's army retreated with a loss of 2,000 men.

Sedgemoor, THE BATTLE OF (July 5, 1685), the last battle fought on English soil, was fought between the Duke of Monmouth and the royal troops under the Earl of Feversham. After marching through the West country and failing to capture Bath, Monmouth determined to risk all in a general engagement with the royal troops, who were encamped on Sedgemoor, about three miles south of Bridgwater, while Monmouth was then in Bridgwater. Sedgemoor is a swampy plain, crossed by wide ditches called "rhines." In front of Lord Feversham's camp was one of these called the Bussex Rhine. It was Monmouth's intention to attack the royal army in its camp at night. His army was in motion by midnight, and his guides brought him to the brink of the "rhine," fronting Feversham's encampment. Finding it too deep to be crossed, the insurgents halted in doubt and by accident shots were fired across the "rhine," which roused Feversham's troops. Making a detour, they fell on Monmouth's army. Lord Grey and his horse were the first of the insurgents to give way. The peasants and Mendip miners of the West country, however, fought with more courage. But the flight of the cavalry under Grey had made the cause of Monmouth hopeless. The duke himself, at dawn, rode away towards Hampshire, where he was taken in the New Forest on July 8. Deserted by their leaders, the insurgents endeavoured to fly; but Colonel Kirke (q.v.), at the head of his Tangier troops, followed them in close pursuit. A great and barbarous slaughter of the fugitives by the royal troops ensued. The battle put an immediate end to Monmouth's rebellion.

Seditious Meetings Act (November 1795) was provoked by the same state of popular excitement which caused the Treasonable Practices Act (q.v.). The measure was introduced by Pitt a few days after the attack made on the king on October 29 on his way to open parliament. It prohibited the meeting of more than fifty persons (except county and borough meetings duly called) for the consideration of petitions or addresses for reform in Church or State, or for the discussion of any grievance, without the sanction of a magistrate. It vested large discretionary powers in the magistrates, both as to sanctioning such meetings and dispersing them. Pitt even proposed to restrict the liberty of discussion by permitting debating societies to meet only in duly licensed rooms. The bill was professedly a measure of coercion, and as such was opposed by Fox and all his party with even more than their wonted vigour. Only forty-two members, however, followed Fox in opposing the introduction of the bill; and its last reading was carried by 266 to 51.

Sedley, CATHERINE, COUNTESS OF DORCHESTER (1657-1717), was the daughter of Sir Charles Sedley (q.v.), and mistress of James II, by whom, in 1686, she was made Countess of Dorchester. She was celebrated more for her wit and vivacity than for her beauty; and notwithstanding her ridicule of the Romish priests who thronged his court, seems to have maintained her ascendancy over James II. After his exile she married the Earl of Portmore.

Sedley, SIR CHARLES (1639?-1701), was a witty but profligate playwright of the Restoration period. He was the father of Catherine Sedley, James II's mistress, and took some part in politics as member for New Romney. Ultimately he became a strong partisan of the Revolution, though his speech in 1690 against placemen showed that he retained his independence under the new government.

Segrave, STEPHEN (d. 1241), was a partisan of King John during his struggles with the barons, and on Henry III's accession he allied himself with the party of Peter des Roches (q.v.). On the dismissal of Hubert de Burgh in 1232 the office of chief justiciar was given to Segrave. His administration was unsuccessful; he identified himself with the party of the foreigners, thereby incurring the hatred of the barons and the people. He fell in 1234, with his patron des Roches, and was called upon to give an account of his stewardship. Subsequently he made his peace with the king by the payment of a thousand marks, returned to court, and became one of the royal advisers, but was not reinstated in his office. He retired at the end of his life to the abbey of St. Mary des Prés, where he died. Segrave was one of the first of the merely legal justiciars. Though so bad a politician, he was a good lawyer. He marks the transition to the chief justices of later times.

Seguise, THE BATTLE OF (635), was fought at Dalguise, near Dunkeld, between the descendants of Nectan, the Pictish king, who had been driven from the throne in 612, and Garnaid, son of Foith, king of the Picts, who, together with Lochene, son of Nectan, was killed.

Selborne, ROUNDELL PALMER, 1ST EARL OF (1812-95). [PALMER.]

Selby, THE BATTLE OF (April 11, 1644), was fought during the Civil War. Colonel

John Belasyse, the governor of York, during the absence of the Marquis of Newcastle, who was facing the Scots in Durham, occupied with 1,500 horse and 1,800 foot the town of Selby, with the object of preventing the junction of Sir Thomas Fairfax with the Scots. He was attacked on April 11 by Fairfax, with rather superior forces, and his position stormed. Belasyse himself was taken prisoner, and he lost his baggage, artillery, and 1,600 men. Clarendon says:—"This was the first action for which Sir Thomas Fairfax was taken notice of, who in a short time grew the supreme general under the parliament."

Sir C. R. Markham, "Fairfax," 1870.

Selden, JOHN (1584-1654), was educated at Hart Hall, Oxford, and became a member of Clifford's Inn in 1602. After he had continued there a sedulous student for some time, he "did by help of a strong body and vast memory, not only run through the whole body of the law, but became a prodigy in most parts of learning . . . so that in few years his name was wonderfully advanced, not only at home, but in foreign countries, and he was usually styled 'the great dictator of learning of the English nation'" (Wood). In 1617 he published a "History of Tithes," strongly Erastian in its tendency, and basing the claim of the clergy to them on the grant of the civil power. The book was suppressed by the Court of High Commission, and the author was obliged to make a public acknowledgment of his error. Selden sat in the parliaments of 1624, 1626, and 1628. He took part in the impeachment of the Duke of Buckingham, and had the 4th and 5th articles entrusted to him (1626). He also helped to prepare the Petition of Right (q.v.). In 1629 he was summoned before the council for his share in the disturbances of the last day of that parliament, and was imprisoned until 1631. Four years later he published "Mare Clausum," asserting the English sovereignty of the seas, which had originally been written in answer to the "Mare Liberum" of Grotius. When the Long Parliament assembled Selden was chosen member for Oxford University. He brought forward a bill for the abolition of ship-money, and other measures limiting the prerogative; but he opposed the bill for the attainder of Strafford, and the Root and Branch Bill (q.v.). In 1643 he was appointed one of the representatives of the House of Commons in the Westminster Assembly (q.v.), where he played a distinguished part, and two years later was selected as a member of the joint commission to administer the admiralty. He died on November 30, 1654, leaving his library to his executors, who gave it to the Bodleian Library at Oxford.

Self-denying Ordinance, THE, was a measure proposed in the Long Parliament on December 9, 1644, by Zouch Tate, member for Northampton. The words of the resolution were "that no member of either House of Parliament shall during the war enjoy or execute any office or command, military or civil, and that an ordinance be brought in to that effect."

An ordinance was brought in and passed the Commons on December 19, by the small majority of seven votes. After some discussion and hesitation the Lords rejected it, giving as a reason that they did not know what shape the army would take. The Commons at once produced a scheme "for new modelling of the army" [NEW MODEL], which passed the Commons on January 28, 1645, and the Lords on February 15. A second Self-denying Ordinance was now introduced which passed the Lords on April 3, 1645. It provided that all members of either House, who had since the beginning of the present parliament been appointed to any offices, military or civil, should vacate those offices within forty days. But it differed from the first ordinance in that it did not prevent members from taking office on any future occasion. The name given to this ordinance is perhaps derived from a phrase used by Cromwell, who was one of its strongest supporters. "I hope," he said, "we have such English hearts and zealous affections towards the general weal of our mother country, as no members of either house will scruple to deny themselves, and their own private interests, for the public good."

Selgovæ, THE, were an ancient British tribe said to have occupied the modern Annandale, Nithsdale, and Eskdale, in Dumfriesshire, with the east of Galloway.

Selvach (d. 729 ?), King of the Scots of Dalriada, son of Fearchar Fada, succeeded his brother Ainbellach, whom he expelled, as head of the Cinel Loarn (698). In 701 he destroyed the rival tribe of Cinel Cathboth, and in 711 defeated the Britons at Loch Arklet, in Stirlingshire. The following year we find him fighting against the Cinel Gabran in Kintyre, and in 717 again defeating the Strathclyde Britons. In 719 he was defeated in the naval battle of Ardanesbi (q.v.). In 723 Selvach resigned the crown to his son Dungal, and entered a monastery, from which, however, he emerged in 727 to fight the battle of Ross Foichen on his son's behalf.

Sempringham, THE ORDER OF, was founded by an Englishman—St. Gilbert, Rector of Sempringham in Lincolnshire—during the second quarter of the twelfth century; and never spread beyond England. The rule provided for double houses, comprising communities of women organized in accordance with the Cistercian rule; and smaller auxiliary communities of canons, following the rule of St. Augustine, and ministering to the spiritual needs of the nuns. The two bodies were rigidly secluded from each other in adjacent cloisters. The order was under the rule of a general superior, known as the Master of Sempringham. The total number of Gilbertine houses was twenty-seven, of which no fewer than sixteen were in Lincolnshire.

Sepoy Mutinies. (1) 1764. Having been instrumental in deposing two nawabs of Bengal, the East India Company's Bengal sepoy demanded a large donation and increased pay, and on refusal a whole battalion marched off to the enemy, until pursued and brought back by Major Munro. Twenty-four leaders were court-martialled and sentenced to be blown from guns. When four had been so executed the sepoys endeavoured to prevent the other sentences from being carried out, until Munro's threat to discharge a volley of grape shot at them unless they grounded arms cowed them into obedience. (2) 1806. [VELLORE.] (3) 1824. [BARRAKPUR.] (4), 1844, was occasioned by the annexation of Sind to Great Britain, which involved a loss to the sepoys of the customary extra allowance granted for service in foreign lands. The disaffection spread to troops brought in from Madras, but was ultimately appeased on the departure of the Madras troops by a small advance of money. (5), 1850, arose from identical causes on the annexation of the Punjab, and had its seat at Delhi, Wuzirabad, and Govindgur. Order was easily restored. (6) 1857. [INDIAN MUTINY.]

Sepoys are the troops, natives of India, in the British pay. At an early date the company found out that the natives, properly disciplined according to European methods, formed excellent soldiers, and largely used them as cheaper and more efficient than the produce of the crimp-houses and ale-shops of London. By their arms, rather than by European troops, India was conquered by the British; but their religious caste prejudices and dislike of innovation, and sometimes the want of consideration shown to them, have produced mutinies, of which the chief are mentioned in the preceding article.

The importance of the native troops in British employ is clearly shown in Sir J. R. Seeley's "Expansion of England," 1883.

Septennial Act, THE (1716), which increased the length of parliament to seven years, was passed, partly because the Triennial Act of 1694 had not worked well in practice, but still more because the very excited state of popular feeling in consequence of the Jacobite revolt made it unsafe for the Whig ministry to run the risk of a general election. The right of a sitting parliament thus to lengthen its own existence was violently contested at the time by Nottingham and others, and, indeed, could only be justified by the critical condition of the nation and the bad state of the representation, which made an appeal to the people almost a farce. But the second reading in the Lords was carried on April 16 by 77 votes to 43, and in the Commons on the 24th by 284 to 162. The royal assent was given on May 7. Often violently attacked as fixing to the life of parliament a limit too long for popular freedom, the Septennial Act nevertheless continued law until 1911, although later usage practically reduced the length of parliament to a maximum of six years. A bill to repeal it was thrown out in 1734. It was ultimately repealed by the Parliament Act of 1911 (q.v.), which shortened the life of parliament to five years.

Seringapatam, THE SIEGES OF. (1) On February 5, 1792, the army of Lord Cornwallis, consisting of 22,000 men, reinforced by Mahratta and Mogul contingents, reached Seringapatam, the capital of Tippoo's state of Mysore. Tippoo's force was encamped on the northern side of the stream in a position admirably fortified. Cornwallis on the 6th moved his army to the assault in three main divisions. The centre moved straight into Tippoo's camp; part forced its way through the river, and seized a village and the guns on the island; part attacked the redoubts within the camp; while the reserve fought its way across the river to the island. The British established themselves in the island, with a loss of 530 men; Tippoo's loss being estimated at 20,000. Tippoo now began to treat insincerely. On February 16 General Abercromby joined Cornwallis, and the operations of the siege were pushed with vigour. Tippoo, alarmed, consented to treat (March 1792). (2) April 16, 1799. This took place during Lord Wellesley's campaign against Mysore. The advanced post of General Harris's army established itself within 1,600 yards of the fort of Seringapatam on the south-west side of the river and fort. On May 3 a breach was practicable. The troops destined for the assault, 4,376 in number, took up their stations in the trenches next morning under General Baird. At one o'clock the word was given, and, in spite of a desperate resistance, within seven minutes the British ensign was floating over the breach. A general stampede followed, and in the flight Tippoo was slain. Baird succeeded in securing the family of Tippoo, and proceeded to search for the dead body of the sultan, of whose death he was informed. Thus in the space of a few hours fell the capital of Mysore, though garrisoned by 20,000 troops.

Seringapatam, THE TREATY OF (March 8, 1792), was concluded between the parties to the triple alliance of 1790 and Tippoo. Its stipulations were the cession of the old Mahratta provinces north of the Tungabuddra to the peshwa; the cession to the nizam of Tippoo's provinces north of that river; the cession to the British of the districts of Malabar, Coorg, Dindigul, Baramahal, and Salem; and the restoration of the British prisoners. Tippoo agreed to pay a sum equivalent to £3,600,000, and gave two of his sons as hostages.

Serjeanty was a tenure the essence of which may be described as "servantship." The list of serjeanties comprised originally most of the needs of the royal household, and many of the needs of the government of the state; while the magnates also secured the staff needed to minister to their personal wants and to administer their lands by granting estates to be held by serjeanty. It comprised also a class of military tenants occupying a position subordinate to that of the knight. With the development of a money economy, the largest class of tenants by serjeanty—viz., those who held their lands on condition of rendering some personal or menial service—gradually disappeared, leaving only the "grand" hereditary serjeanties of the royal household (involving such duties as carrying the king's banner or lance, or acting as his carver, butler, or chamberlain), and the "petty" serjeanties, which were mostly of a military or semi-military character and were with increasing difficulty distinguished from socage. On the abolition of feudal tenures and their incidents, in 1660, the grand serjeanties were specially exempted from the operation of the statute, but the petty serjeanties were finally merged in free and common socage.

Session, THE COURT OF, the highest civil judicial tribunal in Scotland, was formally instituted by statute of James V in 1532 after a long period of experiment. Its functions had previously been discharged by the council and a committee of parliament. Its original composition included fourteen judges, called Lords of Session, and a president. Besides this the Crown could appoint three or four peers as assessors. In 1808 the court was divided into two courts with separate jurisdiction, called the first and second divisions; the former presided over by the president, the latter by the lord justice clerk. In 1810 the junior judges were appointed to sit as lords ordinary in the Outer House. In 1830 the number of judges was reduced to thirteen, and the quorum was also reduced. An appeal lies to the House of Lords.

Seton, ALEXANDER, 1ST EARL OF HUNTLY (d. 1470), was created earl by James II of Scotland (1449-50). He was the head of the Setons and the Gordons, and received his title in reward for his services against the Douglas faction. He defeated the Earl of Crawford, one of the Douglas leaders, in the battle of Brechin (1452); but afterwards obtained for him a full pardon.

Seton, GEORGE, 5TH LORD SETON (1530-1585), was one of the leaders of the Catholic party in Scotland against the teaching of Knox. He was a staunch supporter of Queen Mary, whom he entertained in his castle in Haddingtonshire immediately after Darnley's murder, and promptly aided on her escape from Lochleven Castle (1568). He was captured at Langside, but later made peace with Morton's government. He supported Lennox after Morton's death.

Settlement, THE ACT OF, OR, as its proper title is, the "Act for the further limitation of the Crown and better securing the rights and liberties of the subject," was passed in the year 1701. It was necessitated by the untimely death of the young Duke of Gloucester, son of the Princess Anne, in this year. There was no question that the Princess Sophia was the fittest object of the nation's preference. She was indeed very far removed from any hereditary title. Besides James Edward, labelled from birth a pretender, and his sister, whose legitimacy no one disputed, there stood in her way the Duchess of Savoy, daughter of Henrietta, Duchess of Orleans, and several members of the Palatine family. According to the tenor and intention of this statute, all prior claims of inheritance, save that of the issue of King William and the Princess Anne, being set aside and annulled, the Princess Sophia became the source of a new royal line. The throne of England and Ireland stands entailed upon the heirs of her body, being Protestants. It was determined to accompany this settlement with additional securities of the subject's liberty. Eight articles were therefore inserted in the Act of Settlement, to take effect only from the commencement of the new limitation of the house of Hanover. These eight articles were, however, an unreasonable vote of censure of the Tory parliament which passed the act, on many of the acts of the reign of William III. They are: (1) That whosoever shall hereafter come to the possession of this crown shall join in communion with the Church of England as by law established; (2) That in case the crown and imperial dignity of this realm shall hereafter come to any person not being a native of this kingdom of England, this nation be not obliged to engage in any war for the defence of any dominions or territories which do not belong to the crown of England, without the consent of parliament; (3) That no person who shall hereafter come to the possession of the crown shall go out of the dominions of England, Scotland, or Ireland without the consent of parliament; (4) That from and after the time that further limitation of this act shall take effect, all matters and things relating to the well-governing of this kingdom which are properly cognizable in the privy council by the laws and customs of this realm shall be transacted there, and all resolutions taken thereupon shall be signed by such of the privy council as shall advise and consent to the same; (5) That . . . no person born out of the kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland, or the dominions thereunto belonging (though he be naturalized or made a citizen, except such as are born of English parents), shall be capable to be of the privy council, or a member of either House of parliament, or to enjoy any office or place of trust, either civil or military, or to have any grants of lands . . . from the Crown . . . ; (6) That no person who has an office or place of profit under the king, or receives a pension from the Crown, shall be capable of serving as a member of the House of Commons; (7) That . . . judges' commissions shall be made quamdiu se bene gesserint, and their salaries established and ascertained; but upon the address of both Houses of parliament it may be lawful to remove them; (8) That no pardon under the great seal of England be pleadable to an impeachment by the Commons in parliament. The first of these provisions needs no comment. The second was frequently called in question during the reign of George II, in regard to subsidiary treaties for the defence of Hanover. Certainly if a power at war with England chose to consider that electorate as part of the king's dominions it ought to be defended from attack. The real remedy—the separation of Hanover from England—was effected on the accession of Victoria. The third was repealed shortly after the accession of George I, who frequently abused it by his journeys to Hanover. The next articles are extremely important. The fourth is a reactionary measure, being an attempt to suppress the growth of the cabinet as distinct from the privy council, which became more fully established in the reign of William III. The signature of the privy councillor was devised as a method of obviating the irresponsibility of the cabinet minister. [CABINET.] The article is also a protest against William's Partition Treaty [SPANISH SUCCESSION], which was concluded by the instrumentality of Portland and Somers, without his consulting even the cabinet. It was repealed in 1705. The fifth article is a protest against William's partiality for Portland and Albemarle. It was too sweeping in its application, although it had a beneficial effect in the reign of George I. It was afterwards modified, especially with regard to admission to parliament, and was finally repealed by 7 & 8 Vict. c. 66, Hutt's Naturalization Act. The next article was a most short-sighted measure. Had it continued in force, the ministry would have been excluded from parliament: that is, there would have been a complete separation between the executive and legislature. Hence the Commons, who alone can grant supplies, would either have roused the people to subvert the monarchy, or they would have sunk to the condition of the Estates-General of France. The evil of the influence of the Crown was partially remedied by Place Bills, but more effectively by limiting the royal revenue. The article was revised in 1705, when, however, the following provisions were inserted: That any member of the Commons accepting an office of the Crown, except a higher commission in the army, shall vacate his seat, and a new writ shall be issued; secondly, that no person holding an office created since October 25, 1705, shall be capable of election or re-election. Parliament excluded at the same time all such as held pensions during the pleasure of the Crown; and, to check the multitude of place-men, enacted that the numbers of commissioners appointed to execute any office should not be increased. The efficacy of the seventh clause was increased by the exclusion of judges from parliament.

Settlement, THE ACT OF (IRELAND), I (1652), was the Cromwellian measure for the settlement of Ireland. The following were its chief provisions:—(1) A free pardon was granted to all whose personal estate did not exceed £10 in annual value. (2) All the land in Ulster, Munster, and Leinster was declared confiscated. (3) The Irish proprietors in these three provinces were divided into three classes: (a) All rebels before November 10, 1642, all who sat in the Kilkenny Council before May 1643, all the leaders mentioned by name, and all concerned in the massacre of 1641, to lose their lives and estates; (b) All other persons, who fought against the Parliament, to lose two-thirds of their estates; (c) All persons who had resided in Ireland between 1641 and 1650, and who had not served with the Parliamentary forces since 1649, to lose one-third of their estates. An act of the Little Parliament in 1653, however, declared that those proprietors who were to get part of their estates restored to them must accept equivalents in Connaught and Clare. The greater part of the forfeited lands was then set apart in equal shares to satisfy the claims of the adventurers and of the Puritan soldiery, the counties of Dublin, Cork, Kildare, and Carlow being reserved for the future disposal of Parliament. The soldiers were to be kept together in regiments; but the designs of the Protector in this direction were frustrated by the soldiers themselves, who sold their lands to speculators like Sir W. Petty, before the allotment. It has been said that the Cromwellian Settlement was the foundation of that deep and lasting aversion between the proprietary and the tenants which has been one of the chief causes of the political and social evils of Ireland.

Settlement, THE ACT OF (IRELAND), II (14 & 15 Charles II—1662), was passed in the second session of Charles II's first Irish parliament, and was substantially based on the Declaration of 1660. It declared that innocent Irish were to regain their estates, while the Cromwellian and other settlers also had their land confirmed to them. It was found that there was not enough land in Ireland to satisfy all. Everything depended on the construction of the word "innocent" by the Court of Claims. The term "innocent" was not to include anyone who had been on the rebel side, or even resided within their lines before the cessation, nor anyone who had sided with Rinuccini against Ormonde. Yet, despite this not very liberal construction, too much land was restored by the court to the natives, and it was found necessary in 1665 to pass a second act, the Act of Settlement and Explanation (q.v.).

R. Bagwell, "Ireland Under the Stuarts," vol. iii, 1916; "Irish Statutes," vol. i.

Settlement and Explanation, THE ACT OF (IRELAND) (17 & 18 Charles II—1665), became necessary owing to the action of the Court of Claims and its construction of the Act of Settlement in favour of the natives. In accordance with the new act, adventurers and soldiers were to content themselves with two-thirds of what belonged to them; Catholics were to make good their claims as innocent within the year. All doubtful cases were to be construed in favour of Protestants, and some twenty persons were to be restored to their estates by special favour, and at once. The result of this act, thus avowedly designed to protect the Protestant interest, and especially of the second clause, was to deprive 3,000 Catholics of all their rights without a trial, and to leave but one-third instead of two-thirds of the good land in Ireland in Catholic hands. An attempt at inquiry into the working of this act in 1670 had to be given up in deference to the English parliament.

R. Bagwell, "Ireland Under the Stuarts," vol. iii, 1916.

Settlement of India, THE ACT FOR THE (or, as it is more correctly called, "The Act for the Better Government of India"), became law on August 2, 1858, after vigorous debates on Lord John Russell's resolutions, upon which it was based, and a strong protest from the directors of the East India Company. It provided that all the territories previously under the government of the company were to be vested in the queen, who was to govern through one of the principal secretaries of state, assisted by a council of fifteen, of whom seven were to be elected by the court of directors and eight nominated by the Crown. After a certain time the right of the directors to appoint members was to be transferred to the secretary of state. The governor-general received the new title of viceroy. The civil service was made competitive, the military forces were amalgamated with the royal service, and the navy abolished. It was also provided that Indian revenues should not be applied towards defraying the cost of an extra-frontier military expedition without the consent of parliament. [INDIA.]

Act 21 & 22 Vict. c. 106.

Seven Bishops, THE. [BISHOPS, THE SEVEN.]

Seven Earls, THE, were dignitaries of early mediæval Scotland. The appearance of the term "earl" as a title, and of the Seven Earls as representing various parts of the country in the council of the kingdom, begins with the reign of Alexander I. The same officials had, if Celts, been previously styled mormaers; if Norsemen, jarls. The appearance of the Seven Earls is an important step in the feudalization of Scotland, and in the anglicization of the northern districts. Under Alexander II the Seven Earls appear as a recognized constitutional body, and then included the Earls of Fife, Atholl, Strathearn, Angus, Menteith, Buchan, and Lothian, but the lists vary at different times. The Seven Earls claimed of Edward I the right of constituting and appointing the king. But at least as early as this their functions were extended to the Estates, and the creation of additional earldoms put an end to the Seven Earls.

Seven Years' War, THE (1756-63), was caused by the alarm entertained by the continental powers of Europe at the aggressive designs of Frederick the Great, and by the desire of Maria Theresa to recover the province of Silesia from the King of Prussia. Austria was readily joined by Louis XV of France, the Tsarina Elizabeth, and the King of Poland, who was also Elector of Saxony; while Frederick obtained promises of assistance from Great Britain—which was nervously afraid of isolation, and was already at war with France in the colonies—besides some money, and an army in Hanover. Throughout the continental war, however, the British troops played a secondary part. The first campaign was a great triumph for Frederick. Assuming the offensive, he overran Saxony, defeated the Austrians who were advancing to its relief at Lobositz, and compelled the Saxon army to surrender. In 1757 the attention of Frederick was at first confined to Bohemia, which he invaded; he invested the Imperialists in Prague, until Marshal Daun defeated him decisively at Kolin in June, and compelled him to evacuate the country. Meanwhile, in Hanover, the British-Hanoverian army, under the Duke of Cumberland, was opposed to the French under Marshal d'Estrées. After allowing the French to cross the Weser, he was utterly defeated at Hastenbeck (July 26), and compelled to capitulate under the Convention of Kloster-Zeven (q.v.). This arrangement, however, was repudiated by the British government, and the defeated army placed under Ferdinand of Brunswick, who drove back the French on that side. Aided by this timely diversion, Frederick succeeded in making head against the coalition, the Imperialists being routed at Rosbach in November, and Silesia reoccupied after the victory of Leuthen. The sudden withdrawal of the Russians from the campaign, owing to the illness of the Tsarina, set the Prussians who had been employed against them free to chastise the Swedes, who had joined the allies in this year. At the same time Clive in India had won the great victory of Plassey over the French (June 23). The next campaign (1758) was one of considerable changes of fortune. Ferdinand of Brunswick, after defeating the French at Crevelt on June 23, retired before Marshal Contades, only to advance again and drive the enemy behind the Rhine. On his side Frederick was driven out of Moravia, but won a brilliant victory over the Russians at Zorndorf; and though defeated by Daun with loss at Hofkirchen, he managed before the end of the year to free Saxony and Silesia from the enemy. Meanwhile the British had taken Louisburg and Fort Duquesne in America, and made successful descents upon Cherbourg and St. Malo. In 1759 the efforts of Frederick were on the whole unfortunate. The battle of Kunersdorf, at first a victory, was converted into a crushing defeat by the approach of Marshal Loudon; his general, Fink, surrendered in November, and at the end of the year Saxony and Lusatia were occupied by the Austrians. Ferdinand of Brunswick, however, though frustrated in an attempt to recover Frankfurt, won a great victory at Minden on August 1, over Contades and Broglie, and, aided by the victory of his relative the hereditary Prince of Brunswick, on the same day, succeeded in clearing Westphalia of the enemy. At the same time the resources of the French were being weakened by the British successes in the east and west, by the capture of Quebec in September, by the victories of Boscawen at Lagos, and of Hawke at Quiberon, and by the successes of Coote in India, which terminated with the battle of Wandewash. In 1760 the British subsidy alone enabled Frederick to resist his encircling enemies. Berlin was occupied by the Russians in October, and though by the brilliant victory of Liegnitz on August 15 Silesia had been partially recovered, they came up again on November 3, and the fearful battle of Torgau only just saved Prussia from destruction. It was followed by the retirement of the allies on all sides. Soon after the death of George II all subsidies from Great Britain ceased, and so exhausted were both sides that no operations of particular moment were undertaken. On the Rhine, Ferdinand of Brunswick and the French alternately advanced and retreated, and the Russians and Austrians were unable to crush Frederick's remnant of an army, owing to the desolation of the country. A double series of negotiations had already begun, those between Great Britain and France, and those between Russia and Austria on the one side, and Prussia on the other. The former, in spite of the opposition of Pitt and the outbreak of the war with Spain, ripened into the Treaty of Paris (q.v.) of 1763. The latter were broken off by Austria, and the war was resumed. The death of the Tsarina Elizabeth, in January 1762, however, totally changed the balance of affairs, and Maria Theresa, thus alone, was compelled to conclude the Peace of Hubertsburg in 1763, by which Frederick retained Silesia. The war, therefore, had effected but little change in Europe; but it had settled the question of the rivalry of Great Britain and France in America and India, decisively in favour of the former.

Severus, L. SEPTIMIUS, Roman Emperor 193-211, is famous in British history for his expedition to Britain in 208, and for his campaigns in Caledonia, which resulted in the temporary subjugation of the country as far north as the Moray Firth. He repaired and rebuilt the great wall of Hadrian between the Solway Firth and the Tyne. He died at York early in 211.

Seville, THE TREATY OF (November 9, 1729), settled for a while the difficulties which had been raised in Europe by the intrigues of the Spanish minister, Don Ripperda, in opposition to the Quadruple Alliance (q.v.). The question most difficult to arrange was that of the cession of Gibraltar. This possession the ministry were not unwilling to surrender, provided an equivalent was given, but feared opposition from the nation, which was violently agitated on the subject, owing to the publication of a letter of George I in which it had been vaguely promised to Spain. The government therefore sent William Stanhope to Spain, who succeeded in concluding the treaty. He was aided by French mediation. It was a defensive alliance between England, Spain, France, and subsequently Holland. Spain revoked all the privileges granted to Austrian subjects by the treaties of Vienna, re-established British trade in America on its former footing, and restored all captures. The Asiento (q.v.) was confirmed to the South Sea Company, and arrangements were made for securing the succession of Parma and Tuscany to the infant Don Carlos, by substituting Spanish troops for the neutral forces, which since the preliminaries had been occupying those countries. Gibraltar was not mentioned in the treaty, and this silence was regarded as a renunciation of the claims of Spain. "The Treaty of Seville," says Lecky, "has been justly regarded as one of the great triumphs of French diplomacy. It closed the breach which had long divided the courts of France and of Spain, and, at the same time, it detached both England and Spain from the Emperor, and left him isolated in Europe. He resented it bitterly, protesting against the introduction of Spanish troops into Italy as a violation of the Quadruple Alliance, threatened to resist it by force, and delayed the execution of this part of the treaty during the whole of 1730."

Sexburh (672), is said by the "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle" to have succeeded on the death of her husband Cenwealh, and reigned for a year as Queen of Wessex. If this statement is to be accepted literally, we have here the sole instance of a woman obtaining the crown in Anglo-Saxon times. It is, however, likely that she ruled as regent for an infant son whose name has perished.

Seychelles, THE, a group of 92 islands and islets (Mahé the chief) in the Indian Ocean, first visited in 1609 by an English ship, were formerly in the possession of the Portuguese and French. On the acquisition of Mauritius by the British in 1810 the Seychelles were made a dependency of that colony, together with the island of Rodriguez. They were ceded to Great Britain by the Treaty of Paris in 1814. The office of administrator was created in 1888, and in 1903 the administrator was raised to the rank of governor.

O. Anastas, "Histoire et Description des Iles Séchelles," 1897.

Seymour, LADY CATHERINE, COUNTESS OF HERTFORD (1538?-1568), was the second daughter of Henry Grey, Duke of Suffolk (q.v.), and younger sister of Lady Jane Grey (q.v.), after whose death she represented the house of Suffolk, which by Henry VIII's will was to succeed Elizabeth to the throne. After the accession of Elizabeth, Philip of Spain endeavoured to set her claims in opposition to the queen, but was unable to get her into his hands. In 1561 she was sent to the Tower ostensibly for having contracted a secret marriage with Lord Hertford, but in reality for fear she should prove a dangerous rival to Elizabeth. In 1563 Lady Catherine's claims were seriously discussed in parliament, and in the next year John Hales, the clerk of the Hanaper, published an elaborate argument in her favour. She died in January 1568, her death being accelerated by the harsh treatment of Elizabeth, and by her having been the object of the political schemes of all parties in turn who hoped to make use of her. Lady Hertford's marriage, which was declared null by Elizabeth's commissioners, was pronounced valid by a jury in the reign of James I.

Seymour, CHARLES, 6TH DUKE OF SOMERSET (1662-1748), succeeded to the titles of his brother Francis in 1678. As gentleman of the bed-chamber to James II he refused to introduce the papal nuncio d'Adda at Windsor, and was in consequence dismissed from his office. In 1688 he joined the Prince of Orange, was appointed president of the council, and on the departure of William to Ireland was one of the lords justices who administered the kingdom. On the accession of Queen Anne he was created master of the horse. He was one of the commissioners for treating of the Union with Scotland (1707). Through the influence of his wife he became a favourite with Anne. After being connected with Harley and the Tories for some years (1708-11), he began to intrigue with the Whigs (1711), and was in consequence dismissed from his office in the following year. As Queen Anne lay on her death-bed he repaired to the council, and, in conjunction with Argyll, proposed that the lord treasurer's staff should be entrusted to Shrewsbury. Thus, by taking power out of Bolingbroke's hand, he did a great service to the house of Hanover. Before George I arrived in England Somerset acted as one of the guardians of the realm. He again became master of the horse, but resigned in the following year, and took no important part in politics subsequently.

Seymour, EDWARD, DUKE OF SOMERSET AND 1ST EARL OF HERTFORD (1506?-1552), Lord Protector of England, rose into importance with the marriage of his sister, Jane Seymour, to Henry VIII, in 1536. Henceforward he became one of the leaders of the reformed party at the court, and was constantly employed in military and administrative services, in which he displayed considerable capacity. He was created Earl of Hertford (1537). In 1544 he was sent into Scotland at the head of 10,000 men, and captured and sacked Edinburgh and Leith (May 1544). Immediately afterwards he and the greater part of his army were transported to Calais to prosecute the war against France, and met with some successes near Boulogne. In the closing year of Henry's reign Hertford was actively employed in counteracting the intrigues of the Howards, and succeeded so well that Surrey, his great rival, was put to death, and Norfolk narrowly escaped with his life. By Henry VIII's will Hertford was appointed one of the council of sixteen executors. But the will was immediately set aside, and Hertford (now created Duke of Somerset) was appointed president of the council and Protector of the kingdom. A fleet and army having been collected to assist the Protestants in Scotland, and force on the marriage between Edward VI and the young Queen Mary, Somerset at the head of a great army invaded Scotland, and won the battle of Pinkie (September 10, 1547), with the result, however, of completely alienating the Scots, and hastening the marriage contract between Mary and the Dauphin of France. In France the Protector was obliged to reopen the war, and his forces were worsted in several actions near Boulogne. In home affairs it was the aim of Somerset and his followers in the council to push on the Reformation as speedily as possible. A complete English service book was drawn up [PRAYER BOOK], and the first Act of Uniformity was passed (1549). At the same time an attempt was made to reverse the arbitrary government of Henry VIII's reign. But Somerset's own conduct was in some respects more arbitrary than that of the late king. In 1549 the Protector's brother, Lord Seymour of Sudeley, was engaged in designs for overturning Somerset's government and getting the guardianship of the king and kingdom himself. A Bill of Attainder was brought against him, and he was condemned of treason and executed without being allowed the opportunity of speaking in his own defence (1549). Somerset also made some attempts to relieve the social distresses of the kingdom, and issued a commission to inquire into them. The result, however, was only that of increasing popular excitement, and of rousing the enmity of the whole body of the new nobility who had profited by the recent changes. In 1549 a rebellion of an agrarian character broke out in Norfolk, while another in Devonshire was caused by the advance of the Reformation. Somerset displayed no vigour in suppressing the insurrections, while his rivals in the council acted with energy. John Dudley, Earl of Warwick, his principal opponent, put down the Norfolk rising with much severity, and at once gained great influence in the council. Somerset attempted to bring matters to a crisis, by declaring the council treasonable; but he was compelled to submit to the majority, and to resign the protectorship (1549). He was sent to the Tower, but released in February 1550. In the following year he was gradually regaining influence, with the failure of the council's administration. Northumberland (Warwick), afraid of his designs, had him seized and tried for treason and felony. He was found guilty on the latter indictment and executed (January 22, 1552). A man of patriotic feeling, and much ability, Somerset's failure was chiefly due to want of judgment and foresight.

A. F. Pollard, "England Under Protector Somerset," 1900. [S. L.]

Seymour, EDWARD, EARL OF HERTFORD (1539-1621), was the eldest surviving son of Edward, Duke of Somerset, Protector of England. On the accession of Elizabeth the earldom was revived in his favour (1559). Shortly afterwards (1561) he was imprisoned in the Tower and fined £15,000 for having secretly married Lady Catherine Grey, who was regarded by Elizabeth as a possible dangerous rival. Archbishop Parker declared their union illegal, and the issue illegitimate. Hertford underwent a long imprisonment, and continued in obscurity during Elizabeth's reign. He afterwards married again, and lived to extreme old age.

Seymour, SIR EDWARD (1633-1708), a descendant in the elder line of Lord Protector Somerset, was a strong Tory. He was made Speaker of the House of Commons in 1673, and subsequently created privy councillor and treasurer of the navy. He opposed the Exclusion Bill (q.v.), but soon after the accession of James II spoke against the abrogation of the charters of towns, and also against the maintenance of a standing army. He joined the Prince of Orange, and was left in command at Exeter. In the Convention he would have been chosen Speaker had he not voted for a regency. However, he took the oath of allegiance, and in 1692 he was placed on the treasury commission, when he soon quarrelled with his colleagues on questions of precedence, and in 1694 was dismissed from office. In 1697, exasperated at not being appointed Speaker, he made a violent speech on the election of Littleton, and went beyond the bounds of moderation in his persecution of an officer named Kirke, who had slain his eldest son in a duel. In Queen Anne's reign he was made comptroller of the palace.

He was dismissed from office in 1704 for his opposition to the war with France.

Seymour, LADY JANE (1509 ?-1537), was the third wife of Henry VIII, and mother of Edward VI. She had been maid-of-honour to Anne Boleyn, whom she supplanted in 1536. She was betrothed to the king by special dispensation on May 20, the day following Anne's execution, and married ten days later. Her son, Edward VI, was born on October 12, 1537. She died twelve days later.

Seymour, THOMAS, BARON SEYMOUR OF SUDELEY (1508 ?-1549), brother of Protector Somerset, was a man of great ambition, unprincipled in the attainment of his ends. Made a peer and lord high admiral of England by his brother, he shortly afterwards married Catherine Parr, the queen-dowager, and utilized his improved position to set the young king Edward VI against his brother, of whose power he was envious. He sought allies even among the debasers of the coinage and the pirates in the Channel. He formed a plot to carry off Edward, and to drive his brother from the protectorship, but his plan was betrayed and Seymour was bribed to remain quiet. On the death of Catherine (September 1548) the admiral endeavoured without success to obtain the hand of the Princess Elizabeth, and formed fresh plans of violence against his brother. At the end of 1548 Seymour's proceedings became so threatening that he was arrested and sent to the Tower, attainted of high treason, and executed, March 20, 1549. "He was," said Hallam, "a dangerous and unprincipled man; he had courted the favour of the young king by small presents of money, and appears beyond question to have entertained a hope of marrying the Princess Elizabeth, who had lived much in his house during his short union with the queen-dowager. It was surmised that this lady had been poisoned to make room for a still nobler consort." Latimer said of him that "the admiral was a man furthest from the fear of God that ever he knew or heard of in England."

Shaftesbury, EARLS OF. [COOPER.]

Shah Shuja (1780 ?-1842), was the brother of Zemaun Shah, King of Afghanistan, whom he succeeded in 1803. In 1808 Mount-stuart Elphinstone was sent by Lord Minto to negotiate a treaty of defence with Shah Shuja. During the negotiations an expedition which he had sent to recover Kashmir was defeated, and his brother Mahmud took advantage of this to seize Kabul and Kandahar, and threaten Peshawar, Shah Shuja's capital. Shah Shuja thereupon solicited help from the British. In 1810, however, he was totally defeated by his rival, and fled across the Indus. After remaining some time in captivity in Kashmir he sought refuge with Ranjit Singh (q.v.), who subjected him to cruelties in order to obtain the Koh-i-noor from him. He succeeded at length in escaping in disguise to Ludhiana, where the British government allowed him a pension of 50,000 rupees a year. In 1833 he was encouraged by the treachery of Dost Mohammed's brothers to make an effort to recover his throne. He in vain asked help of the British. He therefore concluded a treaty with Ranjit Singh, guaranteeing him all his conquests beyond the Indus on condition of his support. He marched successfully through Sind to Kandahar, where he was attacked and utterly beaten by Dost Mohammed. In July 1834 he fled to Baluchistan, and in March 1835 he returned to Ludhiana. In 1838, on the failure of the mission to Kabul, a triple alliance was concluded between the British, Ranjit, and Shah Shuja, for the deposition of Dost Mohammed, and the re-establishment of the Shah, on the condition that the possessions of Ranjit across the Indus were guaranteed. The Shah, however, had no desire to be carried into Kabul by British bayonets. All he wanted was British gold. Therefore he did not contemplate the Afghan expedition. On April 25, 1839, he entered Kabul unopposed. In 1840 he established the order of the Durani empire to decorate his British supporters. During his residence at Kabul he insisted that the Bala Hissar, the citadel, in which he had placed his zenana, should not be profaned by British troops, and thus it was left defenceless. He was thoroughly unpopular, owing to the cessions to Ranjit Singh, and was merely supported by British bayonets. In 1842 the last survivor of the British garrison at Kabul reached Jalalabad. Shah Shuja still remained ostensibly head of the Afghan government, continuing to occupy the Bala Hissar. He endeavoured to keep friendly both with the British by professing unaltered attachment, and with the chiefs by professing devotion to the national cause. The latter distrusted him, and desired him to prove his sincerity by leading the army destined to expel General Sale from Jalalabad. On April 5, 1842, after an oath of safe-conduct from Zemaun Khan, he descended from the citadel decked out in all the insignia of royalty, and was shot dead by a body of matchlock men whom Zemaun Khan's son had placed in ambush without his father's knowledge.

Sharrington, SIR WILLIAM (1495 ?-1553), was master of the mint at Bristol, and one of the party of Thomas, Lord Seymour of Sudeley (q.v.), for whose service he coined £10,000 of base money. He was arrested in February 1549, and attainted at the same time as Seymour (March), though he subsequently (December) obtained a pardon.

Sharp, JACK (d. 1431), was the assumed name of a Lollard leader who, in 1431, organized in the southern Midlands a movement which had for its ostensible object the disendowment of the Church. He was captured and put to death either at Oxford or at Abingdon.

Sharp, JAMES (1613-79), Archbishop of St. Andrews, was the agent of the Resolutioners (q.v.) to Cromwell in 1657, and was one of the leading Presbyterian ministers in Scotland. He was in favour of the restoration of Charles II, who appointed him in 1660 one of the royal chaplains. In 1661 he was sent to London by the Presbyterians to beg for the establishment of Presbyterianism in Scotland, but he was bribed to betray his cause, and returned to Scotland as Archbishop of St. Andrews, with the full determination to do everything in his power to further Episcopacy. He was one of the chief persecutors of the Covenanters, and in 1668 he was shot at by one James Mitchell, but escaped without injury. His oppressions and cruelties were so great that in May 1679 he was murdered by a band of Covenanters under David Hackston of Rathillet on Magus Muir, near St. Andrews.

Biography by T. Stephen, 1839.

Sharpe, SAMUEL, was one of the leaders and chief instigators of the slaves in the Jamaican rebellion of 1831-2. It was owing to his ability that the rebels were enabled to gain the few temporary successes they did. He was executed at the close of the insurrection.

Shaw, RALPH (called by some chroniclers JOHN), DR., was brother to Sir Edmund Shaw, lord Mayor of London in 1482. He had a high repute for learning and sagacity, and was employed by Richard, Duke of Gloucester, to preach a sermon at Paul's Cross, to advocate the latter's claim to the crown. Accordingly, on June 22, 1483, he preached, from the fourth chapter of the Book of Wisdom, a discourse in which he impugned the validity of Edward IV's marriage with Elizabeth Woodville, on the ground of a pre-contract with Lady Elizabeth Butler, daughter of the Earl of Shrewsbury. From this he adduced the inference that Edward V and his brother were illegitimate, and therefore, as Clarence's family were attainted and incapable of succeeding, Richard was the rightful sovereign.

Shaxton, NICHOLAS (1485?-1556), Bishop of Salisbury from 1535 to 1539, was for some time associated with Latimer, Bishop of Worcester, in a determined opposition to the statute of the Six Articles (q.v.). On his resignation of his see rather than subscribe to the articles, Shaxton was thrown into prison as an obstinate sacramentarian heretic. He subsequently, however, found it advisable to conform to the new opinions, and signalized his conversion by preaching at the burning of several more determined heretics than he had proved to be, his most notable appearance in this way being at the burning of Anne Askew (q.v.), along with whom he had been arraigned for heresy. He put away his wife, returned to celibacy, and apparently was sincere in his recantation. He accepted a pension from the Crown, and died in 1556.

Sheffield, EDMUND, 1ST LORD (d. 1549), was second in command to the Marquis of Northampton when he was engaged in suppressing the Norfolk rebellion of 1549: he was killed by the insurgents whilst attempting to hold Norwich against them. He was created a peer by Edward VI (1547).

Sheffield, EDMUND, 1ST EARL OF MULGRAVE (1564?-1646), one of the commanders of the English fleet which defeated the Spanish Armada, was knighted for his services, and subsequently became governor of Brill in the Low Countries. He was created Earl of Mulgrave by Charles I in 1626.

Sheffield, JOHN, DUKE OF BUCKINGHAMSHIRE (1648-1721), was the son of Edmund, 2nd Earl of Mulgrave. On his father's death (1658) he became Earl of Mulgrave. In 1666 he served against the Dutch and returned home to take command of a troop of horse. Again, in 1672, he was appointed captain of a ship of 84 guns, and as soon as he came back from sea was made colonel of a regiment of foot. Subsequently he passed over to France to learn the art of war under Turenne. On his return Mulgrave engaged in a professional quarrel with the Duke of Monmouth, and bitterly offended the royal family by entertaining hopes of the hand of Princess, afterwards Queen, Anne. In 1680 he was sent to destroy Moorish pirates who were attacking Tangier. On the accession of James II he was made a privy councillor and lord chamberlain. After the Revolution Mulgrave readily took the oath of allegiance to William and Mary. William created him Marquis of Normanby, and named him a cabinet councillor. In 1703 he was created Duke of Normanby, and soon afterwards Duke of Buckinghamshire, and in this year built Buckingham House. He was compelled to resign office for caballing with Nottingham and Rochester against Godolphin and Marlborough. Forthwith he became a violent member of the opposition, and was struck off the list of the privy council (1707). In 1710, however, when the Tories were restored to power, he was made steward of the household, and lord president on the death of Rochester. He entered eagerly into the plots for the restoration of the Stuarts, and is said by Swift to have been the only man he knew who was sincere in his intentions. The death of Anne destroyed his hopes. The remainder of his life was spent in political disgrace. Buckingham wrote some poems, the best known of which are the "Essay on Satire" and the "Essay on Poetry."

Sheffield was the seat of a castle which was built probably by the family of de Lovelot during the twelfth century, and which passed from the Furnivals and Talbots into the possession of the Earl of Arundel at the beginning of the seventeenth century. The castle was burnt by John d'Eyville during the Barons'

War (1266). It served as the prison of Mary, Queen of Scots, from November 1570 to September 1584. It was occupied for the Parliament at the beginning of the Civil War, but abandoned in May 1643, and held for the king by Sir William Saville. In August 1644 it was captured by Major-General Crawford, and in 1646 demolished by order of Parliament. The town was famous for its cutlery as early as the fifteenth century, and its Cutlers' Company was incorporated by act of parliament in 1624. In 1685 its population was estimated to be about 4,000, in 1760 it had increased to something between 20,000 and 30,000, and in 1921 to 490,639. By the Reform Bill of 1832 it was enfranchised, while in 1843 it became a municipal borough. It was the scene of some serious trade-union outrages in 1867. [SHEFFIELD OUTRAGES.] In 1893 it was raised to the dignity of a city.

J. Hunter, "Hallamshire," 1869; "Victoria County History: Yorkshire."

Sheffield Outrages. In 1867 a commission was appointed to inquire into the trade-union outrages, and the organization and rules of these societies. Sheffield had long been conspicuous as a centre of trade-union tyranny of the worst kind. When a workman had made himself obnoxious to the leaders of a local trade union, some sudden misfortune was sure to befall him. His house was set on fire; gunpowder was exploded under his windows; an infernal machine was flung into his bedroom at night. The man himself, supposing him to have escaped with his life, felt convinced that in the attempt to destroy him he saw the hand of the union; his neighbours were of his opinion; but lack of evidence, and fear of the consequences, made it impossible to punish or even find out the offenders. The secretaries of the trade unions indignantly denied all these statements, alleged the beneficial nature of their societies, and demanded an inquiry into their rules and organization. Ultimately the demand was granted. Three examiners were sent down, with Mr. Overend, Q.C., at their head. A searching inquiry, and the offer of a free pardon to anyone, even the actual offenders, who would reveal any particulars of the crimes, elicited full evidence that most of these outrages were perpetuated at the command of some union, of the unions that of the saw-grinders deserving the most infamous notoriety. It was remarkable that the secretary of this union, William Broadhead (1815-79), had most indignantly protested the innocence of his union, while it was proved by the evidence of James Hallam that the murder of James Linley, an obnoxious employer of apprentices (1859), had been done by Broadhead's especial instructions. The crimes were in most cases regularly ordered by the unions and committed by their paid agents; but only twelve small unions were implicated out of some sixty existing in Sheffield, and one at Manchester (the Brickmakers') had acted similarly. Broadhead at last came before the examiners himself, and explained the whole system of villainy of which he had been the mainspring.

Sheldon, GILBERT (1598-1677), was a native of Staffordshire, and became warden of All Souls College, Oxford, in 1626. He was one of the royal commissioners at the Treaty of Uxbridge (q.v.—1644), and in 1647 was deprived of his wardenship. On the Restoration he was made Bishop of London, and on the death of Juxon in 1663 was advanced to the archbishopric of Canterbury. He was a strong High Churchman, and rigorous in carrying out the Act of Uniformity, a patron of learning, and the builder of the Sheldonian Theatre of the University of Oxford.

Shere Ali Khan (1825-79), was the son of Dost Mohammed, Amir of Afghanistan. On Dost Mohammed's death (1863) a series of struggles ensued for the succession between Shere Ali and his brothers, Afzul and Azim. In one of these Shere Ali was deposed, and Afzul Khan became ruler. He did not live long afterwards, and his son, Abdul Rahman, waived his claim in favour of his uncle, Azim Khan, who had been for some time a fugitive in British territory. Ultimately, however, Shere Ali regained his throne, and the opposing faction was overcome. In 1870 Shere Ali visited India, and met the viceroy, Lord Mayo, at Umballa, where the latter's generous conduct went a long way to ensure friendly relations with the Amir. In 1876, however, began a series of events which produced the Afghan mission of Sir Lewis Pelly, and gradually led up to the second Afghan War (q.v.).

Shere Singh, one of the most influential chiefs of the Punjab, joined the insurrection of Mulraj (q.v.), September 1848. This was followed by a general insurrection known as the second Sikh War (q.v.). Successful at Ramnagar and Sadulapur, owing to the bad generalship of Lord Gough, Shere Singh was beaten at Chillianwalla (January 1849), but the defeat was a practical victory, so much did it elevate the character of the Sikhs for prowess. The rout at Gujarat, however, destroyed all his hopes, and he surrendered to the British, March 12, 1849. [SIKH WARS.]

Shere Singh (d. 1843) was the reputed son of Ranjit Singh (q.v.), on whose death, 1839, followed by that of his son, Khurruk Singh, and grandson, Nao Nihal Singh, in 1840, Shere Singh became regent of the Punjab in conjunction with Chand Kowur, the widow of Khurruk Singh. In 1841 Shere Singh, with the help of the army, attained supreme power. In 1843, during the anarchy which followed, he was assassinated by a discontented chief.

Sheridan, RICHARD BRINSLEY (1751-1816), was born in Dublin. His parents having come over to England, the boy was sent to Harrow. After leaving school he spent several years in idleness, till, stimulated by the straits to which a runaway match had reduced him, he applied himself vigorously to the composition of plays. He aspired to politics, and was elected member for Stafford. His first attempt in the House was a failure, but on the subject of the employment of the military in civil disturbances Sheridan gave some signs of his great oratorical powers. His abilities were so far recognized by the Whig party that on North's fall he was appointed under-secretary for foreign affairs in Rockingham's ministry (1782), and was subsequently secretary to the treasury in the coalition. On Pitt coming into power Sheridan went into opposition, and very soon rose to the first eminence as a debater and speaker. But the occasion of his greatest oratorical triumph took place on February 7, 1787, when he presented his charge "relative to the Begum Princesses of Oudh" against Warren Hastings. Even Pitt allowed his speech to have "surpassed all the eloquence of ancient and modern times." In the rupture which occurred between Fox and Burke on the subject of the French Revolution, Sheridan adhered to his earlier friend, Fox, and himself incurred the hostility of Burke. In 1794, as conductor of the impeachment of Hastings, he made his reply on the Begum charge, and again astonished his hearers by a display of brilliant eloquence, sustained before the Lords through four whole days. When Fox retired from parliamentary life Sheridan still maintained his post in the opposition, and spoke with vigour and power in the debates on the Irish rebellion and the Union. In 1804 he was appointed by his boon companion, the Prince Regent, to be receiver of the duchy of Cornwall. When on Pitt's death Fox and Lord Grenville formed a government, Sheridan was rewarded for his long fidelity to his party by the treasurership of the navy, a lucrative but subordinate post. On Fox's death Sheridan succeeded him in the representation of Westminster, but was next year driven to a less conspicuous constituency. On the passing of the Regency Bill he was admitted to extraordinary intimacy and confidence by the regent, and his own party seem to have been not without suspicions as to his integrity. In the next year he unfortunately confirmed their fears by acting in an indefensible manner towards the chiefs of that party when negotiations were proceeding with them after the death of Perceval. An expensive election in 1812 brought his affairs into hopeless confusion. The last four years of his life were spent in miserable attempts to evade the pursuits of his creditors. He died on July 7, 1816. The charge of being a mere political adventurer which has been brought against Sheridan is sufficiently refuted by the consistent fidelity which he displayed towards his party, more than once from a mere sense of honour towards it refusing to accept a place under others.

Sheriff. This officer, the scir-gerefa, or shire-reeve, appears before the Conquest as nominated by the Crown. He acted as the king's steward, collecting and administering the royal dues in his shire, and presiding over the shiremoot, or assembly of freeholders, which met twice a year to transact fiscal and judicial business. By the Normans the sheriff was identified with the viscount (vicecomes), and the shire was called a county. In order to counteract feudal tendencies, the Norman kings increased the power of the sheriffs, sometimes giving the sheriffdom of several counties to one man, or granting the office as an inheritance. After the Conquest the sheriff was the representative of the Crown in judicial, fiscal, and military affairs. Besides presiding in the county court, he, or his substitute, held a court in each hundred twice a year for view of frankpledge, called the sheriff's tourn. He collected the king's dues from his shire, and once each year accounted at the exchequer for the ferm or rent at which he farmed the ancient demesne and profits of the county from the Crown, and for the sums arising from feudal rights, jurisdiction, the sale of offices, and other casual revenue. In his military capacity he led the posse comitatus, and the lesser tenants of the Crown. In the twelfth century the vast power exercised by men holding the sheriffdom of several counties was injurious to the interests both of the Crown and of the people, and when, as was sometimes the case, the king's justices were themselves made sheriffs, they had ample opportunities for fraud. The administrative vigour of Henry II was displayed by the Inquest of Sheriffs (q.v.), a strict scrutiny into the conduct of these officers, made by his orders in 1170. After this inquest all the sheriffs were removed from office. By the thirteenth century the hereditary sheriffdoms had disappeared, except in the case of Westmorland, Worcester, and at a later date Rutland, and the office of sheriff was held over one or two counties by local magnates. The descendants of Robert de Vieuxpont, created by John hereditary sheriff of Westmorland, continued to hold the office until the death of the Earl of Thanet without issue in 1849, when hereditary sheriffdoms were abolished by statute, 13 & 14 Vict. c. 30. By a charter of Henry I the citizens of London obtained the privilege of electing their own sheriff, and other boroughs gained by fine or charter the right to collect their own ferm without the sheriff's interference.

The importance of the sheriff's office was curtailed during the administration of Hubert Walter, for in 1194 sheriffs were forbidden to act as justices in their own shires, and the office of coroners to hold pleas of the Crown was instituted. A further step in the same direction was taken by art. 24 of Magna Carta, which forbade sheriffs to hold pleas of the Crown. On the fiscal side the sheriff's duties underwent considerable modification in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. He gradually became a tax-collector of the casual revenue of the Crown rather than a land-agent in charge of the ancient demesne. By the provisions made at Oxford in 1258 sheriffdoms were to be held for one year only. An attempt was made the next year to gain a share in the election of these officers for the suitors of the county court. This privilege was granted by Edward in 1300, where the office was not of fee or hereditary, but was withdrawn in the next reign. The limitation of the tenure of office to one year, enforced by statutes of Edward III and Richard II, made the right of appointment a matter of small consequence. The nomination in later times was made in the Exchequer on the morrow of All Souls' Day, changed by 24 Geo. II, c. 48, to the morrow of St. Martin's. Complaints having been made of the high rent at which the sheriffs let the hundreds, they were ordered by 4 Ed. III, c. 15, to adhere to the ancient ferms, and their power in this respect was abolished by 23 Hen. VI, c. 9. The remains of their criminal jurisdiction were swept away by 1 Ed. IV, c. 15. Their military functions were taken away by the institution of lords-lieutenant in the reign of Mary, and some acts of extortion were met by 29 Eliz. c. 4, limiting the amount they might take on levying an execution. A person assigned for sheriff must, by 13 & 14 Car. II, c. 21, have sufficient lands within the county to answer to the king and the people. In his judicial capacity the sheriff still holds a county court for the election of members of parliament, and for a few other purposes. As keeper of the king's peace he is the first man in the county, and takes precedence of any nobleman, and in his ministerial capacity he is charged with the execution of all civil and criminal processes and sentences. Nearly all the duties of his office, however, are fulfilled by an under-sheriff, an officer whom he is compelled by 3 & 4 Will. IV, c. 99, to appoint. The inferior officers of the county, such as jailers, are reckoned as his servants, and until 40 & 41 Vict. c. 21, he was to some extent liable for the escape of a prisoner.

The office of sheriff existed in Scotland as early as the reign of David I, and is mentioned in the laws of that king. It appears to have been an office of inheritance until 20 Geo. II, c. 43, and has long been purely nominal, the title being generally borne by the lord-lieutenant. The sheriff depute, on the other hand, holds an office of great importance. He is appointed by the Crown for life or good behaviour (ad vitam aut culpam), and is the chief judge of the county. His jurisdiction extends to all personal actions on contract and obligation, to actions relating to heritable rights up to £1,000 value, to all matters not belonging to any other court, and to suits about small debts. He has also a criminal jurisdiction, and hears serious cases under the direction of a Crown council.

The last capital sentence passed by a sheriff was at Glasgow in 1788. By 40 & 41 Vict. c. 50, the appointment of the sheriff substitute was taken from the depute, and vested in the Crown.

Sheriffs, THE INQUEST OF (1170). On Henry II's return from France in this year he was met with loud complaints of the exactions of the sheriffs. This afforded him a good opportunity for curtailing the power of these functionaries, and he proceeded to issue a commission to inquire into the truth of the grievances, the accused sheriffs being meanwhile suspended from their offices. The commissioners were to inquire whether the sheriffs had administered justice fairly, whether they had taken bribes, whether the Assize of Clarendon (q.v.) had been properly carried out, and whether the aids and other taxes had been equitably levied. They were also to inquire into the condition of the Crown lands, and to make a list of those persons who had not as yet done homage to the king and his son. The result of the inquiry was the acquittal of the sheriffs, but they were not restored to their offices, and their places were filled by officers of the Exchequer.

Sheriffmuir, THE BATTLE OF (November 13, 1715), was fought between the royalist army commanded by the Duke of Argyll, and the clans which had risen in favour of the Pretender under Mar. The former included about 3,500 regulars, the latter 10,000 Highlanders. The Macdonalds, who formed the centre of the Jacobite army, defeated the left wing of their enemies and drove them to Stirling; while Argyll and the dragoons had simultaneously defeated the left wing of Mar's army. But unable to withstand a rear attack from the Highland right and centre, he also contrived a dexterous retreat to Stirling. The victory of the Highlanders was, however, in no respect decisive. Sheriffmuir is in Perthshire, on the north slope of the Ochils, two miles from Dunblane.

Sherston, THE BATTLE OF (1016), fought between Edmund Ironside and Canute, after two days' hard fighting, resulted in a draw. The Danes, however, fell back on London, and Edmund was able a few days later to break their lines and enter the city. Sherston is five and a half miles west of Malmesbury.

Sherwin, RALPH (1500-81), a Catholic priest, was indicted before Sir Christopher Wray at the same time as Edmund Campion (q.v.) and Alexander Brian for compassing and imagining the queen's death. He was executed in their company at Tyburn on December 1, 1581.

Ship-money. Before the Conquest the navy was furnished by the levy of ships on the counties in proportion to the number of hundreds contained in each shire. Under the Plantagenets the port towns and the coast counties were called on to furnish ships and men. To this was added the royal navy, a mercenary force paid by the king, which was the beginning of the permanent navy. As late as 1626 the fleet collected for the expedition to Cadiz was got together by contingents from the sea-ports. In 1634 the position of foreign affairs suggested to Charles I the necessity of raising a fleet in order to maintain the sovereignty of the seas, assert the ownership of the North Sea fisheries, prevent the French from capturing Dunkirk, and secure the co-operation of Spain for the restoration of the Palatinate. Noy (q.v.), the attorney-general, suggested that money for the equipment of ships should be levied from the coast towns. The first writ was issued in October 1634, and, after some remonstrance from the lord mayor of London, generally submitted to. Next year a second writ was issued (August 4), by which the inland towns and counties were also required to contribute. There was considerable opposition, and Charles obtained from ten of the judges a general opinion that the levy of ship-money from all was lawful (December 1635). A third writ was issued in October 1636, and called forth still stronger opposition, which even a second opinion from the judges in the king's favour (February 1637) could not still. A fourth writ was issued in the autumn of 1637, but none in 1638, and in January 1639 the sum demanded in the fifth writ was only about a third of the amount asked in previous years, but in the next year the government, for the second Scottish war, returned to the full amount of the earlier assessment, i.e., about £200,000. It was by the second of these writs that a ship of 450 tons, manned and equipped for six months, or the sum of £4,500, was demanded from Buckinghamshire. Hampden's trial took place with respect to the twenty shillings due from lands in the parish of Stoke Mandeville. The argument on the point of law began in November 1637, and judgment was finally given in June 1638. [HAMPDEN.] Ship-money was vigorously attacked in the Short Parliament by Pym and Glanville; and Charles, by the advice of Strafford, was willing to allow the judgment to be carried before the House of Lords upon a writ of error, and there reversed. But the question of the abolition of the illegal military charges, and other things, prevented an agreement. When the Long Parliament met, the House of Commons on December 7, 1640, the House of Lords on January 20, 1641, agreed to resolutions pronouncing the levy of ship-money illegal. A bill declaring this was brought in by Selden on June 8, 1641, and received the king's assent on August 7. [C. H. F.]

Shippen, WILLIAM (1673-1743), who first sat in parliament in 1707, was distinguished throughout his life for his uncompromising Jacobitism. In 1715 he attacked Lord Townshend's ministry on the ground that the government was conducted by means of a standing army. In 1718 he was sent to the Tower for remarking that the only infelicity in his majesty's (George I) reign was that he was ignorant of our language and constitution. He vigorously opposed Walpole's measures for the restoration of public credit in 1720 [SOUTH SEA COMPANY] on the ground that they were too lenient. During these years he had led a small body of about fifty Jacobites, who together with the High Tories and discontented Whigs formed the opposition to Walpole's ministry. During the wild intrigues of 1740 he was not consulted by the Jacobite emissary, Lord Barrymore, as he was generally considered a weak conspirator. In 1741, when the motion for the dismissal of Walpole was brought forward, he left the House, with thirty-four of his friends, saying that he did not care what minister was in and what out. He indirectly aided Walpole by proposing that his majesty might be entreated not to involve the country in war for the sake of his foreign dominions. On the fall of Walpole Shippen continued in opposition. He has been well called "downright" Shippen. He always had a personal regard for Walpole, and was accustomed to say "Robin and I are two honest men."

Shirley v. Fagg, THE CASE OF (1675-7), was an appeal to the Lords from the Court of Chancery, the legality of which the Commons denied, resisting it principally because one of the parties in this particular case, Sir John Fagg, was a member of their House. A quarrel ensued between the two Houses, which was only terminated by their prorogation from June 9, 1675, to February 1677. The Commons contended that (1) members were exempt from legal process during the session of parliament, (2) the Lords had no appellate jurisdiction in Equity cases. The case was not proceeded with by Dr. Thomas Shirley, but the appellate jurisdiction of the Lords in Equity cases was never again denied.

Shore, JANE (d. c. 1527), is said to have been the wife of a London goldsmith, and to have become one of Edward IV's mistresses, about 1470. After the king's death she lived with Lord Hastings, and in 1483 was accused by Richard, Duke of Gloucester, of conspiring to injure him by sorcery, but the real reason of his attack upon her seems to have been that she was used as a political agent and go-between by the Hastings and Woodville party. Richard caused her to be brought before the ecclesiastical courts, where she was sentenced to do open penance in the streets of London for her incontinent life. After the death of Hastings she found a new protector in the Marquis of Dorset, but after his banishment she was imprisoned at Ludgate, where her beauty seems to have captivated the king's solicitor, one Thomas Lynom, who apparently intended marrying her. He seems, however, to have been dissuaded, for Jane ended her life in poverty.

Shore, Sir John, 1st Baron Teignmouth (1751-1834), was a distinguished member of the Indian civil service, and for some time one of the council at Calcutta, in which capacity he originated the idea of the revenue settlement of 1793. He succeeded Lord Cornwallis as governor-general (1792), and was created a baronet. He determined on non-intervention in the affairs of the native princes, and especially of the Mahrattas. The latter prepared for war with the nizams to settle old grievances. Shore, regarding the defection of one ally as productive of the dissolution of the Triple Alliance of 1790, refused to assist the nizams, and allowed him to be crushed by the Mahrattas in the Kurdlah campaign (q.v.). The result of this defection of the British was greatly to increase the power of the Mahrattas, the audacity of Tippoo, and the dependence of the nizams, who now fell entirely into the hands of a French officer (Raymond). The disputed succession at Poona in 1795, and the events which followed, neutralized for some time the power of the Mahrattas, at a time when the Bengal mutiny (q.v.) rendered the British powerless. With regard to Oudh, his conduct was equally injudicious. On the death of Hyder Bey Khan (1795), the government became utterly effete, the vizir merely living for sensual gratification. On his death (1797) Sir John Shore, without due consideration, first installed his reputed son Vizir Ali, and then on more mature consideration and evidence, at the expense of a revolution, deposed him in favour of Saadat Ali, the brother of the last vizir. Sir John was created Lord Teignmouth, and embarked for England in March 1798. He devoted his later years largely to philanthropic work.

Shovell, Sir Cloudisley (1650-1707), born of humble parents in Norfolk, gradually raised himself from the position of a cabin boy to be one of the leading seamen of his time. He distinguished himself in Bantrey Bay in 1689, and was knighted by William III. In 1690 he conveyed the king and his army to Ireland, and was made a rear-admiral. Shovell was present at the battle of La Hogue. In 1693 he was placed on the admiralty commission. On the accession of Anne, Shovell served under Sir George Rooke in the Mediterranean, and made a futile descent on Valencia. He brought home the treasure from Vigo Bay, and fought at the battle of Malaga, "with a courage closely bordering on rashness (1704)." The Whig party procured his appointment as commander-in-chief of the fleet in place of Rooke. He accompanied Peterborough on his expedition to Spain. In 1707 he co-operated with Prince Eugène and the Duke of Savoy in the siege of Toulon; the attempt was, however, a failure. During his return home Shovell was caught by a storm off the Scilly Islands, and his ship, the Association, struck on the Gilstone Rock. His body was washed on shore, rescued from the wreckers who had plundered it, and honoured with a public funeral in Westminster Abbey.

Shrewsbury, The Battle of (July 21, 1403), was fought between Henry IV and the northern insurgents under Henry Percy. Percy's object was to join his forces with those of Glendower and Mortimer, but the king intercepted him about three miles from Shrewsbury. The royal troops were completely victorious, Henry Percy was slain, and his uncle, the Earl of Worcester, taken prisoner.

Shuja-ud-Dowlah (d. 1775) succeeded to the viceroyalty of Oudh (1754). He joined Ali Gohar, the Prince Royal of Delhi, in his invasion of Bengal (1758), and besieged Allahabad. The advance of Clive, however, easily drove back the invasion. In 1759 he became vizir to the Great Mogul, while his power and wealth made him practically independent. In 1760 he joined Shah Alam in his invasion of Bengal, but was defeated by the British at Patna. He assisted Mir Kasim (1763) (q.v.) after the massacre at Patna, but was utterly beaten at Buxar by Munro. His dominions were restored to him by Clive, except Corah and Allahabad (1765).

"Sick Man, The," was a term applied by the Tsar Nicholas I of Russia to the Ottoman Empire in a conversation with Sir Hamilton Seymour, the British ambassador (January 1853). "We have on our hands," said the Tsar, "a sick man—a very sick man; it will be a great misfortune if one of these days he should slip away from us before the necessary arrangements have been made." The Tsar's object in the conversation was to ascertain how far Great Britain would be favourable to the project of an Anglo-Russian partition of the Ottoman inheritance. The Ottoman Empire, revived and reorganized by Sultan Mahmud II (1808-39), had begun to languish under his worthless successors Abdul Aziz and Abdul Mejid. [CRIMEAN WAR.]

Sidmouth, Henry Addington, Viscount (1757-1844). [Addington.]

Sidney, Algernon (1622-83), son of Robert, 2nd Earl of Leicester, served under his brother in the suppression of the Irish rebellion (1642), afterwards entered the Parliamentary army, and was wounded at Marston Moor. He was given the command of a regiment in the New Model (q.v.), elected M.P. for Cardiff in 1646, and held for a few months the post of lieutenant-general of the horse in Ireland. He opposed the king's trial, but continued to sit in the House of Commons, and became in 1652 a member of the council of state. During the Protectorate he took no part in public affairs, but on the fall of Richard Cromwell became again a member of the council, and was sent as ambassador to Denmark to mediate between that power and Sweden (1659). The Restoration prevented his return to England, and he remained in exile until 1677. In 1679 and 1680 he twice unsuccessfully attempted to obtain a seat in parliament. His name appears about this time in the accounts of the French ambassador Barillon as the recipient of the sum of 1,000 guineas from him. After Shaftesbury's flight Sidney became one of the council of six which managed the affairs of the Whig party, organized its adherents, and considered the question of armed resistance. In 1683 he was accused of complicity in the Rye House Plot (q.v.), tried by Chief Justice Jeffreys, condemned, and beheaded. The evidence against him was insufficient, and the manuscript of his work on government, in which doctrines inclining to republicanism were laid down, was used to supply the absence of the second witness necessary in cases of high treason. His attainder was reversed in 1689.

Sidney, SIR HENRY (1529-86), the son-in-law of John Dudley, Duke of Northumberland, a great favourite of Edward VI, was slightly implicated in the scheme to place Lady Jane Grey on the throne, but was pardoned by Mary. He subsequently became one of Elizabeth's most valued servants, and is described by de Quadra, the Spanish ambassador, as "a high-spirited, noble sort of person, and one of the best men that the queen has about the court." In 1562 he was sent on a special embassy to Mary of Guise, the Scottish regent, and in 1565 was transferred from the presidency of Wales to the post of lord deputy of Ireland, where he discharged his duties with great administrative ability, and, in spite of the enmity of the queen and Lord Sussex, who endeavoured to thwart all his plans, achieved considerable successes against the rebels, defeating Shane O'Neill with great slaughter at Loch Foyle (1566). In 1571 Sidney obtained his recall from a position which had become extremely unpleasant to him, but four years later was prevailed upon to return to Ireland, though he only retained his office a little more than a year.

Sidney, HENRY (1641-1704), afterwards Earl of Romney, was a younger brother of Algernon Sidney (q.v.). In 1680 he went as envoy to Holland, and there succeeded in gaining the friendship of William of Orange. He was recalled in 1681. In 1688 we find him aiding Edward Russell in persuading the Whig leaders to invite William to England. He was one of the seven who signed the invitation to William. In 1690 Henry Sidney, now Viscount Sidney, was appointed one of the justices for the government of Ireland. Shortly afterwards he was appointed secretary of state. In 1692 he was appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland, but was soon recalled, and became master-general of the ordnance (1693) and Earl of Romney (1694). The grants of Irish land made to him were among those attacked in the Resumption Bill (q.v.).

Sidney, SIR PHILIP (1554-86), who was "regarded both at home and abroad as the type of what a chivalrous gentleman should be," was the son of Sir Henry Sidney (q.v.), the nephew of the Earl of Leicester, and the son-in-law of Sir Francis Walsingham (q.v.). After passing some years abroad he returned to England in 1575, and at once obtained the favour of Elizabeth, by whom he was in 1577 sent on a special mission to Vienna, to endeavour to form a Protestant league against Spain. In 1579 he penned his "Remonstrance" against the Alençon marriage, and shortly afterwards wrote his "Arcadia," which was not, however, published until four years after his death. In 1585 he proposed to offer himself as a candidate for the throne of Poland, but was forbidden to do so by the queen, who in the same year sent him to the Netherlands as governor of Flushing. Whilst in the Low Countries Sidney distinguished himself as greatly as a soldier as he had previously done as a courtier. He received a wound (September 22, 1586), at the battle of Zutphen (having stripped off some of his armour to lend it to another officer), from which he died (October 17). The story of his refusing a draught of water when fainting on the field of battle, in order that it might be given to a wounded soldier, well illustrates his character.

Sierra Leone. [WEST AFRICA, BRITISH DOMINIONS IN.]

Sigebert, KING OF EAST ANGLIA 631-4, was the cousin of Eorpwald, whom he succeeded. Having been banished by his father, he went to Frankland, where, under the instruction of Bishop Felix, the Burgundian, he "was polished from all barbarianism," and on his return to England encouraged learning by instituting schools in many places. With the help of Felix, whom he established at Dunwich, Sigebert restored Christianity throughout his kingdom. He eventually became a monk in one of the monasteries he had himself founded. Some while after, in order to encourage his soldiers, he was led out to battle against Penda, and was slain (635).

Sigebert, KING OF WESSEX (756-7), succeeded his kinsman Cuthred. He is said to have "evil-intreated his people in every way," and to have "perverted the laws to his own ends," the result being that before he had been king more than one year we read that "Cynewulf and the West Saxon witan deprived him of his kingdom except Hampshire, and that he held till he slew his faithful follower Cumbra, when they drove him to the Andreses-weald, where a swine-herd stabbed him to avenge Cumbra."

Sigeric, Archbishop of Canterbury 990-4, has justly obtained an evil reputation in our history as having been one of those who advised King Ethelred to adopt the fatal policy of buying off the Danes. This was first done in the year 991. Nothing else that can be considered worthy of record is known of Sigeric.

Sign Manual, THE ROYAL, is the autograph signature of the sovereign. It is attached to (1) a warrant, declaring an appointment to an office or giving authority for affixing the great seal, (2) an order, authorizing the expenditure of money, (3) a commission. The Sign Manual is also used to authorize the signature and ratification of treaties. In 1830, during the fatal illness of George IV, an act was passed to allow the use of a stamp in lieu of the Sign Manual, but the sovereign's consent was made necessary for each use of the stamp.

Sihtric, KING OF NORTHUMBRIA (d. 926), was the brother of Reginald. About the year 921 Sihtric seems to have been expelled from Dublin (where Godfrith reigned, 918-33) and to have established himself in Northumbria, where he succeeded Reginald as head-king over the English and Danish earls and captains. After the accession of Athelstan, Sihtric went to meet him at Tamworth in February 925, and was married there to the English king's sister. A year later he died. Athelstan now wished to rule directly over Northumbria. Godfrith, Sihtric's son, tried to establish himself on the throne; but after a brief rule he was forced to leave England and his realm was annexed to the crown of England (926).

Sikh Wars. (1) In 1845 the Sikh army, 60,000 strong, with a large and admirably served artillery, crossed the Sutlej, and by December 16 were encamped within a short distance of Ferozepur. On December 12 Sir Hugh Gough, the commander-in-chief, left Ambala with the British and native army, and after a march of 150 miles, accomplished in six days, reached the front. On the 13th the governor-general published a declaration of war, and confiscated all the Sikh districts south of the Sutlej. The Sikh army (December 17) divided; Lall Singh pushed on to Ferozeshah; Tej Singh remained before Ferozepur. On December 18 Lall Singh took Sir Hugh Gough by surprise at Mudki, but lost the advantage by cowardice and incapacity. This was followed by the terrible two days' struggle at Ferozeshah, at which the two divisions of the Sikh army were beaten in detail, and driven beyond the Sutlej. Towards the end of January 1846, however, Ranjur Singh, attributing the inactivity of the British to fear, crossed the Sutlej, defeated Sir Harry Smith (January 20) at Buddowal, and took up a position at Aliwal, where he received heavy reinforcements. On January 28 he suffered here a complete defeat at the hands of Sir Harry Smith. This was followed by the total rout of the grand Khalsa army at Sobraon (February 10), and that same night the British army entered the Punjab. Negotiations were opened on the 11th; on the 17th Dhuleep Singh himself came and made his submission; on the 20th the British encamped outside Lahore and occupied the citadel. On March 9 a treaty was concluded by which the cis-Sutlej districts and the Jullunder Doab were annexed to the British territory; the province of Kashmir, the highlands of Jammu, and half a crore of rupees, were to be given up for the expenses of the war; the Sikh army was to be limited for the future to 20,000 infantry and 12,000 horse; and all the guns which had been pointed against the British were to be surrendered. (2) The intrigues of the Maharani Jhindnu developed a spirit of sedition at Lahore which her removal to Benares only intensified. Chutter Singh and Shere Singh (q.v.), two influential chiefs of the Punjab, were both strongly disaffected (1848), and only waited for a favourable opportunity. In September 1848 General Whish sat down before Multan [MULRAJ] and summoned it in the name of the queen, thus alarming the national feelings of the Sikhs. Shere Singh immediately passed over to the enemy and proclaimed a religious war, and the whole Punjab broke out in revolt. On October 10 Lord Dalhousie proceeded to the front. On the 9th Shere Singh marched up the Chenab, gathering men as he advanced till he had collected an army of 15,000 troops. Chutter Singh opened negotiations with Dost Mohammed, for whose alliance he consented to cede the province of Peshawar. In October the British grand army assembled at Ferozepur under Lord Gough, and on the 16th crossed the Ravee. The English had to act on two lines, against Multan in the south, and the insurrection in the superior delta of the five rivers in the north, and for this they had not enough infantry. The superior position and artillery of Shere Singh enabled him to win the battles of Ramnaga and Sadalapur, in which he was aided by the rashness of Lord Gough. After a considerable delay Lord Gough moved forward again (January 11, 1849) to Dingi; attacked the Sikhs in a very strongly entrenched position at Chilianwalla, and after a long and sanguinary struggle succeeded in compelling them to retreat. The court of directors now determined on a change. Sir Charles Napier was requested to proceed to India to supersede Lord Gough. Before he arrived General Whish had captured Multan and the war had ended at Gujarat. All through January the two armies remained watching each other. On February 6 it was found that the Sikhs had marched round the British camp, and were strongly entrenched at Gujarat. In the battle that ensued the persistent withholding of the troops till the Sikh line was broken by the constant fire of 84 heavy guns caused a total victory with little loss to the British. The rebellion was over. On March 6 the Sikh chiefs restored all their prisoners; on the 12th Shere Singh and Chutter Singh surrendered, and the khalsa soldiers laid down their arms; and Sir Walter Gilbert completed the matter by chasing the Afghans across the Indus to the very portals of their mountain range. On March 29, 1849, the Punjab was annexed to the British territories.

Silistria, THE DEFENCE OF (March-June 1854). Besieged by the Russians, Silistria was defended by earthworks, and garrisoned by a Turkish force. Fortunately there were present two young British officers, Captain James Armar Butler and Lieutenant Charles Nasmyth, who took the command, and conducted the defence with remarkable skill and ability. Repulse after repulse was inflicted upon immense masses of the besiegers. On June 22, worn out by the gallantry of the garrison and their own unavailing attempts, the Russians raised the siege, and retreated, having lost upwards of 12,000 men in their unsuccessful assaults on the works.

Silk Riots, THE (1765). In 1764 a commission had been appointed to inquire into the grievances of the silk-weavers. It recommended the common remedy of those days, namely, the exclusion of foreign silks. A bill to that effect was accordingly brought into the Commons, and passed by them without discussion. But in the Lords it was so vigorously opposed by the Duke of Bedford, on the ground that it was wrong in principle, and could only increase the evil which it was meant to lessen, that it was thrown out. The disappointment of the Spitalfields weavers took the form of a riot. They first made their way into the king's presence, and, meeting with a kind reception from him, directed all their wrath against the peers, especially against the Duke of Bedford. A riotous meeting in Palace Yard was dispersed (May 15), only to reassemble in the front of Bedford House (May 17), which was threatened with destruction. The discontent of the weavers, which was encouraged by the masters, was only at length pacified by the promise of the redress of their grievances, and Lord Halifax in the following year fulfilled the promise by adopting the remedy which had been rejected in 1765, and bringing in a bill prohibiting the importation of foreign silks (6 Geo. III, c. 28).

Silures, THE, were a British tribe who inhabited an area roughly corresponding to the modern counties of Hereford, Radnor, Brecknock, Monmouth, and Glamorgan. They were probably of Celtic stock, although they may have included a considerable pre-Celtic element.

The Silures were amongst the most warlike of the British tribes, and held out against the Romans till subdued by Frontinus shortly before A.D. 78.

Simnel, LAMBERT (fl. 1487-1525), was the son of a baker, and is only famous historically as having been the puppet leader of one of the earlier revolts against Henry VII. In this revolt he figured as Edward Plantagenet, Earl of Warwick, son of the murdered Duke of Clarence, and he is commonly reported to have been trained to play his part by a priest named Richard Simon, perhaps at the instigation of the queen-dowager. Ireland was fixed upon for the scene of the revolt, in consequence of the support of Gerald Fitzgerald, 8th Earl of Kildare, the lord deputy, and the popularity of the house of York there. In England John de la Pole, Earl of Lincoln, the son of Edward IV's eldest sister, Elizabeth, the acknowledged heir of Richard III, was his chief supporter. In Flanders he had a powerful friend in Margaret, Duchess of Burgundy, another sister of Edward IV. Under her auspices the Burgundian court was made the general rendezvous of the conspirators. Henry meanwhile imprisoned the queen-dowager in the nunnery of Bermondsey, and had furnished an unmistakable proof of the baseless nature of the conspiracy by parading the real Earl of Warwick through all the principal streets of London. He inflicted summary punishment on those noblemen whom his spies had detected in correspondence with Simnel's friends, and sent troops to repel any rebel landing. But when after a brief stay in Ireland, where Simnel was crowned at Dublin, the rebels—under the command of the Earl of Lincoln, the Earl of Kildare, and Lord Lovel, accompanied by 2,000 "Almains," under Martin Schwarz (q.v.), a German general—landed at Fouldry in Lancashire, they found no assistance. With the exception of a small company of English, under Sir Thomas Broughton, the rebels marched all the way to York without gaining a single adherent. A determined attack on Newark was resolved upon. Henry decided upon an immediate battle, and with that object took up a position between the enemy's camp and Newark. Thereupon the Earl of Lincoln advanced to a little village called Stoke, where on the following day, June 16, 1487, the battle was fought. Three hours elapsed before victory appeared to incline either way. Finally the rebels were utterly defeated, and nearly all their leaders perished, the slaughter being especially great among the German and Irish mercenaries. Among the few survivors of the carnage were Simnel and Simon. Their lives were spared as a matter of policy. Simon was imprisoned for life, but Simnel was contemptuously taken into the royal service as a scullion. Later he was promoted to be a falconer.

Sind, the country comprising the lower valley and delta of the Indus, was ruled over by three independent amirs with whom Lord Auckland entered into separate treaties in 1839, which imposed on them a subsidiary force and tribute. They had formerly been dependent on Kabul, but had not paid any tribute since 1800. After their secret hostility to the British during the Afghan expedition of 1839 they were compelled to accede to a subsidiary alliance. During the three subsequent years in which Afghanistan was occupied by our troops, and Sind had become the basis of our operations beyond the Indus, their conduct was marked with good faith if not cordiality. But the amirs were emboldened to hostility by our reverses; and Lord Ellenborough sent Sir Charles Napier (q.v.) to Sind to inquire into the matter (September 1843). Intrigues deceived Napier into provoking war which ended with the annexation of Sind by Ellenborough in 1843. Sir Charles Napier himself remarked of these proceedings, "We have no right to seize Sind, yet we shall do so, and a very advantageous, useful, and humane piece of rascality it will be."

Sinking Fund, THE, is a fund collected with the object of paying off some part of the national debt. Before the time of Walpole the only funds to which this name can be given were those instituted for the sinking of particular debts. In 1717 the General Fund Act proposed by Walpole began the process of discharging the funded debt. Between 1717 and 1788 approximately £200,000,000 were allocated to the sinking fund, but the demands of current expenditure forced successive governments to make raids on the fund, and of the whole amount mentioned only one-quarter was applied to the reduction of debt. Perhaps the most celebrated scheme for a sinking fund in English history was that of the younger Pitt. In 1786 he found that whilst the national debt stood at £245,000,000, the annual revenues were in a very flourishing condition. He had a surplus of one million, and, alarmed at the immense development of the debt, he proposed that the surplus should be put aside at compound interest and the proceeds ultimately devoted to the diminution of the debt. He directed that a million should be laid aside every year, apparently under the belief that every year would produce a similar surplus. For the first few years the plan was very successful, but the long wars against revolutionary France soon made it necessary for the nation to spend far more than its income. Yet the million a year was solemnly set aside for the sinking fund, although the nation borrowed many millions at a higher rate of interest than it could get for the fund. A belief in the mysterious wisdom of the step, and of the magical power of compound interest, blinded men to the obvious absurdity of borrowing at a higher interest to lend out at a lower one. By 1813 the old debt of 1786 had been discharged, but in spite of the fund's expensive accumulations the fresh additions to the national debt in the last years of the Napoleonic war put the final redemption forward into a remote future, and by 1819 £13,500,000 a year was being borrowed for the service of the fund. The government was compelled to take from it a large part of the money that was being set aside. In 1828 the whole plan was considered fallacious, and abandoned. Thereafter the plan followed was to allot annually from any surplus of revenue over expenditure a sum of something between £1,000,000 and £3,000,000 for the extinction of funded or unfunded debt. Various experiments were made for the creation of a new sinking fund during the reign of Victoria, but none was conspicuously successful. The practice of converting parcels of government stock into terminable annuities proved more satisfactory. In 1923 the sinking fund had for half a century consisted of two parts:—(1) the old sinking fund established by Goulburn in 1829, to which money is allotted from revenue when there is a surplus; (2) the new sinking fund (1875) which received money from any balance there might be in the amount voted for debt changes after interest, etc., had been paid. There have been frequent diversions of the sinking funds. The "New Sinking Fund" established in 1923 involves the allotment of large annual sums of £40,000,000 and upwards for debt redemption. Sinn Fein, or the extreme Republican party in Ireland, was founded by Arthur Griffith in 1905, to achieve the independence of Ireland by withdrawing the Irish members from Westminster and building up a national life which should ultimately relieve Ireland from economic dependence on England. It did not discountenance the ultimate use of armed force. The Easter Rising of 1916 in Dublin was planned and executed by Sinn Fein, which became a dominant party during the next few years under the leadership of Eamon de Valera (q.v.), who became the president of Dail Eireann in 1918. Peace with Northern Ireland was finally concluded in December 1921.

Sinope, THE BATTLE OF (November 30, 1853). In 1853 a squadron of Turkish ships was stationed at Sinope. The Russians, hearing that the Turks had begun the war on the Armenian frontier, proceeded to attack them. The Sebastopol fleet advanced in order of battle into the harbour of Sinope. The Turks struggled gallantly, and maintained the defence for a long time. In the end they were overpowered and destroyed, and it was reported that 4,000 men had been killed. The tidings of this massacre produced the greatest excitement in Great Britain. It brought the war fever, already great, to its height, and by throwing public opinion strongly in favour of Lord Palmerston's war policy, practically forced the hands of the ministry, and dragged the country into war. [CRIMEAN WAR.]

Sitabaldi, THE BATTLE OF (November 24, 1817). The result of the intrigues of Appa Sahib with Baji Rao (q.v.) was an attack on the British residency. This lay to the west of Nagpur, from which it was separated by a small ridge running north and south, with two hills at the extremity called the Sitabaldi Hills. It was garrisoned by two battalions of Madras infantry, two companies of the resident's escort, three troops of Bengal cavalry, and a detachment of Madras artillery with four 6-pounders. The raja had 18,000 men and 36 guns. The guns were brought to bear on the British position, and a vigorous assault, which was repelled, was made all through the night. At last the Nagpur troops captured the lower hill, and the British ammunition was running short, when a charge of the Bengal cavalry, under Captain Fitzgerald, resulted in capturing two guns and cutting up the infantry. At this moment one of the enemy's tumbrils exploded, and amid the confusion they broke and fled. The conflict, which had lasted eighteen hours, thus terminated in a victory for the British.

Six Acts, THE, were a series of six coercive measures passed in rapid succession during a special autumnal session of parliament in 1819, directed towards the suppression of the prevailing spirit of sedition which commercial depression and reactionary government had excited. They were as follows:—(1) 60 Geo. III, c. 1 (December 11, 1819), an act to prevent the training of persons to the use of arms and to the practice of military evolutions and exercise; (2) 60 Geo. III, c. 2 (December 18), an act authorizing justices of the peace in certain disturbed counties to seize and detain arms, continuing in force until March 25, 1822; (3) 60 Geo. III, c. 4 (December 23), an act to prevent delay in the administration of justice in cases of misdemeanour; (4) 60 Geo. III, c. 6 (December 24), an act to prevent seditious meetings and assemblies, continuing in force for five years; (5) 60 Geo. III, c. 8 (December 30), an act to prevent and punish blasphemous and seditious libels; (6) 60 Geo. III, c. 9 (December 30), an act to subject certain publications to the duties of stamps upon newspapers, and further to restrict the press. These acts were violently denounced by Whig and Radical alike, but received whole-hearted endorsement from the government of Lord Liverpool. The first is still on the statute book; the second lapsed; the third is still in force; the fourth lapsed; the fifth was amended in 1830; the sixth was amended in 1836.

Six Articles, THE STATUTE OF, passed in 1539, marks the beginning of the reactionary period that continued until the close of Henry VIII's reign. In the statute book it is entitled "An Act abolishing diversity of opinion." It enumerated precisely and clearly six points of mediæval doctrine and practice which the Protestants had begun to assail, and imposed severe penalties on all who would not accept them. The first article expressed the doctrine of transubstantiation. Those denying this were to be burnt. If the other five articles were impeached the penalties were, for first offence, confiscation of property; for the second, execution as a felon. The five articles declared (2) that communion in both kinds was unnecessary; (3) that priests ought not to marry; (4) that the vows of chastity ought to be observed in both sexes; (5) that private Masses were allowable; (6) that auricular confession was necessary. This sanguinary act, called by the Protestants "the whip with six strings," continued in force for the rest of Henry's reign.

Skinner v. The East India Company, CASE OF (1666). Thomas Skinner was a private merchant in the reign of Charles II, who, finding that the India Company, at a time when the Indian trade was open, molested him in his business, and took away from him an island bought from a native prince, petitioned the king to give him that redress which he could not get in the ordinary courts. Charles handed the affair over to the House of Lords, but the company, when called upon to defend itself, denied their jurisdiction. This, however, was overruled, and £5,000 damages were awarded Skinner. The company then petitioned the Commons, who had already some disputes with the Upper House. They resolved that the Lords had acted illegally in depriving the company of the benefit of the law courts. The Lords, in return, voted the Commons' reception of a "scandalous petition" against them a breach of privilege. A furious quarrel ensued. Two conferences of the Houses only added fuel to the flame. At last the Commons voted Skinner into custody for violating their privileges, and the Lords in return imprisoned and fined Sir S. Barnardiston, the chairman of the India Company. The king, by successive adjournments for fifteen months, attempted in vain to appease the quarrel. When the Houses again met they took it up at once, but as the Lords had released Barnardiston, the Commons were slightly appeased. Both Houses passed bills censuring the other side, which were promptly rejected by the opponent House. At last the king's advice to both Houses to end the dispute, and erase all reference to it in their journals, ended one of the most important disputes in English history between the Upper and Lower Houses. It had lasted from November 1666 to February 1670. As the Lords never again claimed an original jurisdiction in civil suits, the victory may be said to have rested with the Commons.

Skippon, PHILIP (d. 1660), served in the wars in Holland, and rose from the ranks by his services. Clarendon describes him as "a man of order and sobriety, and untainted with any of those vices which the officers of that army were exercised in." In 1641 he was captain of the artillery garden, and was on January 10, 1642, appointed, with the title of sergeant-major-general, to command the city train-bands, and the guard to be raised for the protection of Parliament. He served as sergeant-major-general under Essex as long as that general retained his command. In September 1644 he was left by Essex in command of the army which was cooped up in Cornwall, and proposed that they should cut their way out at all costs, as the horse had done, but he was overruled by the council of war, and forced to capitulate. In 1645 he was appointed major-general of the New Model (q.v.), and was present at the battle of Naseby, where he was severely wounded. In April 1647 he was voted the command of the army destined for Ireland, and in the summer of the same year he was actively engaged in trying to reconcile the army and the Parliament. Skippon disapproved of the king's execution, and refused to sit in the High Court of Justice, but became a member of the first council of state, sat in the parliaments of 1654 and 1656, acted as one of Cromwell's major-generals (for London), entered his privy council, and accepted a seat in his House of Lords. He died either just before, or immediately after, the Restoration.

Slave. [THEOW.]

Slavery, ABOLITION OF. Slavery in England is of very ancient standing. It existed as an institution among the Saxons as well as the Celts. Among the former the slaves consisted chiefly of captives taken in war, or of members of the subject race. [THEOW.] After the Conquest the distinct slave class ceased to exist, and was merged with the lower class of ceorls into the general body of villeins. [VILLENAGE.] Though the Church had early succeeded in putting an end to the traffic in English slaves (e.g., by the canons of the council of 1102), slavery itself in England was never abolished by any positive enactment. The decision, therefore, of Lord Mansfield, in the case of the negro Somerset (1772), that slavery could not exist in England, had no legal foundation, and merely reflected the public opinion of the time. Negro slavery in English colonies was not, however, touched by this decision. It was of comparatively recent growth; the first importation of negroes to America is said to have been made by the Portuguese in 1503, and the other nations of western Europe took part in the trade as soon as they had gained any share in the New World.

Among Englishmen, the name of the adventurer John Hawkins, who made his first voyage in 1562, is especially associated with the beginning of the trade. The merchants of Bristol long had an evil fame in this matter. One of the most substantial advantages which Great Britain gained at the Peace of Utrecht was the Asiento (q.v.), which gave it a monopoly of the supply of slaves to the Spanish possessions in America.

The movement for the abolition of the slave trade was begun by Thomas Clarkson, some ten years after the Somerset decision. His efforts were assisted by the Society of Friends and by individual philanthropists such as Zachary Macaulay, father of the historian, and, above all, Wilberforce (q.v.). In 1792 Wilberforce gained the support of Pitt, and a motion was carried in the House of Commons for the gradual abolition of the trade. But, though something was done to lessen the atrocities of "the middle passage," bills prohibiting the trade itself were repeatedly defeated by the West Indian interest. In 1805 the first step was gained by the issue of an order in council prohibiting the traffic with colonies acquired during the war, and in 1806 a bill was passed against the trading in slaves by British subjects either with these colonies or with foreign possessions. Thus the traffic with the older British possessions was still allowed; but this also was at last abolished by the General Abolition Act in 1807. For a few years offenders against the act were liable only to fine, but in 1811 slave trading was created a felony punishable with fourteen years' imprisonment; in 1824 it was declared piracy and punishable with death, but in 1837 this was altered to transportation for life.

The success of this movement encouraged its supporters to go on to demand the total abolition of slavery in the British dominions. For some years they made no progress; but in 1823 Canning, though he refused to consider the matter one of pressing importance, gave his support to resolutions declaring that it was expedient to improve the condition of the slaves in order to fit them for freedom. In consequence a government circular was issued to the West Indian Islands directing that women should no longer be flogged, nor the whip used in the fields. It was greeted with sullen discontent, and some of the planters began to talk of declaring themselves independent. In Demerara the negroes, believing the British government had set them free, and being prohibited from attending church, rose in rebellion, but without violence. The rising was put down; and a missionary, John Smith, who had taken no part in the insurrection, but who had done much to civilize the slaves, was tried by court-martial and died in prison. The real meaning of his prosecution was shown by the complaint in the planters' paper that, "to address a promiscuous audience of black or coloured people, bond and free, by the endearing appellation of 'my brethren and sisters' is what can nowhere be heard except in Providence Chapel." The news of Smith's martyrdom gave a great impulse to the abolitionist movement in Great Britain. In 1825-6 Protectors of Slaves were appointed by orders-in-council to watch over their interests, and in 1827 one of these protectors gained the recognition of the right of a slave to purchase his liberty. Finally, in 1833, the great Emancipation Act was passed. After August 1, 1834, all children under six years of age became free at once; field slaves were to serve their present masters as "apprenticed labourers" for seven years, and house slaves for five, and after that were to become free; these terms were shortened by subsequent enactment. Twenty million pounds were to be paid to the planters as compensation. It may be added that from 1815 onward British influence caused the other European nations and Brazil to prohibit the slave trade, and to recognize a mutual right of search.

Slingsby, SIR HENRY (1602-58), of Scriven, in the county of York, represented Knaresborough in the Long Parliament, and followed the king to York. He fought at Wetherby, Marston Moor, Naseby, and other battles, in the Royalist ranks. In 1656 he entered into negotiations with officers of the garrison of Hull for surrendering it to the Royalists. For this he was tried by a high court of justice in 1658, and sentenced to be beheaded. His execution took place June 8, 1658.

Sluys, THE BATTLE OF (June 24, 1340), was fought between the French fleet, commanded by Quiéret and Béhuchet, and the English fleet under the personal command of Edward III. It resulted in a complete victory for the latter. The contest is of great importance in English naval history. It did something to obliterate the memory of the ineffective land campaigns of the early years of the war; and by securing to England for more than thirty years the command of the narrow seas, made possible the later brilliant victories of Crécy and Poitiers. The town of Sluys stood at the head of the harbour of Zwyn at the mouth of the River Scheldt.

Smalley, JOHN (fl. 1575), was the servant of a member of parliament. In 1575 he was arrested for debt. The Commons sent their sergeant to deliver him, "after sundry reasons, arguments, and disputations." But discovering that Smalley had fraudulently contrived his arrest to get the debt cancelled, he was committed and fined. His case is interesting as showing privilege of parliament in its fullest extent, and able even to protect the servants of members. A statute of George III, however (1770), took away this unnecessary and invidious immunity.

Smerwick, a bay and peninsula in Kerry, was the scene of the landing on July 18, 1579, of a papal legate (Dr. Sanders) and James Fitzmaurice Fitzgerald, who built a fort there. Next year, after Fitzgerald's death, the fort was enlarged and made the head-quarters of about 800 Italian and Spanish soldiers, sent to support the Catholic cause in Ireland. They were compelled to surrender after a short siege, by Lord Grey de Wilton, November 10, 1580, and all but the officers were put to death.

Smith, ADMIRAL SIR SIDNEY (1764-1840), entered the navy at an early age, towards the end of the American War, and fought in the battles of Cape St. Vincent and the Chesapeake. During the long peace which followed he served in the Swedish navy against Russia. He afterwards served at Toulon (1793), was for two years imprisoned in France after his capture off Havre in 1796, and subsequently made his greatest mark in history by his defence of Acre in 1799 against Bonaparte (May 15-May 19). He concluded the Treaty of El Arish with Kleber (January 24, 1800), but the government refused to ratify the compact. He was constantly employed on various services till the end of the war; notably in Duckworth's abortive expedition to Constantinople (February-March 1807).

Smith, SIR THOMAS (1513-77), was an eminent statesman of the reign of Queen Elizabeth. At Cambridge he was in early life the associate of Cheke in promoting the study of Greek, and also of civil law, which he studied at Padua. A zealous friend of the Reformation, he took deacon's orders, became dean of Carlisle and provost of Eton (1547), and in 1548 secretary of state. Disgraced under Mary, he was restored by Elizabeth to his deanery, sent on various important missions, and employed as a sort of assistant secretary to Cecil, with whose policy he sympathized. He wrote, besides other works, a book on the English Commonwealth (1583), which is interesting as keeping up the constitutional tradition even at a time of the greatest depression of English liberty.

Snowden, PHILIP (b. 1864), spent his early life in the civil service and joined the Independent Labour Party in 1893. He entered parliament in 1906 as Labour member for Blackburn. He was out of parliament from 1918 to 1922, but won Colne Valley in the latter year and became chancellor of the exchequer in the first Labour government (January-October 1924). His budget was notable for redress of the balance of taxation on the poor.

Sobraon, THE BATTLE OF (February 10, 1846), was fought during the first Sikh War. The Sikhs had entrenched themselves in semi-circular fortifications with the Sutlej as their base and their outer line surrounded by a deep ditch. Sir Hugh Gough moved his army in three divisions, the main attack being led against the western corner, which was weakest. The entrenchment was pierced in three places, and the Sikhs were driven headlong to the river, where, finding the bridge broken, they plunged in and perished by hundreds. Their loss was estimated at 8,000, the British at 2,383.

Socage was a tenure of lands, free in character, but differing from tenure by knight service in the liability of the tenant generally to pay a money rent. By the fifteenth century all free tenure of land which carried no military duties tended to conform to tenure in socage. Thus Littleton, "All manner of tenures, which are not tenures by knight service, are called tenures in socage." In early Norman times socage tenure was of a much more lowly character. Though free it was only just over the border line of unfree tenure. The ancestor of the later socage tenant may be found in the sochemannus of Domesday. The socman of the eleventh century was dependent on his lord and had to seek his soke, or jurisdiction. Sometimes, in the less substantial cases, he had to perform agricultural services, and was in reality unfree. By the end of the thirteenth century socage tenure is better defined and is comparable in some respects with the free tenures by frankalmoin (q.v.), knight service (q.v.), and serjeanty (q.v.). No military service was due; agricultural services were now generally commuted for money rents. Since economic freedom and exemption from military service became the distinguishing marks of socage tenure, it is obvious that it might be used to describe a variety of holdings, from that of the small tenant of gavelkind land in Kent to that of many large landowners, and, as Littleton notes, it is the negative qualities of this rent-paying form of tenure which distinguish it—e.g., freedom from scutage and wardship and marriage. These exemptions caused it to be highly prized. [LAND TENURE.]

Socialism has as its ideal the ownership and control of the means of production by the community (instead of by the individual) with a view to the more equitable distribution of the wealth of society. The word "socialist" first arose in 1827 among the followers of Robert Owen (q.v.). It was Owen who first popularized in England the idea of complete social reorganization, and of the control and distribution by society of its wealth, although other writers had long been working at the same idea. His original scheme was to organize communal villages. His followers attempted the plan of forming one Grand National Consolidated Trades Union to take over the means of production by means of a general strike. (The general strike scheme was first mooted in Carile's "Republican" in 1819, and later advocated by William Benbow with much vigour in 1831.) The Grand National Consolidated Trades Union broke down in 1833-4 and Owen formed the Association of All Classes and All Nations to promulgate his ideas further. A period of depression then followed in working-class activity during the years 1834-8 due to the policy of the government. Chartism developed between 1838 and 1848, but its aim was primarily political and reformist, although it numbered in its ranks most of the leading Owenites, who regarded the movement as a means to their end. On the breakdown of Chartism the Christian Socialist movement was formed by Charles Kingsley, F. D. Maurice, and other members of King's College, London. Numerous guilds for co-operative production were inaugurated, but all failed, and after six years (1848-54) the movement itself collapsed. But the period of mid-Victorian prosperity was not favourable to the growth of Socialist ideas, and the newly-organized unions pursued a policy of Liberal-Radicalism. The 'eighties witnessed a revival of Socialism, however, which has increased in power ever since. The Democratic Federation was formed by H. M. Hyndman and his friends (1882) to promulgate the ideas of Karl Marx; but a split in the party led to the formation of the "Socialist League" by William Morris, Belfort Bax, and others, having as its journal the Commonweal. The League was anarchistic rather than Marxian, and gradually disappeared, Morris having left it in 1890. The Fabian Society arose (1888) out of Prof. T. Davidson's "New Fellowship" group, with an educational aim, and adopting a policy of "permeation." The "Fabian Essays" were published in 1889, and an English translation of Marx had been published two years before. Gradually the trade unions absorbed Socialist ideas; and local labour parties began to be formed. In 1892 Keir Hardie founded the Independent Labour Party (q.v.) as a definitely Socialist party. At a conference held at Plymouth in 1899 it was resolved to secure political unity among the Socialists, co-operators, and trade unionists, and as a consequence the Labour Representative Committee was formed in February 1900 with J. Ramsay MacDonald (q.v.) as secretary. At the following general election two candidates were successful. In the 1906 election the Labour Representative Committee secured 30 members, which was increased to 40 in 1910. The Labour Party had thus come into being, but it was rather a federation of groups than a homogeneous Socialist body. Meanwhile the international side of Socialism had been growing. In 1847 the Communist League was formed in London and Marx issued his famous "Manifesto." In 1864 the International Working Men's Association was founded and Marx drew up its constitution, but it collapsed in 1873. A second International was established in 1889 and has continued. The war split the Socialist movement, and the Independent Labour Party remained opposed to it consistently. In 1918 the Labour Party as a whole in its new constitution first accepted the Socialist aim, and Socialism then spread rapidly. In December 1923 Mr. Ramsay MacDonald became the first Socialist premier, although with a minority party. Since 1924 the Socialist party has been in opposition. Within the general Socialist body wide differences have manifested themselves from time to time both on the question of tactics and on the question of the ultimate organization of society. One of the most vital branches of the Socialist movement in the last twenty years has been Guild Socialism, first put forward in 1906. In 1915 the National Guilds League was formed, and in 1920 experimental guilds were created as in 1848-54; but they were unsuccessful. The general strike of May 1926 resulted in considerable discussion within the Socialist movement of both its ultimate aim and its tactics. In this work the reorganized Socialist Review took a most vigorous share.

Solebay, THE BATTLE OF (June 3, 1665), was fought by the English fleet under the command of the Duke of York, and the Dutch under Admiral Opdam. The English were completely victorious, losing only one ship and about 700 men, while on the Dutch side eighteen ships and 7,000 men were lost, among the latter being Opdam himself. Solebay (Southwold Bay) is on the Suffolk coast. [SOUTHWOLD BAY.]

Solicitor-General, THE, is an assistant to the attorney-general (q.v.). The earliest evidence of the existence of the office of solicitor to the king occurs in the first year of Edward IV, and there seems little doubt that before that reign there was no such officer. In the reign of Mary, Rokeby, in the reign of Elizabeth, T. Fleming, and in the reign of James I, J. Doderidge, were severally discharged from the office of serjeant in order that they might be capable of serving the Crown in the capacity of solicitor-general. The solicitor-general is appointed by letters patent, and is always a member of the House of Commons and of the political party in power.

Solms, HEINRICH MAASTRICHT, COUNT OF (1636-93), was one of the Dutch favourites of William III. He occupied Whitehall in favour of the Prince of Orange, the guards of James II retiring before him. He commanded the Dutch troops during William's campaign in Ireland, and led the charge across the stream at the battle of the Boyne (July 1, 1689). On William's departure for England he was left for a short while in charge. He commanded the English troops at the battle of Steinkirk (August 3, 1692), and his failure to support Mackay's division was in a great measure the cause of that defeat. The outcry against him was great, and parliament commented severely on his conduct. He was mortally wounded at Landen, and fell alive into the hands of the enemy.

Solway Moss, THE BATTLE OF (December 24, 1542), resulted in the defeat of the Scottish army, which was about to invade England, at the hands of some 300 borderers headed by Sir Thomas Wharton. The attack was made when the Scots were quarrelling amongst themselves about the appointment of Oliver Sinclair, one of the favourites of James V, to the office of commander-in-chief. The Scots lost about 20 killed and 1,200 prisoners. The English death-roll numbered seven. Solway Moss is just on the English side of the Esk.

Somerled, LORD OF ARGYLL, married the daughter of Olaf, King of Man, and espoused the cause of Malcolm MacHeth, invading Scotland in conjunction with the sons of Malcolm (November 1153). In 1156 he was at war with Godred, the Norwegian King of the Isles, and in 1164 again attacked Scotland; he was, however, defeated and killed at Renfrew. He represents the Celtic reaction which succeeded on the Norse conquest of the Hebrides. The Lords of the Isles traced their descent from him.

Somers, JOHN, LORD (1651-1716), was educated at Trinity College, Oxford, and became a barrister. At the trial of the Seven Bishops (q.v.) he pleaded as their junior counsel, and made a short but weighty speech in their favour. Together with Montagu he took his seat for the first time in the Convention Parliament (q.v.). At the conference between the Lords and Commons he maintained that James had "abdicated" the throne. He framed the Declaration of Rights (q.v.). Shortly afterwards he was appointed solicitor-general. In 1690 he was made chairman of the committee for considering the rights of those corporations who had forfeited their charters in the last two reigns. He conducted the prosecution of the Jacobite conspirators Preston and Ashton with great moderation. In 1692 he became attorney-general, and subsequently lord keeper of the privy seal. Meanwhile William was gradually discarding Tories and forming a united Whig ministry. It was led by the junto, consisting of Somers, Halifax, Russell, and Wharton. In 1695 the arrangements for the restoration of the currency were placed in his hands. Shortly afterwards the Whig ministry was established, and he was made lord chancellor. In 1697, when parliament wished to reduce the standing army, Somers wrote a treatise, known as the "Balancing Letter," in which, while he condemned a standing army, he approved of a temporary army annually fixed by parliament. By Somers's advice William agreed to the bill for the disbanding of the army. But the country was rapidly becoming discontented. In 1697 Somers was assailed for complicity in the piracies of Kidd (q.v.), because he had subscribed to the expedition which Kidd proposed to start against piracy. Again attacked on the question of grants of Crown lands, he and his colleagues were compelled to retire in 1700. In 1701 he was impeached for his share in the Partition Treaties (q.v.) and in Kidd's misdeeds; but the Commons declined to appear before the Whig majority of the Lords, who thereupon declared him acquitted. The accession of Anne deprived him for some years of any hope of a return to power; but in 1708 he joined, with other members of the junto, the Godolphin ministry as president of the council. He fell with the ministry, and soon after was attacked by paralysis, which put an end to his political activity. Yet, on the accession of George, Somers was sworn of the privy council, and given a seat in the cabinet.

Somerset, FITZROY JAMES HENRY, 1ST BARON RAGLAN (1788-1855), youngest son of Henry, 5th Duke of Beaufort, entered the army in 1804. In 1808 Sir Arthur Wellesley appointed him his aide-de-camp; in this capacity he served all through the Peninsular War, and was present at Waterloo, where he lost an arm. From 1827 to 1852 he was military secretary at the Horse Guards. In 1852 he was appointed master-general of the ordnance and elevated to the House of Lords. In 1854 he became field-marshal. On the outbreak of the Crimean War Lord Raglan was appointed commander-in-chief of the British army. He reached the Crimea in September 1854, and shared with Marshal St. Arnaud the command of the allied forces during the winter and the following spring [CRIMEAN WAR]. He was heavily weighed down by the anxiety caused by the sufferings of his men in the trenches. His health had been gradually failing before he was seized by a fatal attack of cholera. He died on June 28, 1855.

Somme, THE BATTLE OF THE (July-November 1916), was a British offensive undertaken on the western front during the Great War, with the object of relieving the pressure round Verdun, where the German armies had been attacking since February 1916. It opened on July 1 against an extremely strong German position consolidated during the previous year, along a 25-mile front east of the River Ancre, from Serre, through Beaumont Hamel and Fricourt, to Maricourt. The first advance won Fricourt, Mametz, and Montauban by July 6, and part of Delville Wood and Olliviers by July 14. But thereafter little progress was made during August by reason of a German counter-attack, though the attack on Verdun had to be interrupted. The British advance was renewed on September 3, with a tank attack—the first of the war—on the 15th. It resulted in the capture of Combles and Thiepval, so forcing the Germans back to their last complete line of defence. The heavy rains of October, however, seriously handicapped the advance; until after a month of slow progress the fall of Beaumont Hamel to the British on November 13 closed the main offensive. The battle had secured no extensive gains in territory, but it had achieved its immediate object.

South Africa, THE UNION OF, consists of a union of four colonies (Cape Colony, Natal, Transvaal, and the Orange River Colony), together with the native territories of the Transkei, Swaziland, Basutoland, and the Bechuanaland and South-Western Protectorates. Historically, South Africa is a growth from the Cape of Good Hope. Visited in 1487 by Diaz and in 1497 by da Gama, the Cape remained but a landmark until the Netherlands East India Company established a settlement there in 1652 as a port of call where east-bound ships might victual. The colonists, reinforced in 1688 by Huguenot exiles, began to spread inland, absorbed the Hottentots' country, and by the end of the eighteenth century had come into contact with the Bantu. This movement of farmer families is a characteristic of Boer life; a patriarchal self-sufficiency was preferred to governmental regulation. With the colonists dissatisfied with company government, the Dutch governor surrendered the colony to a British naval force in 1795. Restored by the Peace of Amiens (1802), the colony was recaptured in 1806, to remain British after the Dutch government had been indemnified. European expansion led to conflict with the natives, and in 1811 began a series of Kafir wars (q.v.) which only ended with the annexation of all Kafirland to the Cape in 1865. Then began a period of renewed colonization. In 1820 and 1821 the eastern part of the colony was settled by British settlers, and Algoa Bay and the Albany settlement emphasized the tendency to make the Cape British by immigration. By 1824 Natal had been founded, and with this influx of new European blood began that clash of rival cultures which is one of South Africa's greatest problems. Inadequate slave compensation (1834), and wide divergence of British and Dutch attitudes towards the natives, accentuated by the presence of enthusiastic missionaries, reinforced the Boer tendency to trek, and organized migrations culminated in the Great Trek of 1836 by which the border farmers sought new pastures outside the pale of British rule. Those who trekked into Natal were forced to retire, but a loosely-organized community of farmers formed the nucleus of the Orange River Territory, which soon came into conflict with the natives. At the same time the new British settlers on the east coast met the descending Bantu tribes, and a series of wars resulted in annexations not only of native territory, but also in 1848 of the Orange River Territory, because of the fear that Boer aggression would rouse a native attack on all Europeans in South Africa which the Boer republic would not be strong enough to repulse. Nominal independence was secured for the Dutch who had trekked and formed small republics across the Vaal river by the Sand River Convention (1852) and to the Orange Free State in 1854 by the Convention of Bloemfontein. Diamonds were discovered in 1867, and the necessity of providing a strong government capable of keeping internal order and of defending itself against both natives and foreign intruders led to the proclamation of British sovereignty over Basutoland (1868), Griqualand West (1871), and finally the actual annexation of the Transvaal in 1877, followed by that of Walfish Bay (1878). Three years later the first Boer war broke out and a policy of imperial retrogression was marked by the Conventions of Pretoria (1881) and of London (1884), by which the South African Republic and German South-West Africa were recognized. In 1886, however, the discovery of gold on the Rand led to another political crisis. In the first place the Dutch were not prepared to give political power to the mass of cosmopolitan adventurers who swarmed into the gold-fields; in the second place the British ports of the Cape and Natal were able to dictate economic terms to the inland republic; while thirdly there arose a group of ardent imperialists anxious not only to secure political equality for the British on the Rand, but also to exclude foreign powers from South Africa. In 1889 the British South Africa Company was founded to develop the land north of the Boers, and various extensions of British rule or influence terrified the Boers with the fear of being isolated. The Jameson Raid of 1895 precipitated the conflict which in 1899 assumed the proportions of the South African War. Peace terms were dictated to the Dutch at Vereeniging in 1899, and the Dutch were given colonial autonomy in 1906 and 1907. Sir A. Milner, the then high commissioner, did much to restore prosperity to the defeated people, but the economic dependence of the gold-producing area upon the coastal ports was a continual cause of friction. A group of men spent the intervening period in working for a union of South Africa, and their efforts culminated in a series of conferences in which representatives from the four South African colonies agreed upon a plan of union, embodied in the South Africa Act (1909). This union is interesting both as a political experiment in government and as the culmination of a long process of growth.

By the act of 1909 Cape Colony, Natal, Transvaal Colony, and the Orange River Colony were united in a legislative union, under one government. The four colonies became provinces of the Union, all except the Orange River Colony—which became the Orange Free State—retaining their names. The executive government is vested in the king, represented by a governor-general, assisted by an executive council. The parliament of the Union consists of the king, a Senate, and a House of Assembly. The governor-general may appoint such times for holding such sessions as he thinks fit, and has authority—by proclamation or otherwise—to prorogue parliament, and to dissolve both the Senate and the House of Assembly simultaneously, or the latter alone; but the Senate was not to be dissolved within a period of ten years after the establishment of the Union. Cape Town is the seat of the legislature. The Senate consists of eight members nominated by the governor-general-in-council, and eight elected members from each province. Vacancies are filled by election in the provincial council. The Senate elects its own president, whom it may remove from office by a vote. Twelve senators at least are necessary to constitute a meeting of the Senate for the exercise of its powers. The president of the Senate has a casting vote. A member of the Senate may not be a member of the House, nor vice versa. The House of Assembly is composed of members directly chosen by the voters of the Union, and for the first parliament of the Union the number of members was as follows:—Cape Colony, 51; Natal, 17; Transvaal, 36 (now 50); Orange Free State, 17. This number, however, may be increased from time to time as may be necessary, but may not in the case of any original province be diminished until either the total number of members of the House of Assembly for these provinces reaches 150, or ten years have elapsed from the establishment of the Union. Members of both Houses are paid, and are fined for absence.

The parliament has full power to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of the Union. Each province has an administrator, appointed by the governor-general-in-council, and a provincial council, consisting of the same number of members as are elected in the province for the House of Assembly, except in such cases as where these representatives number fewer than twenty-five the number of members of the provincial council is raised to twenty-five. These councils in turn elect executive committees for the purpose of administration. The powers of the provincial councils are restricted to domestic policy. The chief matters in respect of which they have power, subject to the assent of the governor-general-in-council, to make ordinances are:—(1) Direct taxation within the province in order to raise a revenue for provincial purposes; (2) the borrowing of money on the sole credit of the province with the consent of the governor-general-in-council, and in accordance with regulations to be framed by parliament; (3) education; (4) agriculture; (5) hospitals, etc.; (6) municipal institutions; (7) local works and undertakings—roads, outspans, bridges, etc. Free trade was introduced throughout the Union, but until parliament otherwise provided the duties of custom and of excise leviable under the laws existing in any of the colonies meantime remained in force.

Provision was also made by the Act of Union for a Supreme Court of South Africa, with an Appellate Division. The Supreme Courts of the colonies forming the Union became provincial divisions of the Supreme Court of South Africa, and their judges continued in office. From the establishment of the Union, the chief justice of South Africa, the ordinary judges of appeal, and all other judges of the Supreme Court were to be appointed by the governor-general-in-council. All laws in force in the several colonies at the establishment of the Union were to continue in force until repealed or amended by parliament. English and Dutch are equally official languages of the Union.

Provision is made in the constitution for the admission of Rhodesia, but so far that colony has declined to join the Union.

The chief problem of the Union is that connected with the natives, which is one of population complicated by cultural differences and economic competition. No satisfactory solution has been found, segregation being possible only in certain areas and to a limited extent.

Southampton, from its geographical position, has played an important part in English history. The English who settled in Wessex founded the town, called Hantune and Suth-Hamtun in the "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle," near the site of the Roman town of Clausentum. It was frequently attacked by the Danes (in 837, 980, and 994), and Canute used it as a chief point of embarkation. It was a royal borough before 1086, and obtained a charter from Henry II, which was amplified in 1189, 1199, 1256, 1401, 1445, 1447, etc., and finally by Charles I in 1640. It has returned two members to parliament since 1295, and its right to hold a cattle-market was confirmed by Henry IV and Elizabeth. In 1338 it was sacked by a fleet of French and Genoese, and was afterwards fortified with care. Southampton was frequently used as a port of embarkation during the Hundred Years' War; it was there that Henry V, in 1415, just before setting out for France, executed the Earl of Cambridge, Lord Scrope, and Sir Thomas Grey for treason. Southampton espoused the Yorkist cause during the Wars of the Roses, after the Lancastrians had made an attempt to take it. Henry VIII used the town as a basis of operation by sea in his attacks on France. Philip of Spain landed there in 1554. Since then its main importance has been commercial.

South Sea Company, THE (1711-1720). In 1711 a company was formed for trading to the "South Seas," which was induced to lend ten millions to the government during Harley's treasurership, and to allow the debt to be funded, in return for a monopoly of the trade with the Spanish colonies. In 1717 Walpole persuaded the South Sea creditors to make a further advance of two millions to the government. In 1720 the South Sea Company, desirous of further government credit, agreed to take over the whole of the national debt (£51,300,000), and to persuade the holders of government annuities to take in exchange South Sea Stock. The government annuities had borne 7 or 8 per cent. interest; the company was to receive 5 per cent. till 1727, and 4 per cent. afterwards. In order to outbid the offers of the Bank of England and other associations, the South Sea Company agreed to pay to government a heavy premium of more than seven millions. The transaction was embodied in an act of April 7, 1720. The company had thus weighted itself heavily, and it was doomed to failure if the public did not subscribe for its shares readily. At first there seemed no danger of this. The public rushed in to subscribe, and the company's stock was taken with the utmost eagerness. But the success of the South Sea scheme had developed a frenzy of speculation in the nation. Companies of all kinds were formed, some on the most outrageous projects, and the public hastened to subscribe, to sell their shares at a premium, and to buy others. The South Sea Company, whose own shares rose to 1,000 per cent. by July, took action against some of the bubble companies and exposed them. This produced an instan-taneous effect. A panic set in. Everybody was now anxious to sell. All shares fell at once, and the South Sea Company's own stock fell in a month (September 1720) from 1,000 to 175, and by November to 135. The ruin was widespread, and extended to all classes of the nation. Popular feeling cried out for vengeance on the South Sea directors, though in reality the calamity had not been caused by them, but by the reckless speculation which had been indulged in. A retrospective act of parliament was passed, remitting the seven millions due to the government, appropriating the private property of the directors for the relief of those who had suffered, and dividing the capital of the company, after discharging its liabilities, among the proprietors. John Aislabie, the chancellor of the Exchequer, Charles Stanhope, and Secretary James Craggs and his father, were tried and implicated in the matter; and an inquiry, ordered by the Commons, resulted in the expulsion of Aislabie, and the acquittal of Stanhope by three votes. The younger Craggs died before the inquiry was over, and the elder committed suicide.

Spa Fields Riots, THE (December 2, 1816), were the result of the extreme depression of trade, the severity of the government, and the intrigues of the Spencean philanthropists (q.v.). A great meeting was convened in Spa Fields, Bermondsey, which was to be addressed by "Orator" Hunt (q.v.) and Major Cartwright; but before Hunt arrived the mob, led by one Watson, had rushed into the City, plundered a gunsmith's shop, and threatened the Exchange. They were checked by the police here and dispersed. The ringleaders were charged with high treason, but the prosecution failed.

Spain, RELATIONS WITH. Serious relations between England and the Spanish kingdom began with the reign of Henry II. The marriage of Henry's second daughter, Eleanor, to Alfonso VIII of Castile; his arbitration between Alfonso and King Sancho of Navarre; even the younger Henry's pilgrimage to Compostella—always a favourite shrine with Englishmen—Richard I's marriage with Berengaria of Navarre, all contributed to form a close friendship between the two countries which became traditional all through the Middle Ages. The marriage of Blanche of Castile to Louis, son of Philip Augustus, was regarded as a safe means of ensuring peace between John, her uncle, and the French king. The continued possession of Gascony by the English kings made them almost neighbours of some of the Spanish monarchs. The appointment by Henry III of his son, Edward, as regent of Guienne in 1250 was quickly followed by the marriage of Edward with Eleanor, sister of Alfonso X, whose claims through the elder Eleanor to that duchy made it necessary to conciliate him, but whose legislative instinct may well have established sympathy between him and his brother-in-law. Edward I had constant dealings with Spain. He sought earnestly to mediate between France and Castile in 1276. In 1288 he visited Catalonia in order to reconcile the French and Aragonese claimants to Naples; but Alfonso X's death, and the want of success of a policy which rested entirely on mediation, caused Edward's relations to Spain to become less cordial towards the end of his reign, despite the political necessity of seeking in the south a counterpoise to French influence. Again under Edward III the relations were renewed. The Black Prince marched with a great army into Castile to protect Pedro the Cruel against Henry of Trastamara, and his victory at Navarrete (April 3, 1367) (q.v.) for a time kept the tyrant on his throne. Pedro's final discomfiture led to fierce hostility between England and the house of Trastamara, which thus gained possession of the Castilian throne. John of Gaunt and Edmund of Cambridge both married daughters of Pedro. Through his wife, Constance de Padilla, John claimed to be King of Castile, but the brilliant naval victory of the Spaniards over the Earl of Pembroke, which restored La Rochelle to the French (1375), the practical failure of Edmund in Portugal [PORTUGAL, RELATIONS WITH], and the equally unlucky expedition of John to Spain (1385) as pretender and crusader, showed that his chances were hopeless. At last he concluded a treaty with John II of Castile, in which by marrying Catherine, his daughter by Constance, to the heir of Castile, he practically resigned his claims. This marriage renewed the old friendliness. The kings of Castile sympathized with the misfortunes of the house of Lancaster as with those of their own kin. Edward IV in 1467 concluded a treaty with Castile which gave equal trading rights to Castilians and English. The "Libel of English Policy" shows how important Spanish trade was. Yet Edward would not marry his daughter to a Spanish prince, and not until the final Lancastrian triumph under Henry VII was the alliance of the two countries really renewed, and then on conditions that made England almost a satellite of Spain. The marriage of Katharine, daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella, to Princes Arthur and Henry in succession, was the most important result of the restoration of intimate relations. Although Ferdinand hardly treated Henry well, and although his League of Cambrai isolated England from foreign politics, Henry VIII, after breaking up the Cambrai confederation by the Holy League, fully renewed the Spanish connexion. During the war of the Holy League, and the war which broke out in 1521, Henry was the decided supporter of Ferdinand and Charles his successor. At last fear for the balance of power led Henry to a neutral attitude after the battle of Pavia (1525). The divorce of Katharine involved personal and religious differences, which for a time dissolved the Spanish alliance. For some years England feared a Spanish invasion, but so strong were the ties which bound the two states that in 1541 the English and Spaniards were again fighting side by side against the French. Charles's desertion of Henry at Cr  py, and the strongly Protestant policy of Somerset and Northumberland, again produced coolness, until Mary's marriage with Philip, and her subsequent participation in the last of Charles's great wars against France, brought the nations more together than ever. But the catastrophe of Mary's reign was the death-blow of the traditional connexion with Spain. Though it was Elizabeth's policy to keep on fair terms with Spain, the prevalence of religious over political considerations during the crisis of the Catholic Counter-Reformation, the alliance of England and the revolted Netherlands, that of Spain with the pretender to the English throne, and the rise of an English naval power which saw in the Spanish colonies an easy and rich prey, and whose piratical forays soon more than counteracted the friendliness which long and settled trade between the two nations had produced, brought about a state of chronic irritation worse than war, and a series of acts of hostility, which in any other period both parties would have regarded as casus belli. At last, on the very eve of the Armada (q.v.), the long-threatened war broke out. Henceforth hatred of Spain became a mark of the patriotic and Protestant Englishman. James I's Spanish policy and Spanish marriage scheme made him intensely unpopular, and Charles I, though less decided than his father, and actually at war with Spain in the beginning of his reign, and often rather opposed to it, was regarded with some suspicion for the same reason. Cromwell revived Elizabeth's policy of uncompromising hostility to Spain as the centre of Catholicism in Europe. Though successful in execution, his policy was quite obsolete in idea, and tended to promote the ambitious schemes of Louis XIV. Clarendon, who also pursued the Elizabethan tradition, incurred disgrace and exile for what had brought glory to the Protector. Still, the hostility to France, which began with the Triple Alliance (q.v.—1668) and the marriage of William and Mary, and which culminated in the Revolution, did not involve any very cordial alliance with the Spaniards, though the effect of the anti-French policy was to help them. So little did William regard Spain as his ally that he joined with Louis XIV in the Partition Treaties (q.v.). The mismanagement of the allies in the Spanish Succession war made the French King of Spain the representative of Spanish national feeling, and consequently renewed an active hostility between the two countries which the retention of Minorca and Gibraltar as the spoils of the British triumph did much to increase. After the Treaty of Utrecht, Alberoni plotted to restore the Pretender, though the collapse at Cape Passaro (1720) showed that the Spaniards were unable to cope directly with the British. Ripperda's Austrian alliance was equally hostile to Great Britain, and involved a short war which, but for Walpole's peace policy, would have proved serious (1727). The commercial clauses of the Treaty of Utrecht (q.v.) gave the British a limited permission to trade in South America, which involved constant disputes with Spanish revenue officers, and resulted in the war of 1739, the prelude to the more general Austrian Succession war. The Family Compact of the Bourbon kings of France and Spain (q.v.) involved Great Britain in a new hostility to the Spaniards at the close of the Seven Years' War. Spain took advantage of the American Revolution to try to regain what her former ill success had caused her to lose. But the long siege of Gibraltar (q.v.) proved a failure. The affairs of the Falkland islands (1770), and of Nootka Sound (1789), again almost involved a conflict. During the French Revolution the weakness of Spain soon compelled her to lend her still imposing fleet to the Republican and Napoleonic governments, and thus to enter into a naval war with Great Britain which cost her many of her colonies. At last Napoleon's reckless imposition of his brother on the Spanish throne involved a national insurrection in Spain, which led to the establishment of a new alliance with Great Britain. During the whole of the Peninsular War (q.v.) Spanish troops assisted the armies of Wellington, but the pride, inefficiency, and procrastination of his allies were one of Wellington's greatest difficulties. The Spanish popular movement, however, showed how Napoleon could be beaten, and without their irregular forces the Peninsular campaigns would hardly have turned out as they did. Subsequent political relations between Great Britain and Spain have been of inferior importance. Canning recognized the independence of the revolted South American colonies in December 1824. The British aided Queen Christina against the Carlists. [BRITISH LEGION; SPANISH MARIAGES.] In 1907 Alfonso XIII married Princess Ena of Battenberg, a niece of Edward VII.

Spanish Blanks, THE (1593), was the name given to eight papers seized on the person of a man named George Ker, who was about to convey them to Spain. These papers were blank sheets, signed by the Earls of Huntly, Errol, and Angus, and by Sir Patrick Gordon of Auchendoune. It was proved by the confession of Ker that the sheets were to have been filled up by two Jesuits, named William Crichton and James Tyrie, and were to have contained assurances that the persons who signed them would not fail to render material aid to the Spanish armies on their landing in Scotland. The result of this discovery was immediate action on the part of the government against the popish lords, who were compelled to fly, and were finally defeated by Argyll at Glenlivet (October 4, 1594).

Spanish Marriages. From 1840 the marriage of Queen Isabella of Spain had become a question of interest to Europe, and especially to Great Britain and France. The French plan was that Isabella should marry the Duke of Cadiz, and her sister the Duc de Montpensier, having in view the eventual succession to the Spanish throne of the children of the latter couple. The British, who strongly disliked this scheme, contended that Isabella should marry the man whom she and the Spanish people selected, and that the welfare of Spain, and not the interest of the Orleans house, should be chiefly consulted. The British government therefore declined actively to recommend any candidate, even Leopold of Saxe-Coburg, who was desirable in every way, and who would have been the British candidate had there been one. In 1841 Prince Albert and Lord Aberdeen both declared that Great Britain would not interfere. In 1845, during Queen Victoria's visit to the King of the French, the latter declared "that he would never hear of Montpensier's marriage with the Infanta of Spain." This pledge was kept as long as Aberdeen remained in office, but the accession of Palmerston in 1846 changed the views of the French. The defeat of their Eastern policy by Palmerston in 1839-40 still rankled in their minds, and he was an object of their settled distrust. Use was therefore made of an indiscretion committed by Lord Dalling, the British ambassador at Madrid, and also of a rather violent dispatch of Palmerston, and on August 29, 1846, the proposed double marriage between the Dukes of Cadiz and Montpensier, and the Spanish Queen and Infanta, was announced. This statement, communicated shortly by M. Guizot to Lord Normanby, British ambassador at Paris, was received in Great Britain with a great deal of indignation. An official protest was made by the British government, and an unofficial one by the queen; but they were disregarded, and the double marriage was celebrated simultaneously at Madrid (October 10). The conduct of Louis Philippe gave an immense shock to his reputation in Europe, and did a great deal to break off the hitherto friendly intercourse with Great Britain. Indignation at his perfidy was increased by sympathy for the young queen thus sacrificed to his policy, and a coolness in consequence arose. The British fears of French aggrandizement were, however, soon removed by the birth of a son and successor to the Queen of Spain.

Spanish Succession, THE WAR OF THE, was caused by the refusal of Louis XIV to abide by the settlement of the succession question agreed on by him and William III in the Partition Treaties (q.v.). Besides accepting the will of Charles II, which made his grandson, Philip of Anjou, King of Spain, Louis had reserved his grandson's right to succeed to the French crown, had put French garrisons into the towns of the Spanish Netherlands, and had acknowledged the Pretender as King of England. This last proceeding had roused the English. William III in 1701 had laid the foundation of a grand alliance between Great Britain, Holland, and the Empire. It was now concluded. But on March 8, 1702, William died. War was at once declared on the accession of Anne. The emperor, with the Electors of Brandenburg, Hanover, and the Elector Palatine, Denmark, Holland, and in 1703 Savoy and Portugal, were the allies of Great Britain. France had only the Electors of Cologne and Bavaria, and the Duke of Mantua in Italy. Marlborough, commander of the British and Dutch armies, at once went to Holland with the object of capturing the Netherland fortresses occupied by the French. Venloo, Liège, and other towns on the Meuse were taken, and the French cut off from the Lower Rhine. On the Upper Rhine, Louis of Baden had taken Landau, but was defeated by Villars at Friedlingen. In Italy, Eugene had defeated Villeroy at Cremona, but the French still held the Milanese. (For the war in Spain see p. 992.) In France the Protestants of the Cevennes had broken into open rebellion under Cavalier. In 1703 but little was done. Villars wished to march on Vienna, but was thwarted by the Elector of Bavaria. Marshal Tallard recaptured Landau. Marlborough, who had formed a great plan to reconquer Antwerp and Ostend, was foiled by the Dutch, and had to content himself with the capture of Bonn on the Rhine, and Huy and Limburg on the Meuse. In 1704 Louis set on foot no fewer than eight different armies. His chief effort was to be in the direction of Vienna in concert with the Elector of Bavaria. The Hungarians had been incited to revolt. The position of the emperor seemed desperate. Marlborough, however, in a famous march from the Lower Rhine to the Danube, joined Eugene in Bavaria, and marched upon the French commanders Marsin and Tallard. In August the battle of Blenheim was fought. After that disastrous defeat the French withdrew beyond the Rhine. Landau was taken, and Marlborough, marching into the Moselle valley, conquered Trèves and Trarbach. In this year Gibraltar was captured by Sir George Rooke; while the merciful policy of Villeroy put an end to the rebellion of the peasantry in the Cevennes. In Italy, Vendôme had nearly reduced the Duke of Savoy to despair. Eugene was sent thither with Prussian troops (1705). Marlborough wished to invade France by the Moselle valley, but was thwarted by the weak co-operation of Louis of Baden. Villeroi suddenly invested Liège, but on Marlborough's return to Flanders affairs were re-established there. Towards the end of the year Louis of Baden won a great battle at Hagenau. In 1706 Marlborough determined by a vigorous effort in Flanders to make a diversion to Eugene in Italy. In Brabant he encountered Marshal Villeroi at Ramillies. By that victory the allies gained the whole of the Netherlands. Marlborough wished to besiege Mons, but was deterred by the slowness with which the Dutch forwarded supplies. In Italy, Eugene by his brilliant relief of the siege of Turin accomplished a work hardly inferior to that of Ramillies. Italy was lost to France, and compelled to join the Grand Alliance. Louis offered terms of peace, but they were, somewhat unreasonably, rejected by Marlborough. The campaign of the next year (1707) was unsuccessful. Marlborough in vain attempted to bring on a pitched battle. On the Rhine, Villars took and destroyed the lines of Stolhofen. Eugene attempted to attack Toulon by invading France from the south-east; but he had no supplies, and withdrew before Marshal Tessé. In 1708 Marlborough resolved to complete the conquest of the Netherlands in conjunction with Eugene. But the latter experienced great difficulty in raising an army. Vendôme suddenly assumed the offensive, deceived Marlborough by a feint on Louvain, captured Ghent and Bruges, and sat down before Oudenarde. In July the battle of Oudenarde was fought. The results, though it was a victory for the British, were not decisive. Eugene's troops at length joined Marlborough; Berwick reinforced the French. The allies determined to besiege Lille. It fell in October, Marshal Boufflers having made a gallant resistance. Ghent and Bruges were reconquered. General Stanhope had captured Port Mahon in Minorca. France was now absolutely exhausted. Louis once more proposed terms. Once more the demands of the allies were intolerable, consisting of the surrender of the Dutch frontier towns, and all claims to the Spanish succession. Louis appealed to the French people. Villars was sent against Marlborough. He allowed Tournai to fall, but when the allies invested Mons he was obliged to risk a battle. By the advice of Eugene the attack was deferred until troops could be brought up from Tournai. The result was that Villars had time to entrench himself, and that the victory of Malplaquet was almost as disastrous for the allies as for the French. Mons fell, but the campaign was closed. A conference was opened at Gertruydenberg; the British and Dutch consented to treat, but were opposed by Austria and Savoy, and the war was resumed. Douai was captured. The next year Marlborough fought his last campaign.

He was hampered by the withdrawal of Eugene to superintend and guard the Diet summoned to Frankfort to elect a successor to the Emperor Joseph. By skilful manœuvres he passed Villars's lines at Arras, which the French commander called the non plus ultra, and besieged and took Bouchain. But the Tory ministry had already proposed terms of peace. Marlborough was dismissed on his return to England, and Ormonde appointed in his place. He received orders to undertake no offensive operations against the French, but he could not refuse to join Eugene in an attack on Quesnoy. In June 1712 an armistice was declared, and the British troops ordered to separate from Eugene. The imperial general continued the campaign alone. But he was defeated at Denain, and compelled to raise the siege of Landrécies. In March 1713 the Peace of Utrecht (q.v.) was signed. The Germans fought on. But they lost Landau again, and soon afterwards Speyer, Worms, and Kaiserslautern. Villars stormed the lines at Freiburg, and took the town in spite of Eugene's efforts. In the course of 1714 the Treaty of Rastadt was concluded between France and Austria, that of Baden between France and the princes of the empire. Such was the war in continental Europe.

In Spain meanwhile, in 1702, after hostilities had been proclaimed, an armament, under the command of the Duke of Ormonde, appeared off Cadiz. It was ill-conducted, and after plundering the town the British sailed off. On his way back Ormonde destroyed a fleet of treasure ships in Vigo Bay. Some millions of dollars were captured, some millions more were sunk. Next year it was determined to attack Spain from the east and west. The army from the west consisted of Portuguese and British troops commanded by the Earl of Galway. The Archduke Charles, whose claims to the Spanish throne were supported by the coalition, appeared in the camp. But Berwick, the commander of the French, held Galway in check throughout the year 1704. On August 6 Admiral Rooke succeeded in taking Gibraltar. In 1705 Peterborough was sent to Spain with 5,000 Dutch and British soldiers. He was joined by the Archduke Charles. He wished to march at once on Madrid, but was compelled by his instructions to attack Barcelona. The town was almost impregnable; supplies were wanting; he quarrelled with his fellow-commander, the Prince of Hesse. He determined to raise the siege, but suddenly resolved to attack the fortress of Montjuich; it fell. On October 23 Barcelona was captured. Catalonia and Valencia at once declared for the archduke. Peterborough, with 1,200 men, advanced to raise the siege of San Mattheo, where a force of 500 men was surrounded by 7,000 Spaniards. Peterborough deceived the Spanish general as to his numbers, relieved the town, and entered Valencia in pursuit of the Spanish army. Meanwhile an army under the command of Anjou, who was advised by Marshal Tessé, and a fleet under the Count of Toulouse, were blockading Barcelona. Peterborough attempted to raise the siege, but failed. A new commission was sent him placing him in command of the fleet as well as of the army. He failed to entice the French to battle, but they sailed away, and were followed by the army. In this year Berwick fell back before Galway, and that general occupied Madrid (1706). Philip, Duke of Anjou, fled, and Aragon declared for the Archduke Charles. This was the highest point of the success of the allies. But the hostility of the natives, and the cowardice of Charles, made it impossible to hold the town. Galway fell back and effected a junction with Peterborough at Guadalaxara. Berwick immediately occupied Madrid. Peterborough soon quarrelled with Charles, and left the army. The allies retreated on Valencia. In 1707 Galway was rash enough to attack Berwick in a disadvantageous position on the plain of Almanza, and was utterly defeated. Valencia and Aragon surrendered to the French, and the Archduke Charles was reduced to the province of Catalonia. "The battle of Almanza decided the fate of Spain." Stanhope was sent to command in Spain with Stahremberg, a methodical tactician, as his colleague. For two years nothing was done. At length, in 1710, Stanhope and Stahremberg advanced on Madrid. Philip's troops were defeated at Almenara, and again at Saragossa. Madrid was occupied, and Philip was once more a fugitive. Again it was found impossible to hold the town. The allies retreated to Toledo, and thence to Catalonia. Vendôme, the new French commander, followed hard after them. Stanhope, who had separated from Stahremberg, was surrounded at Brihuega, and had to capitulate; Stahremberg, who marched to his rescue, was defeated after an obstinate resistance in Villa-Viciosa. He fled through Catalonia to Barcelona. Philip was now safe on the throne of Madrid. The war was practically over; for, although Argyll was sent to Catalonia in 1711, he could effect nothing with a demoralized army and no supplies. Perhaps, in view of the impending negotiations, it was not intended that he should effect anything. The Peace of Utrecht was signed in March 1713. The Catalans, faithful to a hopeless cause, deserted by their allies, still fought on. But in September 1714 Barcelona fell, and the war in Spain was at an end.

Speaker, THE, is the name given to the officers who preside over the House of Lords and the House of Commons. The Speaker of the House of Lords is the lord chancellor or the lord keeper of the great seal; his office is much less important than that of the Speaker of the Lower House. He is allowed to take part in debates, and to vote as an ordinary member;

his official duties being chiefly confined to putting the question to the House. The Speaker of the House of Commons, on the contrary, is an official of the highest importance; his duties are not only to preside over the debates and to put the question, but to maintain order, to enforce the decrees of the House, and to act generally as its representative or "mouth": through their Speaker the Commons have the privilege of access to the sovereign. Unlike the Speaker of the Lords, the Speaker of the Lower House, who holds rank as the first commoner of the realm, can take no part in debates, and has no vote unless the numbers are equal, when he has a casting vote. The office, which is filled by vote of the Commons subject to royal approbation, is of very ancient origin. That some spokesman was necessary from the first institution of parliament is sufficiently obvious, but the position and title of Speaker only began to be defined towards the end of the fourteenth century. Henry of Keighley, who in 1301 bore the petition of the Lincoln Parliament to the royal presence; Sir William Trussell, who answered for the Commons in 1343, though not a member of the House itself; Sir Peter de la Mare, the famous leader of the Good Parliament in 1376, who discharged the functions without the title, were all practically in much the same position as the later Speaker; but it is not until 1377 that the title is definitely given to Sir Thomas Hungerford, of whom the rolls report that he "avoit les paroles pur les communes." Henceforward the "prolocutor" appears regularly upon the parliament-roll. The independent, non-partisan Speaker of to-day is, however, the result of a slow process of development which was hardly complete before the nineteenth century.

Speights Bay, THE BATTLE OF (1651), was fought in Barbados between the colonists (who were Royalists) under Lord Francis Willoughby of Parham, and a Parliamentary force under Admiral Sir George Ayscue and Colonel Alleyne. The victory lay with the Royalists, but in January 1652 Willoughby was forced to treat. Barbados submitted to the Parliament.

Spencean Philanthropists were followers of Thomas Spence (1750-1814), a Yorkshire schoolmaster, who wished to nationalize the land and support the people on the produce. They arranged the Spa Fields Meeting (q.v.), December 2, 1816. Thistlewood (q.v.) and other notorious demagogues were members of the society.

Spencer, CHARLES, 3RD EARL OF SUNDERLAND (1674-1722), in 1698 married Anne, daughter of John Churchill, Duke of Marlborough. He quarrelled with his father-in-law (1702). In 1705 he was sent as envoy extraordinary to Vienna. The Whigs were anxious that he should be admitted to office, as they hoped thereby to draw Marlborough over to their side. The queen disliked him for his impetuosity of temper. However, Godolphin's threats of resignation, and the prayers of Marlborough, induced her to create him secretary of state (1706). In 1710 he foolishly advised Sacheverell's impeachment, and was therefore to a great extent the cause of his party's overthrow. On the accession of George I he was much disgusted at being appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland, a post he imagined to be inferior to his merits. He began to cabal with the seceders from the Whigs against Townshend and Walpole. In 1716 he went to Hanover, where he gained the ear of George I and Stanhope. He accused Walpole and Townshend of questionable dealings with the Duke of Argyll. George was opposed to Townshend for his opposition to his German plans, and dismissed him; Walpole followed his brother-in-law out of office. Sunderland became secretary of state, and subsequently exchanged offices with Stanhope. The ministry was strong; and in 1719 Walpole and Townshend finding opposition useless formed a coalition with him. The defeat of the government on the Peerage Bill (q.v.), suggested by Sunderland in order to thwart the future king, had done them but little harm. In 1720 came universal distress owing to the bursting of the South Sea "Bubble." [SOUTH SEA COMPANY.] The original scheme had been laid before Sunderland, and therefore it was chiefly on him that odium fell. He was accused of having received £50,000 stock as a present. He was most probably guiltless; indeed it is said that he had lost heavily by the transactions of the company. He was declared innocent by the Lords; but the popular indignation was so great that he was forced to resign. During the last year of his life he is said to have intrigued with the Pretender. "Lord Spencer," says Coxe, "in person was highly favoured by nature, and no less liberally gifted with intellectual endowments. In him a bold and impetuous spirit was concealed under a cold and reserved exterior. He was a zealous champion of the Whig doctrines in the most enlarged sense. Associating with the remnant of the Republicans who had survived the Commonwealth, he caught their spirit. His political idol was Lord Somers, although he wanted both the prudence and temper of so distinguished a leader."

Spencer, JOHN POYNTZ, 5TH EARL SPENCER (1835-1910), was elected M.P. for South Northamptonshire in 1857, but was summoned to the House of Lords in the same year. From 1868 to 1874, and from 1882 to 1885, he was lord-lieutenant of Ireland; from 1880 to 1882, and again in 1886, lord president of the council; and from 1892 to 1895 first lord of the admiralty. In 1901 he was made keeper of the privy seal, and in 1902 became leader of the Liberal peers in the House of Lords until 1905, when he retired from political life.

Spencer, ROBERT, 2ND EARL OF SUNDERLAND (1640-1702), only son of Henry Spencer, 1st earl, was in his early career a supporter of the Exclusion Bill (q.v.) and of the Prince of Orange. But a singularly ambitious and self-seeking disposition made him never hesitate to change his side when it was likely to be unprosperous. He became a strong Tory, the leading minister of James II, and ultimately, though quite destitute of religious convictions, professed his conversion to Catholicism. James found in him a subtle and accommodating minister of very great ability, and quite without scruples. The Revolution of 1688 drove him into exile; but in a few years he returned, and managed to insinuate himself into William III's favour. He was William's adviser in forming a Whig ministry, and was made one of the lords justices in 1697.

Spithead Mutiny, THE, took place on April 15, 1797, and was the result of the legitimate grievance of the seamen at a naval system honeycombed with corruption and abuses, which subjected the sailors to barbarous treatment, while keeping their pay at the rate fixed under Charles II and leaving their commissariat to the control of venal and greedy pursers. In conjunction with the still more famous Mutiny at the Nore under Richard Parker (May 12), it was a formidable danger in the midst of the Revolutionary War. Every ship refused to obey the order to sail. At a council on board the Queen Charlotte, the meeting was organized, and petitions addressed to the admiralty. Lord Howe (q.v.) succeeded by great tact in winning the mutineers back to their duty, and even persuaded them to express full sorrow, a confession which resulted in an act that removed their worst grievances.

Saturday Review, articles by D. Hannay, June 6—July 4, 1891; C. Gill, "Naval Mutinies of 1797," 1913.

Sports, THE BOOK OF, is the name generally given to James I's Declaration, issued in 1618, which permitted the use of "lawful" recreations on Sunday after church time. Dancing, the setting up of maypoles, archery, leaping, and Whitsunales were among the list of lawful sports. Bear-baiting, bowling, and interludes were declared unlawful. Those not attending church were not allowed to join in the sports. In 1633 Charles I reissued the Declaration, and enforced the reading of it in all churches. It was bitterly opposed by the Puritans, and the Long Parliament ordered all copies of the Declaration to be burnt.

Spottiswood, JOHN (1565-1639), Archbishop of St. Andrews, accompanied James VI to England (1603), receiving the archbishopric of Glasgow in the same year in succession to Beaton, and that of St. Andrews in 1615. In 1633 he crowned Charles I at Holyrood, and two years later was made chancellor of Scotland.

Spottiswoode Gang, THE (1837), was the name given to an association in London which was formed to collect subscriptions to test the legality of Irish elections. Mr. Spottiswoode, one of the queen's printers, presided over it, and from this circumstance the name arose. Sir Francis Burdett (q.v.) was a zealous supporter of the association. It was attacked in the House by Mr. Blewitt, member for Monmouth, but he met with little support.

M. W. Patterson, "Sir Francis Burdett."

Spragge, SIR EDWARD (d. 1673), was a distinguished naval commander during the reign of Charles II. He took a prominent share in many battles against the Dutch, and, in particular, gallantly, though unsuccessfully, defended Sheerness in 1667. In 1671 he took part in an expedition against the Algerine pirates. In 1673 he was killed in action against Van Tromp (August 11).

Sprat, THOMAS, Bishop of Rochester (1635-1713), was educated at Wadham College, Oxford, and took deacon's orders in 1660. He became a fellow of the Royal Society in 1663.

He was created by rapid promotion canon of Westminster (1668), canon of Windsor (1680), Dean of Westminster (1683), and Bishop of Rochester (1684). He was weak enough to accept a seat on James's ecclesiastical commission board in hopes of obtaining the archbishopric of York. He read the Declaration of Indulgence in Westminster Abbey. Soon afterwards he resigned his place on the commission. When William of Orange landed he declined to sign a declaration of fidelity to James. He voted for a regency, but took the oaths of fidelity to William and Mary without hesitation, and assisted at their coronation. In 1692 he was involved in a supposed Jacobite conspiracy, designed by one Robert Young (d. 1700), and for a while imprisoned; but his innocence was clearly proved. His chief works are "A History of the Royal Society" (1667) and "An Account of the Rye-House Plot" (1685). Macaulay declared that his prose writings prove him to have been "a great master of our language, and possessed at once of the eloquence of the preacher, of the controversialist, and of the historian. His moral character might have passed with little censure had he belonged to a less sacred profession; for the worst that can be said of him is that he was indolent, luxurious, and worldly; but such failings, though not commonly regarded as very heinous in men of secular callings, are scandalous in a prelate."

Sprigg, JOSHUA (1618-84), was born at Banbury, entered at New Inn Hall, Oxford, in 1634, became a preacher in London, and fellow of All Souls College, Oxford (1649). He was author of "Anglia Rediviva" (1647), a history of the successes of the New Model, of which book, according to Clement Walker, Nathaniel Fiennes was chief compiler.

Sprott, GEORGE (d. 1608), a notary of Eyemouth, was legal adviser to Robert Logan of Restalrig, from whom he acquired information concerning the Gowrie conspiracy (q.v.). Having incautiously revealed his knowledge, he was tortured, and, having confessed all he knew, was executed.

Spurs, THE BATTLE OF THE (1513). [TEROUEENNE.]

Stafford, EDWARD, 3RD DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM (d. 1521), the eldest son of Henry, 2nd Duke of Buckingham, was restored by Henry VII. to all his father's dignities and possessions. In 1521 he was tried and executed for high treason, the chief evidence for the charge being that he had unguardedly let fall some expressions to the effect that he would be entitled to succeed to the throne should the king chance to die without issue. No doubt his connexion with the royal line was his real offence in the eyes of the king. The office of constable, which the Duke of Buckingham inherited from the Bohuns, Earls of Hereford, was forfeited by his presumed offence, and was never afterwards revived in England.

Stafford, HENRY, 2ND DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM (d. 1483), was the grandson of Humphrey, 1st Duke of Buckingham, by Margaret Beaufort, daughter and heiress of Edmund, Duke of Somerset. He was doubly connected with the royal family, and his marriage with Catherine Woodville, daughter of Earl Rivers, made him brother-in-law to Edward IV. He was one of Richard III's great supporters, and was the chief agent in obtaining the crown for him. But before Richard had been on the throne many months Buckingham became alienated from him, the chief reason being apparently Richard's failure to carry out his pledge to give him the moiety of the inheritance of the Bohuns, to which Buckingham had a claim. Influenced by Morton, Bishop of Ely, he entered into a project for calling over Henry, Earl of Richmond. This scheme was supported by the Woodville party, and Buckingham arranged that he should head a rising in the west of England, while Richmond was to land in the south. But the insurrection ended in failure. Buckingham had raised a small force in Wales, but all the bridges over the Severn were broken down, while unusually heavy rains had so swelled the rivers as to make them impassable. Being unable to get provisions, most of his men deserted, and Buckingham himself took refuge in Shropshire, but was betrayed by one of his retainers, taken to Salisbury, and there executed.

J. Gairdner, "Richard III," 1878 and 1893.

Stafford, SIR HUMFREY (d. 1450), was cousin to the 1st Duke of Buckingham, and nephew of John Stafford, Archbishop of Canterbury. On the outbreak of Jack Cade's rebellion (q.v.) he and his brother were sent with a detachment against the insurgents, whom they met at Sevenoaks; an encounter took place, in which the brothers were defeated and slain.

Stafford, JOHN, Archbishop of Canterbury (d. 1452), was a member of one of the most illustrious families in England in the fifteenth century. After holding several minor preferments, he was made Bishop of Bath and Wells in 1425, and in 1443 was translated to Canterbury. He held many important civil offices, being appointed keeper of the privy seal in 1421, treasurer in 1422, and lord chancellor in 1432. He held the great seal till 1450. Stafford was a strong supporter of Beaufort and the peace party, and was zealous in promoting the marriage of Henry VI with Margaret of Anjou. He seems to have played some part in the suppression of Jack Cade's rebellion, and to have helped restore tranquillity to the country by a judicious admixture of firmness and leniency. He was a cautious and experienced administrator, and while he lived he was able to do something to keep the rivalry between the Yorkists and Lancastrians within bounds. He perhaps deserves no higher praise than is bestowed upon him by Fuller, who says—"No prelate hath either less good or less evil recorded of him."

Stafford, THOMAS (1531 ?-1557), was the son of Lord Henry Stafford, and the nephew of Cardinal Pole. He was for a long time an exile at the court of France during the reign of Mary, but in April 1557 headed an expedition to the Yorkshire coast, and took the castle of Scarborough (April 25), with the object "of delivering his country from foreign tyranny," though "not to work his own advancement touching possession of the crown." The castle was retaken at once by the Earl of Westmorland, and Stafford was put to death (May 28).

Stafford, WILLIAM HOWARD, VISCOUNT (1614-80). [HOWARD.]

Stair, EARLS AND VISCOUNT OF. [DALRYMPLE.]

Stamford Bridge, THE BATTLE OF (September 25, 1066), was fought between the English, under King Harold II, and the Norwegians, led by Harold Hardrada and Tostig. The early success of the invaders at Fulford, and the submission of York, had not prepared them for the sudden advance of Harold, and they seem to have been taken unawares, as they were encamped on the banks of the Derwent, east of York. The details of the battle are completely unknown, since the narrative of the "Heimskringla" is totally untrustworthy. All that is certain is that after a hard struggle, the English gained a complete victory. Harold Hardrada and Tostig lay dead on the field, and of the Norwegian host very few escaped to their ships. The victory affords testimony to the military capabilities of Harold.

Stamp Act, THE (1765), was one of the immediate causes of the war with the American colonies. George Grenville, as chancellor of the exchequer, in 1764, asserted for the first time the right of the imperial legislature to impose taxation on the colonies; and under the act customs duties were charged upon the importation into the colonies of various foreign products. The proceeds of these duties were, on a totally new principle, to be paid into the imperial exchequer, and to be applied, under the direction of parliament, towards defraying "the necessary expenses of defending, protecting, and securing the British colonies and plantations." This act was also accompanied by a resolution, passed by the Commons, that "it may be proper to charge certain stamp duties" in America, as the foundation of future legislation. A year's delay was allowed by Grenville before passing the threatened bill, but in 1765, in spite of the unanimous protests of the American colonies, and their assertion of their constitutional right to be taxed only through their representatives, the fateful bill passed almost without opposition. It received the royal assent on March 22, and was to come into operation on November 1. The colonists, however, resisted its execution, convening a general congress at New York on November 7, and their discontent became so marked that parliament was reluctantly obliged to take notice of it. Pitt, who had been prevented by illness from being present at the discussions on the bill (January 1766), now came forward, and, insisting that taxation without representation was illegal, urged the immediate repeal of the tax, while he proposed to uphold the dignity of the mother country by asserting the general legislative authority of parliament over the colonies. From this act he expressly excepted the right of taxation, but the Crown lawyers were against him, and, in spite of the fact that Lord Rockingham was now at the head of the government, the exception was eliminated, and the bill was passed maintaining the absolute right of England to make laws for the colonies. Though defeated in this particular, Pitt carried his original proposal, and in 1766 the Stamp Act was repealed in the Commons on March 11 (by 275 to 167) and in the Lords a week later (by 105 to 71); while at the same time several of the obnoxious duties which had been imposed in 1764 were withdrawn, and others were modified.

Standard, THE BATTLE OF THE (1138), was fought near Northallerton in Yorkshire. David of Scotland invaded England on the pretext of assisting Maud against Stephen; but the hatred and dread of the Scots united all the English of the North against him. Under the authority of Thurstan, Archbishop of York, and the leadership of Raoul, Bishop of Durham, an army was collected, while, to inspire courage, the consecrated banners of St. Cuthbert of Durham, St. Peter of York, St. John of Beverley, and St. Wilfrid of Ripon were entrusted to the army. These were all suspended from one pole, like the mast of a vessel, surmounted by a cross, in the centre of which was fixed a silver casket, containing the consecrated wafer of the Holy Sacrament. The pole was fixed into a four-wheeled car, on which the bishop stood. The Scots were completely routed, and fled in disorder.

Standing Orders are orders drawn up by the Houses of Parliament for the regulation of its conduct and proceedings. They continue in force from one parliament to another, until they are repealed or suspended.

Stane Street was the name of two Roman roads, (1) in Sussex, running from Chichester, by way of Bignor Hill, Haulnaker Down, Pulborough, Billingshurst, Dorking, and Epsom, to London, (2) in Essex, branching from Ermine Street (q.v.) near Braughing, and proceeding through Bishop's Stortford to Dunmow and Marks Tey, where it joined the London-Colchester road. [ROMAN ROADS.]

Stanhope, CHARLES, 3RD EARL STANHOPE (1753-1816), took a prominent part in politics, until his extreme partisanship of the French Revolution lost him all influence. His advocacy of Republicanism often left him single in a minority in the House of Lords. He succeeded to the peerage in 1786, and won notoriety by his attack on Pitt's sinking fund, his chairmanship of the Revolutionary Society (founded in 1788), the firing of his house by a mob in 1794 after his motion to recognize the French Republic, and his construction of calculating machines (1777).

Biography by Ghita Stanhope, 1914.

Stanhope, Lady Hester Lucy (1776-1839), eldest daughter of Charles, 3rd Earl Stanhope, and niece of William Pitt, is remembered for her life in the East. She left England for the Levant in 1810, and settled on the slopes of Mount Lebanon in 1814. From her castle-mansion at Dahar-Jûne she intrigued against British consuls and Ibrahim Pasha, and endeavoured to firm the central authority of Sultan Mahmud II. Her fearlessness secured for her almost despotic power in the neighbourhood, and she won the reputation of a prophetess.

Meryon, "Memoirs of Lady Hester Stanhope," 1845; A. W. Kinglake, "Eöthen," ch. viii; biographies by Paulc Bordeaux, 1924; P. Descoux, 1901; Catherine L. W. Primrose, 1897 and 1914; Julia Roundell, 1909.

Stanhope, James, 1st Earl (1673-1721), in 1695 served as a volunteer in Flanders, and was given a colonel's commission by William III. In Anne's first parliament he sat as member for Newport (I. of W.) and Cockermouth. He was made brigadier-general in 1704. At the siege of Barcelona he was second in command to Peterborough (1705), and afterwards returned to England. In 1708 he brought forward a bill for the dissolution of the Highland clans; but as the danger of a Jacobite invasion passed away, the bill was dropped. In the same year he was appointed commander in Catalonia [SPANISH SUCCESSION, WAR OF]. Unsuccessful on the mainland, he took Port Mahon in Minorca, and in 1710 advanced on Aragon. The Spaniards were utterly defeated at Almenara, and again at Saragossa. Madrid was occupied, but Stanhope was caught, defeated, and taken prisoner by Vendôme at Brihuega (December 9). He was ransomed in 1712, and became on his return leader of the Whig opposition. Owing to his firmness, no attempt at rebellion was made by the Jacobites on the death of Anne. He was prepared, if necessary, to seize the Tower. On the accession of George I he became secretary of state, and was dispatched to Vienna to persuade the emperor to agree to the Barrier Treaty (q.v.). His vigorous measures checked a serious outbreak in England during the rebellion of 1716. He went with George to Hanover (1716), and began negotiations with the Abbé Dubois for the establishment of friendly relations with the regent of France. The result was the triple alliance between Great Britain, France, and Holland (1717). On the retirement of Walpole and Townshend from the ministry in April, Stanhope became first lord of the treasury and chancellor of the exchequer until March 1718, when he was removed from the treasury and became secretary of state for the Southern department. At home he succeeded in repealing the Schism Act (q.v.), but his Peerage Bill (q.v.) was thrown out by large majorities in the Lower House (1719). In 1720 came the downfall of the South Sea scheme. [SOUTH SEA COMPANY.] Stanhope had no share in the speculation; and even proposed that ministers who had received bribes from the company should be accounted guilty of "notorious and dangerous corruption." During the examination of the directors the young Duke of Wharton directed a violent attack against the administration, especially against Stanhope himself. He rose to reply; but his passion brought a rush of blood to his head, which next day proved fatal (February 4, 1721).

Stanhope, Philip Dormer, 4th Earl of Chesterfield (1694-1773), was educated at Trinity Hall, Cambridge. After the accession of George I he was made gentleman of the bedchamber to the Prince of Wales. He sat as M.P. for St. Germans in 1715. The division between the Prince of Wales and the court soon drove him into opposition in spite of the entreaties of General Stanhope, and he joined the discontented Whigs. [WALPOLE, SIR ROBERT.] He had great expectations from George II on his accession (1727); but had the misfortune to offend Queen Caroline. The death of his father a year previously removed him to the Upper House. In 1728 he was sent as ambassador to The Hague, and on his return was made high steward of the household, but was dismissed in 1733 by Walpole for his opposition to the excise scheme. Forthwith he became a prominent member of the opposition, and in 1737 made a magnificent speech against the Playhouse Bill (q.v.). In 1741 he went abroad; and at Avignon met Ormonde, with whom it is said he attempted to concert measures for a Jacobite combination against Walpole. He was excluded from office under Pelham's administration; and continued in opposition, directing his attacks especially against the employment of Hanoverian troops, and the foreign policy of Carteret. At length, in 1744, the king's repugnance was so far overcome that he was made lord-lieutenant of Ireland. His administration of this office deserves the highest praise, and his firm government checked any tendency there might be to imitate the example of the Scottish rebels in 1745. In 1745 he was again sent to Holland, where his negotiations induced the Dutch to send troops to the campaign which terminated in the battle of Fontenoy. In 1746 he became secretary of state. He aimed at governing the king through the latter's mistress, Lady Yarmouth, but finding he could make no progress in bringing about a peace, he resigned in 1748. He still continued to speak, and in 1751 proposed and carried out the reformation of the calendar (q.v.). In 1752 he lost his hearing. In 1757 he was asked to negotiate between Pitt and Newcastle during the intrigues which led to the formation of that great ministry known by their names. In 1768 his natural son, Philip, the object of the greatest care and affection on his part, and to whom he had addressed his famous "Letters to his Son" on which his literary fame largely rests, died, and from that time Chesterfield's life was desolate and cheerless. "Chesterfield was," says his biographer, Dr. Maty, "a nobleman unequalled in his time for variety of talents, brilliancy of wit, and elegance of conversation." Lord Stanhope, referring to his political career, says that "diplomacy was especially suited to his taste and talents. At home, his career, though never inspired by a high and pervading patriotism, deserves the praise of humane, liberal, and far-sighted policy. His defects were a want of generosity, dissimulation carried beyond justifiable bounds . . . and a looseness of religious principle."

Stanhope, WILLIAM, 1ST EARL OF HARRINGTON (1690?-1756), was sent as ambassador to Spain in 1717, and two years later went on a mission to the French army. He was plenipotentiary at the Congress of Soissons (1728). In 1729 he was again dispatched to Spain, where he concluded the Treaty of Seville (q.v.). He was immediately created Lord Harrington, and shortly afterwards became secretary of state. He consistently supported Walpole for many years, but in 1738 he joined the opposition and warmly advocated war with Spain. In 1742 he was created an earl, and lord president of the council, but on the resignation of Lord Granville he again became secretary of state. In 1746 he resigned in pique against George II, and was transferred to the lieutenantancy of Ireland, which appointment he resigned in 1751.

Stanley, EDWARD, 3RD EARL OF DERBY (1508-72), on the death of Edward VI, declared in favour of Mary, and by his example aided materially in preventing any recognition of Lady Jane Grey by the country at large. He filled the office of lord high steward at Mary's coronation, and subsequently did all he could to prevent the queen's marriage with Philip of Spain. Under Elizabeth, Lord Derby's religion prevented him from finding any great favour at court; but in spite of strenuous efforts made by the Catholic peers to entice him into taking an active part in the Northern rebellion of 1569, he refused to implicate himself.

Derby's "Correspondence," 1890.

entered parliament in 1822 as member for Stockbridge. He made his first speech, after two years' silent voting, in favour of a private bill for lighting Manchester with gas, and its ability was noticed by Sir James Mackintosh. In 1827 he took office under Canning as under-secretary for the colonies. On the death of Canning, Stanley retained his office under Goderich, but refused to serve under Wellington in 1828. He was a strenuous advocate of Catholic emancipation, parliamentary reform, reciprocity in free trade, with a moderate fixed duty on corn, and the foreign policy of Canning. Therefore, from 1828 to 1830 he remained in opposition. He then took office under Lord Grey as chief secretary for Ireland. Stanley was quite as earnest as Lord John Russell himself, and much more vehement, in his advocacy of the Reform Bill. The state of Ireland was full of danger. The triumph in the matter of Catholic emancipation, and many grievances, real or fancied, had incited the people to attempt an agitation for repeal of the Union, and every kind of outrage was rife. It fell to Stanley's lot to introduce a Coercion Act in this emergency, and, as a consequence of this, he became very unpopular in Ireland, and was frequently embroiled with Daniel O'Connell. In May 1833 Stanley was charged with the duty of bringing forward the measure for the emancipation of the slaves, and made a speech of remarkable eloquence. In 1834, being now by courtesy Lord Stanley, he separated himself from the Whigs on the question of the Irish Church, and with Sir James Graham, the Duke of Richmond, and some others, formed the intermediate party known as the "Derby Dilly" (q.v.). He rejected the overtures made to him by Sir Robert Peel in 1834, but accepted them in 1841, and took office as secretary of state for the colonies. But on the question of free trade in 1846 Stanley separated from Peel, and was installed, by the advice of Wellington, in the leadership of the Tory party, with Lord George Bentinck and Disraeli as his lieutenants.

In 1852 he held office for ten months, but by the end of the year had to give way to the coalition ministry of Lord Aberdeen. In 1858, being prime minister again, he succeeded in passing his India Bill, but was defeated on the question of parliamentary reform. An appeal to the country was ineffectual, and he resigned office in June 1859. In 1866 his party succeeded in defeating Lord Russell's new Reform Bill, but only to pass next year a similar one, which its opponents declared to be of a still more sweeping character. Early in 1868 Lord Derby surrendered the leadership of his party into the hands of Disraeli, and retired into private life. He died on October 23, 1869. From 1852 to his death he was chancellor of the University of Oxford. He was a man of cultured taste, and a good Greek scholar, and in 1864 published a blank-verse translation of the Iliad, which attracted a considerable amount of notice at the time. Lord Derby's speeches were greatly admired for their eloquence and fire, and he is often referred to as the "Rupert of Debate."

Biography by G. E. B. Saintsbury, 1892 and 1906.

Stanley, EDWARD GEORGE VILLIERS, 17TH EARL OF DERBY (b. 1865), son of Frederick Arthur, 16th earl, was M.P. for the West Houghton division of Lancashire from 1892 to 1906, financial secretary to the war office from 1900 to 1903, and postmaster-general from 1903 to 1905. He is best known for the Derby Scheme of voluntary military service which he devised in 1915, during the Great War, while director of recruiting. He subsequently became secretary for war 1916-18 and 1922-4, and was British ambassador in Paris 1918-20.

Stanley, EDWARD HENRY, 15TH EARL OF DERBY (1826-93), son of Edward, 14th earl, entered parliament in 1848 for King's Lynn, and became under-secretary for foreign affairs in his father's first ministry. In Lord Derby's second administration, in 1858-9, he was secretary for India, and managed the transfer of the government from the directors of the East India Company to the Crown. He was secretary for foreign affairs in 1866, and succeeded to his peerage in 1869. In 1874 he was secretary for foreign affairs in Disraeli's cabinet, but resigned simultaneously with the Earl of Carnarvon, the colonial secretary, owing to differences with his colleagues on the Eastern question in 1878. In 1880 he abandoned the Conservatives, and in 1882 joined Gladstone's ministry as colonial secretary. In 1886 he parted company with Gladstone on the Home Rule question, and became one of the leaders of the Liberal Unionists.

Stanley, EDWARD SMITH, 13TH EARL OF DERBY (1775-1851), was first returned to parliament in 1796 as Whig member for Preston. In 1812 he was elected for Lancashire, which he continued to represent till the changes effected by the Reform Bill. In 1832 he was called to the House of Lords, by the title of Baron Stanley of Bickerstaffe, to strengthen the Whig ministry. In 1834, on his father's death, he succeeded to the earldom of Derby.

Stanley, FERDINANDO, 5TH EARL OF DERBY (d. 1594), was the grandson of Eleanor, Countess of Cumberland, who was herself the granddaughter of Henry VII, through his daughter Mary, the wife of Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk. The Jesuits, upon his succession to the title, urged him, through an agent named Hosketh, to assume the title of King of England; but the earl revealed the plot to the government, and was poisoned for his loyalty by the conspirators.

Stanley, JAMES, 7TH EARL OF DERBY, (1607-51), at the outbreak of the Civil War was appointed by the king lord-lieutenant of Cheshire and Derbyshire, as he was then generally believed to have a great influence upon the people of those two counties. He is said to have shed the first blood of the Civil War in a skirmish at Manchester, July 15, 1642. But his influence was overrated, and his ability was apparently insufficient for the post he held: he was distrusted by the king, and not supported by the people. In spite of several successes, he was forced to abandon the struggle and retire to the Isle of Man. Lathom House was heroically defended by his countess, Charlotte, till December 1643. In 1651 he joined Charles II on his march into England, but whilst endeavouring to raise Lancashire, was surprised and defeated by Robert Lilburn at Wigan. He himself escaped, and took part in the battle of Worcester; but was taken prisoner, tried by court-martial, condemned to death, and beheaded at Bolton, October 15, 1651. The countess continued to hold the Isle of Man till it was reduced by Fairfax in November 1651. "He was a man," says Clarendon, "of great honour and clear courage, and all his defects and misfortunes proceeded from his having lived so little time amongst his equals that he knew not how to treat his inferiors."

Biography by J. G. Cummings, 1867; F. S. Hampson, "Execution of James Stanley, 7th Earl of Derby," 1909.

Stanley, THOMAS, 1ST EARL OF DERBY and 2ND BARON STANLEY (d. 1504), was a nobleman who played a prominent part during the reigns of Edward IV, Richard III, and Henry VII. He married Warwick's sister Eleanor, and gained Edward IV's favour, which he retained in spite of his temporary support of the Lancastrian cause in 1471. In Edward's pretended war upon France (1475), in support of Charles the Bold, Stanley was the ready recipient of the bribes of the French king, and it was in a great measure in consequence of his counsel thus inspired that Edward IV became a party to the Treaty of Pecquigny (q.v.), September 13, 1475. During the brief reign of Edward V Lord Stanley figured as a loyal upholder of the rights of his young sovereign, and was one of the nobles arrested at the council board in Richard of Gloucester's coup d'état of June 13, 1483. Gloucester, however, not only forbore proceeding to extremities with him, but sought to secure his service by conferring upon him the high office of constable of England after the fall of Buckingham. On the death of his first wife, Eleanor Neville, Lord Stanley married Margaret Beaufort, mother of Henry Tudor, Earl of Richmond. On the landing of Henry Tudor at Milford Haven, Lord Stanley, on a plea of illness, refused to join Richard, and was only kept from following the example of his brother, Sir William Stanley, who had openly united with the invader, by the fact of his son, Lord Strange, being detained in Richard's hands as a security for his father's good faith. He still, however, kept in the neighbourhood of the invaders with a force of some 5,000 men; and although it was his brother's intervention on Richmond's side in the heat of the battle that decided the day, it was Sir Thomas who placed Richard's crown upon the head of Henry of Richmond. At the coronation of his stepson, Henry VII, at which he officiated as high constable, he was raised to the dignity of Earl of Derby; and apparently continued in friendly relations with Henry VII until his death.

Stanley, SIR WILLIAM (d. 1495), was the brother of Henry VII's stepfather, justiciar of North Wales, under Richard III, and the nobleman to whose treacherous conduct Henry Tudor's victory at Bosworth Field was chiefly due. In consideration of his important services on this occasion, Henry made him lord chamberlain, and one of his counsellors. Stanley, however, was not satisfied. His continued demands alienated the king, for whom Stanley conceived a growing dislike. He became involved in some way with the affair of Perkin Warbeck. On the evidence of the king's spy, Sir Robert Clifford, he was suddenly arrested on a charge of treason, and after the merest semblance of a trial, was condemned and executed on that charge (February 16, 1495).

Stanley, SIR WILLIAM (1548-1630), who had been employed for some time in Ireland, was in 1585 recalled and sent to the Low Countries, where he became governor of Deventer. He was a traitor to Elizabeth, and a friend of the Jesuits, and is supposed to have been privy to Babington's conspiracy (q.v.). After the discovery of the plot, Sir William accomplished a long-meditated piece of treachery, and surrendered Deventer to the Spaniards, himself entering Philip's service with 1,300 men (January 1587). Guy Fawkes was his subaltern officer.

Stannary Courts, THE, were the courts of the administration of justice among the tinnors of Cornwall and Devonshire, held before the lord warden and his steward. The privilege of the tin-workers to be subject to the jurisdiction of these courts only was confirmed by a charter in 1305, and by a statute in 1377, pleas of life, land, and member excepted. There was no appeal to Westminster, but to the council of the Duke of Cornwall after reference to the warden in person. These courts became the engines of an arbitrary prerogative which robbed the mining districts of the west of the benefit of the common law. The Stuarts largely availed themselves of them; and in consequence of the complaints made, the Long Parliament (16 Car. I. c. 15) passed an explanatory and regulating act concerning them, at the same time that it abolished some analogous special jurisdiction. Since that date the proceedings of the Stannaries Courts have ceased to possess any great historical importance.

Stapledon, WALTER DE (d. 1326), was made Bishop of Exeter in 1307, and in 1320 lord high treasurer. He sided with Edward II against Isabella and Mortimer, and soon after the landing of the latter in England he was seized by the citizens of London, and barbarously murdered. This tenure of the treasurership was marked by a series of important exchequer reforms, which form part of the general attempt to rehabilitate the royal authority after the defeat of the Ordainers and the death of Thomas of Lancaster.

Staples, or Marts, for the sale of the chief commodities of England, viz., wool, woofels (skins), leather, lead, and tin, were established in certain places by Edward I and Edward II. They were continuous marts, the principle of which was to "regulate the stream of commerce and force it into definite channels . . . to facilitate the collection of the customs revenue." The foreign staple was fixed first at Antwerp and then at St. Omer; Edward I established staples in England at Newcastle, Hull, Boston, Yarmouth, Ipswich, London, Sandwich, Southampton and Bristol (1297). Edward II issued in 1313 the Ordinance of the Staple, ordering the setting up of a fixed staple for wool. No home staple was set up, however, until the Ordinance of 1326 appointed 14 places—8 in England, 3 in Ireland and 3 in Wales—at the instigation of Hugh le Despenser. When the English took Calais a staple was set up there (1348) which, on the loss of Calais in 1558, was moved to Bruges. After some changes the staple system was established in 1353 by another Ordinance. The ten English staple towns are enumerated, Dublin, Waterford, Cork, and Drogheda being fixed on for Ireland, and Carmarthen and other places for Wales; the ancient customs payable on staple goods are recited; all merchants, save merchants of the staple, are forbidden to buy or export these goods, and arrangements are made for the government of each staple by its own mayor and constables. The appointment of staple towns was a measure of considerable importance. As a matter of administration it facilitated the collection of the customs. Constitutionally, it bore on the relative rights of the Crown and the parliament as regards taxation. Possessing exclusive privileges, and under the special protection of the Crown, the merchants formed a body apart from the estates of the realm, and the king negotiated with them separately. Commercially, the staples were of importance as ensuring the quality of English exports, for at the staple ports the officers viewed and marked the goods of the merchants. From the jurisdiction of the courts of the staples arose a species of estate defeasible on condition subsequent, called statute staple of the same nature as that founded on the statute, De Mercatoribus, 13 Edw. I, being a security for debt whereby not only the person and goods of the debtor might be taken, but his lands might be delivered to the creditor until out of the profits the debt should be satisfied. "So much more readily did the feudal restraints on alienation yield to considerations of a commercial kind than to any others" (Stephen's "Blackstone," i, 317). This security, originally granted only to traders, was extended as a recognizance in the nature of a statute staple to all subjects by 23 Hen.

VIII, c. 6. Such securities have been superseded by the law of bankruptcy.

Star Chamber, THE. It was at one time usual to trace the origin of this court—of such great constitutional importance in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries—to the famous statute of 3 Henry VII, c. 1, which, after reciting the evils caused by maintenance, and the giving of liveries, by the abuse of the power of the sheriffs, by the bribery of jurors, and by the riots and unlawful assemblies which prevented the administration of justice, empowered the chancellor, treasurer, and keeper of the privy seal, or any two of them, with a bishop and temporal lord of the council, and the chief justices of the King's Bench and Common Pleas, or two other justices in their absence, to call before them persons offending in the above-mentioned respects, and to inflict such punishments, not extending to death, as might be imposed were they convicted in the ordinary course of law. It has been generally recognized, however, that the jurisdiction exercised under the Tudors by the Court of Star Chamber was not new, and that the most the statute accomplished was to give parliamentary recognition to powers long claimed and exercised under the Tudors by the council, while at the same time limiting their exercise to what has been described as a committee or specialized aspect of that body. The council had long been accustomed to meet in the Star Chamber, but now the term Star Chamber began to be particularly applied to the new court which, according to the commonly-accepted theory, had separated from the council as a result of the act of 1487. The fact that the Court of Star Chamber, as it emerges in the later Tudor and Stuart periods, bears little resemblance either in composition or powers to the tribunal of Henry VII's statute discourages an unqualified acceptance of the traditional views of its origin. In the reigns of James I and Charles I its jurisdiction included "most misdemeanours of an aggravated nature, such as disturbances of the public peace, assaults accompanied by serious violence, conspiracies and libels. Besides these every misdemeanour came within the proper scope of its inquiry, those specially of public importance, and for which the law provided no sufficient punishment." At the same time the limitations of the statute as to judges were disregarded, since any member of the privy council was allowed to sit. This divergence between the actual and what were accepted as the statutory powers of the court was regarded in the seventeenth century as the result of usurpation, and was made one of the chief grounds for its abolition by the Long Parliament. Within recent years, however, the origins of the Star Chamber have been the subject of careful investigation, and the original relation between the statute of 3 Henry VII and the court supposedly derived from it has been called in question. Professor Pollard has suggested a new explanation of the discrepancy between the theoretical and the actual Star Chamber. He boldly maintains that the act of 1487, so far from creating either the court or its jurisdiction, had no concern with either. The tribunal it established was, he contends, designed to deal with special problems of a temporary nature, and had only a transitory existence. For this view he finds negative evidence in the fact that the words "Star Chamber" do not once occur in the act itself and that the title "pro Camera Stellata" is obviously a much later addition to the roll. The Court of Star Chamber of the later Tudor and the Stuart reigns he prefers to regard not as the creation of any specific enactment, or even as an outcome of that tendency to differentiation and devolution which marked the growth of the Tudor conciliar system; but rather as the residuum which remained after that differentiation had taken place. He sees in it the direct lineal descendant of the old undifferentiated royal council of the Middle Ages, exercising such of its ancient functions (mainly judicial in character) as had not been assigned to the numerous courts and councils which had branched off from the parent stem in the course of the sixteenth century. "The mediæval king's council," he says, "continued its existence under the Elizabethan disguise of the Court of Star Chamber," while its former political power passed to its offspring, the Tudor privy council. If a parliamentary sanction for its jurisdiction be needed it can, he avers, be found in the repeated delegation to the council in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries of statutory authority to hear and determine cases with which parliament had not itself leisure to deal.

It can scarcely be doubted that during a great part at any rate of the Tudor period the power of the court was beneficially exercised. "It is the effect of this court," says Sir Thomas Smith in his treatise on the "Commonwealth of England" written early in the reign of Elizabeth, "to bridle such stout noblemen or gentlemen who would offer wrong by force to any manner of men, and cannot be content to demand or defend the right by order of the law." It was able to provide equitable remedies for cases which could not be fairly dealt with by the ordinary law courts, and its procedure, whereby juries were dispensed with and the accused was examined upon oath, undoubtedly had its advantages in the days when maintenance and bribery were still rife. But its powers were such as to be liable to grave abuse, and in the later period of its history it became an instrument of tyranny. Juries were summoned before it for verdicts disagreeable to the government, and were fined or imprisoned, so that although the Star Chamber could not itself condemn to death, the fear of its displeasure made juries pliant to its will. It imposed ruinous fines (though in many cases they were remitted), and began in the later Tudor period to sentence to the pillory, whipping, and cutting off of ears. Under James I and Charles I it became the chief weapon of defence used by the government against its assailants and a court of politicians.

The punishments inflicted by it in such cases as those of Prynne (q.v.), Burton (q.v.), and Bastwick (q.v.) excited general indignation, and the Long Parliament proceeded to its abolition by the famous act of July 1641. A committee of the Lords in 1661 reported "that it was fit for the good of the nation that there be a court of like nature to the Star Chamber," but the government did not venture to submit a bill to that effect to the Commons. The restoration of the monarchy was unaccompanied by a restoration of the Prerogative Courts.

State Trials, THE. Collections of trials for treason and others of political interest have been made and published under the designation of "State Trials." They are often invaluable sources of historical information, especially in the seventeenth century. The earliest collection was in six volumes folio, published early in the eighteenth century. T. B. Howell's edition in thirty-four volumes with index includes all up to 1820. (Vols. 1-10, covering the period 1163-1685, were edited by Cobbett and published 1809-11; Howell's work (vols. 11-34) covers the period 1685-1820, and was published 1811-26.) A useful series of selections from the State Trials was issued from the Cambridge Press under the editorship of Mr. Willis Bund in 1880.

Statutes may be defined as written laws, established by the sovereign, with the advice and assent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and of the Commons in parliament assembled. Our legislation, however, did not take this form for a long time. The edicts, or assizes of Henry II, are declarations of methods of procedure rather than enactments, and most of the legislative work of Edward I was done without the co-operation of the Commons. The declaration of Edward II in 1322, that matters touching the state of the king, the kingdom, and people should be established in parliament by the king with the assent of the prelates, earls, barons, and the commonalty, forms an era in the history of our legislation. Nevertheless, the author of the "Mirror," writing in this reign, declares that ordinances made by the king and his clerks, by aliens and others, took the place of laws established by parliament, and for a long time our kings constantly neglected to gain the full concurrence of the three estates, legislating by ordinances or temporary regulations put forth by the council rather than by statute. So long also as statutes were founded simply on petition, it sometimes happened that one estate only gained a statute, and more often that the statutes which were drawn after the parliament had broken up, and which purported to be answers to the petitions presented, were more or less contrary to them. To obviate this, the Commons in the reign of Henry V demanded and obtained that the judges should frame the statutes before the end of each parliament. In the next reign the present system of making statutes by act of parliament was introduced. Statutes are written laws; yet such laws as were made before legal memory—i.e., the beginning of the reign of Richard I—though written, form part of our lex non scripta. Some written statutes also are extant that are not of record, being contained only in chronicles and memories, yet even though a statute be not of record, it is still part of the written law if it is within legal memory. The earliest statute of record is 6 Edward I, called the Statute of Gloucester. The first statute in the printed collection is the Great Charter, 9 Hen. III, as confirmed and entered on the statute roll of 25 Edward I. The statutes from the Great Charter to the end of Edward II are said to be incerti temporis, and are called antiqua, while all those that follow are called nova statuta. A statute takes effect from the moment that it has received the royal assent, unless some special time is expressed in the statute itself. Among the rules to be observed in interpreting statutes, it may be noted that a statute is to be interpreted not by the letter, but according to the spirit and intention with which it was made: and so judges, whose business it is to interpret statutes, sometimes depart from the mere words; that remedial statutes are to be interpreted in a wider, penal in a narrower fashion; and that though it was formerly held that if a statute repealing an earlier one was itself repealed, the earlier statute was thereby revived; since 13 & 14 Vict. c. 21, this is no longer the rule. Statutes have been named in different ways at different times, being called sometimes by the name of the place where they were made, as the Statute of Merton, sometimes by their subject, as "De Donis Conditionalibus"; and sometimes by their first words, as "Quia Emptores" (q.v.). They are now described by the year of the king's reign in which they were made, with the chapter, and when two sessions have been held in one year, with the statute denoting the session in which it was enacted, as 1 William & Mary, st. 2, c. 2 (the Bill of Rights). Statutes are now divided into Public General Acts; Local and Personal Acts, declared Public; Private Acts printed and Private Acts not printed. At first the usual language of our statutes was Latin, but as early as the reign of Edward I we find French also occasionally used, and it had become the normal language of legislation by the reign of Henry VI. Some of the statutes of Henry VI and Edward IV are in English; but Henry VII is the first king whose statutes are all expressed in our own tongue.

Steele, SIR RICHARD (1672-1729), was born in Dublin. At Oxford he became acquainted with Addison, and when, after failing there and in the army, he aspired to a literary career, Addison secured him introductions to the Whig leaders, on whose behalf he soon distinguished himself. In 1709 he entered parliament, but his pamphlets, "The Crisis" and "The Englishman," led to his expulsion by the Tory majority. After the accession of George I he was knighted, elected a member of parliament, and wrote numerous political pamphlets. He quarrelled with his party about the Peerage Bill of 1719 (q.v.), and, not succeeding in his literary and stock-jobbing projects, retired to Carmarthen, his wife's home, where he died. Of his literary eminence there is no need to speak here. As a political writer Steele was one of the boldest and most sagacious of the Whigs, and at the same time he was, in a great degree, free from the narrowness which came over some of the "old Whigs" in George I's reign. His political pamphlets are among the most important contributions to the controversial literature of the period. The Tatler first appeared on April 12, 1709, and ended on January 2, 1711. The Spectator began on March 1, 1710, and ran to 555 numbers.

Biography by G. Aitken, 1889.

Steenie was the pet name given by James I to his favourite, George Villiers, 1st Duke of Buckingham (q.v.).

Steinkirk, THE BATTLE OF (August 3, 1692), was fought between William III and the French soon after the naval victory of La Hogue. The French had taken Namur. On the frontier of Brabant Marshal Luxembourg was left to oppose William, whose head-quarters were at Lambeque; Luxembourg's were about six miles off at Steinkirk, while still farther off lay a large force under Marshal Boufflers. The country between the armies was exceedingly difficult. A spy in the English army had habitually informed Luxembourg of the movements of the allies. His correspondence was discovered, and with pistol at his breast he was forced to write false information dictated by William. The French commander was thrown off his guard. The whole of the allied army marched down upon him in the night, but the progress of William's forces was obstructed by several fences and ditches, and Luxembourg was able to get his troops into order. Meanwhile, Boufflers was coming up. Mackay's division was the first to engage. The enemy were attacked and routed. It was determined to send Louis XIV's household troops against the English, who, after a bloody struggle, were borne down. Count

Solmes refused to bring up his infantry to their support, and the division was nearly destroyed. The French loss was about 7,000, and that of the allies was not much greater. The English army and the English nation loudly expressed their resentment against Solmes.

Stephen, KING (b. c. 1094, r. 1135-54), was the third son of Stephen, Count of Blois, and Adela, daughter of William the Conqueror. He was brought up at the court of his uncle Henry I, from whom he received in marriage Matilda or Maud of Boulogne, niece of the queen. He took the oath of fealty to his cousin the Empress Maud, but immediately on the death of Henry I he caused himself to be proclaimed king. The dislike of Maud's husband, Geoffrey of Anjou, contributed in great measure to Stephen's success, and at first he met with no opposition. But his misgovernment and his conduct towards the Church and the officials of the administration rapidly alienated his friends, and in 1138 the empress invaded England in company with her brother, Robert of Gloucester. From 1138 to 1145 was a period of complete anarchy, sometimes one, sometimes the other party gaining the upper hand. Every lord of a castle acted as king in his own domain. The fearful effects of feudal government were for the first and last time fully exemplified in England. In 1147 Robert of Gloucester died, and in 1148 the empress retired to Normandy leaving Stephen master of England. But in 1153 her son Henry landed in England, and the war was renewed. A treaty was made at Wallingford (q.v.) by which Stephen was to retain the crown during his lifetime, when it was to pass to Henry. In the next year Stephen died at Dover Priory on October 25. By his marriage with Matilda, Stephen had three sons and two daughters—Eustace, his intended heir, who died in 1153; William, who received the patrimonial estate and the earldom of Surrey, and died in the service of Henry II at the siege of Toulouse in 1160; Mary, who became a nun, but leaving her convent married Matthew of Flanders; Baldwin and Maud, who died young. Stephen possessed bravery, generosity, and the other simple virtues of a soldier; but his position required him to be false, and no man trusted him, knowing that he could trust no one. He was quite commonplace, and might have been more successful if more unscrupulous or less honest. A terrible picture of the anarchy of Stephen's reign is drawn by the English chronicler. "When the traitors [i.e., the barons] perceived that he was a mild man, and soft and good, and did no justice, then did they all wonder . . . every powerful man made his castles, and held them against him. They cruelly oppressed the wretched men of the land with castle-works. When the castles were made, they filled them with devils and evil men. Then they took those men that they thought had any property, both by night and by day, peasant men and women, and put them in prison for their gold and silver, and tortured them with unutterable tortures . . . Many thousand they killed with hunger ; I cannot and may not tell all the wounds or all the tortures which they inflicted on wretched men in this land, and that lasted the nineteen years while Stephen was king ; and ever it was worse and worse. They laid imposts on the towns continually, and when the wretched men had no more to give they robbed and burned all the towns, so that thou mightest well go all a day's journey, and thou shouldest never find a man sitting in a town, or the land tilled . . . Never yet had more wretchedness been in the land, nor did heathen men ever do worse than they did . . . The bishops and the clergy constantly cursed them, but nothing came of it ; for they were all accursed and forsworn, and forlorn. However a man tilled, the earth bare no corn, for the land was all fordone by such deeds ; and they said openly that Christ and his saints slept."

Steward, THE LORD HIGH, was in origin an official of the household of the Norman kings. The office became hereditary in the house of Leicester, and later in that of Lancaster ; and was inherited by Henry IV, and so absorbed into the royal dignity. Since that date it has only been conferred for some special occasion, and the office ceases when the business which required it is ended. Such occasions are the coronation of the king or queen, in connexion with which the steward had certain ceremonial functions to perform. Formerly part of his duties consisted in presiding over the Court of Claims, which heard cases connected with the performance of coronation services ; but this function is now discharged by commissioners. More important is his relation to the question of the trial of peers. In 1397 John of Gaunt, as lord high steward, presided in parliament at the trial of the Earl of Arundel and the other appellant lords ; and in the fifteenth century it became the custom, when the hereditary stewardship had disappeared, to appoint a steward pro hac vice to preside at the trial of a peer when parliament was sitting, or to preside over a special court assembled for the purpose when parliament was not in session.

Stewart, ALEXANDER, EARL OF BUCHAN, "the Wolf of Badenoch" (d. 1405 ?), was the brother of Robert II of Scotland, and lord of Badenoch, Buchan, and Ross. He was governor of the northern part of Scotland, where in 1390 he ravaged the lands of the bishops of Moray and Ross, who had censured him for deserting his wife, and burned Elgin cathedral.

Stewart, ALEXANDER, EARL OF MAR (d. 1435), the natural son of Alexander, Earl of Buchan, surnamed "the Wolf of Badenoch," was in his youth a sort of Highland robber. In 1404 he seized and carried off Isabella, Countess of Mar, whose husband he had caused to be slain in the previous year ; having married her, he became Earl of Mar, and in that capacity led the royal troops to victory over the men of the Western Isles at Harlaw (q.v.), 1411. In 1431 he was defeated at Inverlochy by a Highland force under Donald Balloch.

Stewart, FRANCIS, 2ND EARL OF BOTHWELL, the son of John Stewart, prior of Coldingham (an illegitimate son of James V and Lady Jane Hepburn, sister of the 1st Earl of Bothwell), was a favourite of James VI, by whom he was created Earl of Bothwell, 1587. His life was a series of rebellions against the king, whom he attempted to seize at Holyrood, 1592—an attempt which was frustrated by the citizens of Edinburgh. The same year he made another unsuccessful attack on the king at Falkland ; and in 1593 suddenly appeared at Holyrood, at the head of an armed band, to ask pardon, as he said, for his treason. In 1594 he again attacked Edinburgh, but was beaten off by the citizens. From this time his power was broken, and he was forced to quit the country.

Stewart, JAMES, EARL OF MORAY (1531 ?-1570), Regent of Scotland, was the illegitimate son of James V, and the half-brother of Mary, Queen of Scots. In 1562 he married a daughter of William, earl marischal, and was created Earl of Mar, a title which he soon changed for that of Moray. Vehemently opposed to his sister's marriage with Darnley, he headed the combination of lords against the queen and her wretched husband. In 1567, shortly after the murder of Darnley, he was appointed regent on the abdication of his sister. After an interview with the queen in Lochleven Castle, Moray set himself vigorously to the task of governing Scotland. On Mary's escape (1568) he hastily collected a body of troops, and defeated her at Langside. He was one of the commissioners for James VI at York in 1568. His implacable enemies the Hamiltons formed a combination against him, and measures were freely canvassed for bringing back Mary and ousting him. Moray seized the chief conspirators, and was then obliged to devote his attention to quieting the border. On January 21, 1570, he was assassinated by James Hamilton of Bothwellhaugh. Stewart, JOHN, EARL OF BUCHAN (d. 1424), the second son of Robert, Duke of Albany, led a Scottish army of about 7,000 men to France, to aid Charles VI against the English. After winning the battle of Beaugé (q.v.) he was created constable of France and Count of Aubigny. He was slain at Verneuil, 1424.

Stewart, JOHN, EARL OF MAR (d. 1479 ?), was a brother of Alexander, Duke of Albany, and James III. He is described as "comelie in all his behavioures," and as a bold warrior and skilful politician. His popularity aroused the jealousy of Cochrane, the favourite of James III, at whose instance he was arrested and imprisoned at Craigmillar Castle. He is said to have been murdered by Cochrane's orders (1479 ?).

Stewart, JOHN, 1ST EARL OF TRAQUAIR (1599–1659), son of John Stewart of Traquair, was a great favourite of Charles I, who created him an earl in 1633, and in 1636 made him lord high treasurer of Scotland, and in 1639 high commissioner. In 1641 Traquair, who had made enemies, was found guilty of high treason, but pardoned by Charles, who was convinced of his loyalty. In 1648 he fought at the battle of Preston, where he was taken prisoner, and confined in Warwick Castle for four years by command of the Parliament.

Stewart, ROBERT, VISCOUNT CASTLE-REAGH AND 2ND MARQUIS OF LONDONDERRY (1769–1822), second son of Robert, 1st Marquis of Londonderry, was born in Ireland and educated at Armagh and St. John's College, Cambridge. On coming of age he stood for County Down (at a ruinous cost of £60,000) and was returned to parliament on the strength of a pledge to support the claims of the Catholics for representation. He made his maiden speech on behalf of Ireland's right to trade with India despite the company's monopoly. The Whigs welcomed him as a valuable addition to their party, but on the recall of Lord Fitzwilliam he supported the government's coercive measures in Ireland. In reward he was appointed chief secretary for Ireland in 1798, and vigorously advocated the policy of Union. After the Union he sat in the united parliament as member for County Down, and was appointed by Pitt president of the board of control in 1802. He did not resign with Pitt, but continued to hold his post under Addington, and on Pitt's return he became secretary at war until Pitt died in 1805, when he resigned. He became again secretary at war on the fall of Grenville in 1807, but the Walcheren expedition (q.v.), which was undertaken at his advice and under his management, brought him much unpopularity, and involved him in a duel with Canning, who did not disguise his disapproval of the secretary at war. Canning was wounded in the duel (September 21, 1809), and both men resigned office. Castlereagh remained out of office until 1812, when he was appointed foreign secretary under Lord Liverpool. He held this post until his death, and soon became virtually prime minister. In December 1813 he went to the continent to negotiate a general peace, but the overtures came to nothing. In 1814–15 he represented Great Britain at the Congress of Vienna, and played a part in the Bourbon restoration in France for which due credit has only recently been accorded him. Napoleon roundly condemned him for his alleged inattention to the real prosperity of his country; and his conduct at Vienna won him unpopularity at home. But his foreign policy was statesmanlike and his outlook European. His policy abroad in the seven years following the Vienna Treaties was new, and opposed to British prejudice. Inscrutable, resourceful, and patient, he kept all the threads in his own hands, and adhered to the new principles of diplomacy by conference, exemplified in the Congresses of Aix-la-Chapelle (1818), Troppau and Laibach (1820–1), and Verona (1822). The system failed because it was purely conservative and ignored the rising force of nationalism. Castlereagh finally committed suicide on August 9, 1822. his mind suddenly giving way under the strain of overwork.

Stewart, WILLIAM, VISCOUNT MOUNTJOY (1653–92), was one of the few members of the Established Church who held office in Tyrconnel's Jacobite administration (1689). Master of the ordnance and colonel of an Irish regiment, he was also president of a royal society formed in imitation of the Royal Society of London. When it was seen that Ulster was determined to hold out for William III, he was sent there to win over the people. The inhabitants of Londonderry permitted him to leave a portion of his regiment there, but the Enniskilleners declined to listen to his proposal. Shortly afterwards Tyrconnel, wishing him out of the way, sent him on a mission to St. Germain, with Sir Stephen Rice, who was to tell James that he (Mountjoy) was a traitor at heart. He was accordingly thrown into the Bastille. After three years he was exchanged for Richard Hamilton, and, converted by his wrongs to Whiggism, volunteered in William's army. He fell at Steinkirk.

Stigand, Archbishop of Canterbury 1052–1070, is first heard of as a chaplain, adviser, and minister of Queen Emma. In 1043 he was made Bishop of Elmham, but was almost immediately afterwards deposed on the occasion of a quarrel between his patroness and the king. But the next year he made his peace with Edward, and was restored to his see. During the whole of the reign of Edward the Confessor we find Stigand heading the English party in the Church, and strongly opposing the Normanizing tendencies of the king. The bishopric of Winchester was given to him in 1047, and on the flight of Robert of Jumièges (q.v.) in 1052 Stigand obtained the archbishopric. He still continued to hold the bishopric of Winchester, with its various abbeys, of which Gloucester was certainly one. He played his part in facilitating the Norman conquest of England, since the schismatical position in which his appointment placed the English Church enabled William to obtain papal support for his enterprise and to endow it with something of the aspect of a crusade. On the death of Edward, Stigand summoned the witenagemot, which elected Harold, but, probably owing to the irregularity of his position, the archbishop did not actually crown the king. After Harold's death it was Stigand who anointed Edgar the Atheling as king, but when the cause of the young prince was proved to be hopeless he made his peace with the Conqueror. Stigand was present at William's coronation, and did homage to him, and was one of the Englishmen whom the king took over with him to Normandy in 1067. In 1070, however, at a council held at Winchester he was deposed from his archbishopric, three charges being brought against him: (1) That he held the bishopric of Winchester together with his archbishopric, this being uncanonical; (2) that he had assumed the archbishopric during the lifetime of Robert, who had been unlawfully deposed; and (3) that he had received the pallium from the anti-Pope Benedict. There can be little doubt that it had been William's intention from the outset to displace him, and no credence need be given to the stories which ascribe his fall to his adhesion to the party of Hereward. He was placed by William in custody at Winchester, where he remained for the rest of his life, which appears to have terminated in 1072.

Stile, JOHN, was a servant of Henry VII, and his messenger on several important occasions, notably to Ferdinand of Aragon. From the mention of his name in the instructions given to Wolsey with regard to the treaty of marriage between Henry and Margaret of Savoy, he seems to have taken some part in the more private arrangements on the subject, and he was also one of Henry's confidential messengers with reference to the king's matrimonial plans in Naples. In 1502, for some unknown reason, John Stile seems to have fallen temporarily into disgrace, as there is a mention of a pardon being granted him on June 16 of that year.

Stillington, ROBERT (d. 1491), after holding minor preferments, was in 1466 made Bishop of Bath and Wells. He was a strong Yorkist, and in 1467 was entrusted with the great seal. He held it till 1470, and again from 1472 to 1475. After Edward's death Stillington became an adherent of Richard, and drew up the act by which Edward's children were bastardized. On the accession of Henry VII he was imprisoned for a short while, but soon obtained pardon. In 1487, however, he was implicated in the attempt of Lambert Simnel, for which he was kept in prison till his death.

Stirling, a town of Scotland, situated on the Forth, was one of the four burghs given up to the English (1174) as security for the fulfilment of the conditions of the Treaty of Falaise, but was restored to Scotland by Richard I (1186). In 1297 it was the scene of the battle between Wallace and the Earl of Surrey, and in 1304 was taken by Edward I, after being defended for three months by Sir William Oliphant. In 1313-14 it was besieged by Edward Bruce, and after the battle of Bannockburn (q.v.), which was fought in the endeavour to relieve it, was surrendered by the governor. Edward Baliol surrendered it to Edward III in 1334, but in 1339 it again fell into the hands of the Scots, being given up by its governor, Thomas Rokeby. In 1571 an attempt was made on it by the party of Queen Mary, and in 1583 it was taken by the Ruthven conspirators. During the disturbances of 1639 it was in the hands of the Covenanters, and in 1715 was occupied by Argyll against the Jacobites. In 1746 it was unsuccessfully besieged by the Pretender.

Stirling (OR CAMBUSKENNETH), THE BATTLE OF (September 11, 1297), resulted in a complete victory for William Wallace and the Scots over the English, who were led by Warenne and Cressingham. Wallace fell on the English as they were in process of crossing a narrow bridge over the Forth, and cut them to pieces, killing Cressingham.

Stockdale v. Hansard, CASES OF (1837), arose from the publication by T. C. Hansard, by order of the Commons, of a report which described a book published by John Joseph Stockdale as indecent. Stockdale suing Messrs. Hansard for libel, the Queen's Bench, presided over by Lord Denman, decided that the order of the House was no justification (May 31, 1837). After five suits had been brought, and Stockdale and the sheriffs had been committed by the Commons, an act was passed (3 and 4 Vict. c. 9) preventing any suit in future concerning papers printed by order of either House.

Stoke, THE BATTLE OF (June 16, 1487), the last battle between the rival houses of York and Lancaster, was fought between the Yorkist adherents of Lambert Simnel (q.v.) and Henry VII at a small village near Newark. John de la Pole, Earl of Lincoln, Lords Lovel and Fitzgerald led the revolt, assisted by an experienced German general, Martin Schwarz (q.v.), at the head of 2,000 mercenaries. After an obstinate conflict of three hours' duration, numerical superiority caused the royal forces, commanded by Henry VII in person, to prevail. Not one of the rebel leaders escaped. Simnel was taken prisoner, and the revolt was thoroughly suppressed.

Stone, GEORGE, Archbishop of Armagh (1708-64), was the son of a banker. Through the influence of the Duke of Newcastle he became in early life dean of Derry (1734), and then successively Bishop of Kildare and Derry (1745), and in 1747 primate. During Lord Dorset's viceroyalty he was virtually governor of Ireland, and he ruled it by means of the pension list. In 1755 he was dismissed from the privy council, but in 1758 again joined the ministerial party. He was called the "Beauty of Holiness," and was very unpopular. He was, however, a liberal man, and in favour of the removal of Catholic disabilities.

Stonehenge, situated upon Salisbury Plain, midway between the valleys of the Nadder and the Avon, is a megalithic monument without equal in this country. Much controversy has centred around the question of the date of its origin, the provenance of the material of which it is constructed, and the purpose for which it was erected. It consists of a ring (diameter 108 feet) of hewn Sarsen stones with imposts, enclosed by a circular earthwork. Within is a circle of less perfectly hewn foreign stones; and within this again stands a series of great trilithons arranged in horseshoe form, and enclosing a series of foreign stones in similar formation. In the centre of all is a recumbent slab, popularly known as "the Altar Stone." Outside the earthwork stands a large unworked stone (the Hele Stone, or Friar's Heel), over the summit of which it has been observed that the sun rises in a direct line with the axis of the monument, at the summer solstice. This fact has given rise to the view that Stonehenge was associated with sun worship; and much has been said and written of its connexion with the Druids. The exact use to which the circle was put is, however, still a matter of conjecture, although it seems reasonable to conclude that it had a definite religious significance. The date of its erection has been estimated by Sir Norman Lockyer, mainly on astronomical evidence, at roughly 1700 B.C.; and excavations have proved that it was the work of a race of men who had but a slight knowledge of bronze and no knowledge of iron—perhaps of the Goidels, with whose appearance in Britain the earliest use of bronze appears to have synchronized. The provenance of the "foreign" stones has long puzzled archaeologists; but recent investigations have shown beyond reasonable doubt that they were quarried in South Wales, shipped across the Bristol Channel, and up the Avon, whence they were brought along a specially constructed avenue to the chosen site. Stone circles are to be found in many parts of Britain, but Stonehenge is probably the latest, as it is certainly the most elaborate, still extant.

Story, DR. JOHN (1510 ?–1571), was in January 1548, whilst a member of the House of Commons, committed to the custody of the serjeant-at-arms, probably for some ebullition of virulence against the changes of religion. Under Mary, Story became one of the most violent enemies of the Reformation, and a leading persecutor. He was queen's proctor at the trial of Archbishop Cranmer (1555), and in 1559 made a violent speech in the House against the Supremacy Bill. He was subsequently imprisoned for refusing to take the oath of allegiance, and on his release went abroad, where he occupied himself in plotting against Elizabeth's government. He is said to have been plotting the death of James VI of Scotland, in order to smooth the way "for his mother's marriage with some Catholic prince," when he was inveigled on board a vessel at Antwerp by a man named Parker, one of Burghley's spies, and carried to Yarmouth. He was tortured to extort his secrets, and shortly afterwards was hanged (June 1, 1571).

Strafford, THOMAS WENTWORTH, EARL OF (1593–1641). [WENTWORTH.]

Straffordians, THE. The bill of attainder against Strafford passed the third reading in the Commons (April 21, 1641) by a majority of 204 against 59. William Wheeler, M.P. for Westbury, took down the names of the minority, copies of the list got abroad, and one was posted up in the Old Palace Yard, Westminster, with the addition "these are the Straffordians, betrayers of their country." The list included the names of Selden, Lord Digby, Orlando Bridgeman, and Holborne. It did not contain those of Falkland and Hyde, who voted for the bill. The publication of the division lists was at this time a breach of privilege. The House itself first published the names of members voting in the year 1836.

Stratford, JOHN, Archbishop of Canterbury (d. 1348), first appears as sitting in parliament in 1317. He was frequently employed on embassies by Edward II, and in 1323 was made Bishop of Winchester by the pope, contrary to the wishes of the king, who, however, eventually recognized him. He took an active part in the deposition of Edward II, but though he saw the necessity of getting rid of the infatuated king, he did not wish to put the power into the hands of Isabella and Mortimer. His opposition to the guilty pair led to his persecution, and he was compelled to go into hiding until the fall of Mortimer. Edward III made him chancellor in 1330, and he was translated to the see of Canterbury in 1333. He held the great seal twice again, from 1335 to 1337 and for a short period (April–June) in 1340. In this latter year occurred the great quarrel between the king and the archbishop. There is little doubt that Stratford was a faithful minister to Edward, but it was impossible for him to find money sufficient to defray the expenses of the costly French wars. Edward, angered by his lack of money and the ill-success of his expedition, wreaked his indignation on his ministers. The chancellor—Archbishop Stratford's brother, the Bishop of Chichester—and the treasurer were dismissed from office; and a number of the justices were arrested and imprisoned. The next step was to launch a public accusation of treason against the archbishop, in the libellus famosus of February 1341. A lengthy dispute followed, Stratford refusing to answer the charges brought against him except before his peers in parliament. On April 23 parliament assembled and the question was referred to a committee of the Lords, who reported after deliberation in Stratford's favour. Their decision is generally regarded as having established an important constitutional principle—viz., the right of peers to be tried by their own order. The archbishop having got parliament on his side, the king was compelled to give in, and a reconciliation followed (May 7, 1341). Stratford was subsequently often employed by the king on important affairs, but he never again received the chancellorship. Though they can hardly rank as statesmen, the archbishop and his brother seem to have been able and faithful ministers, anxious to check the extravagance of the king and intent on maintaining the privileges of their order rather than the liberties of the people.

Stratford de Redcliffe, STRATFORD CANNING, VISCOUNT (1786–1880). [CANNING.]

Stratton, THE BATTLE OF (May 16, 1643), took place during the Civil War. The Parliamentary forces under General Chudleigh, Sir Richard Buller, Sir Alexander Carew, and the Earl of Stamford were defeated by the Cornish army under Sir Ralph Hopton and Sir Bevil Grenville. The Parliamentary forces were weakened by the detachment of Sir George Chudleigh with all their cavalry. They were posted on the top of Stratton Hill, which the Cornish army after several hours' hard fighting succeeded in storming. General Chudleigh and 1,700 prisoners were taken, together with thirteen guns and all the baggage and stores of the defeated army.

Strode, WILLIAM (1599–1645), was returned to the House of Commons in the last parliament of James I, and the five parliaments of his son. In the third parliament of Charles he took part in the tumult caused in the House of Commons by the Speaker's refusal to put Eliot's resolutions, for which he was called before the council and imprisoned until January 1640. In the Long Parliament he is mentioned by Clarendon as "one of those ephori who most avowed the curbing and suppressing of majesty," and "one of the fiercest men of the party, and of the party only for his fierceness." On December 24, 1640, he introduced the bill for annual parliaments, and on November 28, 1641, moved that the kingdom should be put in a posture of defence. He did not scruple to avow that the safety of the parliament depended on the Scottish army. "The sons of Zeruah," he said (referring to the court party), "are too strong for us." He was one of the Five Members (q.v.) impeached by the king (January 1642). After the Civil War began he took an active part against the king in Somerset, and in the Commons opposed all proposals to treat.

Strongbow. [CLARE, RICHARD DE, EARL OF PEMBROKE.]

Stuart Family. The Stuarts were descended from a certain Walter Fitz-Alan, lord of Oswestry, who entered the service of David I, by whom he was created high steward of Scotland. The office became hereditary in the family. Alexander, the fourth steward of the Fitz-Alan stock, commanded at the battle of Largs in 1263; the fifth, James, was one of the regents appointed on the death of Alexander III; the sixth, Walter, supported Robert Bruce, commanded a division at Bannockburn, and was rewarded in 1315 by the hand of Bruce's daughter, Marjory. Marjory's son, Robert, ruled Scotland as regent during the minority of David II and his captivity in England, and upon David's death, in 1371, succeeded to the Scottish throne. (For the history of the Stuart sovereigns of Scotland see ROBERT II and III, JAMES I, II, III, IV, V, and MARY.)

With the accession of James VI of Scotland to the English throne (1603) as James I, the history of the Stuart rule in England begins; it is that of the transition from the personal government of the Yorkist and Tudor periods to the parliamentary system of Hanoverian times. Such a transition was, in England, inevitable; but to the character and policy of the Stuart kings it was due that the change had to be effected by means of a rebellion and a revolution. Parliament had already in the later years of Elizabeth begun to assume a more independent attitude; but that queen had tact enough to keep it in good temper, and, as in the question of monopolies, knew when to yield. But James I was devoid of tact, and never succeeded in making himself respected. More than this, he continually forced upon men's attention a doctrine of prerogative which cut at the root of English liberties. Moreover, his Scottish experience had rendered him singularly unfit to deal with English ecclesiastical difficulties. The time had come for concessions to, or at any rate considerate treatment of, the Puritans. But James, though he did not, as Charles I, regard Episcopacy as a sacred institution, valued it highly as a means of keeping the clergy in order; any concession to the Puritans would, he thought, weaken episcopal authority, and so prepare the way for that independence of the clergy which in Scotland had proved so dangerous to the State; therefore he refused all change, and so brought about the union against himself of the political and religious opposition. His domestic difficulties were increased by his ill-advised foreign policy. James knew far better than his subjects the true position of affairs on the continent; and, although his policy of mediation could never have succeeded, a frank statement of reasons would have done much to lessen the opposition of the Commons; but as he took no pains to make his people understand him, it was inevitable that the Protestant feeling of the country should be offended by the marriage negotiations with Spain, and by the king's refusal to interfere energetically to save the Palatinate. So firm was the distrust which his action inspired, that even when, under pressure from Buckingham, James declared war against Spain, parliament would not believe that a great continental war was seriously intended, and refused supplies. The question more and more clearly defined itself: could the king persist in a certain policy, or retain a certain minister, against the will of parliament? The actual parliamentary gains of James's reign were but few; more important was it that the imposition had raised the question of unparliamentary taxation, and that the revival of impeachment had given parliament a weapon against the king. But it is clear that if the king determined to carry out a certain policy against the wish of his subjects, and to raise the necessary funds by unparliamentary means, and if parliament in vain attacked ministers, the ultimate issue would depend on the preponderance of power, and this could be decided only by war. This is what came to pass under Charles I.

But while the victory of parliament was inevitable, it was well that it should not be premature. Had Charles yielded to all the demands of the Commons in 1629, had he given them complete control of taxation, and recognized the responsibility of ministers, he would have handed over his sovereignty to them. But the Commons were not yet fit to exercise such a power. Their supremacy would have established a gross tyranny in ecclesiastical matters, for all opinions disliked by the majority of average Englishmen would have been proscribed in the national Church. Nor were the Commons as yet fit to govern. Nothing existed comparable to the modern system of cabinet and party government.

Then followed eleven years without a parliament (1629-40). At first the country was quiet; but Laud's action upon becoming archbishop, and the attempt to raise ship-money (q.v.), strengthened and bound more closely together the Puritan and the constitutionalist opposition; and when the Scottish attack forced Charles to put himself into the hands of parliament the opposition saw their own strength, and Charles had to surrender one by one the powers and prerogatives by which he had attempted to govern. But the redress of political grievances left the religious difficulties still unsolved. It became clear during the struggles of 1641-2 that the main question left was that of the existence of Episcopacy; from the Episcopalian party arose the Cavalier party; and though the attempt to seize the Five Members (q.v.) and the consequent introduction of the Militia Bill were the immediate causes of the war, the religious element was far more important than the constitutional in the early years of the war.

The constitutional questions of the second Stuart period differ from those of the first. No longer was there a direct assertion of "absolute power"; no unparliamentary taxation was attempted; there was no exercise of judicial power by council or Star Chamber. Charles II ruled not against, but through, a parliament which he tried to make subservient. Yet the judges were still under court influence; prerogative lingered in the "dispensing power"; and divine right reappeared under the doctrine of "non-resistance." The fall of the Whigs after the dissolution of 1681 showed how strong the royalist feeling of the country remained, in spite of eighteen years' misgovernment; and even after the lessons of the Civil War the Stuarts might at the eleventh hour have succeeded in creating a despotism, had not James II attacked the English Church, and so united all classes against him.

The reigns of William and Mary and of Anne, though the sisters were of the Stuart house, are more closely connected with later than with earlier history. In them begins the development of party cabinet government; and instead of a shifting policy of neutrality or a truckling to France, the great rivalry begins between France and England which was to last till the close of the nineteenth century. Stuart, ALEXANDER, 3RD DUKE OF ALBANY (d. 1485), was the second son of James II, and brother of James III, from whose jealousy he was compelled to take refuge in France, 1479. In 1482 he joined Edward IV of England, executing a secret deed, in which he acknowledged the feudal supremacy of England over Scotland in return for recognition as King of Scots. After the affair at Lauder Bridge (q.v.) Albany returned to Scotland and assumed the government for a short time; but on the news of his dealings with Edward leaking out was again compelled to seek an asylum in England. Here he joined the Earl of Douglas in 1484 in an invasion of Scotland, which was defeated at Lochmaben, Albany being obliged to go to France, where he enjoyed the favour of Louis XI until his death in 1485.

Stuart, LADY ARABELLA (1575-1615), was the daughter of Charles Stuart, Earl of Lennox, brother of Lord Darnley. Thus she was first cousin to James I and great-granddaughter of Margaret, daughter of Henry VII. During her early life Queen Elizabeth often spoke of Arabella as her possible successor, in case James did not conduct himself according to her satisfaction; and though on Elizabeth's death James I succeeded to the English crown without opposition, there were some who maintained that Arabella, having been born in England, had a better title to the crown than James, who was an alien. [STUART, FAMILY OF.] One of the objects of the Main Plot would seem to have been to depose James and place Arabella on the throne, though it is very improbable that Arabella herself knew anything of the designs of the conspirators. She continued to live at court till 1610, when, contrary to the king's wishes, she privately married Sir William Seymour, afterwards Marquis of Hertford, and a member of the Suffolk branch of the royal family. This union of two possible claimants to the throne was regarded by James with great apprehension; Seymour was at once sent to the Tower, and Arabella confined at Lambeth, to be shortly after conveyed to Durham. While on her way thither she managed to escape, and took ship for France, her husband having escaped from the Tower and fled to Ostend. But before Arabella could reach Calais, the vessel was captured, and she was committed to the Tower. Her reason gave way, and after four years' imprisonment she died. Her character was remarkably amiable, and she never appears to have engaged personally in the intrigues carried on in her name.

Stuart, CHARLES EDWARD LOUIS PHILIP CASIMIR, known as the YOUNG PRETENDER (1720-88), was the son of James Edward Stuart and Maria Clementina, daughter of James Sobieski, eldest son of the King of Poland. He was born at Rome. His education was very much neglected. He became of political importance on the renewal of the hostility between Great Britain and France after the fall of Walpole. Cardinal Tencin, the French minister, was in favour of an invasion of England, and in 1743 Charles came to Paris. Louis XV, although he refused to see him, was not unfriendly to his cause; 15,000 veterans under Marshal Saxe were stationed at Dunkirk, while fleets were collected at Brest and Toulon. But the French admiral, Roquefeuille, feared to attack the British under Sir John Norris; his ships were dispersed by a storm, and the French ministry, abandoning the design, appointed Saxe to command in Flanders. The Pretender retired to Paris, whence he communicated with his Scottish adherents through Murray of Broughton. The results of the battle of Fontenoy (1745) caused him to hasten his plans. He embarked at Nantes (1745) in a privateer, attended by a French man-of-war, but the latter vessel was attacked and disabled by a British ship, so that Charles arrived in Scotland stripped of supplies, and with only seven companions. [JACOBITES.] After the battle of Culloden Charles fled, and succeeded, after five months' wanderings in the Hebrides, in escaping to France. He owed his life to Flora Macdonald (q.v.). On his return to Paris he found that no more help was to be expected from the French court. On one occasion Tencin proposed that he should be supplied with French troops on condition that in the event of his success Ireland should be given to Louis. Charles replied, "Non, M. le Cardinal, tout ou rien, point de partage." In 1747 he went to Spain, and in 1748 to Prussia, to try to get assistance, but without success. He quarrelled with his father and brother when the latter became a cardinal. He was compelled to leave France by the conditions of the Treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, but he obstinately refused to go, and was imprisoned. He resided chiefly after this with his friend, the Duc de Bouillon, in the forest of Ardennes. In 1750, and perhaps in 1752 and 1754, he paid mysterious visits to England. On the death of his father he repaired to Rome. His character had become degraded; his former chivalrous promise had quite vanished, he was a confirmed drunkard, and his friends were alienated by his refusal to dismiss his mistress, Miss Walkinshaw, who it was said betrayed his plans. In 1772 he married Princess Louisa of Stolberg, a girl of twenty, but the union was unhappy, and she eloped with Alfieri. His adherents had sent him proposals that year of setting up his standard in America.

Stuart, ESMÉ, DUKE OF LENNOX (1542-83), the son of John d'Aubigné, captain of the Scots Guard in France, and the nephew of Matthew, Earl of Lennox, came to Scotland in 1579, where his polished manners soon recommended him to the favour of James VI, who created him Duke of Lennox in 1581, having previously made him governor of Dumbarton, captain of his guard, and Earl of Lennox. Hated by the Scots nobles as a foreigner and a favourite, Lennox sought to increase his popularity by becoming a Protestant, and to secure his power by the ruin of Morton. He became an object of dread to Elizabeth, who imagined that he would set himself to draw closer the connexion between Scotland and France. Hurlled from his high position by the "Raid of Ruthven" (q.v.), Lennox was compelled to return to France, where he died at Paris, May 1583.

Stuart, HENRY, LORD DARNLEY (1545-1567), was the son of Matthew Stuart, Earl of Lennox and Lady Margaret Douglas, a niece of Henry VIII. In 1565 Mary of Scotland, his cousin, saw and at once fell in love with him. The marriage was celebrated in the summer of the same year, in spite of violent opposition on the part of Moray and the Protestants, who viewed the union of their queen with a Roman Catholic family with great distrust. Darnley was created Duke of Albany, and was soon afterwards, by order of his wife, illegally proclaimed King of Scots. Mary soon found her mistake in marrying a man who was at once foolish and profligate. A coldness sprang up between them, and the murder of Rizzio, to which Darnley was a party, only increased it. Loathed as he was by the queen, and endangered by her reconciliation to his bitterest enemies, Darnley endeavoured to escape to France, but was not permitted to leave Scotland. After the birth of his son, afterwards James VI, whose christening he refused to attend, Darnley was seized at Glasgow with a violent illness, from which he had barely recovered when Mary paid him a visit and urged his removal to Edinburgh. He was accordingly conveyed to a small house close to the city walls, in a district known as Kirk o' Field. During the night of February 10, 1567, the house was blown up with gunpowder, and Darnley's body was found next morning lying in the garden by that of his page; but neither corpse bore traces of burning. Public feeling at once pointed to Bothwell as the murderer, and more than suspected Mary of complicity in the crime. The strongest circumstantial evidence points to the same conclusion.

Stuart, JAMES, EARL OF ARRAN (d. 1596), was a son of Lord Ochiltree, and a brother-in-law of Knox. In 1581 he received the estates and title which the house of Hamilton had forfeited, as the reward of his zeal in procuring the condemnation of the Regent Morton. Later, taken prisoner at the "Raid of Ruthven" (q.v.), Arran quickly revenged himself by collecting an army in the interest of James VI, and by taking the lead against the conspirators; and having extorted a confession from Gowrie by fair promises, used it against him to his ruin. He became chancellor and lieutenant-general of Scotland, and on the strength of the king's favour, set himself in opposition to the rest of the Scottish barons, rousing their hatred by his arrogance. The English government found means to accuse him of instigating a border raid, and he was ordered to withdraw from the Scottish court in 1584. Shortly afterwards, on a combination against him of the Hamiltons (whose estates he held) and the banished lords, Arran had to escape as best he could to the hills of Ayrshire. He was slain by James Douglas of Thorthorwald in revenge for the death of Morton.

Stuart, JAMES FRANCIS EDWARD, known as the CHEVALIER DE ST. GEORGE and as the OLD PRETENDER (1688-1766), was the son of King James II and Mary of Modena. It was generally believed at the time that he was a supposititious child; but without just cause. When James II contemplated flight, the child was conveyed to France by Lauzun. In 1701, at his father's deathbed, he was acknowledged by Louis XIV, who undertook to uphold his claims. In 1708 Louis fitted out an expedition against Great Britain, but James, who was to have accompanied it, was taken ill of the measles, and the expedition failed completely. He then joined the French army, and was present at the battles of Oudenarde and Malplaquet. On the fall of the Whigs his prospects considerably improved. In 1711 Harley opened negotiations for peace with the French court through the Abbé Gautier, who was also a Jacobite agent. In 1712 James ventured to write to his sister Anne. On the conclusion of the Peace of Utrecht (1713) he was compelled to leave France, and removed to Bar-le-Duc in Lorraine. During this period it was constantly urged upon him that he should change his religion, but he distinctly refused to do so. In June 23, 1714, proclamations against him were issued by both Houses of Parliament. On receiving the news of the death of Anne, he went from Bar-le-Duc to Plombières, where he issued a proclamation claiming the crown, and thence to Commercy. With Bolingbroke as secretary of state, the Pretender's schemes seemed to have a chance of success. It was hoped that Louis might be induced to break the peace; the Jacobites in England were supposed to be eager to rise. But the flight of Ormonde from England was followed by the death of Louis XIV. Despite Bolingbroke's advice Mar rose in Scotland. [JACOBITES.] It was not until Mar's expedition was doomed to failure that James arrived in Scotland. He went to Scone, where he assumed the style of royalty. But it was evident that he lacked all energy. Argyll advanced on Perth; James and Mar withdrew before him, and, deserting their followers, secretly fled to France. On his return James most unjustly laid the blame of the failure on Bolingbroke, and dismissed him. His place was taken by Mar. In 1717 Charles XII of Sweden, and the Spanish minister Alberoni, resolved to bring about a Stuart restoration. But their plans failed. Soon afterwards the regent of France was compelled by the British government to expel James from the French dominions. He went to Rome (1717). He was betrothed to Maria Clementina, granddaughter of John Sobieski, King of Poland, but on her way to Rome she was arrested by the emperor and detained prisoner. In 1719 Alberoni fitted out an expedition against England. The Pretender was invited to Spain, and there publicly received. The expedition under Ormonde was scattered in the Bay of Biscay. This year Princess Sobieski escaped from Austria, and went to Italy, where she married the Pretender. In 1720 Charles Edward was born. In 1722 Atterbury's plot (q.v.) seemed for a short period likely to succeed. James sent an extraordinary declaration from Lucca, offering to allow George II the succession to the throne, and the title of King of Hanover, if he would quietly surrender the British crown.

In 1728 an unsuccessful attempt to incite a rebellion in the Highlands was made by Allan Cameron. James had quarrelled with Mar, and now had as a favourite Colonel Hay, who was made secretary of state and Earl of Inverness. Maria Clementina, jealous of Inverness, left her husband, which alienated the emperor and Spain from him. On the death of George I he repaired to Lorraine full of hopes. They were soon dashed to the ground, and the French government was compelled to send him from France. He returned to Italy and was reconciled to his wife, who died in 1735. He now took as his adviser James Murray, Inverness's brother-in-law, whom he created Earl of Dunbar. On the outbreak of war between Great Britain and France (1740) the Jacobite hopes revived. An association of seven was formed in Scotland; the English Jacobites were roused; the French minister was friendly to his cause. The ultimate result of these intrigues was the Young Pretender's expedition in 1745. James Edward now ceased to exercise any real influence. He quarrelled with his son in 1747. James had fair abilities, but was thoroughly selfish, faithless, and licentious.

Stuart, JOHN, 4TH DUKE OF ALBANY (1481-1536), regent of Scotland from 1515 to 1524, was the son of Alexander, Duke of Albany, and nephew of James III. On the death of James IV, Albany, who was lord high admiral of France, was summoned to Scotland to assume the regency, a position which his French education had by no means fitted him to fill. On his arrival in Scotland one of his first acts was to crush the power of the Earl of Angus, who had married the queen-mother Margaret; his next, to bring to trial all whom he conceived to be in league with the Douglas party. In September 1522 he collected an immense army for the invasion of England, to retaliate upon Henry VIII for having demanded his expulsion from the Scots Estates. Henry, however, contrived by diplomacy to stay the blow before it had fallen, and Albany shortly after returned to France, leaving Scotland to the tender mercies of the Earl of Surrey. In 1523 he appeared once more with a body of French auxiliaries; but, failing to capture Wark Castle, he retired to France in disgust, May 1524, and never returned.

Stuart, JOHN, 23RD EARL OF ATHOLL (d. 1578), was a staunch Romanist and supporter of Mary, Queen of Scots. He was named one of the commission of regency established on the abdication of Mary, 1567. On Moray's return from France he accompanied him to Lochleven and had an interview with the queen. In 1569 he was suspected of planning a rebellion against Moray. In 1577 he combined with Argyll against the Regent Morton, whose deposition was in great part owing to his exertions, and about the same time was appointed chancellor of Scotland; he died soon afterwards at Stirling, poisoned, it was said, by Morton.

Stuart, JOHN, 3RD EARL OF BUTE (1713-1792), son of James, 2nd earl, married, in 1736, Mary, daughter of the celebrated Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, in whose right he inherited a large fortune. In early life he became by accident acquainted with Frederic, Prince of Wales, and soon acquired great influence over him, though it is difficult to see what were the charms which endeared him to the prince, since he is described as "cold and unconciliating in his manners, proud and sensitive in his nature, solemn and sententious in his discourse." During the later years of George II he had remained attached to the court of the widowed Princess of Wales; and scandal attributed to their relations a character which there is no real evidence to show that they possessed. But no sooner was George III seated on the throne than Bute took advantage of his ascendancy over the young king to come to the front in politics. After the dissolution of parliament early in 1761 he became one of the secretaries of state as the colleague of Pitt, to whom he was warmly opposed on the question of the continental war. Pitt resigned in October, leaving Bute supreme. The discovery of the Family Compact (q.v.) between France and Spain, which Pitt had suspected, led to a rupture with Spain; but Bute was none the less resolved to come to terms with France and to desert Germany, and to reverse the policy of his predecessors. On November 3, 1762, the preliminaries of peace were signed at Fontainebleau, and peace was definitely concluded in the following February. [PARIS, TREATY OF, 1763.] But the ministry was unpopular; and this unpopularity gradually developed into a fierce hatred, which amused itself in burning the prime minister in effigy in almost every public place. This extreme feeling can scarcely be said to have been justified by Bute's public measures; and three, at any rate, of his chief sins in the popular view are well set forth by a contemporary writer, who says that he was utterly "unfit to be prime minister of England, because he was (1) a Scotchman, (2) the king's friend, (3) an honest man." In April 1763 he had to yield to the storm of indignation which he had aroused; and he never afterwards filled any prominent office in the state. But he retained his influence over the king, and was all-powerful in the closet, until George Grenville, after the failure of Bute's attempted intrigues with Pitt, insisted on his complete dismissal from the court as a condition of his own return to power. From this time forward there is little evidence that Bute had any hand in the politics of the day, though his withdrawal could not remove the suspicion of his secret influence at the back of the throne. During the last twenty-five years of his life he lived in almost complete retirement at Christchurch, in Hampshire.

Stuart, MATTHEW, 4TH OF 12TH EARL OF LENNOX (1516-71), was a member of the French house of d'Aubigné. On his marriage with the daughter of the Earl of Angus and Queen Margaret he joined the party of Henry VIII in Scotland, but subsequently threw him over at the same time as the Assured Lords (q.v.). He was the father of Darnley, on whose murder he endeavoured without avail to bring Bothwell to justice, for he dared not appear at the trial as his accuser. In 1567, on Mary's abdication, he was appointed one of the council of regency, and the following year collected evidence against the Queen of Scots at the Westminster commission. In 1570 he was elected regent of Scotland, and at once attacked and took the castle of Dumbarton, one of the strongholds of Mary's party. He was mortally wounded by a bullet in a fray at Stirling in September 1571.

Stuart, MURDOCH, 2ND DUKE OF ALBANY (d. 1425), succeeded his father, Robert, as governor of Scotland, 1420, during the captivity of James I in England. Upon James's return he was condemned and executed at Stirling, May 1425, together with two of his sons, for having misused his power as regent.

Stuart, ROBERT, 1ST DUKE OF ALBANY (c. 1340-1420), the second son of Robert II, and the brother of Robert III, of Scotland, during his brother's later years practically governed the kingdom. His inertness on the invasion of Scotland by Henry IV gave rise to the suspicion that he was plotting for the death of his nephew, David, Duke of Rothesay, who was besieged in Edinburgh Castle. That there may have been some truth in the supposition is likely; for soon afterwards Rothesay was seized at Albany's instigation, and imprisoned in Falkland Castle, where he died, perhaps as a result of foul play, in 1402. On his nephew's death Albany became governor of the kingdom, and in that character gave support to a man whom he declared to be Richard II of England, and whom he hoped to be able to make use of against Henry IV. The capture of the young Prince James by the English was also ascribed to his intrigues, whether justly or not is uncertain. On the death of Robert III Albany continued to govern the kingdom as regent, until his own death, September 3, 1420. In spite of his odious private character, Albany seems to have ruled Scotland with vigour, justice, and moderation.

See the "Scotchchronicon" and Wyntoun, bk. ix, for different views of his character; and P. Hume Brown, "History of Scotland," 1911.

Stuart - Wortley - Mackenzie, JAMES ARCHIBALD, 1ST BARON WHARNCLIFFE (1776-1845), was the grandson of John, 3rd Earl of Bute. He was educated at the Charterhouse, entered the army in 1790, and quitted it in 1801 after having obtained the rank of lieutenant-colonel. In 1797 he was elected to parliament for the borough of Bossiney in Cornwall. In 1812, after the failure of many ministerial negotiations, he was chosen to move an address to the Prince Regent praying that he would form a strong and efficient ministry. In 1818 he succeeded to his large inheritance, and was elected for Yorkshire, which he represented till 1826, when, having offended his constituents by his opinions on the Catholic question, he was not re-elected. He was, however, elevated to the peerage. He strenuously opposed the Reform Bill in 1831, but was reconciled to it later by Earl Grey. He opposed the Whigs as long as they were in power, but when Sir Robert Peel was recalled from Italy (November 1834) to form a Conservative government he took office as lord privy seal, until April 1835. In 1841, on the return of Peel to power, Wharncliffe became president of the council.

Stubbs, JOHN, a Puritan lawyer, and brother-in-law of Cartwright (q.v.), published in September 1579 a pamphlet entitled "Discovery of a Gaping Gulf," against the proposed marriage of Elizabeth with the Duke of Anjou. For this he was sentenced to have his right hand cut off; and on the infliction of the penalty is said to have waved his hat in his left hand, crying, "Long live Queen Elizabeth!" This story is, however, doubtful. Stubbs was in 1587 employed by Burghley to answer the libels of Cardinal Allen. In 1588 he was elected to parliament for Yarmouth.

Stukeley, THOMAS (1525?-1578), an adherent of Protector Somerset, was compelled to leave England in 1553 after being imprisoned in the Tower by Northumberland for obtaining alleged false information as to the policy of Henry II of France. He was sacrificed to Northumberland's desire to preserve the friendship of France. Stukeley subsequently became a noted pirate or privateer. He afterwards went to Ireland and acquired considerable possessions there. In 1570 he betook himself to Spain, and entered into negotiations with Philip II, declaring that his influence was sufficient to procure an easy conquest of Ireland; but the contemplated invasion came to nothing. A few years later (1577) Stukeley again projected an attack on Ireland, this time with papal aid; he was killed, however, on his way at Alcazar in battle with the Moors.

Subinfeudation was the process of creating inferior feudal obligations by the lord of a fief. For example, a lord who held an estate of the Crown would grant part of it to a sub-tenant of his own, who would henceforward stand in an analogous relation to him to that in which he stood to his lord. Very often the process of subinfeudation went so far that the nominal holder of a fief had not enough left in his own hands to perform the services required of him. Fraudulent acts of this type were not uncommon. At last the statute Quia Emptores (July 1290) (q.v.) practically abolished further cases of subinfeudation by enacting that in future transfers of land the purchaser should not enter into feudal relations of dependence with the alienor, but should stand to the lord of the fief in the same relation in which the alienor had himself stood. [FEUDALISM.]

Submission of the Clergy, THE (May 13, 1532), was an agreement forced upon the Convocation of Canterbury by Henry VIII, that no new canons should be enacted without the king's sanction, and that a review of the existing canons should be made, and all those disapproved of struck out. In 1534 this submission was embodied in an act of parliament called the Statute of the Submission of the Clergy (25 Hen. VIII, c. 19), which moreover gave the king power to summon convocation by his own writ, annul everything done without his licence, and appoint commissioners to review the canon law. The exact significance of these acts was fiercely debated during the stormy period that preceded the virtual suspension of convocation in 1717.

Subsidy, a parliamentary grant to the Crown, which began to supplement the tenth and fifteenth, and in the early sixteenth century soon became stereotyped. It was made up of a tax of 4s. in the pound on the annual value of land and 2s. 8d. in the pound on the value of goods. Originally much care was taken in assessing the subsidy. "Just as a tenth and fifteenth had come to be a mere fiscal expression for £30,000, so a subsidy became a mere fiscal expression, at first for £100,000, and by the end of the reign of Elizabeth for about £80,000" (Tanner). Aliens paid double subsidy. The clergy were separately assessed and taxed by authority of convocation, the clerical subsidy being equivalent to about £20,000. The "Subsidy Rolls" give an account of how the taxes were raised. This tax should not be confused with the much older subsidy on wool and leather and the subsidy on cloth paid by unprivileged foreigners.

Sudbury, SIMON OF, Archbishop of Canterbury (1375-81), was born at Sudbury, studied canon law at Paris, and became attached to the Papal Curia. He also attached himself to John of Gaunt. In 1360 he was made chancellor of Salisbury, and in 1361 Bishop of London. He took part in several embassies. He incurred unpopularity by his enlightened aversion to pilgrimages. In 1375 he was made Archbishop of Canterbury and in 1380 chancellor. He was murdered in 1381 by the insurgent peasantry when they took possession of the Tower.

Sudreys, THE (Sudreyjar), was a name given by the Norwegians to the Hebrides, or

Western Islands, in contradistinction to the Orkneys or Nordreys. Some authorities say that the Western Islands themselves were divided into the Nordreys and Sudreys, the point of division being Ardamurchan. The name is still preserved in the designation of the Manx bishop, as Bishop of Sodor and Man, though none of the Southern Islands have for many centuries been included in his diocese. [HEBRIDES; ORKNEYS AND SHETLANDS.]

Suetonius Paulinus was Roman commander in Britain from 59 to 62. His first action was the reduction of the island of Mona (Anglesey), the stronghold of the Ordovices and the chief seat of Druidism. From this he was recalled by the news of the great revolt of the Iceni, under Boudicca (q.v.), the capture of Verulamium, Camulodunum, and other posts, and the slaughter of the Romans and their allies. After a tedious campaign Suetonius gained a decisive victory over the Britons near London; but his harshness having greatly conduced to the rebellion, he was, despite his ultimate success, recalled in the year 62.

Suez Canal, THE, conceived by Haroun al-Raschid in the eighth century, and subsequently by the Venetians in the sixteenth century, by Leibnitz in 1671, by the Sheik al-Balad Ali Bey in 1770, and by Bonaparte in 1798, was begun by M. Ferdinand de Lesseps in 1859 and opened in November 1869. The British government became a shareholder in 1875, when Disraeli purchased the Khedive's shares in the canal for £4,000,000.

Sugden, EDWARD BURTENSHAW, BARON ST. LEONARDS (1781-1875), was the son of a hairdresser of Duke Street, Westminster. He was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn (1807). In 1822 he became a king's counsel and bencher of Lincoln's Inn. He at different times was returned to the House of Commons for Weymouth, Melcombe Regis, and St. Mawes; took a prominent part in parliamentary discussions; and was foremost among those who opposed the Reform Bill. In June 1829, when the Duke of Wellington was prime minister, he was appointed solicitor-general; and in 1834, when Sir Robert Peel formed a ministry, Sugden went to Ireland as lord chancellor. Resigning that office on the retirement of the cabinet, he was returned for Ripon, and vacated his seat in September 1841, on resuming under Sir Robert Peel his position as lord chancellor of Ireland, in which he continued until the disruption of the Conservative party in 1846. He accepted the post of lord chancellor in Lord Derby's first administration in 1852, and was raised to the peerage as Lord St. Leonards. In 1858 Lord Derby was desirous that he should again receive the great seal, but he declined the responsibility in consequence of his advanced age. He nevertheless afterwards took an active and influential part in the business of parliament, and exerted himself to keep up the character and efficiency of the House of Lords as a judicial tribunal and to correct by legislation several anomalies in the law of property.

Supplicants, THE, was the name assumed (1637) by those persons in Scotland who petitioned or "supplicated" against the introduction of Laud's "Service Book," and the "Book of Canons." The Supplicants were so numerous and strong that on the presentation of the Great Supplication (which embraced charges against the "Service Book," the "Book of Canons," the bishops, and the government), the privy council found it necessary to authorize the election of delegates from the Supplicants to confer with the executive: these delegates were called "The Tables." In 1638 the Supplicants signed the Covenant, and thenceforward became known by the name of Covenanters. [COVENANT.]

Supremacy, ACTS OF. (1) 26 Hen. VIII, c. 1 (1534), embodied the recognition of convocation, and enacted "that the king shall be taken, accepted, and reputed the only supreme head on earth of the Church of England," and that he shall have "full power to visit, repress, redress, reform, restrain, and amend all heresies, errors, and enormities, which by any manner of spiritual jurisdiction ought lawfully to be reformed." (2) 26 Hen. VIII, c. 13 (1534), or the Treason Act, made it high treason "to imagine or practice any harm to the king, or deprive him of any of his dignities and titles." Under this act More and Fisher suffered. (3) 1 Eliz. c. 1 (1559), "restoring to the Crown the ancient jurisdiction over the state ecclesiastical," and empowering the queen to visit, reform, and amend errors, heresies, and schisms as in Henry VIII's act. But some limitations were secured in the clause that nothing was to be judged as heresy but what was proved so out of the Bible, the canons of the four general councils, or what convocation and parliament should judge to be so. Elizabeth was also declared no longer "supreme head," but "supreme governor" of the Church. (4) 5 Eliz. c. 1 (1563) was a more stringent Act of Supremacy, with sterner penalties, and further obligations in new classes to take the oath of supremacy. By all the above acts the "oath of supremacy" was enforced.

Supremacy, THE ROYAL, was in its earlier forms merely the necessary result of the imperial rights of the English Crown. Even as against the Church, which in mediæval times was in a sense a state within the State, there are many mediæval examples of the exercise of the royal supremacy. The Customs of William I, preserved by Eadmer, the Constitutions of Clarendon, the Statutes of Provisors and Præmunire all embodied the principle. But Henry VIII brought out the principle with a new clearness in his definite claim to be "in all causes and over all persons as well ecclesiastical as civil supreme." Admitted with reservation by convocation, and enforced by acts of parliament, this newly-formulated doctrine soon proved incompatible with the power of the Papacy, and even with the independence of the English Church. Henry VIII's interpretation of the supremacy hardly put him in an inferior position to German princes whom the Reformation made summi episcopi of their dominions. Under it Cromwell received his extraordinary commission. Through it Somerset and Northumberland revolutionized the Church. Never abandoned even by Mary, it was asserted in a new and less insidious form by Elizabeth, and has ever since been part of the prerogatives of the British Crown.

Suraj-ud-Dowlah (d. 1757), ruler of Bengal, was grandson of Ali Vardi Khan, and succeeded him in 1756. He perpetrated the abominable crime of the Black Hole of Calcutta (1756—q.v.), was beaten by Clive at Plassey (1757), whence he fled, but was recaptured, brought back, and put ignominiously to death by Mir Jafar's son Miran (1757).

Surat is a town in the Konkan, in India, situated near the mouth of the Tapti. It was the port to Persia, and one of the largest cities in India. It was originally the chief English factory on the west coast. The Gaekwar and the Peshwa both had claims on it, but in 1800, in consequence of the misgovernment of the Nawab, Lord Wellesley ordered it to be annexed. The Gaekwar was easily persuaded to surrender his claim, and in 1802 by the Treaty of Bassein (q.v.) the Peshwa consented also.

Surat, THE TREATY OF (March 6, 1775), was concluded between the Bombay Presidency, without the authority of Calcutta, and Ragoba, a deposed Peshwa. Its stipulations were that the Bombay government should furnish Ragoba with 3,000 British troops; and that in return Ragoba should pay eighteen lacs of rupees a year, should make an assignment to the value of nineteen lacs, and should cede Salsette and Bassein.

Surgee Anjengaom, THE TREATIES OF (1) (December 4, 1803), concluded between the East India Company and Dowlat Rao Sindhia. Its stipulations were: the cession of all his territories lying between the Jumna and the Ganges, and north of the Rajput kingdoms of Jeypur and Jodhpur, the fortress and territory of Ahmadnagar in the Deccan, and Baroach, with its dependencies, in Gujarat; the relinquishment of all claims on the Nizam, Peshwa, Gaekwar, and British government; the recognition of the independence of all the British allies in Hindustan. (2) (November 23, 1805), concluded between the company and Dowlat Rao Sindhia. Its stipulations were that all the provisions of the first treaty which were not modified by the new arrangement were to remain in force; that Golind and Gwalior were to be restored to him as a matter of friendship, on his engaging to assign three lacs of rupees from the revenues to the Rana. Pensions which had been granted to different officers of his court were relinquished, and annuities were settled on himself, his wife, and his daughter. The Chumbul was to form the boundary of the two states.

Susa, THE PEACE OF (April 14, 1629), was made between England and France, through the mediation of the Venetian ambassador, Contarini, and largely through the good offices of Queen Henrietta Maria. It tacitly recognized the principle that each king was free to settle his dealings with his own subjects as he thought fit.

Suspending Power, THE, is that prerogative of the executive which claims to abrogate, for a longer or shorter period, the entire operation of a law. The royal letters patent from John onwards show how frequently the king suspended ordinances on trade, the collection of taxes, and shipping. Direct abrogation of statutes, though very rare, can be found from the reign of Edward I. Moreover, the many licences granted against the statutes on aliens, wool, corn, and, in the post-reformation period, on religion, amounted in many instances to a virtual suspension of these laws. The political changes wrought by the Puritan revolution affected this power even more than the dispensing power. When Charles II and James II employed it to secure toleration for their Dissenting subjects, parliament resisted and in 1689 declared it illegal.

Sussex, KINGDOM OF. According to tradition, the first Saxon attack upon Britain after the conquest of Kent by the Jutes was that under Ella and his three sons (one of whom, Cissa, is said, with little probability, to have given his name to Chichester). According to the "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle" the South Saxons, after landing with a small force at Selsey in 477, slowly fought their way eastward, conquering the strip of land between the Andredes-weald and the Channel, until in 491 they reached Anderida. After a desperate struggle the fortress was taken, and "all that were therein slain." But they were unable to advance farther, for immediately to the east of Anderida a dense forest belt came down to the sea and barred progress. The kingdom of Sussex was always one of the least important of the English powers. It fell under the overlordship, first of Kent and then, in the latter half of the seventh century, of Mercia. Hitherto it had remained heathen, but in 661 its king, Ethelwalch, was baptized in the presence of Wulfhere of Mercia, and at the same time the overlord added to his dominions the Jutish region of the Isle of Wight, and the lands of the Meonwara along Southampton Water, hitherto subject to Wessex. But the mass of the people were still heathen, and in 681-6 St. Wilfrid occupied his enforced leisure among them in bringing about their conversion. In 685 Ceadwalla brought Sussex under West Saxon supremacy, and from this time it ceases to have any separate history.

Sussex, KINGS OF. Besides Ella (q.v.), the traditional founder of the kingdom of Sussex, and according to Bæda the first English prince who held an imperium or *ducatu*s, few of the South Saxon princes were of importance. Even Ella's bretwaldaship could have meant little more than the command of a confederation of tribes united for purposes of war. Ethelwalch, the first Christian king, and his successor, Eadric, fell in battle against Ceadwalla of Wessex at the end of the seventh century. Mention is also found of the names of Huna, Numa or Nunna, Nothelm and Wattus, as ruling under Ine, and of Osmund, Ethelbert, and Sigebert as later princes.

Suttee was the Hindu custom of burning the live widow with the dead husband. It was practised for twenty centuries, and is supposed to be of religious origin, but was really grafted on the original Hindu law, owing to the unwillingness among the Brahmins that the widow should acquire her settled property and celebrate the funeral rites of her husband. The British were at first afraid to interfere, fearing that it would create a religious excitement against the British rule. Lord William Bentinck, however, determined to abolish this custom, and on December 4, 1829, passed a regulation which declared the practice of suttee illegal, and punishable by the criminal courts as culpable homicide. Not the slightest feeling of alarm or resentment was exhibited. A few attempts at suttee were prevented by the police, and now the practice is a matter of history.

Sveaborg, THE BOMBARDMENT OF (August 9-11, 1855), took place during the Crimean War by the second Baltic expedition, under Admiral Dundas. It opened on the morning of August 9, and shot, shell, and rockets were rained into the fortress from British gun and mortar boats, and the batteries which the French had established on one of the many neighbouring islands. By the morning of the 11th it was computed that no less than one thousand tons of shot and shell had been thrown into the place by the British alone. Finding the destruction of the stores and arsenals and every building of importance to be complete, the admiral resolved to make no further attempt on the fortifications themselves.

Swanimote Court, THE, was a forest court. The term has been used at different times to describe various types of court, but originally it meant that which, under the terms of the Charter of the Forest, met three times yearly to deal with business connected with agistment, pannage, and fawnage. Later it is used to denote the inquisitions held to inquire into trespasses to vert and venison, which under Edward I became generalized. They were defined by a statute of 1306. All offences against the forest law, or misdoings of forest officials, could be presented at these inquisitions, which were held in the presence of a deputy of the justice of the forest, most of the forest officials, and a jury. In some places, further, the lords of chase held courts called Swanimotes. [FORESTS.]

Sweating Sickness, THE, was the name given to a most destructive malady which ravaged Europe, and more particularly England, during the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. Beginning in the form of a violent fever, accompanied by a profuse fetid perspiration, it speedily reduced its victims to a state of utter helplessness and prostration, a few hours only sufficing, as a general rule, to transform a healthy, vigorous man into a loathsome corpse. The mortality caused by a plague of this mysterious and deadly character was enormous, and in England, where its effects were more severely felt than in any other part of Europe, it resulted, according to Stow, in a marked depopulation of the kingdom. The first appearance of the "sweating sickness" in England was in August 1485, when, breaking out seemingly among Henry VII's troops at Milford Haven, it spread with fatal rapidity to London. Here, and generally, the plague raged furiously till about the end of October, when its force began to abate, till eventually on New Year's Day, 1486, all traces of it disappeared. In July 1517 it again broke out among the people, and ran a violent course of six months. In May 1528 its ravages brought about an almost total suspension of business. On this occasion the plague lasted on till July 1529. Its next appearance was in April 1551, when it destroyed in the space of a few days 960 of the inhabitants of Shrewsbury, whence it spread rapidly. It again took its departure in September, and with the exception of a short interval in 1575, when the sickness caused a vast number of deaths, principally in Oxford, we have no record of any subsequent renewal of the visitation. A remarkable circumstance connected with the "sweating sickness" was the comparative freedom which foreign residents in England enjoyed from its effects; upon the native-born population alone, for the most part, and chiefly on the upper classes among them, did the sickness exercise its deadly influence. Hence it has been supposed that the malady was largely due to the immoderate indulgence in beer so common among all classes of English people in the days of the Tudors.

Sweden, RELATIONS WITH. There were practically no dealings between England and Sweden during the Middle Ages. Gustavus Vasa at last freed the merchants of Sweden from the commercial yoke of the Lübeckers, as he had previously freed the country from the political yoke of Denmark. A commercial treaty of 1551 between England and Sweden marks the beginning of a trade which ultimately became important. The general leaning of Sweden to France, however, made really cordial political intercourse impossible. Half-mad King Eric's proposal to marry Queen Elizabeth (1560) must not be taken too seriously. Charles IX sought in 1599 the alliance of Elizabeth and her mediation between Sweden and Denmark. Gustavus Adolphus welcomed Scottish settlers into his new commercial town of Gothenburg. But the weak and uncertain policy of James I and Charles I determined Gustavus not to embroil himself in the Thirty Years' War until he had found in Richelieu a stronger ally than the English kings. Though many Englishmen served in his army, and English subsidies and troops were slowly doled out to him, he found no substantial help from England, and both his opposition to an unconditional restoration of the Elector Palatine and Charles I's desire that Germany should be freed from foreign conquerors prevented any close relations between the two countries. Towards the end of Christina's reign England and Sweden drew nearer together, as is shown by Whitelocke's famous embassy in 1654, the treaty of amity concluded by him, and Christina's acceptance of Cromwell's portrait. Though Charles X was generally supported by England in his Danish war, his unexampled success necessitated the union of England and Holland to force on him a peace which would prevent his obtaining the exclusive possession of the Sound. A common corruption and dependence on France united England and Sweden under the minority of Charles XI. In 1667 both countries reversed their policy and united with Holland to check France by the Triple Alliance (q.v.). This wise policy was, however, not pursued again until after 1680, when Charles XI became master of his kingdom and declared against France, an act which secured his friendship with the England of the Revolution. His last act was to mediate at the Congress of Ryswick (1697). But Sweden and England really belonged to very different political systems—a fact strongly illustrated by the very slight connexion of Charles XII and his northern wars with the War of the Spanish Succession raging at the same time. Charles, however, found on his return from Bender that the Elector of Hanover had seized his German duchies of Bremen and Verden; and his anxiety to recover these was a strong motive for his union with Peter of Russia and Alberoni against George I, and of his schemes to restore the Pretender. Hence Great Britain welcomed the oligarchical revolution, which, on his death, rendered Sweden powerless for nearly two generations. During these "Times of Freedom" the British and Russian ambassadors jointly bribed and intrigued to obtain the supremacy of the "Caps" over the "Hats," though events showed that the Swedish alliance was hardly worth its cost. Twice the ascendancy of the French party involved Sweden in war, first against Great Britain and Russia in 1741-3, next against Prussia, the ally of Great Britain during the Seven Years' War. The failure of both wars restored the Caps to power. At last, in 1772, Gustavus III, with French help, got rid of the corrupt oligarchy of placemen, which was almost a parody of the British Whig connexion. His action was very much resented in Great Britain, and his share in the Armed Neutrality (q.v.) showed that he had become anti-British in policy.

But the abandonment by the younger Pitt of the old British policy of alliance with Russia led to a change in relations with Sweden, and Gustavus's vain attack on Russia (1788-90) was a welcome though ineffectual help to Pitt's plans. At the end of his reign Gustavus's fury against the French Revolution brought him into the coalition against France. But he was assassinated in 1792, and Gustavus IV, though in 1800 he joined the Armed Neutrality, in 1805 united with Pitt in the coalition against France. But after the Treaty of Tilsit the Russians deprived him of Finland, and, having offended the British general of the forces sent to his assistance, he was compelled to resign his throne to his uncle Charles XIII, who sought by adopting a French marshal (Bernadotte) as his heir to appease the fury of Napoleon. Nevertheless the Crown Prince—as Bernadotte was now called—joined in the alliance which dethroned his old master in 1815. Since that period Sweden has had no very striking direct political dealings with Great Britain. Her commercial relations have for the last two centuries been of importance.

Sweyn, King of Denmark (d. 1014), during the lifetime of his father, Harold Bluetooth, threw off the Christianity which had been forced upon him, and distinguished himself as a Viking chief. In 994 he joined forces with Olaf Trygvason (q.v.) in an attack upon England; and was paid by Ethelred 16,000 pounds of silver as Danegeld. In 1002 the murder of his sister in the massacre of St. Brice's Day gave him a new motive of hostility, and in the next year Sweyn, who had in the meantime established himself in Denmark, returned to England at the head of a great army. He retired after ravaging Wessex, returning again in 1004 and 1006. Therafter he did not appear again in person until 1013, when he began the systematic conquest of the country. All the Danelagh submitted at once, and the flight of Ethelred to Normandy and the submission of the West Saxons made him practically ruler of England (1013). But as he was never crowned, the chroniclers call him Sweyn the Tyrant. His death in February of the next year left the throne open to his greater son, Canute.

Sweyn, eldest son of Godwin (d. 1052), was in 1043 appointed to an earldom, which included the shires of Hereford, Gloucester, Oxford, Berks, and Somerset. We read of his wars with the Welsh, and in 1046, on his return from one of these expeditions, he abducted Eadgifu, Abbess of Leominster. Being forbidden to marry her, he threw up his earldom and retired to Denmark. In 1049 he made overtures to Edward for the restoration of his earldom, which had been divided between Harold and Beorn, but his chances of pardon were destroyed by his treacherous murder of Beorn. Declared a nothing by the army, he escaped to Flanders, but in the next year he was restored to his possessions by Edward. In 1051 he was outlawed with his father, and once more retired to Flanders, but did not return with Godwin. "The blood of Beorn, the wrongs of Eadgifu lay heavy on his spirit," a pilgrimage to the Holy Land could alone expiate his crimes. Thither he went barefooted, and on his return "breathed his last in some unknown spot of the distant land of Lycia."

Swift, JONATHAN (1667-1745), was born at Dublin, and educated there at Trinity College. In 1688 he was received into the family of Sir William Temple, to whom he was related. In 1695 he was ordained, but soon resigned a small Irish living, and returned to reside with Temple. During his residence with Temple began his mysterious connexion with Esther Johnson, the "Stella" of his Journal. In 1699, failing of promotion to an English living, Swift went to Ireland as chaplain to Lord Berkeley, and was scantily rewarded by receiving, not the deanery which he had expected, but the living of Laracor, in the county of Meath. Swift began his political career as a Whig. In 1704 he published the "Tale of a Tub," a satire on the corruptions of early Christianity and the results of the Reformation. The "Battle of the Books" (1704), on the literary dispute about the "Epistles of Phalaris," added to his reputation. During Anne's reign he paid frequent and protracted visits to England, and became closely connected with the leading Tories. During the last five years of Anne's reign he played a very prominent part in English politics as the leading political writer of the Tories, and the friend and confidant of their leaders. He was on terms of the closest intimacy both with Harley and Bolingbroke, and attempted to allay the quarrel between the rival statesmen. His pamphlet, "The Conduct of the Allies" (1711), was of immense service to the Tory party; and in a paper called the Examiner he upheld their cause with zeal, and supplied the ministry with arguments (November 1710–June 1711). In 1713 he received the deanery of St. Patrick's, Dublin. There he is thought to have been secretly married to "Stella." She died in 1728. On the death of Anne the dean retired to Dublin a disappointed man. In 1724 he wrote the "Drapier Letters," an attack on the monopoly to coin halfpence which had been granted to a man named Wood; and this was followed by several other tracts on Irish affairs in which the treatment of Ireland by the English government was satirized with unsurpassed power. In writing of Ireland Swift thought chiefly of the English colony in Ireland; but his writings made him the idol of the whole Irish people. In 1726 appeared his greatest work, "Gulliver's Travels." Swift outlived his genius, and sank into idiocy; the last years of his life were spent in almost complete mental darkness. Apart from his literary renown, Swift owes his position in history to the fact that in his writings we have the Tory view of politics in Queen Anne's reign set forth with the greatest literary skill. In Irish politics he is the typical representative of the Protestant ascendancy in Ireland, whose attack on the English government prepared the way for Grattan and the Volunteers (q.v.) of 1779.

"Swing, CAPTAIN," was the name under which, during the agricultural outrages of the year 1830, which had their origin in the increased use of machinery for agricultural purposes, threatening letters were frequently sent to those proprietors who made use of machinery, ordering them to refrain from doing so, and threatening notices were affixed to gates and barns. This nickname was used in order to identify the various documents with the same movement.

Swinton, SIR JOHN, was a Scottish knight who fought with great gallantry at the battle of Homildon Hill, where he was slain (1402). His son, also named John, crossed over to the aid of France with the Earl of Buchan, and was present at the battle of Beaugé (1421), where he unhorsed the Duke of Clarence. In 1424 he was killed at Verneuil.

Swithin (SWITHUN), ST. (d. 862), was not, as has often been asserted, a monk of Winchester, but was probably a secular clerk who won the favour first of Ecgbert and then of his son Ethelwulf. The latter appointed him Bishop of Winchester (852) and retained him as one of his chief counsellors. He was regularly canonized; and his cathedral church, originally dedicated to St. Peter and Paul, was called by his name from the tenth to the sixteenth century.

Swordsmen was the name given to the able-bodied Irish who in 1652 were allowed to leave their country and enlist abroad. Some 30,000 or 40,000 are said to have availed themselves of this permission. At first this was only a private arrangement between the Irish leaders and the Puritan generals to whom they surrendered. But Parliament legalized their capitulations by a special act; at the same time banishing all officers, while allowing them to enlist more recruits. Spain, France, Austria, and Venice took advantage of this opportunity for strengthening their forces.

Swynford, CATHERINE (d. 1403), successively governess, mistress, and third wife to John of Gaunt, was the daughter of Sir Payne de Roelt, who came to England with Queen Philippa, and widow of Sir Hugh Swynford. From her are descended the Beauforts, and consequently Henry VII. Her marriage with John of Gaunt took place in 1396, but all her children were born previously.

Tables, THE, was the name given to a national council in Scotland, formed in 1637 to represent all those who objected to the New Service Book, and other changes which the Scottish council, under orders from Charles I, was attempting to introduce. It was virtually an extraordinary parliament, its sixteen members being elected equally from the four classes of nobles, barons, clergy, and burgesses. The creation of the Tables was sanctioned by the privy council in 1637, as a means of intercourse between the Supplicants (q.v.) (or opposition, which included almost the whole nation) and the Crown. The following account of them is given in Gordon, "Scots Affairs":—"These sixteen thus choosen were constitute as delegates for the rest, who were to treat with the Council thereafter in name of the rest, and to reside constantly where the Council sat. These delegates thus constitute were appointed to give intelligence to all quarters of the kingdom to their associates of all that passed betwixt the King, the Council, and them; to correspond with the rest, and to receive intelligence from them, and to call such of them with the mind of the rest as they thought expedient." The council soon discovered that in authorizing the creation of the Tables they had called into being a representative body of an extremely troublesome and dangerous nature. In 1638, on the publication of a proclamation of the king exonerating the bishops, the Tables summoned their adherents to meet at Stirling, and issued the famous Protestation, declaring the "king to be deceived by the prelates, and to be personally guiltless of the whole." Shortly afterwards they issued the Covenant (q.v.), compelling persons to sign allegiance to it all over Scotland. To the Tables is due the organization of the Glasgow Assembly of 1638, and the indictment of the bishops in the same year. It was the Tables, moreover, which made preparations for the war that broke out the following year.

Tackers, THE (1704), was the name given to a party of zealous Tories, headed by Nottingham, who proposed, in imitation of a plan which had been resorted to in the previous reign in the case of the Irish Resumption Bill, to tack the Occasional Conformity Bill (q.v.) to the New Land Tax Bill, "so that the peers could not fling out the proposal of intolerance without losing the proposal of supply." The moderate Tories, however, headed by Harley and St. John, voted against them, and they were routed by 251 votes to 134.

Tahiti Question, 1842-4. In September 1842 the French admiral, Du Petit-Thouars, extorted a convention from Queen Pomare, by which the French assumed possession of the island of Tahiti. The question was taken up by Great Britain with great vigour. The French government professed that it did not desire the annexation, but merely the protectorate of the island. The French people were, however, most indignant. Popular feeling ran high in both countries, and it was only the moderation of the governments, which preserved peace. In 1844 the two governments were once more embroiled by the indiscretion of the French officials in Tahiti. They had made themselves most objectionable to the natives, and on the night of March 2 one of their sentinels was seized and disarmed. This was made the pretext for seizing and imprisoning George Pritchard, the British consul and a prominent missionary, who was peculiarly obnoxious to the Roman Catholics (March 5, 1844). He was released only on the condition of his instantly leaving the Pacific. This outrage created a profound indignation in Great Britain, and Sir Robert Peel denounced it in parliament as a gross indignity. After some months of negotiation the queen's speech of 1845 announced that the question had been satisfactorily settled, and an indemnity given to Pritchard.

Tailboys, ELIZABETH BLOUNT, LADY (d. 1540?). [BLOUNT.]

Talavera, THE BATTLE OF (July 27 and 28, 1809), was perhaps the most important, as it certainly was one of the most hard-fought, of the earlier battles of the Peninsular War. The town of Talavera de la Reyna stands on the left bank of the Tagus, 42 miles west of Toledo, in a small plain bounded on the north and west by a range of low hills. Wellesley extended his line along these hills and occupied an old ruined building, the Casa des Salinas, in the plain, while Cuesta with the Spaniards, who composed two-thirds of the allied army, was posted in front of the town on his right. Early on the 27th the British division in the Casa des Salinas was surprised by French skirmishers, but was quickly rallied by Wellesley in person, and withdrawn to the hills, where they formed up behind the troops already posted there. Victor opened a heavy fire on the position, which towards evening was suddenly attacked. The Germans, who were in advance, were completely surprised; but Donkin in the rear repulsed the attack. The French, however, seized an unoccupied eminence on his left, from which they annoyed the British until Hill by hard fighting drove them from it, just as darkness put an end to the fight. At dawn on the 28th a violent onslaught was made on the British left, but the French were driven off with a loss of 1,500 men. Both sides rested under the scorching heat of a mid-summer sun; but the British were very short of supplies and were almost starving. In the afternoon the French renewed the attack and fell on the British right, where they were quickly repulsed in confusion. Meanwhile a threatened attack on the left had been checked by a reckless charge of the dragoons, while in the centre the French were completely defeated. The British, however, were too much exhausted to pursue, and the Spaniards could not be trusted, so that Wellesley achieved only the opening up of a safe retreat. He had, however, gained a reputation which was of immense value to him. The losses were roughly 1,000 Spaniards, 6,000 British, and 9,000 French.

Talbot, CHARLES, 12TH EARL OF SHREWSBURY, afterwards the only DUKE OF (1660-1718), came of a Roman Catholic family, but adopted the reform faith as early as 1679. He was one of the seven who signed the invitation to William of Orange. He became secretary of state in William III's first ministry; but he early quarrelled with Nottingham, and finding himself powerless against the superior powers of Carmarthen, he began to intrigue with the Jacobite court at St. Germain. In 1690 William was obliged to dismiss him. But at length, in 1694, the personal request of William overcame his reluctance to resume office, and he was rewarded with a dukedom and the Garter. In 1696 he was gravely implicated in the confession of Sir John Fenwick (q.v.). He at once wrote to the king declaring that Fenwick's charges were exaggerated. William forgave him; but Shrewsbury, overwhelmed with remorse, retired from London. Again, a spy named Matthew Smith accused him of having been privy to the Assassination Plot (q.v.). William himself offered to prove his innocence, and he was declared guiltless by the peers, but, unable to endure his recollections, he left England. For five years he lived at Rome. On his return he deserted the Whig party, being angry because he could not get office. As member of the opposition he defended Sacheverell (q.v.) in the House of Lords. In 1710 the queen, wishing to drive Godolphin from office, made Shrewsbury lord chamberlain without consulting that minister. In 1711 he deserted the ministry, and joined his old colleague, Nottingham, in an attack on the proposed peace; but in 1713, on the death of the Duke of Hamilton, he went to Paris as ambassador, with instructions to inform M. de Torcy that peace must be concluded. During the last year of Anne's life his views on the succession question seemed doubtful. In October 1713 Bolingbroke, probably imagining that he was in favour of a Stuart restoration, sent him to Ireland as lord-lieutenant. He himself declared he accepted the office "because it was a place where a man had business enough to prevent him falling asleep, but not enough to keep him awake." But the elections going against the government, and a contest impending between the two Houses of the Irish parliament, he returned to England to watch the course of events. At Queen Anne's deathbed he was introduced by a deputation and the white staff of treasurer put into his hands. "Use it," said the queen, "for the good of my people." This coup d'état was the result of a consultation between himself and the Dukes of Argyll and Somerset. By this stroke on the part of the Whig leaders Bolingbroke's schemes were overthrown. [St. JOHN.] Until George I arrived in England several great offices were united in Shrewsbury's hands, but henceforth he ceased to take an active part in politics.

Talbot, FRANCIS, 5TH EARL OF SHREWSBURY (1560), a distinguished soldier, did good service in suppressing the Pilgrimage of Grace (q.v.) in 1537. In 1544 he was associated with Lord Hertford in the expedition to Scotland, and again led an army thither four years later. During the reign of Mary he was much favoured by the queen, though he opposed her marriage with Philip II of Spain. In spite of his religion he was admitted by Elizabeth to her privy council, but his unqualified opposition to the Act of Supremacy (1559) lost him her favour.

Talbot, GEORGE, 6TH EARL OF SHREWSBURY (1528 ?-1590), was appointed guardian of Mary, Queen of Scots, at Tutbury, Wingfield, and Chatsworth (1569), and treated her so well as to incur the suspicion of disloyalty towards Elizabeth. In 1571 he was privy to the Ridolfi conspiracy (q.v.), but subsequently returned to his allegiance. He presided at the trial of the Duke of Norfolk in the capacity of lord high steward (1572), and afterwards was present as earl marshal at the execution of Mary (1587). He was to the last unable so to establish himself in the confidence of his sovereign as to be exempt from such starts of suspicion and fits of displeasure as kept him in a state of continual apprehension.

Talbot, JOHN, 1ST EARL OF SHREWSBURY (1388 ?-1453), was a younger son of Richard, 4th Baron Talbot. He married the daughter and heiress of Lord Furnivall. On suspicion of Lollard tendencies he was imprisoned in the Tower early in Henry V's reign, but was soon afterwards released and appointed lieutenant of Ireland (1414), a post which he held for some years, though frequently serving in France, where he was one of the strongest supports of the English rule. In 1429 he was defeated and taken prisoner in the battle of Patay, but three years later was exchanged. In 1442 he was created Earl of Shrewsbury, and in 1447 Earl of Waterford. In 1452 he was sent out with troops to France, and captured Bordeaux; but in the next year he was defeated and slain at Castillon. His bravery gained for him the title of "the English Achilles," and with his death the loss of the English conquests in France was assured.

Talbot, RICHARD, EARL OF TYRCONNEL (1630-91), was one of the most dissolute and abandoned of the persons attached to Charles II's court. In 1660 he took the lead in the infamous plot to defame the character of Anne Hyde. In 1678, after being engaged in a long course of devious intrigues, he was arrested as a Catholic conspirator and banished. In 1685, however, he was restored to favour, and created Earl of Tyrconnel, and the following year sent to Ireland as commander-in-chief. He now became the champion of the Irish Catholics, and went to England, where he tried to persuade James to repeal the Act of Settlement (q.v.). He returned to Ireland in February 1687, as lord deputy. The magistracy, the judicial bench, and the corporations were at once filled with Catholics, and the troops encouraged in all excesses against Protestants. When the news of James's flight reached Tyrconnel in 1689 he raised over 100,000 men, and in February Londonderry and Enniskillen alone held out against him. At the Boyne he commanded the Irish infantry. In 1690 he was for abandoning Limerick, left it to its fate so far as he himself was concerned, and went to France. In the spring of 1691 he returned to Ireland and was received with great respect, though the Irish had asked for a more energetic leader, and though it was known that he hated Sarsfield and St. Ruth. The fall of Athlone was attributed to his favouritism of Maxwell, and he had to leave the camp and go to Limerick. After Aghrim he was in better favour, but died in August 1691.

Biography by P. W. Sergeant, 1913.

Tallage. [An arbitrary tax fixed by the feudal lord and levied upon his dependents. One of the characteristics of unfree tenure was liability to capricious tallage. Towns on the royal demesne were subject to the payment of tallage whenever demanded; and the burgesses, whose administration of the borough's revenue in the fixed form of firma burgi gave them experience in assessment, were loaded with like responsibility of collecting the occasional tax.] In the Pipe Roll 31 of Hen. I appears a town aid, auxilium burgi, or civilatis, which seems to answer to the Danegeld in the counties. It is set down in the roll among the ordinary receipts, and it is probable, therefore, that it was an annual payment; but how long it had been exacted it is impossible to determine. After 1163 Danegeld disappeared, but its place was taken, so far as the towns and demesne lands of the Crown were concerned, by a tax described loosely as donum or assisa, but to which the term tallage came later to be definitely attached. The amount to be paid by each county and town was assessed by officers of the exchequer in special fiscal circuits, or by the justices in eyre; in the towns themselves the civic authorities, whoever they may have been, decided how much each citizen was to pay—a power the abuse of which led to the rising in London under William Fitz-Osbert. As the king had the right of tallaging his demesne, so the barons had the right of tallaging theirs; and towns frequently declared they were liable to the royal tallaging in order to escape the heavier exactions of their lords. The exchequer, however, succeeded in gaining a general control over these seigniorial tallages; special permission became necessary before an imposition could be made, and when escheated baronies were regranted it was always with the condition that tallage should only be paid to the lord when the king taxed his own demesne. As late as 1305 the king, probably to prevent opposition to the tallage imposed the year before, granted leave to the barons to tallage their own ancient demesnes as he had tallaged his. The seigniorial right was gradually bought off by the communities, and early disappears. In the Confirmation of the Charters in 1297 Edward I promised only to renounce “aids, tasks, and prises,” words which might fairly be interpreted not to include tallage from demesne lands. The document known as “De Tallagio non Concedendo” (q.v.), in which the king expressly renounces the right of tallage, and which has been accepted by Hallam as the basis of his argument on this point, was merely an unauthoritative abstract of the original articles. After 1297 tallage was demanded three times: in 1304, in 1312—when it was objected to by London, not on account of illegality, but on the ground that the metropolis was exempted from such payments by Magna Carta—and in 1332, when, upon the remonstrance of parliament, the commissions were withdrawn, and a tenth accepted instead. Finally, by a statute of 1340, “the real Act ‘De Tallagio,’” it was enacted that the nation should no more “make any common aid or sustain charge” but by consent of parliament—words wide enough to include all unauthorized taxation. After this date it was never exacted, though until the end of the reign the Commons were uneasy, and occasionally petitioned that it might not be imposed.

Tallage was, as Gneist observes, a natural product of feudalism. As military service became the burden of a particular class, it seemed equitable that those who were exempt should contribute by taxation to the national defence. Two causes contributed to ensure for the tallaged class in England more considerate treatment than abroad. In the first place the fyrd, or national militia, had been maintained, though partly for other purposes, so that the tallaged had weapons in their hands, with which they did good service; and secondly, the kings frequently promised not to raise the amount of tallage in order to gain an increase of the firma burgi.

Talmash (TOLLEMACHE), THOMAS (1651?–1694), first appears in command of the Coldstream Guards at the skirmish at Walcourt (August 1689), under the Duke of Marlborough. He served under Ginkel in Ireland, and distinguished himself greatly at the siege of Athlone (June 30, 1691), and at the battle of Aghrim (July 12). When the notice of parliament was directed to Solmes’s conduct at the battle of Steinkirk, it was requested that his place might be filled by Talmash, who, next to Marlborough, was universally allowed to be the best officer in the army. He fought under William at the battle of Landen (July 19, 1693). He was soon afterwards sent in command of an expedition against Brest. The design was betrayed probably by Marlborough to James II, from motives of personal jealousy. Accordingly when Talmash attempted to land he was received by a terrible fire from the French troops, and received a mortal wound, “exclaiming with his last breath that he had been a victim of treachery” (June 8, 1694).

Tandy, JAMES NAPPER (1740–1803), a Dublin tradesman, commanded in 1782 the Phoenix Park Artillery. He was an ardent Irish “patriot,” and as early as 1784 began to correspond with France. He became a member of the Whig Club, and in November 1790 was secretary to the Dublin United Irishmen. In 1792 he had the audacity to challenge the solicitor-general; he was arrested, escaped, and rearrested the day before the close of the session, so that he was only in prison for a day. In 1795 he went over to America, but was in France in 1797, where he represented himself as an officer. In 1798, together with some other Irish rebels, he followed Humbert in a small vessel, but did not arrive in Ireland till after the defeat of the French at Ballinamuck, and at once fled and reached Hamburg in safety. On September 29, however, he was delivered up to the British. France afterwards declared war on Hamburg on his account. He was tried in Ireland, but was thought much too contemptible to be made a martyr of, and was liberated after the Peace of Amiens (1802).

Tanganyika. [EAST AFRICA, BRITISH DOMINIONS IN.]

Tangier, a seaport of Morocco, was taken by the Portuguese from the Moors in 1471, and ceded by them to England in 1662 as the dowry of Catherine of Braganza on her marriage with Charles II. Colonel Kirke was placed in command of the garrison. It was evacuated by the English in 1684, on account of the climate and the expense of the wars with the Mussulmans, and the works were destroyed. Tangier subsequently became a nest of pirates, who frequently enslaved British subjects, and whom the British government was not ashamed to subsidize in order to keep them quiet. During the reign of Soliman, however (1794-1822), Christian slavery was abolished and piracy suppressed. The place again became prominent at the Algeiras Conference of 1906 (q.v.), when, as a result of the hostile conduct of Raisuli towards Europeans, a regular police force was established, together with European control of the customs. In 1923 a convention was signed between Great Britain, France, and Spain (December 18, 1923-February 7, 1924), by which Tangier, under the sovereignty of the Sultan of Morocco, was declared a neutral international region.

Tanjore, THE STATE OF, was founded in the middle of the seventeenth century by Shahji, the father of Sivaji. In 1769 it was conquered by Madras in consequence of a quarrel with Mohammed Ali of the Carnatic, to whom the sovereignty was transferred. The court of directors, however, disapproved of this, and ordered that the raja should be restored, 1780. A succession dispute of 1786 led to Wellesley's assuming the entire administration of Tanjore in 1800, the raja being pensioned.

Tankerville, FORDE GREY, EARL OF (d. 1701). [GREY.]

Tantallon Castle, in Haddingtonshire, the stronghold of the Douglasses, was successfully defended (1528) against James V by the Earl of Angus, who had, however, soon afterwards to seek an asylum in England. It was destroyed by the Covenanters in 1639.

Tantia Topi (1819?-1895) was a Mahratta-Brahmin of the revolted Gwalior force in the Indian Mutiny (1857). He took the command, and on November 28 encountered General Windham at Cawnpore with some success. In 1858 he marched to the relief of Jhansi, but was routed at the Belwah by Sir Hugh Rose. Joined by the Rani of Jhansi, he concentrated his forces at Kuneh, but was beaten utterly. He then proceeded to Gwalior and incited an insurrection against Sindhia. He was beaten again by Sir H. Rose outside Gwalior, but escaped, and waged a predatory war for some time. His hiding-place was, however, betrayed; he was seized when asleep (April 7, 1859) in the jungle in Malwa, and was tried and executed (April 18).

Tara, THE HILL OF, situated in Meath, was in ancient days the residence of the kings of Tara. Near here on May 26, 1798, Lord Fingal, with some 400 fencibles and mounted yeomen, routed 3,000 Irish rebels, killing about 400. Here, too, on August 15, 1843, Daniel O'Connell held a monster meeting in support of Repeal, said to have been attended by 250,000 people.

Tara, KINGS OF. Till the seventh century the Ard Ri Eirind, or high king of Erin, resided in the palace of Tara. The kingdom of Meath, in which it was situated, formed his appanage. After the overthrow of the Hui Neills by Brian Boru (q.v.), at the beginning of the eleventh century, the position of King of Tara was held by one or another of the provincial kings; it resembled that of the Anglo-Saxon bretwalda. Under this over-king there was a complete hierarchy of provincial kings, princes, and nobles. The nature of the relations of these classes to each other was in most cases of the same shadowy nature as the overlordship of the King of Tara. [IRELAND.]

Tariff Reform Movement, THE, which began in 1903, was a fiscal policy directed towards giving a preference to colonial goods and protecting Imperial trade by means of retaliative tariffs on certain foreign goods. It was a natural development of the imperialist policy of the later nineteenth century, definitely formulated in the speech of Joseph Chamberlain at Birmingham on May 15, 1903. The movement excited great opposition from free-trade opinion, but it rapidly spread among the ranks of the Conservative Unionist party. The Tariff Reform League was founded in July, and Chamberlain's autumn campaign after his resignation from the Balfour cabinet stirred the country. During 1904 and 1905 the fiscal question remained a burning issue, until it finally split and routed the Unionist party. Mr. Balfour pleaded for a sinking of differences (November 14, 1905), and on Chamberlain still insisting on the adoption of his fiscal policy the government resigned (December 4). At the elections of January 1906 the Unionists were heavily defeated: Joseph Chamberlain was returned for Birmingham, but with only 156 others of his party. The Tariff Reform principle was definitely adopted by the Unionist party. Twenty years after its formulation it again became an election issue, resulting in the defeat of the Conservatives and the accession of the first Labour government (December 1923).

Tasmania, an island off the south-east corner of Australia and one of the original states to form the Commonwealth of Australia. [AUSTRALIA, COMMONWEALTH OF.]

Taunton was in all probability a Roman station. It was of considerable importance to the kingdom of Wessex; Ina built a castle there [about 700], and it was more than once attacked by the Welsh. After the Conquest the castle was rebuilt by the bishops of Winchester, to whom the town and manor were granted. It first returned a member to parliament in 1295. Taunton was held for some time by the pretender Warbeck, and during the Civil War sustained a long siege under Colonel Blake against the Royalists under Goring, until relieved by Fairfax. Jeffreys held his "Bloody Assize" at Taunton after the failure of Monmouth's rebellion, the duke having previously been proclaimed king there. The charter of the borough which was granted to it by Charles I [1627], was taken from it by Charles II [1677 renewed], and it remained unincorporated until after the Municipal Reform Act of 1835.

Taxation. In Anglo-Saxon times the witan alone had the power of imposing extraordinary taxation—a power which was, however, rarely used, as the public expenditure was amply defrayed by the rents of the public lands and by the obligation of trinoda necessitas. The only instances of extraordinary taxation before the Norman Conquest were the Danegeld (q.v.) and shippgeld. The former continued to be occasionally levied down to the reign of Henry II, and under Richard I was revived (in 1194) under the name of carucage. After the Norman Conquest the ordinary revenue proved far too small for the needs of the king, and as a consequence we find the finance of the country occupying much of the attention of the executive, whilst by degrees it was found necessary to increase extraordinary taxation to a very large extent. Up to the reign of Henry II the indirect taxation of the country, such as customs, was unimportant, while the extraordinary taxes, such as the Danegeld and scutage (q.v.) fell only on land. In 1188, however, an important innovation was introduced in the Saladin Tithe (q.v.), or the first tax on movables. This tax became very popular with succeeding kings. Under Richard I one-fourth of their goods was demanded from everyone; John levied one-seventh; and subsequent kings usually one-fifteenth in counties and one-tenth in towns. The imposition of taxes under the Norman kings had been practically at the will of the king, though the consent of the barons was often asked as a matter of form, and the exaction grew so heavy that Magna Carta provided (clause 12) that no extraordinary scutage or aid should be imposed by the king "unless by common counsel of our kingdom." The growth of representation is closely connected with the history of taxation, and it early became a recognized principle that the votes of those who were present bound those who were absent; whilst the idea that taxation required the consent of the taxed, which grew up after it became customary to tax movables, made it necessary to summon to parliament the knights of the shire (1254), and burgesses and lower clergy (1265) as well as the barons and the spiritual lords. The fact that we often find the different classes in the kingdom making grants of different rates is the result of the "right of self-taxation being recognized to the extent of each class of the community determining, independently of the rest, what amount it would contribute. The lords made a separate grant. The knights voted their own quota, and the burgesses theirs, while the clergy decided for themselves the amount of their taxation. By 1283 general grants in parliament were substituted for the system of negotiations with separate sections of the community. The Confirmation of the Charters by Edward I declared that henceforth no extraordinary tax should be levied without the consent of the whole kingdom, and a like promise was made in the statute De Tallagio non Concedendo (1297) (q.v.). From this time the exclusive right of parliament to impose taxation, though often infringed by the illegal exercise of prerogative, became an axiom of the constitution." In spite of this, however, Edward III, in the face of repeated remonstrances from the Commons (notably in the statute of 1340 forbidding all unparliamentary taxation), frequently resorted to arbitrary taxation, whilst Richard II raised forced loans; but under the Lancastrian kings we find but few cases of illegal imposts. From Richard II the old taxes of hidage (q.v.), scutage (q.v.), and tallage (q.v.) were replaced by subsidies. A tax imposed upon persons in respect of the reputed value of their estates in 1379–80, the imposition of a graduated poll tax, ranging from £4 to 4d., proved the immediate cause of the Peasants' Revolt (q.v.). Soon after this time it became customary to make a grant to each king for life at the beginning of his reign. This grant, under the name of tunnage and poundage (q.v.), continued to be made until the time of Charles I. The frequent demands for money by Henry VII and Henry VIII caused great dissatisfaction to the people. In 1523–5 the arbitrary exactions of Wolsey paved the way for his downfall. Direct taxation, however, formed only a small part of Tudor revenues. The bulk came from hereditary Crown lands, feudal incidents, purveyance, ecclesiastical dues, proceeds of justice, customs, and impositions, most of which were nominally dependent on a parliamentary vote at the opening of the reign. Parliamentary taxation consisted chiefly of the tenth and fifteenth (since 1334 a fiscal expression for a fixed sum—£30,000)—and the subsidy (£80,000). Up to 1588 it had been usual for the Commons to vote one subsidy (£80,000) and two-fifteenths on goods; but in that year two subsidies and four-fifteenths were granted, owing to the expense occasioned by the Spanish Armada, and from that date a larger number of subsidies were granted. The financial difficulties of the Stuarts led them to resort frequently to illegal imposts. In 1608, under James I, Cecil caused a "Book of Rates" to be issued, which laid heavy duties on merchandise, while the extortions of Charles I led to the first article in the Petition of Right, which provides that "no person from henceforth shall be compelled to make any loans to the king against his will, as having inherited this freedom, that he should not be compelled to contribute to any tax, tallage, aid, or other like charge not set by common consent in Parliament." Taxation under the Commonwealth was heavy; and on the abolition of feudal incidents and aids, excise and customs duties and hearth-money were granted to the king as compensation. In this reign, too, the control of the Commons over taxation (Commons and Lords concurred in grants until 1625) was much increased by the introduction of the custom of appropriation of supplies, while at the same time the Lower House established their right of initiating all money bills as laid down in a famous statute of 1407. In the reign of Charles II the clergy ceased to tax themselves in convocation. James II once more resorted to illegal and arbitrary taxation, and as a consequence the Bill of Rights declared that the king, amongst other things, had endeavoured to subvert the liberties of the kingdom "by levying money for and to the use of the Crown by pretence of prerogative, for other time and in other manner than the same was granted by Parliament," which was illegal. From the reign of William III the customs and excise duties gradually increased, while in 1690 a land tax of 3s. in the pound was imposed, and renewed annually. Walpole intensely disliked the land tax, and wished to abolish it as a means of conciliating the landed gentry and of keeping himself in office. His theory of taxation was that "that tax which is the most equal and the most general is the most just and least burdensome." Hence his Excise Scheme of 1733 [EXCISE]. He was defeated, however, and by 1742 the principle of a tax on luxuries was in operation. Windows, dogs, horses, and other things were taxed. In 1796 the legacy duty on personal property was imposed by Pitt (the real property tax not being imposed till 1833), and two years later the same minister taxed all incomes over £200. This tax was discontinued in 1816, but renewed by Sir Robert Peel in 1842, since which time it has continued to be levied, the rates being varied by parliament from time to time. [INCOME TAX.] In 1851 the window tax was replaced by a tax imposed on houses in proportion to their rental. The first permanent tax was hearth-money, imposed in 1662, up to which time taxes had been granted for a year, or other fixed term, as occasion demanded. After the Revolution, however, permanent duties increased. These were generally granted as a security for loans, and the financial policy of permanent taxes increased with the national debt and the extension of public credit. At the present day the power of taxation remains as it was in the days of Lord Chatham, who said—"Taxation is no part of the governing or legislative power. The taxes are a voluntary gift and grant of the Commons alone." Stages on the road to this situation are to be found in the Commons' Declarations of 1661, 1671, 1678, and 1860. Taylor, ROWLAND (d. 1555), was vicar of Hadleigh in Suffolk, to which living he was presented by Archbishop Cranmer in 1544. He was condemned by Bishop Gardiner and a tribunal composed of the bishops of London, Norwich, Salisbury, and Durham for his Protestantism; and on refusing to recant was burnt near Hadleigh, February 9, 1555. Foxe, who gives an affecting account of Taylor's martyrdom, says of him, that "he was a right perfect divine and parson."

Tea Duties, THE, were first imposed in 1660. In 1772 the East India Company, being in pecuniary difficulties, were allowed by parliament to export their teas from London warehouses to America free from English duties, and liable only to a small duty to be levied in the colony. Although by this arrangement the colonists obtained their tea cheaper than they would otherwise have done, they looked upon it as a mere bribe to induce them to consent to the right of Great Britain to tax America. Accordingly it was resolved to resist the imposition of the duty, and when the tea-ships arrived at Boston in December 1773 they were boarded and their cargoes thrown overboard. This was one of the incidents which ultimately led to the American War. In Great Britain the East India Company retained its monopoly until 1834. In 1836 new duties were imposed; these were at first 2s. 1d. in the pound, but they were reduced to 1s. 5d. in 1857, to 6d. in 1865, and to 4d. in 1890. They were raised to 6d. in 1900 and in 1904 to 8d.; reduced to 5d. in 1907; raised to 1s. in 1915; reduced to 8d. in 1922, and to 4d. in 1924.

Tea-room Party, THE. Under the Reform Bill of 1867 it was proposed that direct payment of rates by the occupier should be part of the qualification for the parliamentary franchise in boroughs. This excluded a great number of small occupiers who paid their rates through their landlord ("compound householders"). Gladstone proposed to move an Instruction, when the House went into committee, "to alter the law of rating," and to arrange that while the poorest occupiers were to be neither rated nor enfranchised, all above a certain line should both pay rates and have the vote. But forty-eight Liberals met on April 8 in the House of Commons tea-room, and agreed to support only the first clause of the Instruction as quoted above. Disraeli and Gladstone agreed; but in committee Gladstone gave notice of several important amendments, which Disraeli declared to be the relinquished instructions in another form. The support of the Tea-room Party enabled the government to defeat the amendments, but eventually it established household suffrage in boroughs.

Telegraphs, THE PURCHASE OF THE. In 1870 the government ventured on the bold step of acquiring possession of all the lines of electric telegraph in the United Kingdom, and making the control of communication by electricity a part of the general business of the post office (q.v.).

Templars, THE, or the Order of Knights of the Temple of Jerusalem, was a military religious order of knighthood which had its origin in 1118 in an association of knights for the protection of pilgrims to the Holy Land. In 1128 the infant order accepted the Benedictine rule, as recently reformed by the Cistercians. Henceforward its growth was rapid. The Templars did good service in the Crusades, for which they were rewarded with ample grants of land in different countries—England among the rest. They seemed to have appeared in this country early in the reign of Stephen, the first house of their order being established in Holborn. In 1185, however, they removed to more commodious quarters in Fleet Street. This, the New Temple, as it was called, was the chief house of the order in England, to which all the cells or preceptories were subject. The superior of the order was styled Master of the Temple and was frequently summoned to parliament in the late thirteenth and early fourteenth centuries. But the great wealth accumulated by the Templars in time began to excite the cupidity of the needy monarchs of Christendom, while their pride and alleged licentiousness earned them a general unpopularity. Philip the Fair of France determined on their suppression, and obtained the co-operation of his son-in-law, Edward II. In England the order was suppressed in 1308 without the great cruelties practised in France. The knights were allowed to enter monasteries, and their possessions were for the most part given to the Hospitallers, or Knights of St. John (q.v.).

Temple, HENRY JOHN, 3RD VISCOUNT PALMERSTON (1784-1865), was the eldest son of Henry, 2nd viscount. He succeeded to the title, which was in the Irish peerage, in 1802, and was promptly chosen by the Tory party in the University of Cambridge to contest the seat, but without success. In 1807, however, he began his parliamentary career as the representative of Newtown (Isle of Wight), and two years later became secretary of war in the Duke of Portland's administration. This office he held under successive governments until 1828, and aided the Duke of Wellington in his great exploits as far as a rotten military system permitted. Palmerston early attached himself to the more liberal section of the Tories, which was led by Canning and Huskisson, and he followed the latter out of office in May 1828. He now joined the Whigs, and in 1830 accepted the foreign secretaryship under Earl Grey, playing an honourable part in the negotiations which led to the independence of Belgium, to the settlement of the Spanish and Portuguese questions, and to the European resistance to the designs of Mehemet Ali, which brought him into so much odium in France. Having retired from office with the rest of his colleagues in 1841, he returned with them, and again became foreign secretary in 1846. Palmerston's attitude towards the European revolutions of 1848, and the quarrel with Greece about the Don Pacifico affair (q.v.), caused his foreign policy to be called in question; a vote of censure was passed upon it in the House of Lords, but in the House of Commons an amendment, moved by J. A. Roebuck in favour of the government, was carried by a majority of forty-six, Palmerston making a magnificent speech on the status of British subjects abroad (June 1850). In 1852 he was dismissed from office by the queen, acting on the advice of Lord John Russell, for expressing, entirely on his own responsibility, the government's approval of Louis Napoleon's coup d'état. In spite of Disraeli's saying, "There was a Palmerston," he promptly defeated his late leader on the Militia Bill, and having declined office in Lord Derby's stillborn ministry, became home secretary in Lord Aberdeen's coalition cabinet (December 1852). In that capacity he inaugurated the ticket-of-leave system, but he was chiefly employed the while in studying the Eastern question, and urging his colleagues forward to the war with Russia. On the fall of the Aberdeen administration before Roebuck's vigorous attack, it was felt that Palmerston was, as he said, l'inévitable, and in February 1855 he became prime minister. After the peace a period of languor followed until, in 1857, the government was defeated on Cobden's motion condemning the measures taken in "the lorcha Arrow" affair, when Palmerston appealed to the country, and came back again to power with a larger majority than before. The Indian Mutiny was followed by his bill for the transference of the authority of the East India Company to the Crown. In February 1858 he was most unexpectedly defeated over the Conspiracy to Murder Bill, caused by Orsini's attempt on the life of Napoleon III, but the Conservative administration that supplanted him proved short-lived, and in 1859 he came into power again as first lord of the treasury, and continued to hold that office until his death. During his administration the treaty of commerce with France was concluded (1860) through Cobden's exertions. He preserved strict neutrality during the American Civil War; in the Trent and Alabama affairs (q.v.) he displayed some want of wisdom. Then came the Maori War; the Polish insurrection of 1863, during which his distrust of the Emperor of the French compelled him to discountenance the idea of intervention; and the Schleswig-Holstein question, during which he uttered words that were universally interpreted to imply that Great Britain would intervene on behalf of Denmark. He died on October 18, 1865.

Temple, RICHARD TEMPLE GRENVILLE, EARL (1711-79). [GRENVILLE.]

Temple, SIR WILLIAM (1628-99), was the son of Sir John Temple, master of the rolls in Ireland. After being educated at Cambridge, and having spent some years in foreign travel, he returned to Ireland, becoming in 1660 a member of the Irish convention. In 1665 he was first employed on diplomatic business, being sent as an envoy to the Bishop of Munster, and the year following he was appointed ambassador to the court of Brussels, and devoted himself to endeavouring to form an alliance between England and Holland. His exertions were crowned in 1668 by the formation of the Triple Alliance (q.v.) against France, and the consequent peace of Aix-la-Chapelle. But the policy he had inaugurated was short-lived, and the Treaty of Dover (q.v.) made it necessary for the ministers to dismiss the author of the Triple Alliance; he was relieved of his office in 1671. On the fall of the Cabal ministry Temple was offered by Danby, who became lord treasurer, a secretaryship of state, but he refused and was appointed ambassador at The Hague. In 1675 he took an important part in the Congress of Nimeguen. In 1679 Danby was impeached and sent to the Tower, and Charles looked to Temple as the only man who could help him to weather the storm caused by the Popish Plot (q.v.). Temple's proposal was that a means should be adopted for including all parties in the government, and for this purpose he proposed that the existing privy council should be dissolved, and that a new privy council of thirty members should be appointed, half of whom to be great officers of state, and the other half independent noblemen and gentlemen of the greatest weight in the country; that the king should pledge himself to govern by the constant advice of this body, to suffer all his affairs of every kind to be freely dilated there, and not to reserve any part of the public business for a secret committee. An attempt was made to carry out this scheme, but it was soon found to be unworkable. The council was too large for practical purposes;

there was no party tie to bind the members together; and before long an interior cabinet was formed, consisting of Temple, Halifax, Essex, and Sunderland. Temple himself, however, was gradually ousted from the debates of the secret committee. In 1681 he retired from public life, and devoted himself chiefly to literary work. His chief works were his well-known "Essays," an "Account of the United Provinces," and an "Essay on Government."

Tenant-right, THE IRISH, is a custom by which the tenant is entitled not only to compensation for unexhausted improvements when he relinquishes his holding, but by which a sum is paid, sometimes amounting to as much as the fee-simple of the land, by the incoming to the outgoing tenant for the goodwill of the farm. This tenant-right, known as the Ulster Custom, was legalized by the Land Act of 1870, and extended to the rest of Ireland by later legislation. It is supposed to have arisen at the time of the plantation of Ulster (q.v.), the planters refusing to give definite leases of twenty-one years to their English and Scottish tenants, and they in disgust selling their interest in the holdings, and the value of their capital to the native Irish—a practice which was in direct contravention to the spirit of the settlement. Other systems of tenure which obtain in Ireland are: the cottier system, by which tenants bid against each other for a piece of land, no fixity of tenure being recognized until the act of 1881; and conacre, a feudal survival, by which land is granted to the tenant rent-free in return for so much labour. Tenure. [LAND TENURE.]

Terouenne, THE BATTLE OF, was fought at Guinegate, near Terouenne, August 16, 1513, during the campaign of the English under Henry VIII and the Imperialists under Maximilian in Flanders. The allies had formed the siege of Terouenne, and a body of French cavalry came up to relieve the town. The allies advanced in order of battle, and the French on seeing them were seized with panic, put spurs to their horses, and fled without a blow. The battle settled the fate of Terouenne, which capitulated on August 22.

C. H. Williams, "England Under the Early Tudors," 1925.

Territorial Army, THE. It had long been felt that the old volunteer force lacked scientific organization ; it had no cavalry ; its administrative services fell far short of requirements ; the strength of units varied remarkably and contained a large proportion of men unfit to take the field ; there was a deficiency of officers, and, in short, the force as a whole could not be seriously considered as an engine of war. Consequently, on taking office as secretary of state for war in 1905, it was a part of Mr. Haldane's army scheme to put an end to these shortcomings by uniting the auxiliary forces into a homogeneous body, recruited on a single simple principle. His ideal was a home army complete in itself—with the same branches and organization as the regular army. By the Territorial and Reserve Forces Act, 1907, the number of volunteer battalions was reduced and those remaining were renamed and reorganized, and a number of mounted brigades was formed from the Imperial Yeomanry, which became the cavalry of the territorial army. The administration—as distinct from the command and training—was placed in the hands of county associations. Each association is composed of officers from the territorial army in the county, representatives of the county, and borough councils, a president, vice-president, chairman, secretary, and treasurer—all nominated by the army council. Each association receives a grant from the army funds, and its business is to help in recruiting, in finding rifle ranges, manoeuvre grounds, etc., in clothing the men, and in all administrative work generally. Members of the territorial army were not liable for foreign service until, on the outbreak of the Great War, the first British territorial units crossed to France in September 1914. Every man is paid at service rates of pay during the time he is embodied or called out for consecutive training, and enlistment is for a term of four years. The training consists of a number of compulsory drills and an annual attendance in camp.

Test Act, THE (March 29, 1673), was a measure passed in the reign of Charles II, intended to exclude from office the Catholic councillors of the king. It was passed at the instance of Shaftesbury and the country party after the king had been compelled to abandon his attempt to dispense with the penal laws against Dissenters. It required all persons holding any office of profit or trust under the Crown to take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, receive the sacrament according to the rites of the Church of England, and subscribe the declaration against transubstantiation. This act was directed against the Catholics, but was equally operative against Dissenters. One consequence of it was that Arlington and Clifford had to retire from office, and the Duke of York was obliged to resign his post as lord high admiral. The act was not repealed until 1828.

C. Grant Robertson, "Select Statutes, Cases and Documents," 4th edn., 1923.

Test Act, THE, for Scotland (1681), imposed an oath which was made compulsory on all government and municipal officials. It declared a belief in "the true Protestant religion contained in the Confession of Faith," and disowned "all practices, whether popish or fanatic, which are contrary to or inconsistent with the said Protestant religion and Confession of Faith."

Tewkesbury, THE BATTLE OF (May 4, 1471), was, strictly speaking, the last battle fought in the Wars of the Roses, for the battle of Bosworth can hardly be included in those wars. Queen Margaret landed in England the very day that Warwick was defeated and slain at Barnet (April 14), but despite this severe blow to the Lancastrian cause, she was persuaded by Somerset and other lords of her party to continue her advance. She had landed at Weymouth, and at first marched westward to Exeter, where she was joined by reinforcements from Devon and Cornwall. She then moved eastward to Bath, but learning that Edward was marching against her, she determined to march to the north, where the chief strength of the Lancastrians lay. After a tedious march she reached Tewkesbury on May 3, and the next day Edward gave battle. The Lancastrians were utterly routed, owing in no small degree to the treachery or folly of Lord Wenlock, who neglected to bring up the reinforcements in time. Queen Margaret was taken prisoner, and her son, Prince Edward, either fell in the battle or was put to death immediately after. The Duke of Somerset and others, who had taken sanctuary, were beheaded two days after in the market-place at Tewkesbury. This decisive battle coming so soon after the victory of Barnet completely established Edward IV on the throne.

Thanet, THE ISLE OF, in the north-east of Kent, is still partly surrounded by the sea and the River Stour, but the passage called the Wantsum, which formerly separated it from the mainland, has been closed since the fifteenth century. As might be expected from its position, the island has frequently been the landing-place for invaders of England. There the Teutonic heroes Hengest and Horsa are said to have disembarked in 449, and it was the landing-place of more than one Danish invasion. Indeed, those buccaneers seem to have held part of the island from 853 to 865, and it was frequently subject to their raids. Several parishes in the isle of Thanet formed part of the Liberty of Dover.

Thegn was an Anglo-Saxon title bestowed on a class of persons who were inferior to the eorlas and æthel, the original nobility of blood, though superior to the ordinary landowners or ceorls. The thegns were, in origin, a nobility of service, and it is scarcely possible to distinguish them from the king's gesiths—that is, the members of his "comitatus," or personal following. Gradually, however, this characteristic of the thegn is lost sight of, and he becomes a landowner distinguished by having a larger amount of land than the ceorl—that is, five hides and upwards. From the end of the ninth century we scarcely hear of the gesith. The word "thegn" comes to include, on the one hand, those who stand in ministerial relation to the king; and on the other, those who are simply landowners, having the necessary qualifications, whether they were directly connected with the king or not. In fact, any ceorl who acquired five hides of land was regarded as of "thegn-right worthy." Other qualifications for thegnhood were the possession of a church, kitchen, and belfry; burh-geat and sell, the duty of service in the king's hall; while by the tenth century even the merchant who had fared three times over the sea at his own expense could claim the rights of a thegn. Among the thegns themselves there were numerous gradations in rank. The "king's thegn" was superior to the ordinary territorial thegn; and it would seem that the possession of forty hides of land entitled a thegn to the werigild and status of an earl. The werigild of the ordinary thegn was six times that of the ceorl, namely, twelve hundred shillings instead of two hundred. The dignity of thegn was hereditary, and the "thegn-born" were a semi-noble class, contrasting with the "ceorl-born." The attainment of thegn-right worth did not, however, at once ennoble the blood of a promoted ceorl. Only if his son and his son's son continued to prosper did the rank become hereditary with their descendants. The result of the increasingly close association of thegnhood with the holding of land was that by the end of the Anglo-Saxon period the thegn was beginning to assume more and more of the characteristics of the feudal knight. Domesday book shows us that long before the Conquest of 1066 the land of England was being steadily plotted out into 5-hide units, each of which was bound to produce its fully-armed miles for service with the host. The available evidence does not, however, support the view that the feudal knight was, in fact, a direct descendant of the Anglo-Saxon thegn. Knight service (q.v.) as it was known in Norman and Angevin England was introduced by the Conqueror, and was rendered specifically for the land and not, as was thegn-service, merely because of the land.

Thelusson's Case (decided in 1858) was of considerable legal importance, since it settled the question whether testators could dispose of their estates in order that the income should accumulate and form a large fortune, which should be limited in favour of certain descendants. The litigation arising out of the will of Mr. Thelusson lasted for over fifty years (1799-1858), and eventually the House of Lords decided that trusts for accumulation were legal. However, by the Act 39 and 40

George III, c. 93 (July 28, 1800), it had been provided that incomes should not be allowed to accumulate in this way for more than twenty-one years.

Theobald, Archbishop of Canterbury 1139-61, was abbot of Bec, in Normandy, and in 1138 came over to England at the invitation of King Stephen, by whose influence he was elected Archbishop of Canterbury. His authority was, however, weakened by the fact that there was a papal legate in England at the time, and that subsequently Henry of Blois, Bishop of Winchester, was invested with legatine authority. He opposed the election of William, the king's nephew, to the archbishopric of York, and in 1148, contrary to the commands of Stephen, attended the council held by Pope Eugenius at Rheims. On his return to England his temporalities were confiscated and he was compelled to flee once more to the continent. Reconciled to Stephen, he was in 1150 appointed legate by the pope. In 1152 he refused to crown the king's son, Eustace, and was again compelled to seek refuge from Stephen's anger in flight. He returned later in the year, and in 1153 was a strong advocate of the compromise with Henry of Anjou which was embodied in the Treaty of Wallingford (q.v.). As a patron of learning Theobald occupies an interesting position, and still more important is it that it was as a member of his household that Becket first came into prominence. Theobald was a man of marked ability, and was loyal, generous, and earnest in striving to do his duty. By relying on the help of the Roman see, and taking advantage of the civil disorder of Stephen's reign, he succeeded in raising the Church of England to a position of great power and did much to create the problems of Henry II and St. Thomas.

Theodore of Tarsus (c. 602-90), Archbishop of Canterbury 668-90, a Greek by birth, was selected by Pope Vitalian for the see of Canterbury on the death of the archbishop-elect, Wighard, at Rome. Theodore is an important personage in the history of the English Church. He it was who organized the Church and restored order out of the chaos which had been engendered by the great paschal controversy, only recently settled at Whitby. He developed the episcopal system, breaking up the large unwieldy dioceses, conterminous with the early kingdoms, into smaller and more manageable units. This policy involved him in a bitter feud with Wilfrid (q.v.), whose vast Northumbrian diocese Theodore subdivided into four. A reconciliation was not effected until 686, when Wilfrid was restored to the diminished see of York. He drew up the famous Penitential, which was the recognized text-book of confessors for many years. He did much to encourage learning, and was the first to introduce the study of Greek into England. His influence was well summed up in the sentence,

"the first archbishop whom all the English Church obeyed" (Bæda). Theodore summoned to Hertford in 673 a synod of the whole province to confirm the results of his work. He was the last of the Roman bishops; henceforth they were English.

[WESTMINSTER CONFERENCE.]

Theow was the Anglo-Saxon name for a slave. There were various kinds of slaves—the born slave, i.e., the child of slave parents; the captive, often a Briton; the voluntary slave, who sold himself to avoid starvation; the man who was sold into slavery because he could not pay his debts or the fine for a breach of the peace. Nominally the slaves were the goods and chattels of their lords, who had power of life and death over them; they had no legal rights, and no wergild, though in the eleventh century payments had to be made on their death both to their kinsfolk and to their lords. But in practice the theow had recognized rights. He was entitled to regular food and holiday, and any ill-treatment of him by his lord was punished by the Church. In addition to this he might purchase his own freedom with his savings, or he might be manumitted by his lord. After the Conquest the slave-class ceased to exist, and was merged with the lower ceorl into the general class of villeins. As far back as the sixth century we might conclude that slavery was an important social institution in this country, for "the chief source of communication between England and the continent at this time was the slave-trade." The well-known story of Pope Gregory and the English slaves suggests that these slaves were bought and sold in Rome. The laws of Ine forbade the practice of selling slaves of one's own nationality abroad. Their value in the seventh century in England was apparently a pound of silver, the continental prices ranging from three to six times this amount. At the Domesday period the toll paid on the sale of a man at Lewes was 4d. "Whilst only embracing nine per cent. of the whole population of England (at the Conquest), they were most numerous towards the south-west of England, less and less numerous as the Danish districts were approached, and absent altogether from Yorkshire, Lincolnshire, and bordering districts" (Seebohm).

Thirlby, THOMAS (1506 ?–1570), Bishop of Westminster, Norwich, and Ely, one of the commissioners at Gravelines in 1545, was sent in 1553, in conjunction with Sir Philip Hoby, to Brussels on a mission to the Emperor Charles V. Under Mary he took an active part in the persecution of the Reformers in 1558, and was sent, with two other commissioners, to settle the preliminaries of peace with France. He refused to take the oath of supremacy to Elizabeth, and was deposed, though he was treated with great kindness by Archbishop Parker.

Thirty, THE BATTLE OF THE (March 27, 1350), was the name given to an engagement between the English partisans of Montfort and the Breton followers of Charles of Blois. It was fought at Ploermel in Brittany, and by agreement the number of combatants was limited to thirty on either side. The English were defeated.

Thistlewood, ARTHUR (1770–1820), started in life originally with some fortune as a subaltern officer, first in the militia, and then in a regiment of the line, stationed in the West Indies. After having resigned his commission, and spent some time in America, he passed into France, where he arrived shortly before the fall of Robespierre. There he formed revolutionary opinions. He was deeply implicated in the revolutionary scheme of Dr. James Watson, but was, like him, acquitted. He then sent a challenge to Lord Sidmouth, for which he was punished by fine and imprisonment. Upon his liberation (May 1819) he found himself excluded from respectable society, without resources or hopes. The natural violence of his disposition was stimulated by this, and, aided by a number of individuals equally desperate, among them Watson and "Orator" Hunt (q.v.), he planned the Cato Street Conspiracy (q.v.), for which he was executed (May 1, 1820) glorying in his attempt and regretting its failure.

Thom, THOMAS (d. 1838), was a broken-down brewer who, having gone mad, appeared in Canterbury and various parts of Kent in 1838, styling himself Sir William Courtenay of Powderham Castle, Knight of Malta, King of Jerusalem, and claiming various other titles. He was confined in a lunatic asylum, but was subsequently released. When he came out he announced himself to the peasants as a second Messiah, and succeeded in impressing himself on their excited imaginations by denouncing the new Poor Law, which was then intensely hated and feared. He asserted that he had come to regenerate the whole world and save his followers from the new Poor Law. He assembled a mob at Boughton in May, and led them against Canterbury. His followers proceeded to violence, and he himself shot a policeman. Two companies of soldiers came out from Canterbury to disperse the rioters. Thom shot the officer, and his followers charged with such fury that for a moment the troops gave way. Then they recovered and poured in a volley which destroyed the insurrection and put an end to Thom's life and those of many of his adherents. Several of his followers were tried and convicted of murder. But long after his fall people in many parts of Kent believed in Thom's pretensions, and looked to his future return on earth.

Thomson, CHARLES WILLIAM POULETT, BARON SYDENHAM (1799-1841), was a merchant, who first represented Dover (1826 to 1830), and then Manchester (1832) in the House of Commons. In 1830 he entered Earl Grey's Reform administration as vice-president of the board of trade and treasurer of the navy. In July 1834 he became president of the board of trade and resigned with Lord Melbourne's ministry in November following. In April 1835 he resumed that office until he was selected to replace Lord Durham in Canada (1839). As a cabinet minister his efforts were directed to amendment of the Custom Laws and extension of our foreign trade by a more liberal policy. On Lord Seaton's recall from Canada, Thomson was appointed to the supreme government of British North America. In 1840 he was raised to the peerage as Baron Sydenham of Sydenham in Kent and Toronto.

"Thorough" was the term used by Strafford and Laud, in their correspondence, to describe the spirit of their policy. It signified "the resolute determination of going through with it, as it might nowadays be expressed, of disregarding and overriding the interested delays and evasions of those who made the public service an excuse for enriching themselves at the public expense, or the dry technical arguments of the lawyers, which would hinder them in their schemes for the public good" (Gardiner). "For the state, indeed," writes Laud, "I am for thorough; but I see that both thick and thin stays somebody, where I conceive it should not. . . . I am confident that the king being pleased to set himself in the business, is able by his wisdom and ministers, to carry any just and honourable action, thorough all imaginary opposition, for real there can be none." "Thorough" and "through" are the same word, and were, in the seventeenth century, both spelt in the same way.

Thorpe, THOMAS (d. 1461), remembrancer and baron of the Exchequer, was chosen Speaker in the parliament of 1452-3. In the next year he was imprisoned at the instance of the Duke of York, who brought a suit against him. The Commons thereupon claimed their privilege, and appealed to the Lords, who referred the question to the judges. The judges declared that they were unable to decide on the privileges of parliament, but that it was usual that persons should not be prevented by imprisonment from attending parliament. But the Duke of York was now in the ascendant, and the Lords decided that Thorpe should stay in prison, the privilege of parliament notwithstanding. It was, however, as a party man, rather than as a member or as Speaker of the Commons, that he was attacked. On the king's recovery he was released, and restored to his office. In 1460 he was thrown by the Yorkists into the Tower, and on attempting to escape, early in the next year, was seized and beheaded by the mob at Harringay.

Three-cornered Constituencies were boroughs, counties, or county divisions, which were represented by three members. In these constituencies, by an amendment proposed by Lord Cairns in the House of Lords and eventually incorporated in the Reform Act of 1867, no elector was allowed to vote for more than two candidates. This clause was intended to afford some representation to minorities, but was frequently defeated by careful organization which enabled one party to carry all the three candidates. They were abolished by the Reform Act of 1885.

Throckmorton, FRANCIS (1554-84), the son of Sir John Throckmorton, and the nephew of Sir Nicholas Throckmorton (q.v.), was concerned in the Spanish plots for the release of Mary, Queen of Scots. He was arrested (1583) on the evidence of an intercepted letter written to the Scottish queen by Thomas Morgan, stating that the Duke of Guise was ready to invade England. He was racked three times without effect, but on the fourth occasion made a confession, implicating the Spanish ambassador, Mendoza. This confession he subsequently declared to be false, but he was nevertheless executed (July 10, 1584), and although the evidence at the trial was insufficient, it is probable that he was really guilty of treason.

Throckmorton, SIR NICHOLAS (1513-1571), the son of Sir George Throckmorton, who incurred the displeasure of Henry VIII by refusing to take the oath of supremacy, first became prominent during the Scottish campaign of Somerset (1547), in which he greatly distinguished himself. In 1554 he was implicated in the rebellion of Sir Thomas Wyatt (q.v.), but was acquitted on his trial as there was barely sufficient evidence to convict him of having been an active accomplice. His trial is noticeable from the fact that the jurors were imprisoned and fined £2,000 for their verdict. After the accession of Elizabeth, Throckmorton was restored to favour at court, and in 1559 was sent to France as ambassador, where he took an active part in the conspiracy against the Guises. His alliance with the Huguenot party, and his advice to them to proceed to violent measures, caused his imprisonment by the Duke of Guise in the Castle of St. Germain as "the author of all our troubles." He was one of the strongest opponents of the proposed marriage of Elizabeth with the Earl of Leicester. In 1561, in his capacity of ambassador, he was employed to demand the ratification of the Treaty of Edinburgh from Mary Stuart. In 1565 he was sent to Scotland to protest against the marriage of the Queen of Scots with Lord Darnley, and gave Mary Stuart, whose cause he warmly espoused, much advice as to the most politic course of action to pursue. Two years later he was again sent to Edinburgh to negotiate with the rebel lords for the queen's release, and is said by his representations to have saved her life at Lochleven. In 1569 he was arrested and sent to the Tower for being implicated in the plot to bring about a marriage between Mary Stuart, whose partisan he always remained, and the Duke of Norfolk. He obtained his release in a short time, but never regained the queen's favour, and died, it has been maintained (without reliable authority), by poison administered by Leicester.

Thugs, THE, were an Indian fraternity of hereditary assassins who subsisted on the plunder of the victims they strangled. They generally attached themselves, as if by accident, to the travellers whom they met, and then at a convenient spot strangled them and buried the bodies in a pit hastily dug with a pickaxe which had been consecrated by religious ceremonies. They were bound to secrecy by oath, and had peculiar signs for recognizing one another, and a slang language of their own. They considered themselves the especial favourites of Doorga, the goddess of thieves and murderers, and celebrated her rites with the most scrupulous piety. The gang was recruited by children kidnapped for the purpose, and cautiously initiated into the arcana of their society. Their victims were counted by thousands annually, and no district was free from their ravages. Lord William Bentinck determined to suppress these ruffians, and in 1830 organized a regular department presided over by Major William Sleeman. An elaborate system was worked out. Every inducement was offered to informers; and in six years more than 2,000 Thugs were arrested and condemned to transportation or death. The confederacy was effectually broken up, and travelling in India ceased to be dangerous. These efforts were crowned by the establishment of a school at Jubbulpur for the Thugs who had turned informers and the children of convicted offenders.

Thurcytel, or THURKELL THE TALL, was one of the famous Jorlsborg vikings. In 1009 he came with fifty ships of his pirate followers to England, and after holding Canterbury to ransom, ravaged Wessex. After plundering a great part of England (1010 and 1011), and extorting large sums from the English, Canterbury was betrayed to them by Elfmarr. They sacked the city and captured the Archbishop Alphege (Ælfheah), who was murdered by the drunken pirates at a banquet on Palm Sunday, 1012, for refusing to pay ransom for himself. He now, with forty-five ships and their crews, having received the £8,000 agreed on with Ethelred, went over to the English service, and helped to defend London against Sweyn in 1013. When the English resolved to forsake Ethelred it was in Thurcytel's ships that the exiled king was carried to Normandy. In 1014 he seems to have been still in Ethelred's pay; but he joined Canute against Edmund Ironside before the battle of Assandun, where he is said to have slain Wulfcytel, the eorlorman of East England, thus avenging a brother whom Wulfcytel had killed in battle some years previously. He was installed in Wulfcytel's eorlormanship by Canute in 1017, was outlawed in 1021, reinstated in the king's favour in 1023, and sent to act as regent in Denmark, where he died not long afterwards.

ThurLOW, EDWARD, 1ST BARON (1731-1806), was born in Norfolk, the son of the Rev. Thomas ThurLOW. He was educated at Caius College, Cambridge, from which he was sent down in 1751 without taking a degree. He at once entered at the Inner Temple. In 1758 he gained some reputation by his spirited conduct towards Sir Fletcher Norton, who was opposed to him in a case. In 1761 he was retained in the Douglas case, and thereby made the acquaintance of Lord Bute, who in 1761 gave him silk. From this time his practice increased, till in 1765 he was returned to parliament in the Tory interest for Tamworth. He conducted the appeal of the plaintiff in the Douglas case with great success; and in 1770, after fiercely denying the legality of Wilkes's election for Middlesex, was appointed solicitor-general. In 1771 he became attorney-general, and urged the committal of Richard Oliver and Brass Crosby to the Tower in the matter of Junius's letters. In this affair he displayed a bitterness which was still more conspicuous throughout the debates on the American War. "Of all the orators on the government side he was the most violent and exasperating." In 1778 he was appointed lord chancellor. "In this office," says Lord Campbell, "he was above all taint or suspicion of corruption, and in his general rudeness he was very impartial; but he was not patient and painstaking, and he did little in settling controverted questions or establishing general principles." In the meantime he still warmly advocated the prosecution of the American War; and, being taunted by the Duke of Grafton on the humbleness of his origin, he made so crushing a retort that he at once became supreme in the House of Lords. The next year, perceiving that the ministry could not last much longer, he began to coquet with the opposition, and was rewarded by being continued in the chancellorship by Rockingham. Far, however, from assisting the new government, he acted as the leader of the "King's Friends" (q.v.), and opposed all the government measures, among others Burke's proposal for economical reform. In spite of his conduct, Shelburne, on succeeding Rockingham, still retained him as chancellor; but on the formation of the coalition (April 1783) the great seal was put into commission. His deposition notwithstanding, "he was still keeper of the king's conscience," and did the king's pleasure in bitterly opposing every government measure. He was again rewarded by being appointed lord chancellor by Pitt in 1784, and now appeared as an advocate of a commercial union with Ireland, which he had formerly opposed. In 1787 he presided at the trial of Warren Hastings. The next year he opposed the bill for mitigating the horrors of the Middle Passage. When the king became ill Thurlow entered into intrigues with Carlton House and the opposition, in order to make his position secure in case of a regency. But Pitt did not fail to discover the manœuvres of his chancellor, and withdrew his confidence. Already, in 1791, Grenville had supplanted Thurlow as leader in the House of Lords, and Pitt decided to dismiss him from his office in May 1792. For a few years he retired to indulge his chagrin in seclusion; but in 1795 he opened negotiations with the Whigs and the Prince of Wales, and posed as a champion of the rights of the people in his opposition to the Treason and Sedition Bills. Tired of this, he took up the cause of the Princess of Wales, and intrigued to obtain for her a separation from her husband. But all his efforts failed of success; and in 1798, seeing no chance of overthrowing Pitt, he quitted public life, and remained in retirement till the resignation of Pitt in 1801. Then his hopes brightened again, but they were doomed to be disappointed. His day was past, and on September 12, 1806, he died. His appearance and manner in parliament have been thus described: he was "blunt, coarse, and vigorous, hurled hard words and strong epithets at his opponents in a tremendous voice, with a look and tone of defiance." "Of statesmanship he himself declared that he knew very little"; and, says Lord Stanhope, "it must be owned that his private life by no means eminently qualified him to stand forth as the champion of any Church or creed."

Thurot, INVASION OF. Thurot (d. 1760), an Irishman, who had adopted a French name, and commanded in the French navy, became the terror of British merchant ships during the Seven Years' War. On February 21, 1760, with a small armament, he appeared before Carrickfergus, landed 600 men, and plundered the town. On February 28, 1760, however, he was overthrown on his way back to France by Captain Elliot with three frigates, his ships were taken, and he himself was killed.

Thurstan (d. 1140), Archbishop of York, was elected to the northern see in 1114. He refused to profess obedience to Ralph, Archbishop of Canterbury, thus reopening the vexed question of the relation of the two sees. After a long contest, Thurstan was reconciled to Henry I in 1121; but two years later the controversy was resumed on the election of William of Corbeil as Archbishop of Canterbury. Both prelates appealed to Rome, and although no definite decision was reached, the pope granted a legatine commission to William, who thereby gained the practical advantage. Thurstan played an important part in resisting the invasion of David of Scotland in 1138, and the credit of the English victory at Northallerton is largely his. He contributed greatly to the development of monasticism in northern England, and himself ended his days as a Cistercian monk at Pontefract.

Thynne, THOMAS (1648-82), the "Issachar" of Dryden's "Absalom and Achitophel," was one of Charles II's favourites. He at first attached himself to the Duke of York's party, but subsequently joined Monmouth. In 1667 he was employed to negotiate peace with the Dutch. In 1682 he was assassinated in the streets of London by three ruffians (Captain Vratz the chief), hired for the purpose by Count Königsmark, the unsuccessful suitor of Thynne's wife, Elizabeth, Lady Ogle.

Tichborne, CHDIOCK (d. 1586), was one of the conspirators in Babington's Conspiracy (q.v.), and one of the six specially told off to murder the queen. He was executed at Tyburn (September 20, 1586).

Tierney, GEORGE (1761-1830), was of Irish descent, but was born at Gibraltar, where his father was a wealthy prize-agent. He was sent to Eton and afterwards to Peterhouse, Cambridge. He entered parliament for Colchester in 1796, joined the opposition, and very soon became one of Pitt's most formidable opponents. In May 1798 he called Pitt out for using language of an insulting character about him; but nothing came of the meeting, which took place on Putney Heath (May 27). When Fox seceded from parliament in 1798 Tierney became the leader of the opposition under Addington. He became treasurer of the navy in 1803, and a member of the privy council, but withdrew on Pitt's resumption of office. In the "Talents Administration" he became Irish secretary. He was the constant supporter of Whitbread on the subject of the Continental War, and forsook his party in 1814 when, on the escape of Napoleon from Elba, the Whigs, as a body, sided with the ministry in thinking it necessary to renew the war. On all questions of finance he was a great authority, having studied the question with zealous industry. On Ponsonby's death Tierney became the recognized leader of the Whigs in the House of Commons. He opposed, as was natural, the proceedings against Queen Caroline, though a just appreciation of both sides of the case prevented him from being carried away into any enthusiastic admiration of the queen. On Canning's becoming prime minister Tierney was made master of the mint. He retired with Lord Goderich in January 1828.

Tillotson, JOHN (1630-94), Archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Halifax and educated at Clare Hall, Cambridge. Early in life he was impressed by Calvinistic principles, which he later modified. He was ordained in 1660 or 1661, attended the Savoy Conference on the Nonconformist side, became preacher at Lincoln's Inn in 1663, was promoted dean of Canterbury in 1672, and became a prominent advocate of religious toleration. He was made dean of St. Paul's in 1689 and Archbishop of Canterbury in 1691 in succession to Sancroft.

Tilney, CHARLES (d. 1586), one of the conspirators in Babington's Conspiracy (q.v.), was arrested in London. He was accused by Savage of having been one of the six selected to murder the queen, and was executed in St. Giles's Fields (September 20, 1586).

Tippermuir, THE BATTLE OF (September 1, 1644), was fought three miles west of Perth between 3,000 Cavaliers under Montrose and 8,000 Covenanters under Lord Elcho. Montrose gained a complete victory.

Tippoo Sultan (1753-99), was the son of Hyder Ali, founder of the Mohammedan kingdom of Mysore. He acted under his father during the first Mysore war, and on the death of the latter carried it out successfully, finally concluding the Treaty of Mangalore (1784) with the British. He devoted himself to converting his subjects to Mohammedanism, reformed his army, and established foundries for cannon and other arms at Seringapatam. In 1786-7 he was engaged in a war with the Mahrattas and the Nizam, which originated in an aggression of his on the district of Kurnul. In 1789, enraged by the agreement of Lord Cornwallis with the Nizam, and at the same time inspired with courage by the evident fear in which he was held, in spite of the threats of the British he attacked the state of Travancore, a British ally. This conduct produced the second Mysore War, the defeat of Tippoo at Arikera (May 1791), and his submission and the limitation of his power and territory by the Treaty of Seringapatam. He now engaged in a vast series of intrigues through India and even Europe for the destruction of the British, in which Sindhia, the Peshwa, Zemaun Shah of Afghanistan, the French troops of the Nizam, and France were included, and which was considerably facilitated by the policy of Sir John Shore and the defeat of the Nizam in the Kurdlah campaign. The result of Tippoo's intrigues was the issue of a proclamation (1798) by M. Malartie, French governor of the Mauritius, which revealed the whole plot while it was as yet incomplete. Lord Wellesley was able therefore to complete his preparations, and begin the war while Tippoo was unprepared. The result was the capture of Seringapatam, the death of the Sultan (May 4, 1799), and the extinction of the Mohammedan kingdom of Mysore by the two Treaties of Mysore (1799).

Tiptoft (or TIBETOT), JOHN, EARL OF WORCESTER (d. 1470), nicknamed "the Butcher," was a strong Yorkist partisan. He held the office of treasurer in 1452 and again in 1462-3, and early in Edward IV's reign was made constable, in which capacity he rendered himself odious by his cruelties and by the arbitrary methods he employed. He was lieutenant of Ireland in 1467, and held other important offices. In 1470, on the restoration of Henry VI, he was captured, and beheaded on Tower Hill. He was illustrious for his learning and his patronage of learned men; he was the patron of Caxton, translated many works into English, and spent a great part of his life in travel and study on the continent. He may be regarded as an early type of the Italianate Englishman, who, according to a later proverb, was "a devil incarnate."

Tithes, considered historically, are a tenth part taken annually from the stock and produce raised on the land and from the profits of those engaged in trade and industry. This latter variety of personal tithe is not of much importance, since it dropped largely into disuse at an early date. Two classifications have been adopted: first, according to the nature of the product, as (1) predial, or arising from the soil in the form of grain, fruit, and wood; (2) mixed, derived from the produce of animals in the form of calves, lambs, chicks, eggs, and so on; and (3) personal, the clear gain in certain occupations at one or more removes from the soil, in milling, fishing, etc.; and secondly, according to a grouping in value, viz., (1) great or rectorial, comprising corn, beans, hay, and wood, and (2) little or vicarial, all the other predial and mixed tithes. Barren lands converted to cultivation were exempted for seven years by an act of Edward VI (2 and 3 Ed. vi, c. 13). A further exemption was given in 1832 against lay claimants, where evidence of payment during the last thirty years could not be advanced.

Tithes were at first a moral obligation only. In 787 a council under Offa made them compulsory, and at a synod in London in 944 non-payment was made an offence to be punished by excommunication. Athelstan and his successors issued ordinances from time to time with a repetitive urgency which suggests that laxity prevailed. Before the Conquest the parochial system was not sufficiently developed to become the groundwork for a distribution of tithe, which was paid instead to the episcopal foundation in the cathedral town or to the conventual mother church of the district. Thus it happened that many monasteries became great owners of tithes. When parish churches were set up, sometimes by the monastery, sometimes through the munificence of a local magnate, the smaller or vicarial tithes would not infrequently be made over to the priest by the monastery, though no legal claim could be exercised by the resident vicar, unless a burial-ground were attached to the church, when one-third of the tithe became his due. It was still the general custom in the twelfth century for the patron to send his tithe to a monastery, even if it were at a considerable distance. The village priest lived on whatever pittance he could obtain. A council held at Westminster in 1200 proclaimed that the first claim on tithes was that of the parish priest, but it was only gradually and through the growth of custom that the latter grew strong enough to recover a reasonable share of what in justice was due to him. The common law courts of the thirteenth century began to act on the presumption that the parish church was entitled to the tithes of the parish, unless it could be shown that they had been alienated to a religious body either by express grant or by the proof of prescriptive right. Custom and tradition were thus behind the payment of mediæval tithes, and, as already noticed, their distribution to beneficiaries varied with local history. Consequently no sharp generalizations can be made. Vicarial tithes were received by the local priest, rectorial tithes were often the property of monastic foundations—that is, of ecclesiastical appropriators. With the distribution of religious lands at the Reformation, a considerable portion of the appropriated tithes passed into the hands of lay rectors or impropriators. It was found in 1836 that one-fourth of the net annual value of tithes (estimated in all at £4,000,000) was in the hands of laymen. The Reformation left the share secured by the parish clergy untouched, but in the seventeenth century even the parochial distribution of tithe was called in question. At first, during the early Stuart period an attempt was made by groups of Puritan enthusiasts to buy up parcels of lay impropriations for the endowment of lectureships, with the quite innocent intention of reconverting the proceeds of lay rectorships to religious uses, but to the mind of Laud the form that this was taking seemed harmful to the interests of the Church, and the movement was checked. Later, during the Civil War and the Interregnum, efforts were made from time to time to change or destroy tithes in principle, but parliamentary statutes and the action of Cromwell himself countered these attacks. In the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries antagonism to the prevailing incidence of tithes was reinforced with economic arguments. Among farmers who set out to improve their land the infliction of heavier burdens in the shape of tithes, on top of the expenditure of much capital, was a practical grievance. "Tithes became a charge which was increased by good farming, or diminished by bad, a tax on every additional outlay of money and labour." In some districts

the collection of tithes in kind had already been transformed into a composition calculated on the rental value of the estates concerned. In other cases fixed money payments in lieu of produce-tithe had long been the rule, but where the old system of collection prevailed there were constant quarrels and misunderstandings. A farmer would clean and manure his land in one parish where the tithe arrangements were satisfactory, and neglect his fields in another where tithe was collected in kind. The parliamentary enclosure of many village-farms brought certain of the local disputes to an end by allotting part of the land to the tithe owner as a final settlement of his claims. As far as the remainder of the uncommuted tithes were concerned, it was obvious that changed conditions called for a revision of the law. The solution was found in the Commutation Acts of 1836-60, which provided the arbitration machinery necessary for the substitution of money rents in the place of collection in kind. The average prices of wheat, barley, and oats for the last seven years form the basis for a calculation of the annual tithe rent-charge. "The charge is affected most by variations in the price of oats, and least by those of wheat." Further legislation secured that the legal liability of payment of the new rent-charge should rest with the owner and not with the tenant. The large movements in corn prices brought about by the war of 1914 again made fresh legislation necessary. An act of 1918 substituted a quinquennial average for the septennial computation, the charge being timed to take place in 1926, and provided for the compulsory redemption of tithe at the will of the tithe-payer. In 1926 a further act entirely swept away the old period-average system and substituted a stable charge. In this year the total amount of the tithe rent-charge for England and Wales was £3,265,000.

Tithes in Ireland were not levied from grassland, thus leaving only the small Catholic tenants to bear the chief burden; in Munster especially great sums were extracted from the wretched peasantry by the tithe proctors, and the clergy themselves received but little of it. The Whiteboys (q.v.) in part rose in opposition to tithes, and in 1787 two bills—the Insurrection Acts (q.v.), which enabled the clergy to secure tithes by a civil bill without a jury—had to be passed. In 1823 the question of tithes again became prominent. In 1824 an attempt was made to do away with the obvious injustice of tithes, and with some success; by this act grasslands were no longer to be exempted. In 1830 great disorders amounting to what was called the "tithe war" arose from the collection of tithe, and in 1832 the lord-lieutenant was authorized to advance £60,000 to the starving clergy. The government now, with the assistance of the military, tried to levy the tithe itself, but could only collect £12,000 out of £100,000 which were due. In 1833 the government gave up the attempt to enforce tithes, and parliament again granted a million for the destitute clergy. An attempt was now made to substitute a land tax for the tithe, but in 1833 and 1834 the government failed in their effort, O'Connell (q.v.) threatening the landlords with a crusade against rent if the land tax, or, in other words, the tithes, formed part of it. The government then agreed to accept O'Connell's own plan, including a reduction of 40 per cent.; the rest was to be provided for by a redeemable land tax. On the question, however, of what was to be done with the money thus accruing, a contest took place between the Whigs and the House of Lords, the former being in favour of the appropriation of the Church property to lay uses, the Lords energetically resisting this. It was in consequence of this struggle that Tithe Commutation Bills failed to pass (1834, 1835, 1836). At last, in 1838, the Lords remaining firm, and it being impossible to collect the tithes in Ireland, Lord Melbourne's government gave way. Tithes were commuted for a permanent rent-charge upon the land reduced by one-fourth. But the security of this new rent-charge was an ample compensation to the clergy for their loss; as further compensation the loan of a million adverted to above now became a gift.

Titles, ROYAL. Early royal titles in England as in the other kingdoms of the west were national and not territorial. Thus Egbert was "King of the West Saxons," and in one charter (of 828) "King of the English." Alfred often used the title "King of the Saxons." Edward the Elder commonly calls himself "King of the Anglo-Saxons," a term almost confined to this sovereign and to Edwy. From the time of Athelstan "King of the English" is the usual title; though in one charter he is described as "Ongol-Saxna cyning and Brytaen-walda ealles thyses iglandes," which is translated in the Latin version, "Angul-Saxonum necnon et totius Britanniae rex." By succeeding kings up to the time of Canute, such titles as "Imperator," "Cæsar totius Britanniae," "Basileus," are frequently used, expressing supremacy within Britain, and independence of all other authority. "King of the English" is the official style of the Norman kings. Henry II retains this, but also frequently calls himself "King of the English, Duke of Normandy and Aquitaine, and Count of Anjou," to which was added upon the conquest of Ireland "Lord of Ireland." Under John the style "King of England" replaced that of "King of the English." Edward I dropped the title derived from Normandy, which had been conquered by the King of France in 1204, and was crowned as "King of England, Lord of Ireland, and Duke of Aquitaine"; and to this title Edward III, in 1339, added that of "King of France," which was retained far into the reign of George III. By a bull dated October 11, 1521, the title "Defender of the Faith" was conferred upon Henry VIII, a title which has been retained until the present. Twenty-one years later Henry marked his rejection of the papal authority by assuming the title "King of Ireland." James I was proclaimed "King of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland," and was wise enough to drop the title "King of Great Britain," which he had assumed by proclamation. After the union with Scotland (1707) Anne was styled "Queen of Great Britain, France, and Ireland," which was exchanged upon the Union with Ireland (1801) for the style until recently used "of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland King." By the Royal Titles Bill of 1876 Victoria was empowered to add to her style, and on January 1, 1877, she was proclaimed "Empress of India," at Delhi. On November 4, 1901, the words "and of the British Dominions beyond the seas" were inserted in the king's style of titles. In November 1926 it was suggested by the Imperial Conference that the words "United Kingdom" should henceforward be omitted in order to mark the change in the status of Ireland under the act of 1921. The suggestion was adopted, and the new form of the royal title accordingly runs as follows: "By the grace of God, of Great Britain and Ireland and the British Dominions beyond the seas, King, Defender of the Faith, Emperor of India."

Tobago (ASSUMPTION ISLAND) now forms part of Trinidad, in the legislative council of which it has one official and one unofficial member. Discovered in 1498 by Columbus, it has a broken history of conflicting claims and conquests. Claimed in 1608 by England, settled in 1625 by Barbadians and included in the Montgomery grant of 1628, it was colonized by the Dutch in 1632, by Courlanders in 1642, again by the Dutch (1654), to whom the Courlanders surrendered in 1658, followed by an unsuccessful French colony in 1656 and Louis XIV's grant to two Flemish merchants in 1662. Charles II granted it again to the Duke of Courland in 1664 and Jamaicans captured the island in 1666, only to surrender it in 1667, at the Treaty of Breda, after which the Dutch returned. The French captured the island in 1677 and restored it to the Dutch by the Peace of Nimeguen (1678), but it remained still not finally possessed. The island's neutrality, guaranteed in 1748 by the Peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, was violated by a British invasion of 1762 and its cession in 1763, after which the British included it in the government of Grenada, but granted it a legislative council and Assembly in 1768. A slave revolt was crushed in 1770. Occupied in 1781 by the French until 1783, retaken in 1793, ceded to France in 1802, it was finally captured in 1803 and ceded to Great Britain in 1814.

In 1833 it was included in the Windward Islands government, but separated in 1889 and finally absorbed in 1899 by Trinidad (q.v.).

Toleration Act, THE (May 24, 1689), was a measure due to the Earl of Nottingham. It passed both Houses with but little difficulty, and received the hearty consent of King William III. In order to be properly appreciated it must be judged by the religious prejudices of a past age. It relaxed the stringent conditions of the Act of Uniformity (q.v.), the Five Mile Act (q.v.), and the Conventicle Act (q.v.). "It exempts," declared Hallam, "from the penalties of existing statutes against separate conventicles, or absence from the established worship, such as should take the oath of allegiance, and subscribe the declaration against popery, and such ministers of separate congregations as should subscribe the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England except three, and part of a fourth. It gives also an indulgence to Quakers without this condition. Meeting-houses are required to be registered, and are prevented from insult by a penalty. No part of this toleration extended to papists, or to such as deny the Trinity." The inconsistencies of the act are that persecution continued to be the rule, toleration the exception; and that freedom of conscience was granted in a most capricious manner. "The provisions," observed Macaulay, "removed a vast mass of evil without shocking a vast mass of prejudice; they put an end at once, and for ever, to a persecution which had raged during four generations."

Tone, THEOBALD WOLFE (1763-98), was the founder of the Society of United Irishmen. He entered Trinity College, Dublin, in 1781, but had little taste for study. He took his B.A. in 1786, went to London, and for a time was a member of the Middle Temple. He returned to Dublin in 1788, and was called to the Irish bar, but politics proved more attractive than the law. He became paid secretary to the United Irishmen, and was a whole-hearted enthusiast for the French Revolution. On the arrest of William Jackson, one of his associates (1794), he felt himself seriously implicated, and, on the single condition of not being called to bear witness against Jackson, agreed to leave his country for America. Accordingly, he sailed thence with his wife, children, and sister on June 13, 1795. He did not, however, consider himself bound to remain there; and after an interview with the French minister at Philadelphia, sailed for France on January 1, 1796, in order to enlist French sympathies on behalf of the independence of Ireland. In Paris he was encouraged to believe that the French would undertake a considerable expedition, to be commanded by Hoche, and received a commission in the army of the Republic. The expedition, consisting of 43 vessels in all, with 15,000 troops on board, actually started on December 15, but was driven back by a storm. A second expedition was rendered abortive by foul weather and the superiority of Admiral Duncan's fleet; and to add to Tone's disappointment, Hoche died. On the outbreak of the Irish rebellion in 1798 a French fleet actually sailed, came into action with a British squadron off Lough Swilly on October 10, and after a stubborn fight was worsted. The Hoche, with Tone on board, struck, and he was made prisoner. On November 10 he was tried by court-martial and condemned to death for high treason. He pleaded his right, as a French officer, to be shot, but this was refused him. Sooner than submit to be hanged he attempted to take his life in prison; the attempt was not immediately successful, but he died (November 19) after lingering a week in great agony, and so escaped the ignominy which he dreaded.

Tooke, JOHN HORNE (1736-1812), was the son of John Horne, and assumed the title of Tooke after being adopted by William Tooke, of Purley. His family persuaded him, after he had taken his degree in 1758, to enter the Church, but his own inclination was for the law, and in 1779 he tried to obtain admission to the bar, but his clerical profession prevented him. Tooke had already become conspicuous as a democratic politician; at first as a friend of Wilkes, with whom, however, he speedily quarrelled, and was in consequence attacked by Junius. In 1775 he was sentenced to a year's imprisonment and a fine, for saying that the Americans who fell at Lexington had been "murdered" by the British soldiers. He plunged actively into the political agitation which followed the French Revolution, and in 1794 he was committed for trial on account of his connexion with the supposed treason of the Corresponding Society, but after an able and witty defence he was acquitted. After contesting Westminster twice without success, he was returned for Old Sarum in 1801, but a bill was passed in the next session rendering clerical persons ineligible. His last days were spent in easy retirement. Tooke had a great social reputation; his "Divisions of Purley" is an original, though rather primitive, work on philology.

There are lives of Tooke by J. A. Graham, 1828; A. Stephens, 1813, and M. C. Yarrow, 1926.

Torres Vedras, THE LINES OF (1810-1811), were thrown up by Wellington in order that he might protect Lisbon and the army during the winter and thus baffle the superior forces of Masséna in their efforts to drive the British out of Portugal. They consisted of three distinct ranges of defence. The first, extending from Alhandra on the Tagus to the mouth of the Zizandre on the sea-coast, was, following the inflections of the hills, 29 miles long. The second, traced at a distance varying from 6 to 10 miles in the rear of the first, stretched from Quintella on the Tagus to the mouth of the St. Lorenza, being 24 miles in length. The third was intended to cover a forced embarkation, and extended from Passo d'Arcos on the Tagus to the coast. Masséna soon perceived the impossibility of carrying the position at any point or of turning it, except from the Tagus, where a large flotilla of British gunboats was moored. Throughout October Masséna, though harassed by sickness and increasing scarcity of supplies, persisted in his efforts to turn the position by the Tagus; but he was as persistently foiled by Wellington's manœuvres. Towards the middle of the month Masséna fell back on Santarem, but there stood firm, and Wellington, who had thought him in full retreat, had to abandon the idea of attacking him, and drew back into his lines. In November Masséna again resumed his plans on the Tagus, but without success. During December and January the armies remained quiet; but the difficulty of obtaining supplies and forage led the French into horrible excesses and marauding expeditions, which undermined the discipline of the army. Had Wellington been vigorously reinforced from England he would have attacked Masséna's weakened forces, but he was compelled to await Masséna's retreat. On March 2, 1811, the latter began his retreat, which he executed with "infinite ability." But for the lines of Torres Vedras Wellington could have hardly held his ground against Masséna's much larger force.

Torrington, EARL AND VISCOUNT.
[BYNG; HERBERT.]

Tory. The name is derived from an Irish word, meaning to pursue for the sake of plunder. It was applied to those Irish who in 1654 preferred to remain as outlaws in their own lands to emigrating to Connaught. The government offered prizes for their heads, and a free pardon to any Tory who brought in the head of a confederate. In 1693, after the civil war had come to an end, they again appear; they are described by the law as "out of their keeping." A statute passed (7 William and Mary) put a reward of £20 on the head of any Tory, and assessed the Catholic inhabitants of a barony for any loss caused by them. This statute was not repealed till 1776. In English politics the word appears to have been first used contemptuously to designate the court and Roman Catholic party in the disputes between the Abhorrrers (q.v.) and Petitioners in 1679. In the debates on the Exclusion Bill it was applied insultingly to the partisans of James II. In

William III's reign the term was coming into current use without an opprobrious meaning, as the title of the party who opposed the Whig interest in Church and State; and in the reign of Anne it was the common designation of this party. On account, however, of its suspicious connexion with Jacobitism, and the honourable and respectable traditions attaching to the name of Whig, because of the large share borne by the Whigs in the Revolution, Tory was not a title which any party was anxious to assume. It was not until the failure of the rebellion of 1745 that the Tories were able to free themselves finally from the trammels of the Jacobite tradition. Their opportunity to recover political power came with the accession of George III, the determined enemy of the Whigs; but to the younger Pitt belongs the credit for their final rehabilitation. To him was due their revival as a great party in the State, resting on popular support as well as on that of the Crown, and opposed to the Whigs, who had become to some extent an aristocratic faction. Under his administration the name was generally acknowledged by the party which towards the closing period of his premiership probably included the majority of the middle and propertied classes, and was especially identified with the continuance of the war with France, and opposition to what were assumed to be revolutionary and radical changes in domestic affairs. Since that period the word has held its own as the designation of one of the two great parties in British politics; though in the nineteenth century that of Conservative was often preferred to it. But this name has hardly supplanted the older designation as that of Liberal has done in the case of the rival party. A Tory perhaps is understood to be a person less indulgent towards the principles of his opponents than a Conservative. But the two terms are used almost indiscriminately in political phraseology.

Tostig (d. 1066) was the third son of Godwin. In 1051 he married Judith, sister of Baldwin of Flanders, and in the same year he shared his father's exile. In 1055 he was created Earl of Northumbria, and was seemingly a great personal favourite of King Edward. In 1061, in company with Gurth and Archbishop Ealdred, he made a pilgrimage to Rome, and during his absence Northumbria was invaded and ravaged by the Scots. In 1063 he joined Harold in his Welsh campaign. In 1065 his earldom broke out into revolt, his harsh and tyrannical government being no longer bearable. The Northumbrians held a meeting at York, outlawed and deposed Tostig, and chose Morkere, son of Earl Elfgar, as their earl; a massacre of Tostig's followers ensued, and the insurgents marched southwards to support their claims. With the advice of Harold, the king yielded to the demands of the insurgents, and Tostig was deposed and banished. He took refuge in Flanders, where he heard of Harold's election to the throne; having failed to induce William to make an alliance with him, he got together a fleet and ravaged the Isle of Wight and the southern coast. Thence he went northwards to the Humber, probably with the hope of recovering his earldom, but failing in this he retired to Scotland, where in all probability he met Harold Hardrada, King of Norway, whom he induced to join him in an invasion of England. At first they were successful, and defeated Edwin and Morkere at the battle of Fulford (September 20, 1066); but King Harold, hearing of the invasion, marched northwards promptly, and met them at Stamford Bridge (September 25, 1066), where the Norwegian force was totally defeated, and Tostig and Harold Hardrada slain. Tostig left two sons, Ketil and Skule, who settled in Norway.

Totnes, GEORGE CAREW, EARL OF (1555-1629). [CAREW.]

Touchet, JAMES, 12TH LORD AUDLEY (d. 1459), served under Henry V in the French wars. In the reign of Henry VI he took part with the Lancastrians, and was in command of the army which intercepted Salisbury at Blore Heath, in which battle Audley was defeated and slain.

Touchet, JAMES, 14TH LORD AUDLEY (d. 1497), a man of broken fortune, was famous in the reign of Henry VII for his ill-advised leadership of the Cornish rebels in 1497. In the conflict that took place at Blackheath between the rebels and the king's forces under the command of Lord Daubeney and the Earl of Oxford, Audley was taken prisoner, and soon afterwards beheaded.

Toulouse, THE BATTLE OF (April 10, 1814), was the last of the battles of the Peninsular War. Soult had thrown himself into Toulouse, and was resolved to hold the place at all hazards. As Wellington approached he took up a strong position in front of the town, which was protected on the other side by the Garonne, and outside that by the St. Cyprian heights, strongly fortified. The battle began early on the morning of the 10th. From six o'clock till four in the afternoon it raged, and in that time 4,200 men of the allies had fallen, while the French lost 2,000. Finally the French were defeated, and slowly retired from all their positions. The battle was—"a lamentable spilling of blood, and a useless, for before this period Napoleon had abdicated the throne of France, and a provisional government was constituted at Paris."

Sir C. W. C. Oman, "Peninsular War," 1902-20.

Toulouse, THE WAR OF (1159), is the name given to the campaign undertaken by Henry II in order to enforce his wife's claim to the county of Toulouse. The expedition, which lasted for some months, was eventually unsuccessful, though Henry's troops performed some brilliant exploits. The theory that it was the first occasion for a general levy of scutage (q.v.) has now been exploded.

Townshend, CHARLES, 2ND VISCOUNT (1674-1738), entered public life as a Tory, but soon joined the Whigs. He was one of the commissioners for the Union of Scotland. In 1709 he was sent with Marlborough as plenipotentiary to The Hague, where he concluded the Barrier Treaty, which Marlborough refused to sign. He completed his connexion with the Whigs by marrying Walpole's sister. In 1712 he was severely censured by the Tories as the author of the Barrier Treaty. George I, before his arrival in England, appointed him secretary of state and prime minister, passing over the old Whig junto, but he soon became distasteful to the king, and was disliked by the Hanoverian courtiers. He opposed George's schemes with regard to Bremen and Verden. Perceiving that Charles XII of Sweden was threatening England, he was anxious for peace with Russia. Urged on by Sunderland, the king dismissed him from office, offering him in exchange the lord-lieutenancy of Ireland, which he accepted (February 1717). But he was soon dismissed also from that position when, on the schism between Walpole and Stanhope breaking out in the ministry, his followers voted against a supply for hostilities against Sweden (April). Finding opposition useless, he rejoined the ministry in 1720 as lord president. On Walpole's becoming premier he was made secretary of state. He soon quarrelled with the king's favourite, Carteret, with whose more ambitious views of foreign policy he could not agree. The contest came to an issue at the marriage of Madame de Platen, sister of the king's mistress, the Countess of Darlington, in Paris. There Townshend sent Horace Walpole as rival ambassador to Carteret; and the latter was forced by the king to withdraw to the lord-lieutenancy of Ireland. In 1725 Townshend concluded the Treaty of Hanover between Great Britain, France, and Prussia, to check the designs of Austria, Spain, and the Duke of Bourbon, as formulated in the Treaty of Vienna (1725), namely, a Stuart restoration and the surrender of Gibraltar and Minorca. This treaty, which Walpole considered was too precipitate, was the cause of his quarrel with Townshend. "The firm," he said, "should be Walpole and Townshend, not Townshend and Walpole." After a violent quarrel with Walpole, Townshend retired from public life. He passed the remainder of his life at Rainham, refusing to take further part in politics. To him we owe the cultivation of the turnip, and hence a proper rotation of crops.

Townshend, CHARLES (1725-67), was the second son of Charles, 3rd Viscount Townshend.

In 1747 he was returned to parliament for Yarmouth, and joined the opposition, but without much warmth. In 1749 his large family influence obtained for him a place at the board of trade. Five years later he was nominated one of the commissioners for executing the office of lord high admiral. In 1757 he became a member of the privy council. In March 1761 he became secretary at war. Here he fluctuated between Pitt and Bute, at one time supporting one, at another the other. In 1765 he accepted the office of paymaster-general in the Rockingham government, although he had no faith in its strength, and called it "a mere lute-string administration, pretty summer wear." In the following year he became chancellor of the exchequer in the Chatham ministry. But, as usual, Townshend was not decided in his support of the cabinet, of which he was now a member. As chancellor of the exchequer he introduced a budget in which he pledged himself to the reduction of the land tax at the end of a year, but on a motion of the opposition that the reduction should take place at once, the government was defeated. With Chatham ill, the members of the ministry broke away from all control, and Townshend in particular gave vent to the wildest frolics of his genius. In one of the most celebrated of his speeches he said that the government "had become, what he had often been called, a weather-cock." The revenue which he failed to obtain by the land tax he now sought by taxing with import duties many small commodities sent to the American colonies. It was a most fatal measure, the evil results of which Townshend did not live to see, as he died of a fever on September 4, 1767. Walpole, who was his friend, says that "Townshend had every great talent, and very little quality. His vanity exceeded even his abilities, and his suspicions seemed to make him doubt if he had any. With such a capacity he must have been the greatest man of his age, and, perhaps, inferior to no man of any age, had his faults been only in moderate proportion."

Townshend, GEORGE, 1ST MARQUIS OF (1724-1807), served in the army, and concluded, after Wolfe's death, the capitulation which gave Quebec to England. In 1767 he became viceroy of Ireland, and, in accordance with George III's instructions, tried to govern in defiance of the Ponsonbys and Shannons; but, defeated on the Army Bill in 1768, had to abandon the attempt. A new parliament was no more docile than the last, and corruption was now tried. By means of the new oligarchy of Crown pensioners, the great families were defeated, and in 1771 Townshend secured a favourable parliament. But by 1772 matters had so far changed that complete defeat could only be averted by making peace with Lord Shannon. Disgusted with his office, the lieutenant resigned and retired to England, leaving behind him £300,000 of arrears. He was created marquis in 1786.

Towton, THE BATTLE OF (March 29, 1461), was the most important engagement in the Wars of the Roses. After the second battle of St. Albans, Queen Margaret and the Lancastrians had retired to the north, while Edward and Warwick entered London, and the former was proclaimed king. The Yorkists immediately determined on marching northwards and completing the defeat of the Lancastrians. On March 12 the Yorkists were at Pontefract, the Lancastrians at York. After a skirmish at Ferrybridge, the two armies met near the village of Towton, not far from Tadcaster. The battle was fought on Palm Sunday, March 29, and lasted ten hours, ending in the complete victory of the Yorkists, and the rout and dispersion of the Lancastrian army. The Earl of Northumberland fell in the battle, the Earl of Devon and the Bastard of Exeter were beheaded after it, and many men were left dead on the field. Henry and Margaret, with such of their followers as had survived the slaughter, fled into Scotland, while Edward returned in triumph to London.

Trade, THE BOARD OF. Councils "of Trade and Plantation" were created by Charles II after the Restoration, charged with the concerns of the colonies and merchant shipping. The two were united in 1672, and abolished in 1675. The council was reappointed in 1695, and continued to exercise a certain control over colonial and mercantile matters for nearly a century afterwards. In 1782, having long been found inefficient, and having been attacked by Burke, it was abolished. In 1786 the Board of Trade with substantially its present function was established by order in council. The president of the board usually has a seat in the cabinet. Its functions have been regulated by several acts, notably those of 1845, 1850, and 1867, and it has been charged with the superintendence of railways (1840) and merchant shipping (1854 and 1867). The personnel includes, besides the president, a parliamentary and a permanent under-secretary, assistant secretaries, and several heads of departments.

Trade Unions. [A trade union, in the words of Sidney and Beatrice Webb, is commonly understood to be "a continuous association of wage-earners for the purpose of maintaining or improving the conditions of their working lives." There are many points of resemblance between such bodies as we know them to-day and the guilds of the Middle Ages, and it was even argued by Brentano that the modern unions were historically derived from the mediæval crafts. But however many the points of likeness—and it must be remembered that there are also considerable points of difference—it is impossible to trace any direct continuity. Early analogies have been pointed out in the journeymen fraternities, often frowned upon by the law, which grew up among the non-master class in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. There were combinations among the masons and building craftsmen in the fifteenth century. The decay of the religious gild, the transformation of the city crafts into livery companies, usually dominated by the wealthiest merchants, the formation of new associations of industrial masters, all tended to widen the division between employer and workman, and, as we might expect, it is where a capitalistic organization of industry first flourished that we discover the early signs of what may be called modern trade unionism. In the clothing areas of the south and west of England the operatives employed by the clothiers were forming combinations at the end of the seventeenth century. Earlier than this, during the Interregnum period, an industrial democratic movement sprang up among the rank and file of craftsmen, and quarrels with the governing members of their companies were numerous. A combination of the journeymen employed by the felt-hat makers was formed in the first decade of the Restoration, and appears to have had a continuous history down to the present day. In the eighteenth century trade unions were formed amongst other groups of London craftsmen, e.g., among the tailors in 1720, agitating for better wages and a shorter working day. The Elizabethan Statute of Artificers (1563), which, it is now generally agreed, did something to assist in the maintenance of the workers' standard of living, being, in Sir Henry Slessor's words, "an early, and almost universal, application of the principle of the statutory minimum rate, with the Justices of the Peace as Trade Board," had by the eighteenth century become obsolete. Adam Smith notices that the practice of wage-fixing by magistrates had in 1776 "gone entirely into disuse." As early as 1725 temporary associations were formed among workmen to secure the carrying out of the act. But these were declared illegal by act of parliament, although the attempts of the legislature to revive the practice of fixing wages by the justices proved resultless. In spite of evils in particular industries, the relations of the various classes engaged in manufacture were fairly good during the earlier part of the century. The introduction of machinery, however, and with it of the factory system, soon caused an industrial war; journeymen everywhere petitioned that the Act 5 Eliz. should be enforced, and began to form societies and raise funds for the prosecution of offending masters. But while parliament suspended the act for the benefit of employers year after year, and repealed it for the woollen manufacture in 1809, and generally in 1814, associations of workmen were rendered penal by acts of 1799 and 1800. [But it was the law of conspiracy which could be employed against combinations with the sharpest effect.] The unions either assumed the guise of friendly provident societies to evade the acts, or else became secret associations, with the usual evil results. In 1824 Joseph Hume (q.v.), [urged forward by Francis Place (q.v.), who for ten years had been patiently collecting materials in order that he might convince the country that the Combination Laws were stupid and unjust,] gained the appointment of a parliamentary committee, which reported that the administration of the law had been one-sided, that it had only touched workmen, and not masters who had combined, adding also that the law had, "in the opinion of many of both parties, tended to produce mutual irritation and distrust, and to give a violent character to the combinations." In accordance with its advice, all the acts against combination were repealed in 1824; but so numerous were the strikes that followed that a most unwise amending act was passed next year, according to which, though persons meeting to determine their own wages were exempted from punishment, "all meetings or agreements for the purpose of affecting the wages or hours of work of persons not present at the meeting, or parties to the agreement, were conspiracies. So were all agreements for controlling a master in the management of his business. So were all agreements not to work in the company of any given person, or to persuade other persons to leave their employment, or not to engage themselves. In fact, there was scarcely an act performed by any workman, as the member of a trade union, which was not an act of conspiracy and a misdemeanour." Besides, the general acts against conspiracy could still be employed against unionists, as in 1834, when six Dorchester labourers were sentenced to seven years' transportation for "administering unlawful oaths"—i.e., admitting members into a union. During the next thirty years, in spite of these acts, the movement spread with great rapidity. [Large industrial unions grew up (notably among the cotton operatives, and in the metal and building trades) which frightened the public and threatened the employers, who resorted with the menace of lock-outs unless trade-union workers renounced their membership. The break-down of the large unions of associated trades was followed by the formation in 1834 of Robert Owen's Grand National Consolidated Trades Union, which in a very short time gained half a million members. It aimed at the improvement of labour conditions by "direct action." A general strike was declared to secure an eight-hour day. It failed, and with it the Grand National. For many years industrial action remained discredited.] In 1851 a combination of several associations produced the Amalgamated Society of Engineers, which played a part in trade-union struggles comparable to that of the weavers among the mediæval gilds. Public attention was recalled to the unions by the Sheffield outrages (q.v.) of 1866, which led to the appointment of a Royal Commission in 1867 to examine the whole matter. But it was clearly proved that the large majority of unions had nothing illegal in their working, and in consequence the Trades Union Act of 1871 recognized their complete legality. Finally, the last vestiges of the Combination Acts were repealed in 1875; henceforward the offences of unionists must be tried under no special acts, but under the ordinary criminal law. About the same time unionism was introduced into agricultural districts, and the Agricultural Labourers' Union, founded in 1872, has many thousands of members.

In 1902 the Taff Vale Company brought an action against the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants for damages in connexion with a strike on that line. A verdict was given for the company, and the Amalgamated Society paid damages and costs amounting to £23,000. But more serious than the money penalty was the loss of immunity from liability for the illegal acts of their agents which trade unions were presumed to enjoy prior to this litigation. [In spite of a vigorous agitation the trade-union movement had to live through four apprehensive years before it could get the decision against its members reversed in the Trade Disputes Act of 1906, which laid down that "an action against a Trade Union in respect of any tortious act alleged to have been committed by or on behalf of the Trade Union shall not be entertained by any court." During the last two decades of the nineteenth century the character of trade unionism changed. The old-established societies of skilled workers, employing their funds largely for benefit and relief purposes among their members, were joined, especially during the 'nineties, by a large number of new unions, whose members were unskilled. The new unionism, which was militant and inclined towards collectivism in social theory, was stimulated to political activity. Funds were employed for party purposes and union officials became Labour members of the House of Commons. Trade-union politics received a set-back in 1908, in what is known as the Osborne judgment, which amounted to a declaration that all activities undertaken by trade unions, outside their industrial functions, were illegal. In 1913 the Trade Union Act extended the permissible field of action to electoral and parliamentary work, provided a ballot of the members supported a trade union's decision to enter upon it and that a distinction was made between the political levy and other subscriptions, so that a dissident member might claim exemption from the former. The movement in favour of the use of conciliation machinery between representatives of employers and employed, which had begun during the years following 1860, had been successful in setting up boards for the settlement of disputes in many of the big industries. In the first decade of the present century about 750 disputes a year were coming before such boards for settlement, and until 1911 it appeared probable that arbitration and conciliation would take the place of lock-out and strike in the industrial history of the future. The three years before the war, however, saw a succession of strikes on an alarming scale, affecting especially the transport industries; since then the fluctuating condition of industry, the special demands of the war, and change in the general balance of political views have conspired to prevent a return to industrial peace. Inspired by its success in combating the General Strike of 1926, the Conservative government pushed through parliament the Trade Unions and Trade Disputes Bill of 1927, which made the use of the strike for political or non-industrial purposes illegal, modified the law with regard to picketing, and substituted the obligation to "contract in" for contributions to the political levy by its subscribers, in place of the regulation prescribing "contracting out" by individual dissentients.]

Trafalgar, THE BATTLE OF (October 21, 1805), was the last and most fatal blow inflicted on the naval power of France. On the previous afternoon the combined French and Spanish fleets had been despatched sailing out of the port of Cadiz, and during the night Nelson had kept his fleet under all sail to keep them in sight. At daybreak on the 21st they were seen in a close line about 12 miles ahead. As the English fleet came up with him, the French admiral, Villeneuve, formed his fleet in a double line in close order. Nelson had 27 men-of-war and 4 frigates, against the combined fleets of 33 ships and 7 frigates, and he adopted the plan of attacking in two lines, Collingwood leading the lee-line of 15 ships, and Nelson the weather-line of 12. Villeneuve made the most skilful preparations to meet the attack, but seems to have perceived at once that Nelson's plan would succeed. As the Victory, Nelson's ship, neared the French fleet, she was raked by a galling fire from the enemy, so that she had lost fifty men before returning a shot. At noon she opened her fire, and ran on board the Redoubtable, with the intention of breaking the enemy's line. That ship fired one broadside, and then, through fear of being boarded, let down her lower ports, and contented herself for the rest of the battle with keeping up a fire of musketry from her tops. The Victory soon became busy with her, the Téméraire, and the huge Santissima Trinidad, and at 1.25 p.m. Nelson was mortally wounded by a ball from the marines in the tops. Within twenty minutes the Redoubtable struck. In the meantime the battle had been raging with almost equal fury on all sides ; and everywhere the stubborn courage of the British seamen wore out the resistance of the enemy. Nelson lived just long enough to know that he had gained his last and greatest victory. Eighteen of the enemy had struck ; seven of their ships escaped from the battle only to be captured by Sir Richard Strachan off Rochefort. The next evening a gale came on from the south-west which destroyed most of the prizes. The British loss amounted to 1,587 men ; the loss of the allies was much greater, and included the Spanish admiral, while Villeneuve was taken prisoner. The Spaniards, disgusted with the conduct of the French, at once made peace, and treated our wounded with the utmost attention. With the loss of Villeneuve's fleet vanished all Napoleon's hopes of invading England.

Trailbaston, COMMISSIONS OF, date from an ordinance of 1304. Their object was to put down the numerous bands of swash-bucklers or "trailbastons" (i.e., staff or bludgeon carriers) as they were called. Commissions for the purpose of quelling the disturbances caused by these ruffians were sent throughout the country, inquiring, imprisoning, fining, and even hanging summarily. The exact nature of the commissions is difficult to determine, but it seems to have been a sort of connecting link between the justices in eyre and the justices of oyer and terminer.

Train Bands, or trained bands, instituted in the reign of James I, were bodies of urban militia, which combined with the principle of the "fyrd" a large volunteer element. They proved, however, exceedingly turbulent, especially in London, and, having espoused the side of the Parliament during the Great Rebellion, were abolished after the Restoration. [MILITARY SYSTEM.]

Transport, MINISTRY OF, was created a department of state in 1919 by the Ministry of Transport Act, which gave the minister powers to control all existing means of internal transport, which had been taken over by the government at the outbreak of the Great War in 1914. Mr. Churchill's budget of 1927 proposed that the Ministry of Transport, together with the Ministry of Mines and the Department of Overseas Trade, should be abolished as a separate department.

Transvaal. [SOUTH AFRICA, UNION OF.]

Traquair, JOHN STEWART, 1ST EARL OF (1599-1659). [STEWART.]

Travancore was a little principality at the southern extremity of the Malabar coast. The treaty of Mangalore placed it under British protection. In consequence of this Lord Cornwallis began the second Mysore War to avenge on Tippoo the insult offered to the British government by his unprovoked attack (1790) on the lines of Travancore (a line of ramparts protected by a ditch and bound hedge, extending along the northern frontier from the Neilgherry hills to the sea). In 1795 a subsidiary alliance was concluded between the raja and the company, by which he agreed to assist them if necessary with troops to the best of his ability. And in 1805 a second treaty was concluded, by which this duty was commuted for an annual payment. Travancore was extremely badly governed, and retrenchment and reform were absolutely necessary. The last treaty with the British had stipulated this. In 1808 an attempt to enforce this led to an attack on the Residency, from which the resident barely escaped. British troops were marched up, and order was after some trouble restored. Travancore is still one of the protected native states, placed in direct relation with the government of India since 1923, under an agent to the governor-general in charge of the Madras States agency.

Treason, THE LAW OF. High treason, which means a transcendently dangerous kind of betrayal, is theoretically a murderous blow aimed at the State, but in fact is any mischievous action or design against the person of the sovereign, with whose particular life the general welfare is supposed to be bound. It is called "high" treason to distinguish it from simple or petty treason, which was an outrageous or unnatural betrayal of confidence, as that of a child who attempts or designs the slaughter of a parent. Feudalism is usually credited with having shifted the mark of treason from the State to the sovereign. Yet the idea of the king's supreme lordship and consequent importance in this connexion is first seen in Alfred's law of treason : "If anyone plot against the king's life, of himself or by harbouring of exiles, or of his men, let him be liable in his life and in all that he has." For such "treachery against a lord" Alfred thought no reparation possible. After the Conquest, therefore, while the penalty of rebellion was, for a Norman, only forfeiture and imprisonment, for an Englishman it was death. In 1075 the Norman earl, Ralph Guader, met with no worse doom than loss of lands and perpetual captivity ; the Englishman Waltheof perished on the scaffold. The crime did not assume its darker aspect, or draw after it the more awful punishment afterwards reserved for it, till many years later. The Norman and early Plantagenet kings seldom, if ever, had leaders of rebellion executed on legal process ; their vengeance was satisfied with the ordinary feudal consequences. The idea of treason, however, was well known. Glanville speaks of it under the name of "lese majesty," thus showing the influence of the Roman law on its development. Edward I gave expression, perhaps for the first time, to the sterner conception of the offence ; the proceedings against David of Wales and William

Wallace first exhibited its merciless characteristics. The constructive complexity of David's guilt set the precedent for the most appalling feature in our legal history. He was drawn to the gallows, hanged, had his bowels burnt, and his quarters dispersed over the kingdom, respectively for the treachery to his lord, the murder, the profanation of a holy season, and the repeated formation of designs against his king at various places, into which the judges divided his crime. This case practically ruled all that came after. The hurdle, the gallows, the axe, and the quartering knife were for ages the instruments of the punishment of treason, varied only by the stake and the faggot if the convicted traitor were a woman. The legal sentiment was now fostered that there was a special heinousness in the offence. It was deemed politic, perhaps, to frighten the king's liegemen into a respect for their oaths and implied fealty. Any scheme that struck at the king, his crown and dignity, or tended to do mischief to his person or royal estate, was asserted by legal writers to be treason, not only in those who attempted it, but also in those who advised it. But the Crown had the interest in keeping the offence indefinite that the consequent frequency of forfeitures gave; and the profitable vagueness was allowed to hang over it for a time. Mortimer, for instance, was in 1330 condemned for merely "accroaching" or drawing towards himself the royal power. In 1352, therefore, the puzzled and distressed Lords and Commons begged King Edward III to declare authoritatively the law on the subject. Edward complied, and the historic Statute of Treasons was the result. Henceforward no man was to be held guilty of treason who had not compassed the death of the king, queen, or their eldest son; violated the queen, the king's eldest daughter, if unmarried, or the wife of his eldest son; levied war against the king in his kingdom, or adhered to his enemies; counterfeited the great seal, or brought false money into the land; or slain his chancellor, treasurer, or judges "being in their place doing their offices." And all the lands forfeited for any of these offences were to go to the king, whether holden of him or of others. The weightier clauses of this statute are law still. But it often fell short of the needs of an arbitrary king or an unusually critical condition of affairs; and such additions were made to it by the legislature, and constructions placed upon it by the judges, as the occasion seemed to demand. In Richard II's heyday of power, in Henry VI's growing weakness, new treasons were created, but only to be brushed away at the return of better or more settled times. The reign most prolific of artificial treasons was Henry VIII's; to deny the royal supremacy, or even decline to admit it, to deprive the king of any of his titles, to keep back from him the knowledge of an immorality committed by the lady he proposed to marry, and several other things of little seeming importance at other times, were exaggerated into treasons. These were all swept away when Edward VI succeeded; but many of them were re-enacted the year before his death, while, as a feeble antidote to this renewed severity, it was provided that no treason should be established save on the testimony of two witnesses. The restored additions were cast out again in Mary's reign, but the mitigatory provision was left untouched. The safety of Elizabeth called for fresh accessions to the law—among other enactments it was made treason to say that the queen was a heretic, a schismatic, or a usurper—but these were limited to the queen's lifetime. After her death the law of Edward III continued the sole statutory basis of the crime, and the law of Edward VI its sole judicial corrective. The nimble wits of lawyers, however, had found in the former, by help of the doctrine of constructive treason, more than one implication of crime. Chief among these was conspiracy to levy war against the king, which, though not asserted to be itself treason, was accepted as a convincing proof of treason. To this principle parliament also three times gave a lease of the existing sovereign's life, in the reigns of Elizabeth, Charles II, and George III. The contemplated deposition of the sovereign, or even the devisal of a plan for putting him under restraint for any purpose whatever, such as Essex designed in 1601, was discovered in Edward III's statute. At last, in 1816, the whole subject was comprehensively treated in a statute of that year, which is now the accepted standard of treason. By this measure not only the overt act, but the mere entertainment of a design to slay, wound, coerce, or depose the king, or to deprive him of any part of his dominions, or to levy war against him with any view whatever, or to move an invasion from abroad, and the publication of an intention to do any of these things, were declared to be high treason. The law was thus definitely fixed. No legal process was more shamelessly perverted to tyrannical and unjust ends than that of treason, as a hundred cases, from Burdett's to Sidney's, testify. To remedy the monstrous unfairness of trials on this charge the notable law of 1696 was passed. This ensures to the accused the assistance of counsel, the examination of his witnesses on oath, a copy of his indictment five (afterwards ten) days, a list of the jury panel two days, before his trial, and the certainty of having two direct witnesses produced against him; and limits prosecutions to the term of three years, save for an attempt to assassinate the king. The revolting horrors of the punishment have since been removed—the cutting down alive and disembowelling of men, and the burning of women, in 1790; the drawing, quartering, and beheading, in 1870. But much earlier they had ceased to be carried out.

[J. R.]

Treason Felony Act, THE, or CROWN AND GOVERNMENT SECURITY ACT (11 and 12 Vict. c. 12), was introduced in 1848 (passed April 22), partly to meet certain forms of sedition practised by the United Irishmen (q.v.), partly to extend the law of treason more fully to Ireland, and partly with a view to the Chartist disturbances. The act reduced the death penalties produced under 36 George III, c. 7 (1795), for certain offences against the person of the sovereign, to transportation for life, extended those acts to Ireland and provided that any person compassing or intending the deposition of the sovereign or levying war against the Crown within the British dominions in order to intimidate Crown or parliament, or inciting to foreign invasion of any British dominion, or expressing such intention by writing or any overt act, should be guilty of felony and liable to transportation for life. The act was strongly opposed by Smith O'Brien (q.v.) and some Radical members. It has played an important part in the later history of Irish disturbances.

Treasonable Practices Bill (1795) was introduced into the House of Lords in November by Lord Grenville in consequence of the excited state of popular opinion, which at length displayed itself in an attempt upon the life of the king (George III). The chief point in the bill was that it dispensed with proof of overt acts of treason, and altogether widened the definition of treason, so as to include any writing or speaking which should incite the people to hatred or contempt of the king's majesty, or the established government and constitution of the realm. It thus formed a statutory prohibition on the discussion of parliamentary reform, and was a most flagrant encroachment upon freedom of opinion. The bill was supported in a narrow spirit, worthy of its aims; but it also found seven opponents among the peers. In the House of Commons it met with a vigorous resistance. Fox went so far as to say that if this and the Seditious Meetings Bill (q.v.) "should be put into force with all their rigorous provisions, if his opinion were asked by the people as to their obedience, he should tell them it was no longer a question of moral obligation and duty, but of prudence." He was supported by Sheridan, Grey, and Whitbread, and others of the extreme Liberals; but the ministers openly avowed their determination "to exert a rigour beyond the law as exercised in ordinary times and under ordinary circumstances." They could do what they liked; and in spite of this brilliant opposition in the House, and popular indignation outside, the bill was passed to remain in force during the life of the king, and till the end of the next session after his death.

Treasurer, THE LORD HIGH, the office of, was of Norman origin. It does not seem at first to have been considered of great importance, the duties of the king's treasurer consisting in keeping the royal treasure at Winchester, and, as a member of the exchequer at Westminster, in receiving the accounts of the sheriffs. The office was held by several ecclesiastics, among whom were Nigel of Ely and his son, Richard Fitz-Neal. Under the Norman kings it had no separate judicial powers, and it was not until after the extinction of the office of justiciar that the treasurer rapidly became one of the chief functionaries of the Crown. From the middle of the reign of Henry III we find the treasurer, in conjunction with the newly-created chancellor of the Exchequer, taking part in the equitable jurisdiction of the Exchequer. He was now the third great officer of the Crown; and his duties, besides presiding in the upper court of Exchequer, consisted in the custody of the king's treasure and of the records deposited there, and the appointment of the commissioners and other officers employed in collecting the royal revenue. The treasury was first put in commission on the death of Lord Salisbury in 1612, and the last lord high treasurer was the Earl of Rochester (1679-84). The office of first lord of the treasury has frequently in modern times been held by the prime minister. The lord high treasurer of Scotland was created by James I, King of Scots, on his return from captivity in England. The office was modelled on the parallel institution in England, but it seems to have acquired more relative importance, for in 1617 it was declared the first office of state. Commissioners of the treasury were first appointed in Scotland in 1641, and its separate existence was abolished at the Union. A similar step was taken with regard to Ireland in 1816, where lord treasurers seem to have been in existence as early as the reign of Henry III; but the office disappeared with the creation of the Irish Free State in 1921.

Tremayne, ANDREW (d. 1562), one of the conspirators in Sir Henry Dudley's plot (1556), had been suspected of being involved, together with his brother Edmund, in Wyatt's rebellion (1554-q.v.), but nothing was proved against him. In 1560 Tremayne distinguished himself at the siege of Leith; he was killed at Havre at the same time as his twin brother Nicholas. Froude calls him "the most gallant of the splendid band of youths who had been driven into exile in Mary's time, and had roved the seas as privateers."

Trenchard, SIR JOHN (1640-95), first sat in the House of Commons in 1679 as member for Taunton. He brought in the first Exclusion Bill (November 1680). He was imprisoned for his share in the Rye House Plot (q.v.), and was a vigorous supporter of the unfortunate invasion of Monmouth. He escaped to the continent, and was expressly excepted from the Bill of Pardon of 1686. He returned with William III, and sat as a member of the Convention. In 1692 he was appointed secretary of state. "Apparently," says Macaulay, "he was not trusted with any of the greater secrets of State, but was little more than a superintendent of police." He displayed great and perhaps excessive zeal in the suppression of the Jacobites. A general search for members of that political persuasion in Lancashire failed in its effects, owing to the betrayal of the design. Trenchard was thereupon made the subject of bitter pamphlet attacks. The prosecutions of the arrested men were complete failures. These proceedings were severely commented on by the House. Trenchard's health gave way, and he died soon afterwards.

"Trent," THE CASE OF THE, 1861, arose during the American Civil War. The British mail steamer Trent left Havana (November 8, 1861) for St. Thomas with the mails for England, under charge of a commander in the navy, and with numerous passengers, including Messrs. Slidell and Mason, commissioners for the southern Confederate States. It was stopped (November 9) at the entrance to the Bahama Channel, and about nine miles from the island of Cuba, by the American steamship of war San Jacinto, under Captain Wilkes. The Confederate commissioners and their secretaries were taken from the mail steamer, which was allowed to proceed on her voyage, and were carried to the United States, where they were imprisoned in Fort Warren, near Boston. Intense indignation was aroused in Great Britain, and Earl Russell, in a dispatch on November 30, 1861, instructed Lord Lyons to demand their release and a suitable apology. This note was supported by communications from France, Austria, Prussia, Russia, and Italy, sustaining the views of the British government. Mr. Seward, the American secretary of state, justified the seizure on the grounds that the commissioners were contraband of war, and that Captain Wilkes was entitled to seize them as enemies or rebels. He denied the immunity of the Trent as a packet-boat, and declared that Captain Wilkes had exercised the right of search in a perfectly legal manner. He conceded, however, that Wilkes was guilty of an irregularity in not sending the vessel into an American port to be tried by a prize court, and finally based his acquiescence in the British demand on considerations connected with the complaints previously made by the United States as to the impressment of seamen from their vessels. The question was eventually settled by a suggestion of the Prince Consort that Great Britain would be satisfied with the release of the prisoners if the United States would declare that Wilkes had acted without instructions. Lord Russell, however, in a dispatch of January 11, 1862, explicitly denied that the commissioners could in any sense be described as contraband of war.

Tresilian, SIR ROBERT (d. 1388), was appointed Chief Justice of the King's Bench in 1381. His first act was to try the insurgents of Wat Tyler's rebellion, and he is said to have performed his duty with such cruelty that no parallel can be found for his conduct till the campaign of Judge Jeffreys. He attached himself to the king and de Vere, and was one of the judges by whose advice Richard in 1387 annulled the commission of regency appointed in the previous year. When parliament met in 1388 the barons were determined on his punishment; he was deprived of his office and appealed of treason. He sought refuge in flight, but was captured and hanged at Tyburn.

Trevor, SIR JOHN (1637-1717), was, says Macaulay, "bred half a pettifogger, and half a gambler." He was called to the bar in 1661. He was a creature of Judge Jeffreys, and as such was chosen Speaker in 1685. Shortly afterwards he became master of the rolls. After the Revolution he was sworn of the privy council. He was employed by Lord Carmarthen to buy the votes of the House of Commons. He again became Speaker in 1690, without opposition. He was subsequently created first commissioner of the great seal. In 1695 he was accused of corruption, having received from the City of London £1,000 for expediting a local bill. It was known that he pocketed £6,000 a year beyond his official salary. In his place he was forced to put the question and declare that the "ayes" had it. Next day he avoided putting the vote for his expulsion by pleading illness. He was, however, expelled the House.

Triers, THE COMMISSION OF, was established by Cromwell (March 20, 1654). Cromwell regulated the Church by means of two ordinances, one of which (August 22, 1653) established local committees to eject unfit ministers, whilst the other (March 20) established a central committee to examine ministers newly appointed. The latter, or Commission of Triers, consisted of thirty-eight persons, of whom nine were laymen and twenty-nine divines, to whom four divines and one layman were afterwards added. Their duty was to examine all future presentees to livings and all who had been appointed since April 1, 1653. Their certificate of fitness was to be regarded as qualifying candidates to receive the ministerial stipend, but it was expressly declared that it was not to be regarded as "any solemn or sacred setting apart for the office of the ministry." Baxter, though a Presbyterian, says, "To give them their due, they did abundance of good to the Church. . . . They saved many a congregation from ignorant, ungodly, drunken teachers." He goes on to add that they were too partial to Independents and Separatists,

"yet so great was the benefit above the hurt which they brought to the Church, that many thousands of souls blessed God for the faithful ministers whom they let in."

Trim, THE REMONSTRANCE OF (March 1643), was a document drawn up by the Irish Catholics, and transmitted to the king through Ormonde. In it they complained of the penal laws and disabilities under which they had been suffering since 1660, and also of the conduct of the lord justices in 1641, and of the threats of the English parliament; they concluded with an offer of 10,000 men to defend the king's prerogative. The Cessation (q.v.) soon followed.

Trimmers, THE, were a party of politicians who formed a third party in parliament in the reign of Charles II, about 1680, between the Whigs and the Tories as they came to be called. Their leader, Halifax, was a Trimmer on principle, and looked upon the title as one of honour. True to their character, they voted in the Upper House against the Exclusion Bill, although they were known to be opposed to the Duke of York.

Trinidad, the most southerly of the West Indian Islands, was discovered by Columbus in 1498 and used by the Spaniards as a victualling and slave supply station. Founded in 1577 or 1584, San José was attacked by Sir Walter Raleigh in 1595. The island was included in the Earl of Montgomery's grant (1628), and the Earl of Warwick unsuccessfully tried to colonize it. In 1677 and 1690 it was ravaged by the French and remained sparsely populated until the decree of 1783 attracted many French Catholic settlers by grants of land. Trinidad was taken by a British force under Abercromby and Harvey in 1797 and ceded to Great Britain by the Peace of Amiens (1802). Immediately numbers of Scots and Irish settlers arrived and prospered. Negro emancipation was peacefully accepted in 1834, and its mineral resources, together with the introduction of Chinese (1806) and East Indian coolies (1845), prevented the island from suffering the prevalent West Indian depression. A semi-official legislature was granted in 1831, and now Trinidad with Tobago is administered as a Crown colony by a governor, assisted by an executive council of 3 and a legislative council of 8 officials and 10 nominated members to represent the divisions of the colony. The law is English with slight Spanish modifications. Since 1899 Tobago (q.v.) has been an integral part of the colony. The colonial office mission of 1921-2 under the Hon. E. F. L. Wood recommended the adoption of representative government.

Trinoda Necessitas, i.e., the three-fold necessity of repairing bridges (brigh-bot), keeping up fortifications (burh-bot), and performing military service (fyrð), was usually incumbent on every holder of land in Anglo-Saxon times, even if he were exempt from every other service. The earliest mention of the Trinoda Necessitas occurs at the beginning of the eighth century.

Triple Alliance, THE (January 23, 1668), was made, chiefly by the exertions of Sir William Temple and the Dutch statesman De Witt, between England, Holland, and Sweden. The three powers bound themselves to assist one another against France, and especially in checking the aggressions of Louis XIV in the Spanish Netherlands. Finding himself threatened by this powerful coalition, Louis was compelled on May 2 of the same year to make the Treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle with Spain, by which, while retaining many of the border fortresses of the Netherlands, he gave up Franche-Comté, which he had also conquered, and agreed to retire from the Netherlands, while the Spaniards ceded to him many important frontier towns. The Triple Alliance, however, was of short duration, and was reversed two years afterwards by the Treaty of Dover (q.v.) concluded between England and France (1670), and directed against Holland.

— (January 4, 1717), was concluded between Great Britain, France, and Holland, on the basis of an Anglo-French treaty concluded on November 28, 1716, by Stanhope and Dubois, after a convention at Hanover. It guaranteed the succession to the crowns in France and Great Britain, and provided for a settlement of the questions of Dunkirk and Mardyck and for the expulsion of the Pretender from France. It was directed against Philip V of Spain and Alberoni. And on the accession of the Empire to it on August 2, 1718, it became the Quadruple Alliance (q.v.).

— (May 20, 1882), was formed by the accession of Italy to the dual alliance already existing between Germany and Austria-Hungary since October 7, 1879. The first step towards the Alliance had been the Dreikaiserbund of 1872 between the Emperors of Germany, Austria, and Russia. The alliance was made for five years, and renewed in 1887, 1891, 1902, and 1912. The formation of the Triple Entente (q.v., 1894-1907), combined with the existence of the Triple Alliance, divided Europe into two armed camps.

Triple Alliance (INDIA) (July 4, 1790) was concluded between the East India Company, under Lord Cornwallis's governorship, the Nizam, and the Peshwa. Its stipulations were that the three powers should attack Tippoo's dominions, both during and after the rains, and prosecute the war with vigour; that the Mahrattas and the Nizam should join the British, if required, with 10,000 horse, for which they were to be fully reimbursed; that a British contingent should accompany their troops; that all conquests should be equally divided; and that none should make peace without the rest.

Triple Industrial Alliance, THE (1914), was formed in 1914 as a federation comprising the Miners' Federation of Great Britain (founded c. 1870), the Transport Workers' Federation, and the National Union of Railwaymen (founded 1912-13). The alliance took action during the coal stoppage of 1921, calling a strike in support of the miners. But the strike notices were cancelled on April 14, ("Black Friday") and the miners fought on alone until forced to capitulate in June.

Trollop, SIR ANDREW (d. 1461), served in the French wars, and on the outbreak of the Wars of the Roses joined the Duke of York. In 1459, after the battle of Blore Heath, the combined forces of York, Salisbury, and Warwick assembled at Ludford, close to Ludlow. Here they were confronted by the king, and a battle was imminent, when Trollop deserted with a considerable body of men to Henry. His defection caused the Yorkists to retreat in disorder. Trollop fought at Wakefield and St. Albans, and commanded the van of the Lancastrians at the battle of Towton, where he was slain.

Trot of Turriff, THE, was a name given to a defeat of the Covenanters at Turriff by the Gordons (May 14, 1639).

A. Lang, "History of Scotland," vol. iii, 1904.

Troyes, THE PEACE OF (April 11, 1564), was concluded, after the surrender of Havre, between France and England. By it the queen's mother undertook to pay 120,000 crowns to England, free trade was to be allowed, and the French hostages were to be released. The English agents were Sir Thomas Smith and Sir Nicholas Throckmorton (q.v.).

Troyes, THE TREATY OF (May 21, 1420), was concluded between Henry V, Charles VI of France, and the Burgundian party. The dauphin and the Armagnacs were still in arms, and refused to recognize the treaty. The terms agreed upon were that Henry should have the title of regent and heir of France; but promised to maintain the French parliaments in their privileges, and to preserve the privileges of all individuals, and all the laws and customs of the realm of France. He further undertook to restore to the French king all cities, castles, etc., that had revolted from him, "being on the side called that of the Dauphin and of Armagnac"; Normandy and all parts and cities conquered by King Henry were to be restored to France as soon as Henry succeeded to the throne of France; Henry of England was to succeed on the next vacancy to the throne of France; the two crowns were to be for ever united; each realm was to have its own laws and government, and neither was to be in any way subject to the other; finally, Henry was forthwith to espouse Catherine, daughter of the King of France.

Truro, THOMAS WILDE, LORD (1782-1855). [WILDE.]

Tudor, THE FAMILY OF, was of Welsh origin, Tudor being probably a corruption of Theodore. The first of the Tudors of whom we have individual knowledge was Owen Tudor (q.v.), a gentleman who fought during the Wars of the Roses on the Lancastrian side, and who married Catherine of Valois, the widow of Henry V. By her he had two sons, Edmund and Jasper, whom Henry VI created Earls of Richmond and Pembroke. The marriage of the Earl of Richmond with Margaret, daughter of John Beaufort, Earl of Somerset, who was the heiress of the illegitimate branch of the house of Lancaster, founded the fortunes of the race. As soon as the house of York became unpopular, Henry, Earl of Richmond, the son of Edmund, was adopted by the party of the Red Rose as the only possible candidate for the throne. When his second attempt to gain the throne was successful Henry became Henry VII, and was careful to confirm his dubious claims by marrying Elizabeth, the daughter of Edward IV, and to rule by a quasi-parliamentary title.

The character of Henry VII is, to a considerable extent, an enigma. He seems to have been regarded by his contemporaries with a mixture of hatred and admiration, the former called forth chiefly by the exactions of the last part of his reign. The central fact of his home policy is the systematic repression of the old nobility, already almost exterminated by the Wars of the Roses, and his continuance of the regime of personal government inaugurated by Edward IV. Abroad he trusted rather to diplomacy than to arms, and the cold, mysterious course of action which was adopted also by his contemporaries, Louis XI of France and Ferdinand the Catholic, of Aragon, gained for them the title of "the three Magi." The marriage of his daughter Margaret with James IV of Scotland was an instance of singular foresight. His other daughter, Mary, after marrying the decrepit Louis XII of France, was united with her old love Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk. One of her daughters was the mother of Lady Jane Grey; the heiresses of the others married into the great houses of Seymour and Stanley.

Few kings have been more popular at the time of their accession than the handsome and accomplished Henry VIII. His title was undisputed, and the able part which he soon began to play in foreign affairs still further aroused the national enthusiasm. He showed considerable ability in maintaining the balance of power in Europe, and by the aid of Wolsey was able to a great extent to play off the Empire against France, to the great advantage of England. The divorce question, with its momentous consequences, was the turning-point of the reign. Henry, always swayed by passion and impulse, was hurried, the nation apparently silently approving, into a rupture with the Papacy, and sweeping measures of ecclesiastical reform, including the Act of Supremacy, and the destruction of the old system of monasticism. The Church aristocracy fell before him, as the landed aristocracy had fallen before his father, and on their ruins rose a new and subservient nobility. All this time Henry was sincerely Catholic; his hatred of Lutheranism, and his vigorous persecution of it when it appeared in England, were quite consistent with the publication of the ten articles of religion. During the latter part of his reign Henry was disliked by his subjects, and was conscious of that dislike. The courage with which he still confronted the formidable coalition of the emperor and the pope was not properly appreciated. Cromwell proved a more violently autocratic instrument than Wolsey had been; the king was vexed by agrarian revolts, and troubled by the failure of his marriage projects. During the last years of his life he was occupied chiefly in arranging the succession, and in alternately persecuting and protecting the parties of reaction and of reform.

The personality of young Edward, a sickly and precocious hothouse plant, is of comparatively little moment in the history of the house of Tudor. The brief reign divides itself into two periods: the first, during which the kingdom was under the uncertain guidance of the Protector Somerset, being marked by the violent advance of the Reformation and terminating in another agrarian revolt; the second being occupied by unprincipled intrigues for the management of the succession. The courage of Mary and the loyalty of the nation thwarted the schemes of Northumberland, and the Catholics of England, certainly a majority of the gentry, hailed with delight the accession of a sovereign who had suffered persecution and sorrow for the cause. It should not be forgotten that Mary did not begin by shedding blood. She spared Lady Jane Grey as long as she could, but her Tudor pride could brook no opposition, and the popular opposition to her marriage with Philip of Spain only made her the more bent on carrying out the project. By that miserable arrangement she wrecked her life. Her domestic life was utterly blighted. She was embroiled in a disastrous war with France, and finally she was induced by her advisers to enter upon a course of religious persecution, which has since unjustly come to be regarded as the chief, and perhaps only, feature of her reign.

It is impossible here to give more than the merest general outline of the character and policy of Elizabeth. From the first her attitude to Catholicism was perfectly consistent. With little real religious conviction, she was opposed to the Papacy from purely political motives, and the Acts of Supremacy and Uniformity were passed primarily as a reply to the denial by Paul IV of her right to succeed. From the same spirit she acted severely towards the Nonconformists; the pale of the English Church was to be as wide as possible, but no independence could be allowed outside it. In spite of her persecutions, Elizabeth was really tolerant. The whole history of her reign turns upon the religious question, and the religious question in turn upon the succession question. Mary of Scotland was put forward by Catholic Europe as the legitimist candidate for the throne, and Philip of Spain, with the Guises at his back, posed as her champion. Elizabeth was, therefore, forced, like her father, even though it was against her will, to abandon a trimming foreign policy, and to become the chief of the Protestant cause; and yet in the very crisis of the struggle we find her, partly from motives of parsimony, partly from excess of caution, and partly from Tudor reverence for royal authority, acting in disregard of her ministers, and starving the rebellions of the Netherlands and of the Huguenots no less than her own army and navy. It cannot be denied that in her struggle with the great tide of events which was finally stemmed by the Armada she was favoured by good fortune to an extraordinary degree. Her marriage coquetries nearly wrecked the vessel of State more than once, and her indecision in dealing with Mary Stuart aggravated a very grave crisis. Yet, with all her faults, Elizabeth is among the very greatest of the sovereigns of England. In her personal grace and culture of character, her patriotism, her despotic spirit, which yet understood so well the temper and the needs of the nation, she exemplifies the highest qualities of the family, to which, on the whole, Englishmen of later times owe a great debt of gratitude.

Tudor, EDMUND, EARL OF RICHMOND (d. 1456), was the eldest son of Owen Tudor by Catherine, widow of Henry V. He was created Earl of Richmond in 1453, and married Margaret Beaufort, daughter and heiress of John, Duke of Somerset, by whom he had one son, afterwards Henry VII.

Tudor, JASPER (c. 1431-95), created Earl of Pembroke c. 1453, and Duke of Bedford at Henry VII's coronation, was the second son of Owen Tudor, and consequently an uncle of the founder of the Tudor dynasty. In the Wars of the Roses he played an active part among the Lancastrian leaders, and it was his defeat at Mortimer's Cross by Edward IV, then known as the Earl of March, that gave Edward the possession of London and the crown of England at the same time. During the Yorkist supremacy Jasper Tudor was an exile, sharing the perils of Henry of Richmond in France and Brittany. On his nephew's overthrow of Richard III he was entrusted with military commands of importance, as well as with such high offices as the lieutenancy of Calais and the lord-lieutenancy of Ireland. He fought against the rebels in 1486 and 1487 and joined the French expedition in 1492.

Tudor, OWEN (d. 1461), claimed descent from Cadwallader, the last so-called King of Britain, but his origin is very obscure. He seems to have been the godson of Owen Glendower (q.v.), and he is said to have been one of the band of Welshmen who, under David Gam, fought at Agincourt. Henry V, according to this version, made him in reward one of the squires of his body. His handsome person gained him the love of Catherine, widow of Henry V, whom he secretly married about 1429. He was imprisoned in Newgate, whence, however, he escaped twice, and was subsequently received into favour by Henry VI. His wife died in 1437. He fought on the Lancastrian side in the Wars of the Roses, and was taken prisoner in the battle of Mortimer's Cross, carried to Hereford, and beheaded there. By his wife he had two sons, who played an important part in English history—Edmund, Earl of Richmond, father of Henry VII, and Jasper, Earl of Pembroke.

Tulchan Bishops, THE, was a name given to the creatures of the Regent Morton, who were appointed to sees in accordance with the enactments of the Leith Convention (January 1572) and the Perth Assembly later in the same year. The commissioners at Leith were the mere dupes and tools of a rapacious court, and a strange, heterogeneous compound of popery, prebacy, and presbytery was authorized, by which the avaricious nobility imagined they had secured their long-cherished design of obtaining for themselves the real possession of the wealth of the Church. It was decided (though the true nature of the transaction was veiled as far as possible) that such valuable Church property could only be held by bishops, prebacy should continue, and creatures of the court should be appointed, who were to pay for their promotion by making over large portions of their temporalities to their patron, whoever he might be, who had procured their election. The new dignitaries quickly acquired the name of "Tulchan" bishops (from tulchan, a calf's skin stuffed with straw, which was used in the Highlands to induce cows who had lost their calves to give their milk readily), for "the bishop had the title, but my lord got the milk, or commodity." "Every lord," says James Melville in his Diary, "got a bishopric, and sought and presented to the kirk such a man as would be content with least, and get them most of tacks, feus, and pensions."

Tulsi Bai (d. 1817) was the favourite concubine of Jeswunt Rao Holkar. During the insanity of the latter she carried on the government in conjunction with his chief minister, Baharam Sett. On his death in 1811 she adopted a son of his by another concubine, and conducted the government as regent. The army, however, was too large and turbulent for the state, and the revenue was totally unable to support them. They were therefore generally in a mutinous state, and at last drove the Bai to seek refuge in Kotah, by the threat of actual violence. Her amours and crimes embroiled her with Guffur Khan, the leader of the Patan horse, and in the warfare which followed she in person led her Mahratta horse with the most undaunted courage to the assault. Between these various factions the government of the Holkar state fell into complete anarchy, the administration being vested in the Bai nominally and all real power being in the hands of the military leaders. On the outbreak of Baji Rao (q.v.) in 1817 the chiefs assembled their forces, and determined to support the Peshwa, but Tulsi Bai opened negotiations with the British government, offering to place the young Holkar, and the Holkar state, under their protection. These proceedings being suspected, the chiefs seized and imprisoned her ministers, and she herself was put to death.

Tunnage and Poundage, a duty which, at first fluctuating, was eventually fixed at 3s. on every tun of wine, and 5 per cent. on all goods imported. It appears to have been first voted by the Commons in 1308. The original intention was that it should be applied to the protection of the merchant navy; and in Sir John Fortescue's scheme of reform we find that it was regarded as dedicated to that purpose. Nevertheless, the custom of voting the duty to the king for life, which was begun in the reign of Henry V, soon caused it to be looked upon as part of the royal revenue. Accordingly some indignation was not unreasonably excited in the court when, on the accession of Charles I, the Commons proceeded to vote it for one year only. The House of Lords rejected the bill on account of its innovating tendency, and Charles proceeded to try to levy the tax by royal authority, but the London merchants refused to pay it. A remonstrance was carried against this conduct in 1629, and, though Charles declared that tunnage and poundage was what he would not give away, and prorogued parliament in order to avoid receiving the remonstrance, he was compelled in the following year to consent to an act renouncing the power of levying the tax without the consent of parliament. In 1641 the prerogative of levying customs on merchandise was abolished by an act which granted tunnage and poundage for two months only. After the Restoration, tunnage and poundage was voted for life to Charles II and James II, but only for limited periods to William III. In the reign of Anne it was made perpetual, and applied to the diminution of the national debt. It was finally abolished by Pitt's Customs Consolidation Act of 1787.

Tunstall, CUTHBERT (1474-1559), was made Bishop of London (1522) and afterwards of Durham (1530) by Henry VIII, who, after having employed him on various diplomatic missions, also named him in his will as one of the council of executors during the minority of Edward VI. In 1547 he was excluded from the council for his opposition to the party of the Reformation, and was shortly afterwards sent to the Tower for the same reason, though the ostensible charge against him was complicity in the schemes of Somerset. In 1553 he was released by Mary, and appointed a commissioner to inquire into the condition of the Protestant bishops, though he appears to have been a lenient inquisitor. On the accession of Elizabeth, Tunstall was deprived of his bishopric for refusing to take the oath of supremacy.

Turkey, RELATIONS WITH. [For relations between England and the earlier Turkish kingdoms see CRUSADES.] The dealings between England and the Ottoman Turks began during the reign of Elizabeth, when not only did commercial relations of some importance spring up, but the queen sought Ottoman assistance against the Spaniards. In 1579 three merchants (Harebone, Ellis, and Staple) visited Constantinople, and obtained for English merchants privileges equal to those of other countries. In 1583 Harebone became English ambassador to the Porte, and Elizabeth did not scruple in 1587 to invoke the aid of the Turks against the "idolatrous Spaniard and Pope." To these advances the Turks seem to have made no answer. Their state was already decaying, and Roe, James I's envoy, in 1622, tells emphatically how it had become "like an old body, crazed through many vices." During the seventeenth century a renewal of vigour gave the lie to Roe's prophecy of speedy dissolution, and Puritan England on the whole looked with favour on the power that checked the Catholic Austrians on the Danube, and so saved Protestant Germany. Louis XIV's alliance with Turkey, however, turned things the other way. Yet at the Congress of Carlowitz (1699) the English ambassador did his best to minimize the cessions of Turkish territory, and Sultan Ahmet III expressed his strong sense of gratitude for the efforts made by the English on his behalf. The general alliance between Great Britain and Russia during the early part of the eighteenth century involved us in some hostility to the Turks. The government of George III protected the Russian fleet, which in 1768 sailed to the help of the revolted Greeks, and its acquiescence in the partition of Poland implied approval of the aggressions against Turkey. During the Coalition ministry Fox acquiesced in the annexation of the Crimea (1783). At last Pitt inaugurated the policy of opposition to Russian aggression, and of consequent support to Turkey in her struggle against Catherine II and Joseph II. In 1807 Duckworth's disastrous expedition to Constantinople was designed to punish the alliance of Turkey and Napoleon. After the close of the Napoleonic war Britain's policy constantly tended to support Turkey as a necessary bulwark against Russia, but the difficulties created by Turkish misgovernment, and the impossibility of cordially supporting so effete a system, modified the general idea in practice, and Turkey, although helped, was never really treated as an independent power. The Greek insurrection nowhere excited more sympathy than in Great Britain; yet Great Britain, after Navarino (q.v.), drew back under Wellington, and, while giving Greece her liberty, limited her power and narrowed her frontiers. [GREECE.] Similarly in 1832 Britain hesitated to help Sultan Mahmud II against Mehemet Ali, and then, after Russia had sent a force against the rebellious Egyptian, joined with that power and France in restraining his advances. In 1839 British support of Turkey, again attacked by Mehemet and Ibrahim, was more thorough and decisive. In 1840 Great Britain, Russia, Austria, and Prussia joined with Turkey in a treaty defining the terms of their intervention. A British fleet under Stopford and Napier bombarded Beyrut and Acre, and drove Ibrahim out of Syria. In 1854 Great Britain joined France in the Crimean War (q.v.) for the defence of Turkey; but the success of the allies could only postpone the decay of their protégé. In 1858 Britain recognized the practical independence of Rumania; yet in 1860 she assisted in maintaining order in Syria [LEBANON QUESTION], and in 1867 in subduing Crete. In 1876-7 the Balkan insurrections and the situation created by the Russo-Turkish War brought into prominence again the question of the relations of Great Britain with the decaying State. Ultimately the Treaty of Berlin (q.v.) preserved European peace, while recognizing that the gradual reconstitution of the Turkish peninsula into autonomous Christian states was the only solution to the question. [T. F. T.]

This process of disintegration and reconstitution was accelerated by the recognition of Bulgarian independence (1896), the annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina to Austria-Hungary (1908), and the annexation of Crete to Greece (1909-10). The tradition of Anglo-Ottoman friendship outlived the Balkan Wars, however. Great Britain welcomed the Young Turk Revolution of 1908, and joined with the powers in mediating between the Balkan League and Turkey in 1912-13. But the entry of Turkey into the World War on the side of Germany (November 1, 1914) automatically severed relations. It was followed by the Dardanelles campaign (q.v.—February 19, 1915—January 8, 1916), and the offensives under Maude and Allenby in Syria and Mesopotamia, culminating in the capture of Aleppo by the British on October 26, 1918. The Peace Conference at Paris neglected the Turkish problem, but Great Britain supported the Greek landing at Smyrna in May 1919 and the Greek offensive in Asia Minor, after the Treaty of Sévres, in 1920. This attitude was reflected in a speech by Mr. Lloyd George on August 4, 1922. On the defeat of the Greeks (September) Lord Curzon took the initiative in inviting the Turks to a peace conference with the allies. The conference opened at Mudania (October 3) and led ultimately to the Treaty of Lausanne (q.v.—July 24, 1923). An acute Anglo-Turkish controversy remained, in the question of Mosul and its oilfields. This was softened by the recognition of the Brussels Line (proposed by the League of Nations) in September 1924, and a settlement was made by the Anglo-Turkish-Iraqi Treaty of June 5, 1926, which included Mosul in Iraq.

Turk's Islands and Caicos (or KEYS) are geographically part of the Bahamas and a dependency of Jamaica. The name derives from the turban-like appearance of an indigenous cactus. Visited annually from 1678 by Bermudian salt-rakers, the settlements later became permanent. Expelled by Spaniards in 1710, the British returned and resisted counter-claims from both France and Spain until in 1765, after a French outrage, the Islands were recognized as part of the Bahamas and from 1799 were given representation in the Assembly. In 1848, on petition, they were made a separate colony with a president appointed by the Crown and a council of eight, half of whom were elected, under the supervision of the governor of Jamaica, to which island they were annexed in 1873, owing to financial disabilities, to be governed by a resident commissioner and a legislative board of five nominated by the governor of Jamaica.

Tutbury, in Staffordshire, twenty miles from Stafford, was granted by William the Conqueror to Hugh d'Avranches, who built the castle. The Ferrers held it until 1266, when it was forfeited and given to Edmund Crouchback, Earl of Lancaster. In 1322 it was garrisoned against Edward II by Thomas, Earl of Lancaster, but surrendered. In 1350 John of Gaunt rebuilt the castle for his wife's residence. In 1569 Mary, Queen of Scots, was imprisoned there, under the charge of the Earl of Shrewsbury, but after a few months (February 3—May) was removed to Chatsworth. In 1585 she was again brought back to Tutbury (January 13), in charge of Sir Amyas Paulet, and remained there until her removal to Chartley (December). Tutbury was frequently visited by James I and Charles I, for the latter of whom it was garrisoned by Lord Loughborough in the Civil War. It was taken (1646) and dismantled (1647) by the Parliamentary troops under Brereton.

Twenge, ROBERT DE, a knight of Yorkshire, organized a secret society in the year 1232, the object of which was to prevent the intrusion of foreigners into English benefices. Under his leadership masked men went about the country seizing the foreign ecclesiastics, pillaging their barns, and giving the corn to the poor. These doings were openly connived at by many of the leading men in the kingdom, and when in 1239 Twenge went to Rome he took with him letters from the chief men in the realm remonstrating against the papal aggression. The pope was obliged to yield, and promised never again to interfere with the rights of patrons, but the promise was not kept long, as soon afterwards we find Grosseteste and others complaining of the number of Italians holding benefices in England. Twenge's subsequent history is obscure. He probably went with Richard of Cornwall to Palestine and was later employed on various diplomatic missions. He died about 1268.

Tyler's Rebellion. [PEASANT'S REVOLT.]

Tyndale, WILLIAM (d. 1536), the translator of the Bible, was a student at both Oxford and Cambridge, and at the latter University probably came under the influence of Erasmus. While tutor in the family of Sir John Walsh, in Gloucestershire, he translated the "Enchiridion" of Erasmus, and for that, and his known anti-clerical views, fell under the displeasure of the bishop. In 1523 he went to London and tried to obtain assistance for his projected translation of the Bible. Failing to do so, however, he sailed for Hamburg (1524) and there printed his first two Gospels. During the rest of his life he kept himself for the most part in retirement, in company with his friend John Frith, his head-quarters being at Antwerp, where he was befriended by English merchants. In 1529 the printing of Lutheran books was prohibited by a treaty between Henry VIII and the governors of the Netherlands. At length he was seized, at the instigation of Henry, when he went beyond the liberties of Antwerp, and was burnt by the order of the emperor. The first part of the quarto edition of his translation of the New Testament reached England in 1525; the Pentateuch, in which he was assisted by Miles Coverdale, in 1530; and four editions of his New Testament were printed at Antwerp in 1534. About forty editions were afterwards published.

Tyrconnel, RORY O'DONNELL, 1ST EARL OF (1575–1608). [O'DONNELL.]

Tyrell, SIR JAMES (d. 1502), was popularly supposed to have murdered the young princes Edward V and Richard, Duke of York, in the Tower. The charge, however, is not definitely proved, and was not brought forward until after Tyrell's execution as a confederate of the Earl of Suffolk. The confession which he is alleged to have made on the eve of his execution is embodied in the "Historie of Kyng Richarde the Thirde."

Tyrone, EARLS OF. [O'NEILL.]

Tyrrell, or TIREL, SIR WALTER, is generally credited with having accidentally slain William Rufus in the New Forest (August 2, 1100). Tyrrell himself denied the charge, but the facts that his name appears as the murderer in almost all the authorities for this period, and that he immediately fled across sea, seem to point to him as the actual homicide.

U

Uchtred of Galloway, the son of Fergus, joined his brother Gilbert in revolt against William the Lion (1174). A few months later he was murdered by his nephew Malcolm, at the instigation of Gilbert.

Udall, JOHN (1560 ?-1592), a Puritan minister, was tried for the publication of "A Demonstration of Discipline," as "a libel on the person of the queen, because it inveighed against the government of the Church established by her authority." Udall was condemned to death, but was spared at the intercession of Sir Walter Raleigh. He died in prison (June 1592) after his pardon had been made out.

Uganda. [EAST AFRICA, BRITISH DOMINIONS IN.]

Uhtred, the son of Earl Waltheof, defeated the Scots under Malcolm towards the commencement of the eleventh century, and thus saved the city of Durham (1006). For this he was rewarded with the earldom of both Deira and Bernicia. In 1013 he submitted to Sweyn, but in the course of the same year joined Edmund, only, however, to submit once more to Canute when that king gained the upper hand (1016). Uhtred was murdered at the instigation of his old enemy Thurbrand (1016).

Ulf, Bishop of Dorchester, succeeded Eadnoth in the year 1049, much to the disgust of the Englishmen, who considered him utterly unfit for the office, and loathed him as a Norman. When Godwin returned in 1052 he fled, sword in hand, from London, and crossed over to the continent, and was deprived of his see. He is spoken of as the bishop "who did nought bishop-like."

Ulf, EARL (d. circ. 1025), is sometimes credited with having been instrumental in securing the rise of Godwin, who married his sister Gytha. His wife was Estrith, Canute's sister, and for some years he acted as Canute's regent in Denmark; but notwithstanding this relationship, he was put to death by this king, in circumstances of peculiar atrocity, somewhere about the year 1025.

Ulfcytel, ealdorman of the East Angles, led the men of his province against Sweyn in 1004. His prowess was so conspicuous as to earn him the warm commendation of his antagonists, although they were ultimately victorious. In 1010 he was defeated at Ringmere, and six years later he met his death at the battle of Assandun (1016).

Ulster, THE KINGDOM AND PROVINCE OF, appears to have been first colonized, at an unknown period, by Picts of Celtic origin. The great race movements which culminated in the formation of the over-kingship of Meath by Tuathal [MEATH] affected the south rather than the north of Ireland; but during the first half of the fourth century we find some of his descendants invading Ulster from Meath with the countenance of the ard ri (over-king), and winning for themselves the land of Uriel. They were followed, during the reign of Niall "of the nine hostages" by other cadets of the reigning family, who became princes of Tyrconnel and Tyrone. With the arrival of St. Patrick, in the first half of the fifth century, Ulster, which had lagged somewhat behind the rest of Ireland, received an extraordinary impetus, and became a centre whence large numbers of missionaries, chief of whom was St. Columba, issued forth to Britain and northern Europe. Ulster offered a rather more vigorous resistance to the invading Vikings than did the rest of Ireland, and we find Murtoth O'Neill, about the middle of the tenth century, making a triumphant circuit of Ireland. During the anarchy which preceded the Anglo-Norman invasion the kings of Ulster were engaged in a long and arduous struggle with their Munster rivals, and Murtoth O'Loughlin, of the house of O'Neill, twice succeeded for a brief period in making himself over-king of Ireland (comparatively 1148 and 1156). Ulster suffered little from the first invasion, and though Henry granted the province to de Courcy, he only succeeded in grasping a strip of land near Downpatrick. John, however, resumed the grant, and gave it to a younger member of the de Lacy family, through whose daughter and heiress it passed into the de Burgh family. After the murder of William, the 3rd Earl of Ulster, in 1333, his heiress married Lionel, Duke of Clarence, and the earldom thus passed through females to the house of Mortimer, and to Richard, Earl of Cambridge, the grandfather of Edward IV, with whom it became vested in the Crown. In the thirteenth century Ulster was practically independent. The English possessions were confined to the outskirts of Down, Antrim, and Fermanagh, and a town or two in Donegal. The invasion of the Bruces in 1315 was followed by the loss of even these paltry districts, and the O'Neills did what they pleased in Ulster before the accession of the Tudors. Under Henry VII Turlough O'Donnell and Conn O'Neill were disposed to be friendly to the Crown; the descendants of the latter chieftain became Earls of Tyrconnel, while the former was made Earl of Tyrone. When the first attempt to introduce the reformed doctrines was made the primacy was transferred from Dublin to Armagh, where the O'Neills could protect it. The power of that race, however, was soon to be broken. The earldom of Tyrone was conferred by the government on Conn's bastard son Matthew, to the exclusion of his legitimate son Shane. The latter was, however, chosen chief by the tribe, and, having murdered his brother, maintained his rights against the lord-lieutenant, Sussex, partly by arms and partly by intrigue. For a while he was allowed to administer Ulster as "captain of Tyrone," and used the opportunity to oppress the O'Donnells and the M'Donnells, Scottish settlers in Antrim. These tribes promptly espoused the side of the new lord deputy, Sir Henry Sydney (1586), and Shane, out-manceuvred, was defeated and put to death by the M'Donnells. The earldom was granted to Matthew's son Hugh in 1587, and he was soon afterwards placed in possession of the territory. An able man, he formed a coalition, which relied on Spanish aid, of all the northern chiefs, together with the pretender to the honours of Kildare, against the English, and from 1595 to 1603 he waged a life-and-death struggle with the Crown, terminating in his submission on honourable terms. The province was, however, utterly ruined, and in the following reign he and his kinsman, the Earl of Tyrconnel, fled from Ireland in fear of the designs of the government. Six counties were thereupon declared to be forfeited to the Crown, the minor chiefs were driven out on one pretence or another, and James I set to work on the Plantation of Ulster (q.v.), which was made with scientific precision [on the basis of the unsuccessful shiring begun by Lord Deputy Sir John Perrot in 1585], and was in consequence a success (1608). Wentworth oppressed Ulster hardly less than the rest of Ireland, and he was especially severe on the Scottish Presbyterians. With the outbreak of the rebellion of 1641, Catholic Ulster at once sprang to arms under the brutal Sir Phelim O'Neill, who was afterwards superseded by Owen Roe O'Neill (q.v.), a trained soldier. The latter in 1646 gained a considerable victory over Monro at Benburb (q.v.), but the Irish parties began quarrelling among themselves, and Cromwell's work was easy. After the massacre of Drogheda the chief towns of Ulster surrendered one after another, and the rebellion in that district was rapidly stamped out by Coote, the Protector's subordinate. By the Cromwellian settlement the remaining Catholic gentry were transplanted into Connaught, or shipped to Barbados; the Presbyterians also of Down and Antrim, who had shown Royalist sympathies, were compelled to migrate to Munster. Of the lands thus vacated Antrim, Down, and Armagh were partitioned between adventurers and soldiers, and the rest of Ulster was colonized by the soldiers, who were allowed to remain practically undisturbed after the Restoration, though the Presbyterians suffered considerable persecution under the last of the Stuarts. Hence it can hardly be wondered at that after the Revolution the Protestants of Ireland should have chosen Ulster as the spot on which to make a stand, and that Londonderry and Enniskillen should have held out against James II. From that time forward Ulster remained distinct in character from the rest of Ireland. It was more prosperous, a valuable linen industry having been founded there by Huguenot refugees under William III, which a narrow mercantile policy was not able wholly to destroy, and which revived when in 1779 the Volunteers won free trade for Ireland. It was also emphatically Protestant, in spite of the persecution of the Presbyterians, who fled in large numbers across the Atlantic. Lastly it was emphatically loyal, though it was frequently disturbed by turbulent associations such as the Whiteboys (q.v.), Peep-o'-day Boys (q.v.), Orangemen, and the like, and though the United Irishmen of 1798, and the Fenians of a later date, drew recruits from Belfast and Londonderry almost as freely as from Cork or from Limerick. After the Union the condition of Ulster was on the whole peaceful and prosperous; but the Repeal agitation, and the Home Rule movement (in which the Ulster Protestants were on the side of England and the English connexion), perpetuated the distinction between it and the rest of Ireland. Ulster, THE PLANTATION OF (1608-11).

The troubles of the early years of the seventeenth century, the flight of Tyrconnel and Tyrone, and other rebellions, had resulted in the forfeiture of a very large part of Ulster to the Crown. In 1608 a commission was appointed to consider what should be done with these large estates, and proposed to colonize the whole district with "retired civil and military servants," and with colonists from England and Scotland. Sir Arthur Chichester would have left the Irish in possession of their own territories, and only settled the new-comers here and there by agreement with them; but the commissioners recommended that large tracts should be completely handed over to the colonists, and taken away from the old inhabitants. In 1609 the scheme was ready. The escheated lands were divided into portions consisting of 1,000, 1,500, and 2,000 acres, and each large proprietor was bound to build a castle on his estate, and was forbidden to alienate his lands to Irishmen. Six counties were to be treated in this way—Tyrone, Coleraine, Donegal, Fermanagh, Cavan, and Armagh—and the natives were as a rule to be confined to the parts assigned to landholders of their own race, though in some cases they were allowed to remain on the grounds of the new-comers. Chichester, who was entrusted with the carrying out of these schemes, found himself in face of terrible difficulties, and could not secure that the natives should be treated with fairness and consideration. In 1610 he visited Ulster for the purpose of removing the Irish, and had to leave double garrisons behind him on his departure. In 1611 the work progressed better. The City of London had founded the colony of Derry, and everywhere things began to look more prosperous. It was even found possible to reduce the number of the troops. According to the original scheme, the division of the forfeited lands was to be as follows:—150,000 acres were to go to the English and Scottish "Undertakers" (q.v.)—who could have no Irish tenants; 45,500 acres to the servitors of the Crown in Ireland, with permission to have either Irish or English tenants; while 70,000 acres were to be left in the hands of the natives.

Ulster Massacre, THE (1641). The Irish rebellion of October 1641 began with a sudden attack on the English settlers in Ulster, and their violent expulsion from their holdings. According to the statement of Sir John Temple, 300,000 persons were destroyed between 1641 and the cessation of arms in 1643, of whom 150,000 perished in the first two months. Clarendon states that 40,000 or 50,000 of the English Protestants were "murdered before they suspected themselves to be in any danger or could provide for their defence." Other contemporary authorities give equally high figures. Lecky affirmed that the figure of 300,000 exceeds by nearly a third the estimated number of Protestants in the whole island, and was computed to be more than ten times the number of Protestants that were living outside walled towns in which no massacre took place. Gardiner, while denying that there was any general massacre, or that the English were put to the sword in a body, considered that about 4,000 persons were put to death in cold blood and about twice that number perished in consequence of the privation caused by their expulsion. Later research declares that the number of victims cannot be definitely ascertained.

Umbeyla Campaign, THE. A fanatic conspiracy broke out in 1863 among the Sittana and other Afghan hill tribes. General Neville Chamberlain was unsuccessful against them, and was badly wounded in a battle near Umbeyla. Sir Hugh Rose then advanced against them, and General Garnock successfully assaulted Umbeyla and captured Mulka. On Christmas Day, 1863, the force retired, and the war was at an end.

Underhill, EDWARD (d. c. 1560), known as the "Hot Gospeller," was a zealous Puritan, and one of the leaders of the insurgents in the western rebellion of 1549. He was imprisoned in Newgate by Queen Mary, whom he subsequently served during Wyatt's Rebellion (1553).

Undertakers, THE, sometimes called ADVENTURERS, were English gentlemen, chiefly from Devonshire, who undertook to keep possession of the lands forfeited to the Crown in Ireland, or of lands which, though nominally the property of Englishmen, had been allowed to fall into Irish hands. The first attempt was made by a natural son of Sir Thomas Smith, in Ulster, about the year 1572; again by the Earl of Essex in 1573; but the result in both cases was failure. A similar attempt made by Sir Peter Carew and St. Leger in Munster resulted in the outbreak of the great Geraldine rebellion (1579–82). After its suppression the attempt was renewed; but this time the government insisted on conditions to be observed by the Adventurers; of which the principal were, that an English or Scottish family was to be settled on every 240 acres, and that no Irish tenants were to be admitted. But the "Undertakers," among whom were Sir Walter Raleigh and Edmund Spenser, observed neither condition. Hence when O'Neill's revolt broke out (1596) they had to flee. In the beginning of James I's reign, however, they came back again in greater numbers.

Undertakers, THE, OF 1614. When in 1614 James I, crippled by a debt which amounted to £680,000, had determined to call a fresh parliament, Sir Henry Neville (d. 1615) and certain others offered to undertake that the House of Commons then to be elected would grant the king the large supplies of which he stood so greatly in need. Others engaged to secure the return of members whose views were strongly in favour of the royal prerogatives. The people by whose means the votes of the House were to be won over to meet the royal wishes were called by the name of Undertakers, but appear to have been men of little influence. James's best counsellors—Bacon, for example—were from the first distrustful of the scheme, and the king himself, in his opening speech, disowned his connexion with the Undertakers. Again, seven years later, he referred to them as "a strange kind of beasts, called Undertakers—a name which in my nature I abhor."

Uniformity, THE FIRST ACT OF (January 15, 1549), was passed in spite of the opposition of some of the bishops. It ordered the use of the "Book of Common Prayer" by all ministers on penalty of forfeiture of stipend and six months' imprisonment, with heavier punishment for second and third offences. Learned persons were, however, permitted to use Latin, Greek, or even Hebrew for their own private advantage; while university chapels might hold all services (except the Communion) in the same tongue

"for the further encouraging of learning." It was this act which led in great measure to the rebellion in the West of England in this year.

— THE SECOND ACT OF (1552), prohibited under pain of forfeiting goods and chattels for the first offence, of a year's imprisonment for the second, and of imprisonment during life for the third, the use by a minister, whether benefited or not, of any but the established liturgy; and imposed a fine of one shilling on all who should absent themselves from church on Sundays and holy days. It also confirmed the revised "Book of Common Prayer," established by Edward VI, 1552, and inflicted heavy penalties on all who should make a mock of the new service, interrupt the minister, or have any other form used in church.

— THE THIRD ACT OF (April 28, 1559), was passed as a measure separate from the Elizabethan Act of Supremacy, after stormy debates in both Houses during March when the two measures were combined. The third reading in the Lords was carried by a slender majority of three. The act legalized the Prayer Book of 1552 (q.v.), and revived the Act of Uniformity prohibiting any other service.

— THE FOURTH ACT OF (May 19, 1662), was passed after the Restoration. This act, after declaring that a universal agreement in the matter of public worship was conducive to the peace of the nation, bade all ministers in churches within the realm of England and Wales to use the revised "Book of Common Prayer," and read the morning and evening prayers therein. All parsons, etc., holding any benefice, were publicly to read and declare their assent to the same book by St. Bartholomew's Day (August 24, 1662), and if they refused were to be deprived of their livings. For the future all people presented to any benefice were to make a similar declaration. Every incumbent was to read the service publicly at least once a month, under pain of a fine of £5. Every dean, university reader, parson, or schoolmaster or private tutor, was to make declaration as to the unlawfulness of bearing arms against the king on any pretence whatever, and to deny the binding force of the Solemn League and Covenant. Schoolmasters and tutors were not to teach before obtaining a licence from the bishop or archbishop in whose diocese they were. No one who had not been episcopally ordained was to hold a benefice after St. Bartholomew's Day, 1662. Heads of colleges and lecturers were to subscribe to the Thirty-nine Articles, and declare their assent to the "Book of Common Prayer." In consequence of this act more than 2,000 ministers resigned their preferments.

Union Group. [NEW ZEALAND, DOMINION OF.]

Union of England and Ireland (1800–1921). After the suppression of the rebellion of 1798 the Union had come to be recognized, not only in England, but also by many of the Irish, as a necessary measure if only in order to save Ireland from itself. But the interests of the country did not outweigh the interests of individuals, and these latter were determined not to allow their own interests to be overlooked in the general well-being of the country. It at once became clear that the opposition of interested individuals would be fatal to the scheme, unless they were bought off. The British government accordingly set about the gigantic scheme of purchasing the Irish boroughs. Seats were paid for at the rate of $750 each, nor did the total sum paid as compensation for consent to the scheme amount to less than one million and a quarter. "Peers were further compensated for the loss of their privilege in the national council by profuse promises of English peerages, or promotion in the peerage of Ireland. Commoners were conciliated by new honours, and by the largesses of the British government. Places were given or promised; pensions multiplied; secret service money exhausted." At length, by this wholesale system of political jobbery, the consent of the Irish parliament was obtained (March 28) in spite of a few patriots who still protested against "the sale of the liberties and free constitution of Ireland." The settlement of the terms of the Union (39 and 40 Geo. III, c. 67) did not occupy a long time. The royal assent was given on August 1. "Ireland was to be represented in parliament by four spiritual lords sitting in rotation of sessions, by twenty-eight temporal peers elected for life by the Irish peerage, and by a hundred members of the House of Commons." The pledge to redress Catholic grievances, which had silenced the opposition of that portion of the community, had to wait thirty years for fulfilment, owing chiefly to the scruples of George III. But the restrictions on Irish commerce were removed, and her laws were administered with more justice and impartiality. The established Church of Ireland was declared one with the Church of England. The debts of the two countries were to be kept separate for twenty years. A new great seal and a new royal standard were made; the king's new title was proclaimed on January 1, 1801 (the words "King of France" being omitted); and the first session of the united parliament opened on January 22, 1801. No further change occurred until 1921, when the Irish Free State was established with a parliament of its own. [IRISH FREE STATE; IRELAND, NORTHERN.]

Sir Erskine May, "Constitutional History," ed. F. Holland, 1912; T. D. Ingram, "The Legislative Union of Great Britain and Ireland," 1890.

Union of England and Scotland. For a century after the union of the crowns the two countries continued entirely separate kingdoms, with separate parliaments. The attempt of James I and Bacon at legislative unity [UNITED KINGDOM] proved unsuccessful. Under Cromwell the two nations had been for a time united under one legislature (1654), but that union was severed at the Restoration, and Scotland replaced on the same independent footing as before. But after the Revolution it was seen that this state of things could not continue, and that as the two countries were now one in interest and in speech, they must also become one in law. The wisdom of William III showed him the necessity of a complete amalgamation of his two kingdoms, but his death cut short his plans for carrying it out. Religious and commercial jealousies were still further impediments. The religious difficulty was an internal obstacle in Scotland itself. The hatred between the contending sects of Episcopacy and Presbyterianism had been fostered by the persecutions of the Restoration, and now each sect wished to be in the ascendant, and neither could brook the toleration of the other. The commercial difficulty lay between the two countries, and showed that the old feeling of hostility between them was not extinguished, and might on slight provocation again burst into flame. The English grudged the Scots the advantages of an equal share of the trade with the colonies, and the Scots refused to bear their part of the national debt. The Scottish Act of Security of 1703 (replied to by the Alien Act of 1704) showed only too plainly the unsatisfactory state of public feeling. From this act the name of the Princess Sophia, the acknowledged heiress of the English throne, was omitted, and the proviso was made that no sovereign of England should be acknowledged in Scotland without giving full security for the preservation of the religious and trading liberties of that country. Jealousy of their country's independence led the Whigs to make common cause with the Jacobites, and in case of the queen's death there was great danger of both uniting in an effort for the restoration of the Stuarts. It was clear that a union was the only possible means of allaying the apprehension of a civil war. That the union was accomplished so successfully was due to the management of Somers, and to the realization by the Scots that independence might be more burdensome than union. The Scottish proposal that the union should be federal was set aside, and it was resolved that as the two nations had virtually become one people, united by community of interests, so they should now become one in point of law, and as they already had one and the same sovereign, so they should have one and the same legislature. Commissioners from both kingdoms were empowered to collect information on which a Treaty of Union could be based. The resultant treaty was thus a real contract between England and Scotland, passed in Scotland and in England separately, and assented to by Anne first as Queen of Scotland and then as Queen of England. The chief provisions of these articles were that on May 1, 1707, England and Scotland should be united in one kingdom, bearing the name of Great Britain; that the succession to the crown of Scotland should be in all points the same as had been settled for England; that the United Kingdom should be represented by one parliament; that thenceforward there should be community of rights and privileges between the two kingdoms, except where otherwise agreed upon by the parliament; that all standards of coin, weights, and measures in Scotland should be assimilated to those of England; that the laws of trade, customs, and excise should be the same in both countries; that all other laws of Scotland should remain unchanged, but with the provision that they might be altered in time to come at the discretion of the united parliament. To these articles was added an Act of Security for the maintenance of the Scottish Church and the four universities. This act required each sovereign on his or her accession to take an oath to protect the Presbyterian Church as the established Church of Scotland. The whole judicial machinery for the administration of the Scottish law system remained untouched, but henceforward there would be a possibility of appeal from the decisions of the Court of Sessions to the House of Lords. In the parliament of Great Britain Scotland was to be represented by 45 members sent up by the Commons, and 16 peers elected by their fellows as representatives of the peerage of Scotland. The Articles of Union received the royal assent, and the first parliament of Great Britain met on October 23, 1707. The act contained both revolutionary and conservative features, and was at first everywhere unpopular. England feared it would inordinately increase parliamentary corruption and the power of the party in office: Scotland feared it would lead to interference with her institutions and laws. Actual resistance to it was to come in the Jacobite risings and the Porteous Riots (q.v.). But the success of the Union has been almost without a parallel, and Scottish nationalism has lived.

United Irishmen, THE. The plan on which this society was afterwards constituted was sketched by Russel and Wolfe Tone (q.v.). Its object was to be the establishment of the "rights of man," and correspondence with the Jacobin Club in Paris and the English Revolution Society. Reform and Catholic emancipation were to be among its immediate objects. On July 14, 1791, it was organized, but its first actual meeting took place at the Eagle in Dublin on November 9. Hamilton Rowan (q.v.) and Wolfe Tone were the leaders; James Napper Tandy (q.v.) was secretary. After the French victories in 1792 they began openly to talk of rebellion, and raised a national guard.

The meeting of the Catholic committee was thought to be the signal of war; but Fitz-Gibbon declaring the national guard illegal, only three men assembled in defiance of his proclamation. In the north the society made much show in green uniforms, but were disarmed in 1793. An attempt at a representative assembly was foiled by the Convention Bill. In 1794 they again began secretly to prepare for revolt. Their organization, now secret, consisted of county committees, baronial committees, and elementary bodies, with an executive directory of five members at their head. The heads of these bodies were changed fortnightly, and they only dealt with and knew of their immediate superiors. They had about a million members, but the very perfection of their organization was its great fault, as the seizure of a few leaders would paralyse the whole body. One of their chief schemes was to debauch the fidelity of the Dublin garrison, and though they were unsuccessful in this, the militia were almost entirely theirs. In 1796 Hoche, whom Lord Edward Fitzgerald and O'Connor went to see, promised them French help, and they boasted at that time that they could muster 200,000 men. The seizure of Keogh in Dublin, and of others in Belfast, however, paralysed them, and when the French were at Bantry the country remained quiet. In 1797 they had reorganized themselves, but General Lake, by disarming Ulster, again disabled them. This last step was taken in consequence of the report of a secret committee of the House of Commons; and at the same time a free pardon was promised to all the United Irishmen who surrendered before June 24. The Dublin men refused to rise at once, and in consequence the men of Ulster submitted. In 1798 the Catholics, with the concurrence of the Dublin committee, prepared to rise, but again the arrest of their leaders disconcerted their plans.

United Kingdom. The adoption by James I of the title "King of Great Britain" instead of "of England and Scotland" was part of his wider plan of bringing about complete union between the two kingdoms. As early as April 1604 the English parliament was asked to consent to the change of style. But fears were expressed lest the laws and liberties of England might not hold good in the new realm of Britain, and the Commons urged that some agreement as to the terms of the union should precede the assumption of the title. James yielded to the advice of Cecil, and deferred the change. Bacon, in "Considerations Touching the Union," which he laid before the king in the autumn, suggested that it would be better to proceed by proclamation: "the two difficulties are point of honour and love to the former names, and the doubt lest the alteration may induce and involve an alteration in the laws and policies of the kingdom. Both which, if your majesty shall assume the style by proclamation and not by parliament, are satisfied; for then the usual names must needs remain in writs and records, the forms whereof cannot be altered but by act of parliament, and so the point of honour satisfied. And, again, your proclamation altered no law, and so the scruple of a tacit or implied alteration of laws likewise satisfied." Accordingly on October 20 James issued a proclamation: "As an imperial monarchy of these two great kingdoms doth comprehend the whole island, so it shall keep in all ensuing ages the united denomination of the invincible monarchy of Great Britain, and, therefore, by the force of our royal prerogative we assume to ourselves the style and title of King of Great Britain, France, and Ireland . . . to be used in all proclamations, missives, treaties, leagues, dedications, &c.; and the inscription "J. D. G. Mag. Brit. F. et H. R." was placed on the coinage. James was, however, balked in his attempt to bring about union, and the title only received parliamentary sanction at the union with Scotland in 1707. By the Act of Union (with Ireland), 39 & 40 Geo. III, c. 67 (July 1800), the kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland were constituted the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, which has remained the official designation. The establishment of the Irish Free State in 1921 did not involve a change in the title, though the phrase "Great Britain and Northern Ireland" was still used in official documents. But the proposals of the Imperial Conference of October 1926 included the omission of the words "United Kingdom" from the king's title.

United States of America. RELATIONS WITH, began with the recognition of the United States by Great Britain in 1783. The War of Independence, hastened by the Stamp Act of 1765 and the question of "no taxation without representation," had sprung from causes far deeper: notably the mercantile system, under which the aim of the British commercial regulations had been to strengthen the empire and foster imperial shipping, but which had been galling to the colonists; the removal of the French danger by the Seven Years' War, which left the colonies free to refuse any contribution towards the increased measures for imperial defence necessitated by the enlargement of the British Empire resulting from the Treaty of Paris (q.v.—1763); and the American spirit of freedom engendered by years of virtual self-government. Britain was in the right in attempting to tax the colonies, but the Grenville policy was inexpedient and inimical to conciliation, as Burke maintained. The Declaration of Independence was issued on July 4, 1776; the colonists prospered in the war by reason of French help and the leadership of Washington (q.v.); their independence was recognized in the Treaty of Versailles (q.v.—September 1783); and in 1787 the American constitution was drafted with Washington as president.

Washington pursued a moderate policy towards Great Britain in the questions left unsettled by the peace. And when the outbreak of the French Revolutionary War led in 1793 to an order in council for the seizure of all vessels carrying provisions to the French West Indies (which injured the United States in virtue of Washington's treaty with France), the president sent John Jay to London in 1794 to negotiate a commercial treaty, in the face of bitter American opposition. Friction recurred, however, through the institution of blockades by Britain and France, and through the British assertion of the right of search and the impressment of deserters from the navy. The American War of 1812–14 (q.v.) was declared by the United States only a few days before the withdrawal of the obnoxious order in council. But by the Peace of Ghent no question in dispute was settled.

After 1815 Great Britain and the United States adopted parallel policies towards the revolted Spanish-American colonies; but, as Castlereagh feared, the United States recognized the independence of the colonies first (1821). The Monroe Doctrine (q.v.—1823), which settled United States policy for a century to come, was welcomed by Canning, whose sympathy with it was revealed in the Polignac Memorandum of October 1823, and in his recognition of the colonies in December 1824. But the next few years produced a diplomatic contest, Great Britain striving to secure in Latin-America not exclusive trade privileges, but the prestige of a disinterested and powerful friend, and to break down the wall between America and Europe built by John Adams and strengthened by the Monroe Doctrine. This policy was reflected in Canning's attendance (in the person of E. J. Dawkins) at the Panama Congress of 1826. Thereafter boundary disputes came to the fore; exemplified in Peel's Ashburton Treaty of 1842 (q.v.) and the Oregon Treaty of 1846 (q.v.), which gave Vancouver to Canada. Four years later the problem of the connexion between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts of America, and the influence of the British Central American possessions on the United States project for a Panama Canal, led to the negotiation of the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty of 1850 (q.v.).

During the American Civil War (1861–4) the two governments came perilously near to hostilities. The first step was Lincoln's institution in 1861 of a blockade which he could not enforce; and the difference which arose was aggravated by a cleavage between London and Washington on the question of Free Trade v. Protection, by the sympathy of Tory and of some Liberal opinion in England for the Southern States, and by the English cotton famine brought on by the blockade. British opinion veered round in favour of the North, however, as the question of slavery came to predominate. The gravest moments of diplomatic tension were in late 1861, on the sailing of Slidell and Mason in the Trent (q.v.), and in the summer of 1862 on the sailing of the Alabama [GENEVA AWARD]; the latter of which incidents ended in a triumph for the principle of international arbitration.

Relations were thereafter uneventful, save for the Washington Treaty of 1871 (q.v.) and the San Juan Award of 1872 (q.v.), until the Sackville incident of 1888, when Sackville, an Englishman, interfered in the presidential election, and a wave of feeling which swept over Great Britain was intensified by Lord Salisbury's refusal to recall him. Seven years later the Venezuela dispute of 1895 (q.v.) reached a crisis over the boundary between Venezuela and British Guiana, and resulted in a vindication of the Monroe Doctrine. In 1909 the Newfoundland fisheries question was referred to The Hague Tribunal, and settled in 1910.

In the United States a reaction from the policy of isolation set in, however, after the Spanish-American War of 1898 and the occupation of the Philippines. The prestige of the United States as a great power was increased by the annexation of Hawaii, the revival of the Venezuelan question in 1903, and the Panama Conferences of 1899, 1901, and 1906. The opposite tendency reappeared later in the scheme of Woodrow Wilson (who became president in 1913) for a Pan-American alliance; and the entry of the United States into the Great War on April 6, 1917, was construed as a design to make the Monroe Doctrine the "doctrine of the world" rather than as an attempt to destroy its postulate of American non-intervention in Europe.

The negotiations for peace in 1919 were a triumph for President Wilson, whose suggestions for a settlement in 1917, and whose Fourteen Points of January 8, 1918, paved the way for the Peace of Versailles and the inauguration of the League of Nations. Post-war questions between Great Britain and the United States included the settlement of the halibut fisheries dispute with Canada (ratified by Great Britain) in 1924, and the funding of the British war-debt at four thousand millions sterling to be paid off in 62 years (1923). The United States meanwhile steadily declined to enter the Permanent Court of International Justice (set up by the League in 1920 in succession to The Hague Court of 1899, which had lapsed). Assent, subject to certain reservations, was voted by the Senate in January 1926. In the summer of 1927 both governments, in company with Japan, attended the abortive Geneva Conference on the reduction of naval armaments. The next year brought a United States proposal for world peace.

Universities. The word universitas is in Roman Law the synonym of collegium. In the Middle Ages it was originally used of any body of men when spoken of in their collective capacity; but it gradually became appropriated to those guilds or corporations either of masters or of scholars, the earliest of which originated in that great revival of intellectual activity throughout Europe which began at the end of the eleventh or the beginning of the twelfth century. The more ancient designation of these communities was, however, "studium generale." The idea of a university may be said to have originated at Bologna, where a university of students was formed in the course of the twelfth century. The schools of Paris date their pre-eminent position from the teaching of Abelard in the first half of the twelfth century; but there is no trace of the formation of an organized society or university of masters till towards the close of the twelfth century.

OXFORD was the earliest of the universities organized after the model of Paris, though in the division of the faculty of arts into Australes (South-countrymen) and Boreales (North-countrymen) each under its "proctor" (who at the daughter-university of Cambridge long retained the name of "rector"), there seems a trace of an earlier organization on the model of the two universities, each with its own rector, of Ultramontani and Citramontani at Bologna. The legend which attributes the foundation of the University of Oxford, and even of University College, to Alfred the Great is supported only by documents now known to be forged or interpolated. There is no trace of any schools of the smallest reputation at Oxford till about the year 1133, when the Paris doctor of theology Robert Pulleyne is said to have taught there. In the later twelfth century the Italian jurist Vacarius introduced the study of Roman Law. It seems to have been, however, as a result of an importation of English scholars from Paris about 1167 or 1168 that Oxford began to develop into a "studium generale." At the beginning of the following century we find the university fully organized on the model of Paris, with some important differences. At Paris the masters had to obtain their licence to teach, or degree, from the chancellor of the cathedral or of St. Geneviève. At Oxford the chancellor was chosen by the masters, but derived his authority from the bishop of the distant see of Lincoln. He, in fact, united the functions of the chancellor and the rector at Paris, and eventually became more powerful than either. He was from the first an ecclesiastical judge in cases affecting scholars. After the great "Town" and "Gown" battle of 1209, in which three scholars were hanged by the townsmen, the university gained its first royal charter of privilege, and its chancellor obtained a civil and criminal, as well as an ecclesiastical, jurisdiction. Each of those sanguinary street-fights, with bow and arrow, or sword and dagger, between clerks and townfolk, which make up the history of mediæval Oxford, ended in the humiliation of the town and some accession to the privileges of the university. The chancellor eventually acquired (subject to an appeal to the university) cognizance of all cases in which a scholar was one party, except in cases of homicide or maim.

The students (who usually began their arts course at thirteen or fifteen) at first lived sometimes in lodgings with townsmen, but usually in "halls" or "inns," which were boarding-houses kept by a master. In 1249 William of Durham left a legacy to provide pensions for four masters of arts studying theology, a foundation which developed into "University College." Some time between 1263 and 1268, Balliol College was founded for poor students in arts, by John Balliol and Dervorgilla, his wife. It was, however, the far larger foundation, in 1264, of Walter de Merton, Bishop of Rochester, which really originated the English college system. The foundation of Exeter followed in 1314, Oriel (by Edward II) in 1326, Queen's (named after Queen Philippa by Robert Eglesfield, her chaplain) in 1340. William of Wykeham's splendid foundation (1386), still known as New College, introduces a new era in college-building. After the foundation of Lincoln in 1427 came All Souls (1437), and Magdalen in 1458, founded, the former by Archbishop Chichele, the latter by William of Waynflete, both Wykehamists, and imitators of Wykeham. Brasenose was founded in 1509, Corpus Christi—designed to foster the "New Learning"—by Bishop Fox, in 1516. Christ Church was begun under the name of Cardinal College by Wolsey, and completed by Henry VIII in 1546. Trinity (1554), which occupies the site of an earlier college for Durham monks, and St. John's (1555) are the offspring of the Marian reaction; Jesus (1571), Wadham (1609), and Pembroke (1624) of the Reformation. Worcester, on the site of the hall once occupied by Gloucester monks, dates from 1714. Keble, founded in 1870, is the monument of the "Oxford Movement." The ancient Magdalen Hall was endowed and incorporated as Hertford College in 1874.

The colleges had originally been intended only as a means of support for poor scholars; but their superior discipline led to the practice of sending wealthier boys as "commoners," or paying boarders, to them. The Reformation for a time nearly emptied the university; most of the halls disappeared, and the code of statutes imposed upon the university during the chancellorship of Laud completed its transformation into an aggregate of colleges, by giving the "Hebdomadal Council" of heads of houses the sole initiative in university legislation.

From the time of the Restoration learning declined, and in the eighteenth century Oxford gradually sank into a state of intellectual torpor. The first sign of reviving life is the distinction between what were afterwards called "Pass" and "Honour" examinations in 1802, followed by the foundation of "Honour Schools" in classics and mathematics in 1807. And the "Oxford Movement" gave a great impulse to the intellectual, as well as the ecclesiastical, activity of the university. The era of university reform begins with the appointment of a royal commission of inquiry in 1850. The act of 1854 abolished the subscription to the articles hitherto required at matriculation and on admission to the B.A. degree, and appointed an executive commission which abolished the local restrictions of scholarships and fellowships. The abolition of tests for the higher degrees was delayed till 1871. The commission of 1877 founded or augmented professorships at the expense of the colleges, limited the tenure of "idle" fellowships, and almost completely removed clerical restrictions. A new commission, set up in 1919, reported in 1922; and the new legislation based upon its report is only now beginning to take effect. Women were admitted to honours examinations in 1884; and, as an indirect result of the Great War of 1914-18, were admitted in 1920 as full members of the university.

The stories which attribute the foundation of CAMBRIDGE to Cantaber, a mythical Spanish prince, or to Sigebert, King of the East Angles in the seventh century, are among the stupidest of historical fabrications. The first authentic notice of Cambridge as a seat of learning is in 1209, when some of the students who left Oxford, in consequence of the disturbances of that year, established themselves at Cambridge. In 1229 came an immigration of students who had left Paris on account of the great quarrel of that university with the friars. To this year belongs the first legal recognition of the university and its chancellor. It now appears to be organized after the model of Oxford, and its history is marked by the same struggle for independence against the bishop, and the same sanguinary street-fights between "Town" and "Gown," or "North" and "South," and the chancellor gradually acquired nearly the same jurisdiction, though exemption of the university from the jurisdiction of the bishop and of the metropolitan was not fully established till 1434. The statutes by which the university has been nominally governed down to the present century were imposed upon it by royal authority in 1570, chiefly through the influence of Whitgift, then master of Trinity. They virtually destroyed the democratic government of the masters by the large powers which they conferred upon the heads of colleges.

In mediæval times Cambridge had never enjoyed the European celebrity of Oxford; but the English Reformation was a Cambridge movement. From that time, but still more conspicuously after the Restoration, to the present century, the superiority in intellectual activity was, as Macaulay boasts, "on the side of the less ancient and less splendid university." It was, in the main, the impulse given to mathematical study by Sir Isaac Newton, long resident in the university as fellow of Trinity and professor of mathematics, which saved Cambridge from the stagnation of eighteenth-century Oxford. The lists of the mathematical "Tripos" date from 1747. The Classical Tripos was founded in 1824. Women were first regularly admitted to Tripos examinations in 1881; but they do not yet enjoy full university status.

The first college at Cambridge, Peterhouse, was founded by Hugh Balsham, Bishop of Ely, in the year 1284, upon the model of Merton College, Oxford, the rule of Merton being constantly appealed to in the statutes. Michaelhouse (now extinct) was founded in 1324, the King's Hall by Edward III in 1326, Pembroke in 1347, Gonville (called Gonville and Caius since its refoundation by Dr. Caius in 1558) in 1348, Trinity Hall in 1350, Corpus Christi by the Cambridge gilds of Corpus Christi and of St. Mary in 1352; Clare in 1359. King's was founded in 1441 by Henry VI, out of the revenues of the suppressed "alien Priors." Queens' owes its origin (1448) to his consort, Margaret of Anjou, being refounded in 1465 by Elizabeth Woodville, consort of Edward IV. St. Catherine's was founded in 1473; Jesus in 1496; Christ's (incorporating an earlier college for training schoolmasters called God's House) in 1505; St. John's, on the site of the suppressed Hospital of St. John, in 1511; Magdalene in 1519. Trinity College (from its foundation the leading college in the university) was erected by Henry VIII, in 1546, on the site of the suppressed Michaelhouse and King's Hall. Emmanuel was founded by a Puritan in 1584; Sidney Sussex dates from 1598, Downing from 1800. The legislation of 1850, 1856, 1871, and 1877, in regard to Cambridge, was similar to that relating to Oxford. Since 1922 a statutory commission has been engaged in putting into practice the findings of the royal commission of 1919.

The first attempt to found a UNIVERSITY OF LONDON was made by Sir Thomas Gresham (q.v.) in 1548, when seven professorships—in divinity, music, physic, astronomy, geometry, law, and rhetoric—were endowed; but the scheme never came to full fruition. In 1825 the project was revived by Thomas Campbell, the poet, and an interest so widespread was awakened that in 1827 the foundation stone of the present University College was laid, and next year classes were opened in the faculties of arts, law, and medicine. In 1836 the first charters of incorporation for both the university (as an examining body) and University College were obtained. In the meantime King's College had received its charter in 1829. During the past century development has been rapid, and the University of London, which in 1898 was reconstituted as a teaching body, has become the largest in the British Empire. Within recent years some thirty-five colleges have applied for recognition as schools of the university. Since 1915 the internal side has trebled and the external side doubled the numbers of its students. In July 1926 the number of internal students was 9,400. The recent acquisition by the university of the Bloomsbury site marks the inauguration of a movement of centralization and reform, which may be expected in the immediate future to have far-reaching consequences.

The idea of founding a university at DURHAM dates from the days of Oliver Cromwell, who actually established a college there. The present university was founded by the dean and chapter of Durham in 1831, incorporated by royal charter, and liberally endowed with a portion of the capitular estates. There are eight colleges at Durham; and Armstrong College and the College of Medicine at Newcastle-on-Tyne are fully incorporated with the university.

THE VICTORIA UNIVERSITY OF MANCHESTER was founded in 1850, and reorganized in 1880 and 1903.

Other English universities are :—Birmingham (1900), Liverpool (1903), Leeds (1904), Sheffield (1905), Bristol (1909), Reading (1926); while a university of the East Midlands, comprising Nottingham University College (1880) and Leicester University College (1921), is in process of establishment. Among university colleges which have not as yet attained to full university status may be mentioned the Cheltenham Ladies' College; Queen's College, London; the University College of the South-West of England (Exeter); University College, Hull; and University College, Southampton.

The first Scottish university was founded at ST. ANDREWS, in 1411, by Archbishop Henry Wardlaw. It owed its existence in a measure to the schism in the Papacy, in which Scotland adhered to the French popes of Avignon, and England to the Roman line. Although exempted from the obligation of acknowledging Clement VII, the schism added to the unpopularity and consequent ill-treatment to which Scottish students had always been more or less exposed at Oxford. At St. Andrews the bishop and his successors were appointed chancellors. The head of the university, however, was (as in all the continental universities) the lord rector, who was and still is elected by the students. St. Salvator's College was founded by Bishop Kennedy, in 1456, that of St. Leonard by the boy-Archbishop Stewart and Prior Hepburn, in 1512. These two colleges are now amalgamated. The foundation of St. Mary's or "New College" was begun by Archbishop James Beaton in 1537, and completed by his two immediate successors.

The University of GLASGOW was founded in 1450 by Bishop Turnbull. The bishops were constituted chancellors. As at Paris, the university was divided into four "nations," whose "proctors" elected the rector. In the sixteenth century the university fell into complete decay. Its revival dates from the appointment of the accomplished humanist, Andrew Melville, to the principalship of the "College of Glasgow," within the university, endowed out of Church estates placed at the disposal of the town council by Queen Mary. Henceforth the university and college became practically identical. The principalship of Melville marks the close of the mediæval or Aristotelian period in Scottish education. By him the study of Greek and the logic of Ramus were first introduced into the universities. Classical scholarship, and especially Greek, has, however, never flourished in the Scottish universities. The prominence still accorded to moral philosophy and logic in their curriculum remains a witness to their mediæval origin.

The University of ABERDEEN was founded in 1494 by Bishop Elphinston. The foundation of Aberdeen was designed to be a means of civilizing the Highlands and educating its clergy. A small college, subsequently called King's College, was provided for by the founder. Marischal College was founded in 1593. Its assumed power of conferring degrees was recognized by parliament in 1621.

What is now the University of EDINBURGH has grown out of the College of Edinburgh, founded in 1582 by the town council on the model of Calvin's "Academy" at Geneva. The power of conferring degrees seems to have been from the first assumed by the college (unless it was conferred by some lost charter), and was recognized by act of the Scottish parliament in 1621. The college eventually came to be called a "university." It remained under the government of the town council till the nineteenth century, but is now organized like the other Scottish universities, the administration resting chiefly with the professors.

The University of WALES, comprising the University College of Wales (Aberystwith), of North Wales (Bangor), of South Wales and Monmouthshire (Cardiff), and of Swansea, received a charter in 1893.

Of the Irish universities, Dublin dates back to 1591. The National University, founded in 1908, includes colleges at Cork, Galway, and Dublin. Queen's University, Belfast, was established in 1909.

The University Extension movement began with Cambridge in 1872, and has been promoted by other universities throughout the English-speaking world.

University Bill, THE IRISH (1873).

The essence of this measure as introduced by Gladstone on February 13, 1873, was that the exclusive connexion between Trinity College, Dublin, and the University of Dublin was to cease, and that that college, as well as Sir Robert Peel's Queen's Colleges, excepting that at Galway—which was to be dissolved—and also several Roman Catholic seminaries, were to be placed in the same position regarding the university as an Oxford or Cambridge college. Theology, moral philosophy, and modern history were excluded from the regular university course, and there were certain limitations on professional freedom of speech. The bill was soon opposed on all sides, and the second reading was lost by 287 to 284. The government immediately resigned (March 1873), but resumed office on Disraeli's declining to form an administration.

Ushant, THE BATTLE OF, was fought on July 27, 1778, between the British and French fleets. The former, under the command of Augustus Keppel (q.v.), consisted of 30 vessels; the latter of 30 also. After a fight which lasted three hours each fleet returned to its own harbour, without having captured or destroyed one of its opponent's ships. There was a general outcry against so dishonourable an engagement, and Keppel attempted to throw the blame of his ill-success upon his subordinate, Sir Hugh Palliser, who recriminated upon his chief. A court-martial was held, which, however, resulted in the acquittal of Keppel (1779). As Keppel represented the Whig opposition and Palliser the court party, the dispute received a political significance.

Ussher, JAMES (1581–1656), Archbishop of Armagh, was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and was ordained in 1601. In 1615 he was employed in drawing up articles for the Irish Church; and six years later was appointed Bishop of Meath, from which post he was promoted in 1625 to be Archbishop of Armagh. When the Irish Rebellion broke out in 1641 he escaped to England, and received the bishopric of Carlisle. His chief historical work is entitled "Britannicarum Ecclesiarum Antiquitates."

Utrecht, THE PEACE OF, was signed March 31—April 11, 1713. Several times during the War of the Spanish Succession negotiations had been set on foot between England and France. In 1706, after the battle of Ramillies, Louis XIV suggested a new partition treaty, "by which he would consent to acknowledge Queen Anne in England, to give the Dutch the barrier they demanded, to grant great commercial advantages to the maritime powers, and to surrender Spain and the Indies to the Archduke Charles, if only he could preserve for his grandson, Philip, a kingdom in Italy consisting of Milan, Naples, and Sicily." But the emperor saw that the Dutch barrier would be taken from the Spanish dominions in the Netherlands, and therefore from his son; and Marlborough was anxious to continue the war for his own sake. The Dutch were therefore induced to reject the demands. In 1709, after the battle of Oudenarde, the French king again tried to treat. The allies now demanded the resignation of the whole of the Spanish succession, together with the restoration of Newfoundland to Great Britain. Louis represented that his grandson would refuse to be altogether crownless. Thereupon the allies demanded that if Philip would not resign Spain within two months, Louis was to pledge himself to join the allies in expelling him thence. Next year the negotiations of the previous year were resumed at Gertruydenburg (q.v.). In the interval the French had fought and lost the battle of Malplaquet. The demands of the previous year were renewed, but at length the British and Dutch waived the point of the assistance of Louis in ejecting his grandson. But the opposition of Savoy and Austria rendered general negotiations impossible. In January 1711, for the first time, proposals were made from the side of the allies. On January 12, 1712, the congress of Utrecht opened. By April 11, 1713, all the treaties were signed except that between France and the empire and emperor. In the course of 1714 they also were concluded at Rastadt and Baden. The terms of the principal treaties were: (1) Between Great Britain and France: The Protestant succession, through the house of Hanover, was secured; the Pretender was to be compelled to quit France; a permanent severance of the crowns of France and Spain was solemnly promised; Newfoundland, Acadia, St. Kitt's, and the Hudson's Bay Territory were ceded to Great Britain. (2) The Dutch secured a strong fortress barrier, with a reduction of duty on Dutch goods entering France; the Spanish Netherlands were handed over to them, and Lille was given back to France. (3) The Duke of Savoy secured Sicily and the title of king. (4) The treaty between Spain and Great Britain, signed in July, granted to Great Britain the possession of Gibraltar and Minorca [BARRIER TREATY], and by the Asiento (q.v.), a contract signed at Madrid, withdrew the grant of slave trade from France and gave it to Great Britain. (5) Spain gained the recognition of Philip V. (6) The Emperor Charles received Milan, Naples, Sardinia, and the Austrian Netherlands in compensation for his loss of Spain. (7) The electors of Cologne and Bavaria were restored. (8) The title of the King of Prussia was confirmed. From the standpoint of Europe the peace mainly registered accomplished facts.

J. W. Gerard, "The Peace of Utrecht," 1885.

Uxbridge, THE TREATY OF (January and February 1645), is the name given to the futile attempts at an understanding made between the commissioners of Charles I and the Parliament at the beginning of 1645. It was soon evident that the demands of the Parliamentarian party were too exorbitant to be granted, for they demanded not only the abolition of Episcopacy, but also the establishment of the Directory instead of the Book of Common Prayer. To these requirements they added the command of the army and navy, and the renewal of hostilities in Ireland. The king was by no means prepared to go such lengths, and after some three weeks had been wasted it was once more seen that the final appeal would have to be made to the sword. The negotiations ended in failure on February 22.

Vacornagi, THE, were an ancient British tribe who possessed the country forming the modern shires of Banff, Elgin, and Nairn, with the east part of Inverness and Braemar in Aberdeenshire. They are mentioned by Ptolemy as lying between the Dumnonii and the Moray Firth, and are said to have extended "from the Ness to the upper course of the Dee, and from the Moray Firth into the heart of Perthshire."

Vagrancy Acts. Enactments against vagrancy began with the Statutes of Labourers (q.v.) (the first in 1349), which aimed at securing cheap labour, and treated the labourers who wandered in search of better terms as criminals. By the act of 1388—the origin of the English Poor Law—the labourer was forbidden to leave the hundred where he served without a passport from his hundred declaring the cause of his journey. In 1414 justices of the peace were empowered to recover fugitive labourers by writ in whatever part of the country they might be, and were given summary jurisdiction over all offences committed by them. Tudor legislation on the subject is "written in blood," and marks the terror felt in the break-up of mediæval society at the bands of vagrants wandering over the country. The act of 1530 empowered justices and borough magistrates to cause able-bodied vagrants "to be tied to the end of a cart naked, and be beaten with whips throughout the town till their bodies were bloody." Five years later it was added that they were to be set to labour; "ruttelers," i.e., vagabonds calling themselves serving men, were to have their ears mutilated, and for the second offence to be hanged. By the act of 1547 the vagrant was to be branded, and given as a slave for two years to anyone who asked for him, and if no one would take him he was to be sent back to his birthplace, and set to work on the highways, if necessary in chains. But this was felt to be too severe, and in 1549 the statute was repealed, and the previous acts again came into force. The act of 1597 ordering vagrants to be whipped, sent to their place of settlement, and there placed in the house of correction, and that of 1604, adding the branding of incorrigible rogues, remained in force till 1713. The present law is based on the acts of 1744 and 1824, by which the definitions of rogue and vagabond have been widely extended, and attempts made to distinguish between various classes of offences. It is scarcely necessary to add that imprisonment for short periods has taken the place of whipping and branding. "It may now be almost stated as a general proposition that any person of bad character who prowls about, apparently for an unlawful purpose, is liable to be treated as a rogue and a vagabond." Valence, AYMER DE (d. 1260), son of Hugh de Lusignan and Isabella, widow of King John, came to England in 1247. In 1250 he was, through the influence of his half-brother Henry III, elected Bishop of Winchester, in spite of his youth and total lack of qualifications for the office. His unpopularity was very great, both with the barons and the clergy, and he was driven out of England in 1258. His quarrel with Boniface of Savoy in 1252 is one of the most noteworthy incidents in his turbulent career. It was said that at a party banquet, just before leaving England, in 1258, he attempted to poison some of his chief opponents, but this assertion rests on no very authentic basis. Early in 1260 Aymer was consecrated by the pope to the bishopric of which he had so long enjoyed the revenues; but he died at Paris in December 1260, while on his way to force an entry into England.

Valence, AYMER DE, EARL OF PEMBROKE (d. 1324), was the son of William de Valence (q.v.). He was made by Edward I guardian of Scotland in 1306, and succeeded in surprising and defeating Robert Bruce at Methven, but in 1307 he was himself defeated by the Scots at Loudon Hill. On the death of Edward I he lost his command in Scotland, and he became one of the strongest opponents of Gaveston. He was one of the Ordainers (q.v.) appointed in 1310; and took Gaveston prisoner at Scarborough two years later, but it was without his knowledge and against his personal pledge that the favourite was seized by Warwick and beheaded without trial. This violent conduct on the part of Warwick and Lancaster alienated Pembroke, who then endeavoured to form a middle party between Lancaster and the king, and from May 1318 to 1321 was probably the most influential man in the kingdom. The Treaty of Leek, concluded in August 1318, was largely the work of Pembroke and his confederates. He opposed Lancaster in 1322, and was one of the judges before whom Lancaster was tried. In 1324 Pembroke was sent over to France by the king on an embassy, and there he died suddenly—murdered, it was said, by the orders of Queen Isabella.

Valence, WILLIAM DE (d. 1296), was the son of Hugh de Lusignan and Isabella, widow of King John, and consequently half-brother to Henry III. In right of his wife, Joan de Munchensi, he assumed the title of Earl of Pembroke (1247). He made himself extremely unpopular in England, and in 1258 was expelled from the country. He subsequently returned, fought for the king, and after the battle of Lewes had to flee to France, while his lands were confiscated. The defeat of the barons restored him his possessions, and he subsequently received large grants of land from the Crown. He played a part of some importance in the Welsh Wars of Edward I's reign, commanding the army of West Wales in the campaigns of 1282-3.

Valentia, or VALENTIANA, was the name given to the northern province of Britain (recovered from the Picts by Theodosius in 369), in honour of the Emperor Valentinian. The idea that it applied to the area between the Walls of Hadrian and Antonine appears to be erroneous. There was no extension of the border, but merely a recovery of lost ground.

Val-ès-Dunes, THE BATTLE OF (1047), was fought between Duke William of Normandy, aided by Henry I of France, and the rebellious Norman barons. William's victory was complete, and firmly established his power in the duchy. Val-ès-Dunes, the scene of the battle, is a broad plain not far from Caen.

Valetta, LA, the capital of Malta (q.v.), was besieged from September 1798 to September 1800 by a force of Maltese and British, who were anxious to drive the French out of the island. After being reduced to the verge of starvation the French garrison, commanded by General Vaubois, were compelled to surrender to General Pigot, and Malta became a British possession.

Vancouver Island, on the west coast of North America, separated from the mainland by Queen Charlotte Sound, Johnstone Strait, and the Strait of Georgia, was in 1849 granted to the Hudson's Bay Company. In 1859 it became a Crown colony, and in 1866 was incorporated with British Columbia, whilst five years later the whole province became part of the Dominion of Canada (q.v.).

Van Diemen's Land (TASMANIA). [AUSTRALIA, COMMONWEALTH OF.]

Vane, SIR HENRY, THE ELDER (1589-1655), was educated at Oxford, and knighted by James I in 1611. He was employed on diplomatic business in Holland by Charles I (1629-1630), and subsequently became treasurer of the royal household, and in 1630 a privy councillor. In 1640 he was appointed secretary of state, through the queen's influence. He was a bitter opponent of Strafford, and one of the chief instruments in his conviction. He held his secretaryship till November 1641, though he decidedly inclined towards the opposition in parliament; and then retired into private life after being deprived of his offices. Clarendon says that he was the last of the king's counsellors who stayed with parliament, and that, "though he concurred in all the malicious designs against the king, and against the Church, he grew into the hatred and contempt of those who had made most use of him, and died in universal reproach."

Vane, SIR HENRY, THE YOUNGER (1612-1662), usually known as Sir Harry Vane, the son of Sir Henry Vane, comptroller of the king's household, was educated at Westminster School and Magdalen Hall, Oxford. In 1635 he emigrated to Massachusetts, of which colony he was elected governor, but after a year's tenure of office his advocacy of unlimited religious liberty lost him his post, and he returned to England in 1637. In the Long Parliament he became one of the leaders of the Root and Branch party (q.v.), and his evidence played an important part in Strafford's trial. In July 1643 Vane was appointed one of the commissioners to negotiate the alliance with Scotland, and it was by his skill that the clause "according to the Word of God" was inserted in the Solemn League and Covenant. In the parliament Vane was recognized throughout as one of the ablest leaders of the Independents, and sided with that party and with the army against the Presbyterians in 1647. Vane disapproved of the violation of the parliament by Pride's Purge (q.v.) and took no part in the king's trial. He was chosen as a member of the council of state of the republic, but refused the proposed oath approving of the punishment of the king. As head of the commission governing the navy, and chairman of the committee for drawing up the scheme for the constitution of a new parliament, he played a very important part during this period; but his persistency in pressing forward the passing of his measure, and refusing Cromwell's plan, led the general to expel the Rump (1653). In 1656 he wrote a tract entitled "A Healing Question Propounded and Resolved," proposing the calling of a general convention to establish a free constitution, for which he was summoned before the Protector's council and imprisoned at Carisbrooke for three months. In Richard Cromwell's parliament Vane represented Whitechurch (Hants), and headed the opposition to the new government. When the restored Rump quarrelled with the army Vane took part with the army, and acted in the council of state established by it. On the second restoration of the Rump Vane was punished by being expelled from parliament (January 1660), and relegated to his estates in Durham. On the return of the king he was arrested (July 1660) and wholly excepted from the amnesty, though it was agreed that the two Houses should petition Charles to spare his life. After two years' imprisonment he was tried (June 1662) and sentenced to death, the king thinking, as he wrote to Clarendon, that he was too dangerous a man to live if he could honestly be put out of the way. He was executed on June 14, 1662.

Vansittart, HENRY (1732-70), was a Madras civilian selected to succeed Clive in the government of Bengal (1760). He determined to depose Mir Jafar (q.v.) and place Mir Kasim (q.v.), as ruler in his stead. In this plan, however, he was opposed by several members of his council. His attempts to force revenue reforms on Mir Kasim ended in the massacre of Patna, and the restoration of Mir Jafar. Notwithstanding the ill-success which attended his measures generally, Vansittart seems to have been a man of very good intentions. He attempted to check the illegitimate trading which the company's servants carried on for their own benefit. In 1765 he returned to Europe, and in 1769 was appointed one of a company of three "Supervisors" sent out to India by the company for the purpose of investigation and reform. On their voyage to Hindustan the frigate in which these gentlemen were embarked disappeared in an unaccountable way, nothing having ever been heard of its unfortunate passengers from that day.

Vansittart, NICHOLAS, LORD BEXLEY, (1766-1851), the son of an East Indian director, was called to the bar in 1792, and in 1796 returned to parliament for Hastings. In 1801 he was sent with plenary powers to detach the court of Denmark from the Northern Alliance. Returning to England, he was elected for Old Sarum, and supported the Addington ministry, under which he held the office of joint secretary to the treasury. He continued in office when Pitt again resumed the premiership, and in 1805 was appointed chief secretary for Ireland. In the ministry of Lord Grenville he again became secretary to the treasury. In 1812 he was appointed chancellor of the exchequer by Lord Liverpool. In this important office he remained eleven years, and on his resignation was raised to the peerage with the title of Lord Bexley, and was at the same time appointed to the office of chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster, which he held for five years.

Varaville, THE BATTLE OF (1058), was fought by William of Normandy against the combined forces of France and Anjou. The latter were completely routed, and shortly afterwards peace was made. Varaville is on the Dive, not far from Falaise.

Vassalage is a word signifying the condition of feudal dependence. The term vassus (from a Celtic word originally meaning "a growing youth") appears first in Merovingian chronicles and charters in the sense of an unfree person, while in the Carolingian period it is used for a freeman who has commended himself to some more powerful person or corporation. Commendation was symbolized by the act of homage, which was accompanied by an oath of fealty. But at first the relation was a purely personal one, and implied no change in the ownership of the land. It was only when the beneficiary tie, that relation which arose from the grant of a benefice with the obligation of service, was united to commendation that the status known in the later Middle Ages as vassalage was perfected. Frank feudalism arose then principally from the union of the beneficial system and commendation. Though commendation frequently occurs in England, its part in the creation of the English nobility by service, and of the semi-feudal condition of things immediately before the Conquest, is of comparatively small importance as compared with that of the comitatus and that of the English judicial system. The word vassus, or vassalus, is of very rare occurrence before the Conquest; though as early as Alfred the term is applied by Asser to the thegns of Somerset. The Conquest itself universalized a feudal tenure of land of the continental type, and with the thing came the name. [FEUDALISM.]

Vellore Mutiny, THE (July 10, 1806). Vellore, a fortress eighty-eight miles west of Madras, had been selected as the residence of the family of Tippoo (q.v.). Here they were treated with great liberality by the British government; but made use of their opportunities to foment a deep spirit of disaffection in the native army—a design in which they were greatly aided by various innovations introduced by the adjutant-general into the military code. An insurrection broke out on July 10, 1806, by the seizure of the powder magazine and the assault of the European barracks. About 170 of the British troops were wounded or killed, and thirteen officers of the garrison were slain. The surviving British troops, however, managed to hold their position till the arrival of Colonel Gillespie with succour from Arcot. An investigation succeeded in fixing the greater guilt of the revolt on the Tippoo family, who were accordingly removed to Calcutta.

Venezuela, BRITISH RELATIONS WITH. The relations of Great Britain with Venezuela (which proclaimed its independence of Spain in 1811 and was recognized by Madrid in 1845) have turned mainly on a dispute of long standing as to the boundary between the Republic and the colony of British Guiana. The Venezuelans derived their territorial claims from Spain, the British from the Dutch, who ceded the colony to them in 1814. As a result of President Cleveland's message to congress on December 17, 1895, demanding that the dispute should be submitted to arbitration, the question for a time assumed a highly critical aspect as between Great Britain and the United States, and a boundary commission was appointed by the latter power to investigate the question. In June 1897 the dispute was referred to arbitration, and in October 1899 it was settled by the award of the arbitration tribunal, presided over by the Russian jurist, Professor Martens. During the Venezuelan revolution in 1901 outrages were committed on British and other European persons and property. In 1902 Great Britain, with other powers, sent claims against Venezuela, and after an ultimatum British, Italian, and German fleets blockaded Venezuelan coasts. The matter was referred to The Hague Tribunal, which decided in 1904 that the powers were entitled to preferential treatment. The tribunal of 1907 vindicated the British and other claims (£691,160).

Venner, THOMAS (d. 1661), a wine-cooper by trade, was the leader of a band of Fifth-Monarchy men, who appeared in arms in London in January 1661 (after being imprisoned 1657-9 for an abortive rising), demanding the establishment of the monarchy of Christ. The rising was suppressed, and Venner and sixteen others were executed (January 19).

Vere, EDWARD DE, 17TH EARL OF OXFORD (1550-1604), one of the haughtiest and most overbearing of the nobles of Elizabeth's reign, was one of the commissioners at the trial of Mary, Queen of Scots, in 1586. He subsequently did good service for England in fitting out, at his own expense, ships for the defence of the country against the Armada (1588).

Vere, SIR FRANCIS (1560-1609), accompanied Sir Philip Sidney (q.v.) to the Netherlands, and in 1587 was present at the defence of Sluys and Bergen-op-Zoom (1588), where he greatly distinguished himself. In 1596 he took part in the expedition to Cadiz, and in the following year accompanied Essex in his unfortunate expedition to the Azores. Towards the end of 1597 he returned to the Low Countries, where he was wounded at The Hague in 1602. In 1604 he returned to London, where he died.

Vere, SIR HORACE, BARON VERE OF TILBURY (1565-1635), served with his brother, Francis, in the Low Countries, and was present at the capture of Sluys. Subsequently he was knighted for his gallantry at Cadiz in 1596. He succeeded his brother in the command of Brill till that town was restored to the States of Holland in 1616. On the outbreak of the Thirty Years' War (1618) he was set at the head of the force destined by James I for the preservation of the Palatinate, but on this occasion was forced to surrender to Tilly at Mannheim. He was created Lord Vere of Tilbury by Charles I on his accession to the crown, and was made master of the ordnance in 1629.

Vere, JOHN DE, 12TH EARL OF OXFORD (1408?-1462), fought in the French wars. He was a staunch Lancastrian, and on the accession of Edward IV he was attainted and beheaded on Tower Hill.

Vere, JOHN DE, 13TH EARL OF OXFORD (d. 1513), son of the preceding, was restored to his earldom in 1464, but on the restoration of Henry VI joined the Lancastrians. After the battle of Barnet he fled to France, and getting together some ships, maintained himself by piracy. He afterwards seized on St. Michael's Mount in Cornwall, where he was besieged for some months (1473-4). He at last surrendered and was imprisoned at Hammes, in Picardy. Here he remained till 1484, when he induced the governor of the castle to espouse the cause of Henry of Richmond, whom he accompanied to England, and assisted at Bosworth. He was rewarded by Henry VII, with whom he was in high favour. It was he who, according to the well-known story, was in 1498 fined 15,000 marks by Henry for breaking the Statute of Livery and Maintenance.

Vere, ROBERT DE, 9TH EARL OF OXFORD, 1ST MARQUIS OF DUBLIN, and DUKE OF IRELAND (1362-92), was one of Richard II's chief favourites and advisers. He married in 1378 Philippa, daughter of Ingelram de Coucy, and granddaughter of Edward III, but subsequently, having obtained a divorce from her, he married a Bohemian, who had come over with Queen Anne (1387). De Vere quickly acquired a great ascendancy over the young king, by whom in 1385 he was created Marquis of Dublin, receiving as an appanage the whole territory and lordship of Ireland. In the next year he received the title of Duke of Ireland, and became practically the ruler of England. His advancement was bitterly resented by the English nobles. His chief opponent was the Duke of Gloucester, who was actuated more by selfishness than any desire for good government, and compelled the king to assent to the appointment of a commission of regency. After a feeble attempt at resistance the king had to give way, and the chief favourites were appealed of treason. Among these was de Vere, who raised a small body of troops and marched against Gloucester, but he was met at Radcot Bridge (1387) by the Earl of Derby, and, finding himself outnumbered, fled to the Low Countries. In his absence he was condemned as a traitor by the Merciless Parliament (q.v.) of 1388 and his estates were confiscated. He settled at Louvain and was slain in a boar hunt (1392). [RICHARD II.]

Verneuil, THE BATTLE OF (August 16, 1424), was fought by the English, under the Duke of Bedford, against the combined French and Scottish force commanded by the Dukes of Alençon and Touraine. The lack of discipline in the French army, and the misconduct of the Lombard mercenaries, contributed in no small degree to the victory of the English, which was nevertheless not an easy one. The French were eventually completely routed, and are said to have left between 4,000 and 5,000 on the field. Amongst those who fell were the Constable, and the Earl of Douglas (Touraine), while the Duke of Alençon and other generals were taken prisoners. This victory ensured for the time being the supremacy of the English in the north of France. Verneuil is one of the frontier towns of Maine, and is not far from Evreux.

Vernicomes (or VENICONES), THE, were an ancient British tribe who appear to have inhabited part of Perthshire, the whole of Angus, and a large part of Kincardineshire. According to Sir John Rhys they occupied Mearn, Angus, and the east of Fife, having for their chief town an unidentified place, Orrea. The same authority regards this tribe, who are mentioned by Ptolemy, as being one with the later Mæatae, and considers them to have been on the whole neither Goidelic nor Brythonic, i.e., not Celtic at all by race, but members of the aboriginal Picts.

Vernon, EDWARD, ADMIRAL (1684-1757), was the son of James Vernon (q.v.). Entering the navy in 1700, he served in the Vigo expedition, and was captain at twenty-one and rear-admiral at forty-four. He was member of parliament for Penrhyn and Portsmouth from 1722 to 1741, and in this position was a strong opponent of Walpole. In 1739 he was dispatched to the Antilles with a fleet to destroy the Spanish establishments there, but failed in his attempts to seize Porto Bello on account of an insufficiency of forces. In 1741 he was associated with Wentworth in the disastrous expedition against Carthage. But even this failure did not destroy his popularity at home, where he was elected to parliament for three boroughs at once, and continued to take part in politics for some years afterwards.

Vernon, JAMES (1646-1727), was a Whig statesman in the reign of William III. In December 1697, on the sudden resignation of Sir William Trumbull, he was elevated from the post of under-secretary to that of secretary of state, through the influence of Shrewsbury. Soon afterwards, in conjunction with Montagu, he was elected for Westminster (1798). He attempted in vain to moderate the violence of the House of Commons on the Resumption Bill (q.v.), proposing that William should be allowed to retain a third of the Irish grants. When the Partition Treaties (q.v.) were discussed he carried a resolution that the House would support the king, and even proposed that William should be authorized to conclude alliances. On the accession of Anne he was dismissed from office and replaced by Nottingham.

Verona, THE CONGRESS OF (October-November 1822), the last of the congresses of powers established by Art. vi of the Second Treaty of Paris (November 20, 1815), opened in October 1822 to discuss the situation created by the War of Greek Independence, the designs of Russia against the Ottoman Empire, and the danger of a French invasion of revolutionary Spain, together with other questions, such as the slave trade, the evacuation of Naples by Austria, and the problem of Spanish America. The Spanish question occupied the chief place. The importance of the congress in British history is that it witnessed the abandonment by Great Britain, under Canning, of the congress system cherished by Castlereagh. The Montmorency Memorandum of October 20, which sought to obtain material and moral support from the alliance for France in the event of war between France and Spain, was accepted by Russia, Prussia, and Austria (October 30), but rejected by the Duke of Wellington as representative of Great Britain. Verona marks the beginning of Canning's policy of "splendid isolation," based on the doctrine of non-intervention (q.v.).

Versailles, THE PEACE OF (September 3, 1783), closed the maritime war of Great Britain against France, Spain, the United Provinces, and the United States. It was preceded by the British acknowledgment of American Independence on September 27, 1782 (followed by preliminaries of peace on November 30) and by preliminaries of peace with France and Spain on January 20, 1783. By the treaty Great Britain recognized the independence of the United States, whose boundaries were defined so as to include Louisiana, and allowed American citizens to retain their fishing-rights off Newfoundland and in the Gulf of Mexico. France restored to Great Britain Grenada, St. Vincent, Dominica, St. Kitt's, Nevis, and Montserrat, and ceded the River Gambia; Great Britain restored to France Goree, St. Louis, and all the French stations in India, and ceded the River Senegal, Tobago, fishing-rights off Newfoundland, and the right to fortify Dunkirk. Spain renewed the British right to cut logwood in Honduras, and restored the Bahamas; but retained Minorca and Florida. The United Provinces regained all their losses to Great Britain except Negapatam, in exchange for rights of navigation in eastern rivers hitherto exclusively controlled by the Dutch. The terms of the treaty were vigorously opposed by Fox and North on the opening of parliament on December 5, 1782. And when a vote of censure was carried against the government on February 21, 1783, by 207 to 190, Shelburne resigned on February 24 and was succeeded by the Fox and North coalition.

Versailles, THE TREATY OF (June 28, 1919), closed the Great War of 1914-18 after the cessation of hostilities declared by the Armistice of November 11, 1918. After the collapse of Bulgaria, Turkey, and Austria-Hungary in September-October, Germany sued for an armistice through Woodrow Wilson, president of the United States, who had formulated his ideas as to the essential conditions of the final settlement in his Fourteen Points of January 8, 1918, Four Principles of February 11, Four Ends of July 4, and Five Particulars of September 27. Germany accepted his preliminary stipulations on October 20; the allied powers accepted the Fourteen Points with reservations; and the Armistice was signed on November 11. The Peace Conference called by the five principal allied powers opened at Paris on January 18, 1919. Great Britain was represented by Mr. Lloyd George and Lord Balfour, France by MM. Clemenceau and Pichon, Italy by Signors Orlando and Sonnino, Japan by the Marquis Saionji, the United States by President Wilson and Mr. Lansing, Germany by Herr Müller and Dr. Bell. The first draft of the Covenant of the League of Nations (q.v.) was presented on February 14 and approved on April 28. The Treaty of Versailles between the allies and Germany followed on June 28.

It is in 15 parts:—(1) The Covenant of the League of Nations (q.v.). (2) (3) Territorial Dispositions, by which Belgium and Luxemburg ceased to be neutralized states, the left and part of the right bank of the Rhine were demilitarized, Germany lost Alsace and Lorraine to France, the Saar basin was to be controlled by an international commission, Heligoland was to be demilitarized, north Schleswig went to Denmark, Upper Silesia was subjected to a plebiscite, Dantzig was made a free city, administered by the League, and the Republic of Poland was recreated. (4) German Interests outside Germany: All the German colonies were ceded to the allies, the British Empire obtaining mandates in the Cameroons, Togoland, South-West Africa, East Africa, Samoa, New Guinea, Nauru Island; and all German treaty rights and concessions were cancelled. (5) Military, Naval, and Air clauses, by which the German army was restricted to 100,000 men, all munitions beyond that figure were to be given up and destroyed, and conscription was to be abolished. The fleet was restricted to 6 battleships, 6 cruisers, and a few destroyers, etc. (6) Clauses for the return of prisoners of war. (7) Penalties, including the trial of the ex-Kaiser (never carried out) and certain

"war criminals." (8) Reparation clauses, in which the responsibility for the war was fixed on Germany (Art. 231) and means of payment (later superseded by the Dawes Scheme of 1924) were set out. (9) Financial clauses. (10) Economic clauses. (11) Aerial navigation. (12) Ports, waterways, and railways. (13) Labour clauses, including the inauguration of the International Labour Office at Geneva. (14) Guarantees, chiefly an allied occupation of the Rhineland and Cologne for fifteen and five years respectively. (15) Miscellaneous provisions.

The treaty was severe; more severe than Mr. Lloyd George or President Wilson or M. Clemenceau personally considered expedient; but pressure from their home governments was exerted on all three statesmen in the direction of severity. Its provisions came into force on January 10, 1920.

Vespasian was sent into Britain as "legatus legionum" in the year A.D. 43. In this capacity, according to Suetonius, he fought thirteen battles with the natives, subdued two of their tribes, took twenty of their towns, and captured the Isle of Wight. After attaining the empire (A.D. 70) he continued to take some interest in Britain, to which island he sent more than one army for the purpose of conquest. He also carried through some important military reforms.

Vexin, THE. This province, which lay on the borderland of France and Normandy, had, according to the Norman writers, been ceded by King Henry I of France to Duke Robert of Normandy as the price of his assistance in that sovereign's restoration. During the years of William's childhood it had been resumed by France, and the conquest of Maine and England had occupied this duke's time too fully to give him leisure to reclaim the smaller province till towards the close of his reign. At last, irritated by the French king's jests, and the ravages committed on Norman ground by the French commanders in Mantes, he entered the Vexin in 1087. Mantes was razed to the ground, and it was among the burning embers of this town that William met with the accident which put an end to his life.

Vicar-General was the title given to Thomas Cromwell (q.v.) in his capacity of exercising "all the spiritual authority belonging to the king as head of the Church, for the due administration of justice in all cases touching the ecclesiastical jurisdiction, and the godly reformation and redress of all errors, heresies, and abuses in the same Church," in 1535. In 1539 Cromwell was, by act of parliament, empowered to sit in this capacity "on the right syde of the Parliament, and upon the same fourme that the Archbishop of Canterburie syttheth on, and above the same Archbishop and his successors." It was in his capacity of vicar-general that Cromwell issued the commission for inquiry into the religious houses throughout the kingdom.

Viceroy is a term popularly used in reference to the governor-general of India, but in British government it has no official recognition.

Victoria (ALEXANDRINA VICTORIA), QUEEN (b. May 24, 1819, s. June 20, 1837, d. January 22, 1901), was the only child of Edward, Duke of Kent (fourth son of George III), and Princess Louisa Victoria of Saxe-Coburg (relict of the hereditary prince of Leiningen). The greater part of her first eighteen years of life was spent with her mother at Kensington Palace, where she was educated under Fräulein Lehzen and the Rev. George Davys (later Dean of Chester), and subsequently under the Duchess of Northumberland and Baron Stockmar. She became queen on the death of William IV, who had lately been on bad terms with her mother. For the first two years of the reign Lord Melbourne acted as her private secretary as well as prime minister. The accession involved the devolution of the crown of Hanover on the queen's uncle, Ernest Augustus, Duke of Cumberland (by the Hanoverian Salic Law), and the delegation to the home secretary of the royal prerogative of mercy. Parliament granted the queen £385,000 annually. The coronation took place on January 28, 1838. The first crisis of the reign occurred in 1839 over the Bedchamber question (q.v.) and involved the temporary resignation of Lord Melbourne. It was followed in 1840 by the queen's marriage (February 10) to Prince Albert of Saxe-Coburg (q.v.), whom she had first met at Kensington Palace in 1836. The prince was at first kept from any intimate knowledge of matters of state, but later he shared the queen's duties and powers, and she acted in later life according to the advice she believed he would have given had he lived. Prince Albert, however, was never popular in England.

Throughout her reign Queen Victoria took a keen interest in all matters of government. She accepted Peel and the Tories with reluctance in 1841, but her relations with Peel and Aberdeen were soon cordial. She paid her first visit to Scotland in 1842, the year in which attempts on her life were made by John Francis and William Bean, and her first visit to Ireland in 1849. In 1845 she supported Peel's decision to repeal the Corn Laws (q.v.), but her relations with the succeeding Russell ministry were clouded by her disapproval of Palmerston; though she was privately in sympathy with Palmerston's protest in the question of the Spanish Marriages (q.v.—1846). Fresh attempts on her life were made by William Hamilton and Robert Pate in 1850, but the rapid growth of her popularity was reflected in the "marvellous outburst of loyalty" which attended the opening of the Great Exhibition on May 1, 1851. In 1857, by a decree of June 25, Prince Albert received the title of Prince Consort. The resignation of Palmerston in 1858 on the Conspiracy to Murder Bill brought an improvement in the relations between queen and government under Lord Derby, and a better understanding with France was assured by a royal visit to Cherbourg—continued to Berlin—in August. In the queen's absence a bill for the settlement of India after the Mutiny was introduced; it received the royal assent on August 2. The Prince Consort died on December 14, 1861. The queen never went out of mourning for him, and resolved to rule henceforth as she believed he would have had her rule. Unfortunately her prolonged seclusion, and her not infrequent absence from the opening of parliament, led to a decline in her popularity in 1865. In May 1867 she founded the Royal Albert Hall. The next year saw the first ministries of both her great rival ministers, Disraeli (whom she had long admired and who was to become one of her most affectionate advisers) and Gladstone (towards whom she never developed cordial feelings). She did not share all Gladstone's Liberal views, nor did she appreciate his "mutability" of views. In his first period of office she opposed both the Irish Church Disestablishment Act and Cardwell's army reforms. In 1872 occurred a wave of Republican feeling in England, vented by Sir Charles Dilke (q.v.) in a motion to revise the civil list. It recurred in 1889. On Gladstone's fall in 1874 the queen joyfully accepted Disraeli, who treated her "as a woman" and not "as a department of state." The consequent growth of imperialist policy was exemplified in the act of 1876 which conferred on the queen the title of Empress of India; and her relations with Disraeli were strengthened by the opposition of both to Gladstone's denunciation of Turkey during the Balkan crisis of 1875-7. The queen warmly championed the Afghan and Boer Wars of 1879-80, and the policy of repression in Ireland which followed the Phoenix Park murders of 1882. She censured the government for its delay in sending relief to Gordon in Egypt (1885), and in the same year intervened to secure the smooth passage of the Third Reform Bill. She strenuously opposed Gladstone's conversion to Home Rule in 1886.

The queen was also a diligent student of foreign affairs, and on several occasions influenced the course of British foreign policy in important questions. She deprecated Palmerston's independent attitude during the crisis of 1840 over Mehemet Ali; and as she and Prince Albert came more and more to study foreign affairs after the royal visit to Louis Philippe in 1843 (returned in 1844) and the visit of the Tsar Nicholas I in 1844, their disapproval of the foreign secretary increased. They feared the revolutionary possibilities of his support of foreign Liberals, particularly in Germany and Italy in 1848, and his bellicose attitude during the Spanish (1846) and Greek (1850) crises. [PACIFICCO.] The result was the queen's famous memorandum of August 12, 1850, followed by Palmerston's dismissal on account of his open approval (without consultation) of the coup d'état of Louis Napoleon. He was succeeded by Granville. Queen Victoria received the first advances of Napoleon III coolly, but the Balkan situation necessitated close relations by 1853 and co-operation in the Crimean War (q.v.) in 1854. Next year, however, the fall of Aberdeen and the weakness of Lord John Russell's party forced her to accept Palmerston as prime minister (February 1855). The same year she received and returned a visit from Napoleon III, and was visited also by King Victor Emmanuel and Cavour. The pro-Italian policy of Palmerston and Russell during the War of Liberation (1859-61) greatly disturbed her; and in 1861 her and Prince Albert's intervention contrived to moderate the dispatch by which Palmerston might have rendered any successful solution of the Trent affair (q.v.) hopeless. Nor did her devotion to the principle of safeguarding existing monarchies accord well with the policy of the government towards the Polish insurgents in 1863; while in the Schleswig-Holstein question of 1864 (q.v.) the queen's sympathies were divided between Augustenburg and Prussia. In 1867 she was visited by Ismail Pasha and by Sultan Abdul Aziz (the first sultan to visit England), and in 1873 by the Shah of Persia. In 1875 she wrote to the Tsar and the German Emperor in an endeavour to stave off war in the Balkans; and in 1878 she supported Disraeli at the Congress of Berlin even to the extent of contemplating war. 1879 saw her first visit to Italy; 1889 the first visit of the Kaiser Wilhelm II to England. During the years 1890-3 the queen toured abroad. She received with joy the defeat of Gladstone's second Home Rule Bill in 1893, celebrated her Diamond Jubilee in 1897, and vigorously upheld the Boer War when she found peace no longer possible. She died in 1901 at the age of 81.

Popular at first, she found her people indifferent towards her during her years of seclusion, until her popularity revived and flourished after 1880 when the crown became the symbol of growing imperial unity. Imperious in will, with an exalted sense of duty, frank to her ministers and a stern critic of their work, she nevertheless suffered the royal power to decline during her reign, by reason of her absences from the opening and closing of parliament, her numerous foreign visits, and her long years of isolation.

Her nine children were :

1. Princess Victoria (Princess Royal); b. 1840; m. Prince Frederick William of Prussia, 1858; d. 1901.
2. Edward, Prince of Wales (Edward VII); b. 1841; m. Princess Alexandra of Denmark, 1863; s. 1901; d. 1910.
3. Princess Alice; b. 1843; m. Prince Louis of Hesse, 1862; d. 1878.
4. Prince Alfred; b. 1844; m. Marie Alexandrovna of Russia, 1874; d. 1900.
5. Princess Helena; b. 1846; m. Prince Christian of Schleswig-Holstein, 1866.
6. Princess Louise; b. 1848; m. Marquis of Lorne, 1871.
7. Prince Arthur (Duke of Connaught); b. 1850; m. Princess Louise of Prussia, 1878.
8. Prince Leopold (Duke of Albany); b. 1853; m. Princess Hélène of Waldeck, 1882; d. 1884.
9. Princess Beatrice; b. 1857; m. Prince Henry of Battenberg, 1885.

Vienna, CONFERENCE OF (1853), met during the period of difficult diplomatic negotiations which immediately preceded the opening of the Crimean War (q.v.). It was attended by representatives of Great Britain, France, Austria, and Prussia, and was directed towards accommodating the conflicting demands of Russia and Turkey. The Russian demands, presented at Constantinople in March by Prince Menshikov, concentrated on satisfaction from the Porte in the matter of the Holy Places in Palestine, and an acknowledgment of the Tsar's protectorate over all the orthodox subjects of the Porte. This demand the British government considered inadmissible. Lord Stratford de Redcliffe at Constantinople prevailed on Menshikov to separate the two demands, and on the Sultan to concede the first of them (April); but negotiations broke down, and the Russian army crossed the Pruth on July 21. The Vienna Conference therefore assembled. The famous Vienna Note of July 31 attempted to resolve the question of Christian protectorate. But the form of words suggested by the ambassadors was rejected by the Sultan, and Stratford's amended draft, which implicitly repudiated the Russian claim, was rejected by the Tsar. Negotiations broke down, and Turkey, encouraged in her resistance by Stratford, declared war on October 25. In reply to the conference the Porte submitted a draft of the terms on which it would treat for peace, but these were rejected by the Tsar, who substituted five of his own (January 1854). The Conference thereupon dissolved.

—SECOND CONFERENCE OF (1855), was attended by representatives of Great Britain, France, Russia, Turkey, and Austria. It opened on March 15, was adjourned on the 26th, resumed early in April, again adjourned on April 21, and dissolved in June. The negotiations for peace broke down on the question of limiting Russian naval power in the Black Sea, and involved the withdrawal of the British and French representatives. Lord John Russell subsequently resigned on July 13 after an attack in the Commons by Milner Gibson.

Vienna, THE CONGRESS OF (1814-15), met to settle the affairs of Europe after the first Treaty of Paris (May 1814) and the banishment of Napoleon to Elba. The chief representatives present were: for Great Britain, Lord Castlereagh; for Russia, the Tsar Alexander I; for Austria, Prince Metternich; for Prussia, Barons Humboldt and Hardenberg; for France, Prince Talleyrand; for Spain, Count Labrador; most of the smaller powers of Europe, including Turkey, were also represented. The proceedings opened on September 14, 1814, and were hampered throughout by lack of precedent (no great peace conference having been held since that of Westphalia in 1648), by the gaieties indulged in by the representatives and their families assembled at Vienna, and by the Poland-Saxony question, which reached Vienna in the form of a healthy quarrel between the four allies of Chaumont. The intention was to restrict the major issues of the congress to discussion by the five great powers and Spain, with an inner cabinet of four representing Great Britain, Prussia, Russia, and Austria. But by January 1815 Talleyrand, the astute representative of France, gained admission to the inner cabinet, increasing its personnel to five. The chief questions before the congress were Poland and Saxony, Italy, Germany, Switzerland, the slave trade, and various problems such as international rivers and ambassadorial precedence. The problems of Poland-Saxony and Italy were the most important. Lip-service was paid to the desire of Great Britain for a general abolition of the slave trade; the Swiss Confederation received a new constitution to supersede that of Napoleon; the German Confederation of 39 States was set up with a Federal constitution and a diet dominated by Prussia and Austria jointly; Sweden received Norway from Denmark; and the Belgian provinces of the Netherlands were united to Holland. The Poland-Saxony question brought out the policies of the five powers; of Great Britain, to avert French aggression in the west and Russian in the east; of Russia, to gain all Poland and part of Saxony; of Prussia, to gain Saxony and to crush France; of Austria, to safeguard herself against Russia in Saxony and against France in Italy; and of France, to save what could be saved from the ruins of Napoleon's position. The chief credit of the solution of the Polish-Saxon question is due to Castlereagh, who suggested first a representation to Russia on the part of Great Britain, Prussia, and Austria. His first plan failed because Prussia would not consent to Austria's securing a Saxon frontier. His second plan, to achieve an arrangement as to Saxony between Austria and Prussia, was also defeated by the obduracy of the King of Prussia, who was not brought into line until January 1815, and then only as the result of a secret treaty between Great Britain, Austria, and France. The settlement reached provided that Russia should obtain Poland, with the title of king and the grant of a constitution; that Prussia should receive the districts of Thorn, Posen, and Dantzic; that Austria should receive Galicia, and the Tyrol and Salsburg from Bavaria; that Hanover should be extended to the sea in East Frisia; and that Luxemburg should be given to the Netherlands. Cracow became an independent republic (until 1847). Italy was settled after a lengthy duel between Talleyrand and Metternich. The Bourbons were restored in Naples; the pope regained his legations, though garrisoned by Austrian troops; midland duchies were restored to their Austrian archdukes; and the King of Sicily was compensated for his loss of Naples by the gift of the Ionian Islands under British protection (till 1864). The congress closed on June 9, 1815. Its greatest achievement was the preservation of general peace in Europe until the Crimean War (1854). Its immediate result was the establishment of the system of congresses of powers which (set up under Art. 6 of the Second Treaty of Paris, November 20, 1815) met at Aix-la-Chapelle (1817), Troppau (1820), Laibach (1821), and Verona (q.v.—1822), to consult upon the common interests of the powers and take measures to preserve the peace and security of Europe. The principle beneath the Vienna settlement was that of Balance of Power (q.v.), a principle of great use in negotiation, but of doubtful stability.

Vienna, THE TREATY OF (March 16, 1731), completed the settlement of Europe designed by the Treaty of Seville (q.v.). By that treaty the emperor had been isolated in Europe. He seized the duchy of Parma, and it seemed likely that Great Britain, in conjunction with France and Spain, would be forced into a war that would result in acquisitions by France in the Austrian Netherlands which would be dangerous to Britain. Accordingly Sir Robert Walpole, in conjunction with Holland, opened negotiations with the emperor. Great Britain guaranteed the Pragmatic Sanction, which secured the succession of the Austrian dominions, while Austria "accepted the terms proposed at Seville, agreed to destroy the Ostend Company, to establish Don Carlos in his duchies, and not again to threaten the balance of European power." The treaty was signed without the participation or assent of France.

Vigo Bay, THE EXPEDITION TO (1702), undertaken during the War of the Spanish Succession, was dispatched in July 1702 under the command of the Duke of Ormonde, with Sir George Rooke (q.v.) at the head of the fleet. It consisted of 50 vessels, of which 30 were English and 20 Dutch. It sailed from St. Helen's, and on August 12 anchored in the harbour of Cadiz. Through disunion and jealousy very little was effected at this place besides the plunder of a few ports. News, however, now arrived from England of the arrival of the Spanish galleons in the Bay of Vigo, and instructions to take or destroy them were forwarded to Sir George Rooke, who, however, had received this information earlier, from Captain Wishart. The Dutch vessels were communicated with, and on October 11 it was resolved to attempt to capture the French and Spanish ships which were drawn up at Vigo Bay, in a position defended by a boom and a castle. Next day the Duke of Ormonde landed some soldiers to effect a diversion, and these soon made themselves masters of the castle. Meanwhile the boom was forced by the English ships, and the French admiral, seeing destruction imminent, gave orders to set fire to his own vessels. Of the enemy's men-of-war 11 were burnt, 4 were taken by the British and 6 by the Dutch. Of the galleons 6 were taken by the British and 5 by the Dutch, who, however, sank 6 others. Of the treasure on board, valued at more than 40,000,000 "pieces of eight," much had been taken on shore before the arrival of the attacking forces, and booty to the amount of 11,000,000 "pieces of eight" alone fell into the hands of the victors.

Viking is a term derived from the old Norse vik, meaning a creek, bay, or fiord, and denotes the men who made such inlets their haunt. It is commonly employed to describe the Scandinavian hordes—Norse, Danish, and Swedish—who harried Europe from the eighth to the eleventh century; but also, in a broader sense, to signify a particular stage in the cultural development of the Scandinavian peoples, covering their activities in peace as well as in war. Archaeological research, combined with a closer study of Scandinavian sources, has in recent years greatly modified current ideas as to the character of the Vikings and of their civilization. Professor Allen Mawer has emphasized the importance of the trading and maritime activities in which they had been engaged for many centuries before they began to trouble the peace of Christendom. Special causes, among which may be noted the Scandinavian laws of succession, the development in Norway and Denmark of consolidated kingdoms, and the militant Christianity of the Franks, precipitated the great movement of expansion of the eighth century onwards, which was facilitated by Charlemagne's destruction of the naval power of the Frisians. Henceforward the Vikings ranged the seas at will. Their westward voyagings brought them into contact with Scotland and the Isles, and the Welsh and Irish coasts; while, moving in a more northerly direction, they reached Iceland, Greenland, and even, if we are to trust the tradition of the sagas, the North American continent itself. Their southern wanderings embraced the coasts of England and Frankland, and brought them eventually through the Pillars of Hercules into the Mediterranean. Meanwhile the Swedes and Danes had been mastering the Baltic region, and pressing overland across modern Russia until they reached, by way of the Dnieper and the Black Sea, the walls of Constantinople itself. It is only if studied as part of this world-wide movement, in which were blended the motives of trade, exploration, and colonization, no less than of piracy pure and simple, that the history of the Northmen in England can be properly interpreted. Villa Viciosa, THE BATTLE OF (December 10, 1710), fought during the War of the Spanish Succession, was the sequel to the unfortunate defeat of the allies in Spain at Brihuega (q.v.). That defeat was mainly owing to the sluggishness of the imperial general, Stahremberg, in the support of General Stanhope. On coming within sight of Brihuega at last, Stahremberg found that Stanhope had surrendered and at once attempted to retreat, but finding that step impossible, he drew up his troops in order of battle. He had but thirteen thousand opposed to twenty thousand. The left wing of the allied troops was completely routed by the cavalry of the enemy, amongst whom was Philip, the French candidate for the crown. Instead, however, of proceeding to attack the remainder of our army, the victorious troops fell to plundering the baggage, leaving Stahremberg free to contend with the left wing, a contest in which he was so far successful that by nightfall he was left in possession of the field, from which the Duke of Vendôme and Philip had galloped in haste. The enemy's cannon were taken and the British recaptured, but the allied forces had suffered so much in the action that Stahremberg deemed it advisable to retreat to Saragossa. The campaign closed with the loss to the allies of all Spain.

Villenage, Villeins. These words respectively denote the depressed condition, and the class to which at one time the vast bulk of the population that was in immediate contact with the soil belonged. The villen class was the aggregate, formed by political and social influences, of several classes, some similar and all distinguishable, which began to be drawn closer to one another long before the Norman Conquest, and reached their common level years after that event. It is a fair surmise that the mutual attraction exercised on each other by the various kinds of ceorls (q.v.) and theows (q.v.), the former sinking, the latter rising, till they met and blended, had been working from an early date. The villeins, however, were originally those who had a right to share in the common land of a vill. When Domesday Book was compiled the sections of the labouring population that were in a few generations to combine into the general villein class were known as bordars, cottars or cotsets, serfs, and villeins, the first and last in enormous majority. [The Domesday villanus seems sometimes to be almost a generic term, covering the bordiers, cottagers, and virgate holders. It must, then, be regarded as meaning simply villager, and as not everywhere holding its later much more definite legal connotation.] These classes may be assumed to have already come to differ in degree only; perhaps they were not far from the substantial amalgamation which eventually made a single class of them. When the coalescence and degradation were complete they bore many names. As tillers of the soil, and of a status distinct from that of the lower class in towns, they were called rustics; as being exclusively of English birth natives or neifs; villeins because they were bound to live on the vills, which had now become the property of feudal lords; and serfs because they had to serve another's will. The feature in the condition that accompanied every one of its varying stages and distinctions, and doubtless fixed the fate of the different constituents of the class, and may consequently be taken for the most significant, was the dependence of every member of it on a superior, the existence of an intermediary through whom alone they came under the eye of the law, and by whom alone their rights could be asserted. The moment this is seen in the historic development of our system—and it is clearly seen in the later Anglo-Saxon rule, that no man could be lordless—at that moment we become aware of a general set among the humbler dwellers in the land towards villenage. The fresh impetus given to the feudal principle by the Conquest, and the indifference of Norman judges to the degrees of English dependence, ensured the completion of the process; when the twelfth century began the men whose labour raised the necessary food for all were in huge proportion “irremovable cultivators,” holding their cottages and patches of ground at the will of others, barely capable of political rights, and at the mercy of others for the exercise of such social rights as the law doled out to them; in a word, dependent on those who had lordship over them for everything that made living possible and life supportable. The peculiar facts of their condition were summed in the single fact, they had a master. This master commanded their services; had nominally power to take from them everything they possessed; could transfer them in the lump with the land they tilled; they were—in some instances at least—reckoned part of the stock of his estate; against his will they were not at liberty to withdraw from the conditions of their birth. They could not buy their freedom from him with their own money, because all they had was in his power. If a villein ran away from his lord he not only lost the holding that afforded him a livelihood, but was liable to be dragged back to his former dependence. The consent of his lord was needed to his becoming a knight or clerk, or to his educating his children for the service of the Church. Yet his lord's authority over him was not unbounded; for his cruelty or neglect the villein had a remedy in the king's court. And from all oppressions but his lord's he was absolutely safe; the law redressed the wrongs done to him by others as promptly as those of the most law-worthy man in the kingdom. He had, moreover, many comforts and little responsibility. He was generally left in undisturbed enjoyment of his small farm and the gains of his industry, was exempt from service in war, and often found his lord an indulgent master. There was more than one door to freedom that he might contrive to open; residence in a town as member of a gild for a year and a day, unclaimed by his lord, made a free man of him; the Church was on his side, ever raising her strong voice in favour of emancipation. Nor was he always an utter nonentity in politics, or overlooked in the great securities of the national rights. His oath was received in the great inquests; he was represented in the local gatherings; the Great Charter guaranteed his wainage (perhaps legally his lord's property) against distraint.

In course of time the villein's position came to be something like this: he owed his lord the customary services, whereby his lord's demesne was cultivated; and to render those his continual presence on his lord's estates was required; but his lord could not refuse him his customary rights in return, “his house and lands and rights of wood and hay,” and, in relation to everyone but his lord, his capacity as a citizen was unqualified—“he might inherit, purchase, sue in the courts of law.” His condition, too, had a tendency to improve; custom raised his hold upon his house and land into a form of tenure—that by villenage, which eventually developed into copyhold—he was allowed to pay his rent in money instead of service; in many cases his lord's grasp upon him gradually relaxed; the current of the time ran in favour of enfranchisement. In the middle of the fourteenth century a certain number of the villeins had become actually, a large number virtually, free; these were “free to cultivate their land, to redeem their children, to find the best market for their labour.” This beneficial movement was checked by the Great Plague, when the scarcity of labour gave the lords an interest in recovering stray or half-liberated villeins, [and the steps they took to this end have been said to be one of the causes of the Great Revolt of 1381, which was preceded by a period of unrest in several counties among men who remained technically bondmen, though economically free. The abolition of villenage and substitution of rent for its services were among the demands of the insurgents. The check, however, was almost negligible. Commutation proceeded as before.] "The landlords ceased the practice of demanding base services; they let their lands to leasehold tenants, and accepted money payments in lieu of labour; they ceased to recall the emancipated labourer." It must be remembered, moreover, that emancipation had long been common, that the law was now making for freedom, throwing the burden of proof on the claimant lord, and construing doubtful points in favour of the claimed. These causes were once held to have affected mainly the "villeins regardent," as those whose bondage was dependent on land, and disabled them only towards their lords, were called. It is suspected that there were also in England "villeins in gross," whose villenage was personal and absolute, whose services at least could be sold in open market, and who had not a trace of political status; but this is still a disputed point. "We may conjecture that the villein regardent had fallen into villenage by occupying some of the demesne of the lord on servile conditions, and that the villein in gross was a chattel of the lord whom he paid or maintained by a similar allotment of land." [This theory, which is said by Professor Holdsworth not to have originated with the lawyers, must be regarded as trying to create a false division between different classes of villeins. The terms do not appear to have had any reference to personal status, but to have been employed to describe the special claims which a lord might urge in pleading. In mediæval legal theory the lord had a power which was almost absolute over the villeins, the term villein being equivalent to serf. There is a remarkable agreement among the twelfth- and thirteenth-century writers on this subject. Glanville, the Dialogue of the Exchequer, Bracton and Fleta all hold that he could sell them and do what he pleased with them. But in practice we do not find much evidence of the complete application of these views. The villein had the rights of a freeman against all but his lord, and even by him he could not be treated with the indignities which a slave might suffer, for he was protected by the criminal law. If he entered a monastery he was free whilst he lived the religious life. He was seldom transferred by sale except with the land he cultivated. If he fled and were recaptured the lord might find it difficult to prove that he was a villein, since it was base blood and not base tenure that would be most likely to convince the court. Thus proof of bastardy was often an effective answer to the lord. The confusion which arose in the minds of lawyers was partly due to the fact that villenage might be regarded in two ways, as a status or as a tenure. As manorial lands lost their old symmetry and the holdings were transferred from one hand to another—a process which is already to be observed in the thirteenth century—a freeman by birth might well acquire land held in villenage. He was thus a villein if his tenure were taken into account, but his status did not suffer. In the case of the villein by birth the advance of commutation of services for money rents gave him economic freedom, but his status remained base. The lawyer still regarded him as a villein, and it was only with the development of new processes of law and the rise of new courts of equity that the copyholder, his descendant, established what in the end amounted to personal freedom. The condition of villenage disappeared gradually; and even as late as the reign of Elizabeth there are instances of the emancipation of quite wealthy men who have long since left their village "nest," but are yet required to pay large sums for freedom.] [MANOR; COMMUTATION; COPYHOLD; DOMESDAY.]

Villiers, BARBARA, DUCHESS OF CLEVELAND (1641–1709), was the daughter of Lord Grandison, and wife of Roger Palmer. About 1659 she became one of Charles II's mistresses. In 1661 her husband was made Earl of Castlemaine, and it is as Lady Castlemaine that his wife is generally known. Her beauty and strong will gave her immense influence at court, while in the number of her intrigues she almost eclipsed the king. In 1670 she was created Duchess of Cleveland, and seven years afterwards left England for France, where she spent the rest of her life. In 1705 she married Robert (Beau) Feilding; but the marriage was subsequently annulled, on the ground of the husband's having committed bigamy. Of her sons by Charles II, the eldest became Duke of Cleveland, the second Duke of Grafton, and the youngest Duke of Northumberland.

Villiers, ELIZABETH (1657?–1733), was one of the ladies-in-waiting to Princess (afterwards Queen) Mary at the time of her marriage with William of Orange. She became the prince's mistress, for although destitute of personal attractions she was a woman of considerable talents, and "to the end of her life great politicians sought her advice." In 1693 William employed her in vain to induce the Duke of Shrewsbury to accept office. She married George Hamilton, afterwards Earl of Orkney. William bestowed on her a grant of part of the old Crown property in Ireland (estimated at £26,000, though really only about £4,000 a year), and this grant became very unpopular when grossly exaggerated in value by the commission sent to inquire into the Irish forfeitures (1699). It was against Lady Orkney, Woodstock, and Keppel that the Resumption Bill of 1700 was chiefly directed.

Villiers, GEORGE, 1ST DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM (1592-1628), born August 20, 1592, was the younger son of Sir George Villiers of Brooksley. In 1614 he was first brought before the notice of James I, and, being an active, handsome, and intelligent youth, his companionship served to amuse the leisure hours of the king. In 1615, after the fall of the former favourite, Carr, Earl of Somerset, Villiers was left without a rival in the king's favour. In 1616 he was created Viscount Villiers; in 1617 he became earl; in 1618, Marquis of Buckingham. By the royal bounty he was made one of the richest noblemen in England, and all the patronage of the court was placed in his hands. Few men could endure such rapid and unmerited advancement without detriment to their character. Buckingham was a vain and arrogant man, not ready to take advice, and not content that any should hold office who did not owe their promotion to his good will. Charges of malversation were brought against various officials, and several noblemen of high birth deprived of their offices. But although some reforms were effected in the public service, and although Buckingham was not personally avaricious, the atmosphere of the court remained venal. Those who sought promotion, if they had not directly to purchase office, were expected to requite the service in one form or another, to win the favour of Buckingham's dependents, or possibly marry one of his needy relations. Over the direction of James's foreign policy Buckingham, during the first part of his career, exercised no appreciable influence. In 1619 the Protestants of Bohemia had risen in rebellion against their king, the Emperor Ferdinand, and had bestowed the crown on James's Protestant son-in-law, the Elector Palatine. The Palatinate had been in consequence invaded by a Spanish army. James hoped to get it restored to the elector by negotiating a treaty of marriage between Prince Charles and the Spanish Infanta. Buckingham, as personal motives prompted him, joined those who approved of a Spanish alliance or those who desired to render assistance to the Protestant party in Germany. In 1620 he had married a Catholic, Lady Catherine Manners, and in 1622 his attitude became more decided. He entered into a close friendship with the Spanish ambassador, Gondomar, and the following year prevailed on James to allow him and the prince to go to Spain, under the belief that once there they could readily prevail on Philip IV to restore his lands to the elector. Arrived at Madrid Buckingham soon discovered his delusion. The Spaniards desired toleration for the English Catholics, but refused in return to bind themselves in any way regarding the Palatinate. During his absence James conferred on Buckingham the title of duke. The new duke and Charles both returned, irate with the Spaniards and eager to declare war. A parliament was summoned and its support asked (1624). For a time the duke was immensely popular, but his popularity was short-lived. He had many schemes in his head for the recovery of the Palatinate, but he had not the qualities of a statesman, and did not understand the first conditions of success. A treaty was agreed on for the marriage of Charles with Henrietta Maria, the sister of Louis XIII, in which concessions were made in favour of the English Catholics, although a distinct promise had been given to the parliament that nothing of the sort should be done. James and Buckingham expected that in return Louis would aid them to recover the Palatinate, but they were soon undeceived. Dire misery and misfortune befell an isolated body of 12,000 men sent to pass through Holland and fight their way into the heart of Germany. In March 1625 James died, and Charles, who was deeply attached to the duke, came to the throne. A parliament was summoned from which Charles parted in displeasure because it expressed distrust of the duke's capacity. A fleet dispatched to Cadiz to seize Spanish treasure-ships returned without effecting its object. Want of money led to the summoning of a second parliament, which impeached the duke and was angrily dissolved by the king (1626). Buckingham, always buoyant and sanguine, believed that if he could achieve success he would recover popularity. Anger against the French king led to a declaration of war with France, and Buckingham sailed in command of a fleet to succour the Protestant town of La Rochelle, which had rebelled against Louis (1627). He effected a landing on the Isle of Rhé, but was subsequently driven off by the French with heavy loss. The king summoned a third parliament, which passed the Petition of Right (q.v.) and afterwards drew up a Remonstrance demanding that Buckingham should be removed from office (1628). In consequence the parliament was dissolved, and popular feeling became more excited than ever against the duke. He was at Portsmouth, preparing a second expedition for the relief of La Rochelle, when as he left the room where he had breakfasted he was stabbed to the heart by a discontented officer, John Felton, who had served under him, and who thought with one blow to avenge his private wrongs and rid his country of a public enemy (August 23, 1628).

Villiers, GEORGE, 2ND DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM (1627-88), was the son of the 1st duke. He served in the Royalist army, and was present at the battle of Worcester, after which he retired to the continent. He returned to England in 1657, and married the daughter of Lord Fairfax, through whose influence he was able to recover a portion of his large estates.

At the Restoration he was made master of the horse and a privy councillor. In 1666 he took part with the opposition in parliament, and on a charge of having endeavoured to excite a mutiny in the fleet he was committed to the Tower, but in less than a year he was pardoned. On the formation of the Cabal ministry (q.v.) in 1667 he became one of its chief members, and when it fell in 1673 he, like Shaftesbury, joined the opposition. But his health was so bad that he took little further part in public affairs, and spent the rest of his life at his seat in Yorkshire. In his private character he ranks as the most profligate member of the most profligate court England has ever seen. He was strongly suspected of having hired Colonel Blood to assassinate the Duke of Ormonde, while his seduction of the Countess of Shrewsbury and the death of the earl in a duel with him created a fearful sensation even in those days. He is thus described by Dryden, under the name of Zimri, in some famous lines of "Absalom and Achitophel"—

"A man so various that he seemed to be,
Not one, but all mankind's epitome;
Stiff in opinions, always in the wrong,
Was everything by starts, and nothing long . . .
Railing and praising were his usual themes;
And both, to show his judgment, in extremes . . .
He laughed himself from court; then sought relief,
By forming parties, but could ne'er be chief."

Macaulay describes him as "a sated man of pleasure, who turned to ambition as to a pastime."

Vimeiro, THE BATTLE OF (August 21, 1808), fought during the Peninsular War, was brought on by an offensive movement of the French army under Junot, four days after the combat of Roliça. The village of Vimeiro stands in a small plain at the foot of hills, near the river Maceira, and about nine miles from Torres Vedras. Wellesley's object was to keep near the coast, in order to protect the landing of British troops; but although holding the road to Torres Vedras, he had been forestalled at that place by Junot, who had collected there the scattered troops of Delaborde and Loison. Wellesley accordingly took up a defensive position, occupying two ridges and some high ground between them. On the high ground to the south of the village he placed Fane and Anstruther with some infantry and six guns, while the bulk of the troops occupied the range west of the Maceira. On the heights to the east and north few troops were posted owing to a want of water. The total of British and Portuguese troops was about 20,000. Junot's plan was to attack these heights, so thinly defended, and so to outflank the British left; but Wellesley, to meet this, withdrew large bodies from the right. The French attack on the centre, which was intended to be supported by the troops who were told off to outflank and destroy the British left, met with some little success at first, but was checked at the summit of the plateau by the 50th Regiment, who drove it back over the hedge, and a cavalry charge completed the rout. In the meantime the French troops on the right, having too late extricated themselves from the ravines which had intercepted their progress, attacked Ferguson on the extreme left, but were vigorously repulsed. The pursuit, which would have destroyed the French army, was arrested by Burrard, who had arrived, and now took up the command.

Vinegar Hill, THE BATTLE OF (June 21, 1798), was fought near Enniscorthy, in Wexford, during the Irish Rebellion of 1798. The Irish rebels, headed by Father Murphy (q.v.), assembled here, established a camp, and committed fearful cruelties in the neighbourhood. From May 29 till the time when the camp was stormed the massacre of Protestants was a matter of almost daily occurrence. On June 21, 13,000 British troops, under the command of General Lake, advanced from five sides to attack the rebels, the road to Wexford being, however, perhaps intentionally, left open. The camp was taken without much fighting, only 400 out of 16,000 being killed. Thirteen guns, however, were taken, and the rest of the rebels fled in disorder to Wexford.

Virgin Islands, THE, are a group of islands owned by the United States, Denmark, and Great Britain. The British islands are the most northerly and form a presidency of the Leeward Islands colony. Discovered by Columbus, they were called Las Virgenes in honour of St. Ursula. Tortola was the home of Dutch buccaneers from 1648 until an English expedition from Jamaica expelled them (1666), and was added to the empire in 1872. St. Croix, or Sancta Cruz, was held jointly by Dutch and English as early as 1625. St. Thomas and St. John, captured from the Danes, was restored in 1802, surrendered in 1807 and restored in 1815 again, to be bought by the United States in 1917. The inhabitants are English-speaking even after two centuries of Danish rule. The islands were given a nominated legislative council of eight members (four being official) in 1774. The natives are interesting as being a mixture of Carib and Spanish with marked characteristics. Now they are ruled by a governor and executive council.

Viscount is a title of nobility between those of earl and baron. As an hereditary honour it was introduced into England in Henry VI's reign, John, Baron Beaumont, being created viscount by letters patent of February 1440. The title has never been used to any great extent in England, though in latter times it has been the custom to confer it on prominent cabinet ministers when they are raised to the peerage, and on retiring Speakers. It must be remembered that the Latin word vice-comes is always used to translate the English sheriff; in this sense the word seems to have been brought into England from Normandy at the time of the Conquest, and was used by the invaders for the English shire-reeve because the Norman vice-comes was the nearest equivalent to that office.

Visitation, THE COMMITTEE OF, appointed by the Scottish parliament, consisted of Presbyterian clergymen, who were to purify the Church by visitation. The result was the expulsion of many Episcopalian clergy on charges of immorality, which were often the result of malice.

Vitoria, THE BATTLE OF (June 21, 1813), was the first great battle of Wellington's campaign of that year in the Peninsular War. Vitoria stands on a small eminence with the Zadora flowing through the plain on its northern side. In the Vitoria basin Joseph Bonaparte had collected all the baggage, camp-followers, and plunder of the previous campaigns. On the 19th the allies came up, and encountered the French in some partial skirmishes. Joseph's plan was to hold the bridges over the Zadora; Wellington determined to deliver three attacks on the French position, which was very widely extended. Hill, on the right, was to force the bridge of the narrow pass called La Puebla, and drive in the French left. Wellington himself was to carry the three chief bridges in the centre, while on the extreme left Graham was to turn the French right, and so enclose the whole army in the Vitoria basin between the Zadora and the Puebla range. On the morning of the 21st Hill seized the village of La Puebla, and while some of his men were detached to seize the heights, he himself pushed on through the pass, and carried the village of Subigana. In the centre, and on the left, Kemp and Graham succeeded in driving back the enemy, and before long all the British troops were across the Zadora. The French began to retreat, but were hotly assailed on all sides, especially by Wellington from the hill of Aimez, which he had seized by a sudden rush. They nevertheless kept up a running fight for five miles, until, after being driven from each successive position, they finally gave themselves up to a headlong flight, leaving women and children, baggage, and artillery behind them as spoil for the pursuing troops. The allied casualties were about 5,000 and the French about 8,000.

"Vixen," SEIZURE OF THE, 1836. The Vixen, a vessel owned by the house of Messrs. Bell, London merchants, was seized by the Russian government in 1836 for infringing the blockade of Circassia. Great excitement was caused in England by the seizure, but the demand of Roebuck and others in parliament for a select committee on the subject was rejected by Lord Palmerston (June 1837).

Volunteer Corps in Great Britain are not entirely of recent origin. Henry VIII granted a charter in 1537 to the voluntary Guild of St. George, which grew into the Honourable Artillery Company. But an organized volunteer force originated in the Militia Bill of 1757. Disbanded in 1783, the English and Scots Volunteers were revived soon after the outbreak of the Revolutionary War with France (1793), when numerous volunteer corps were raised in England to defend the country in case of invasion, and to overcome internal disorder if necessary. These regiments were raised chiefly from the gentry and the middle classes, and were armed and equipped at their own expense. Several of the corps consisted of cavalry. In 1803, when the war broke out again, the volunteer movement received a great impetus. A bill known as the Military Service Bill was passed, authorizing the enrolment as volunteers of all able-bodied men. Many new regiments were formed, and the numbers of the Volunteers rose to over 300,000. Pitt put himself at the head of the movement, and, as warden of the Cinque Ports, raised a force of 3,000 Volunteers, of which he was in command. Though not called upon to repel invasion, these Volunteer Corps were frequently useful in suppressing riots. In 1857 the intemperate language used about Great Britain in French newspapers and public meetings roused the nation to its defenceless condition. In consequence large numbers of Rifle Volunteer Corps were formed all over the country in 1859. The movement spread and took firm root. In 1860 an act was passed to regulate the conditions of service, and in 1862 amended. Several other statutes were passed in reference to the Volunteers, and in 1871 an act provided for the resumption by the Crown of direct authority over the Volunteers. Thus the Volunteers were closely incorporated with the military system of the country, and placed under the direct control of the war office. In 1881 they were further affected by the regulations of the forces, and by administrative changes; the chief of which was that of attaching the Volunteer Corps as auxiliary battalions to the line regiments. The Volunteers did signal service during the Boer War, some 20,000 being used in the campaign of 1900. In 1908 the whole force (335,000 strong) was combined with the yeomanry into the new Territorial Force (q.v.).

Volunteers, THE IRISH. The movement for establishing Volunteer corps began about 1778, owing, on the one hand, to the boldness of American privateers, and, on the other, to want of money, which prevented the lord-lieutenant from establishing a militia. It was part of the definite system of compelling the English government to grant legislative and commercial independence to Ireland by that country adopting the methods of agitation which had been so successful in America. In 1779 the first regular regiment, under command of the Duke of Leinster, was formed in Dublin, and though the Catholics were persuaded to abstain, Protestant corps were formed all over the country, commanded by country gentlemen. They were soon 40,000 strong. On September 13 parliament passed a vote of thanks to them, and the patriots, anxious to imitate America, at once determined to use them to extort concessions from England. In this they had not miscalculated; and the government, being unable to spare troops for Ireland, had to grant free trade in 1779. Grattan had now begun to attack the Union. The Volunteers supported him, and elected Lord Charlemont to be their leader, in defiance of the Castle. In the north they began to hold reviews, their flag bearing the inscription "Hibernia tandem libera." Soon afterwards, they passed resolutions declaring free trade in danger and denouncing the Perpetual Mutiny Bill. The House of Commons at last took alarm, and in September 1780 declared their resolutions "false, scandalous, libellous, and tending to raise sedition." All through 1781 the Volunteers continued to recruit till their numbers were estimated at 100,000. Meanwhile their uselessness in case of invasion had been shown by the fact that when Cork was threatened, only 300 came forward to defend it. In April 1782, when parliament again met, the Volunteers poured into Dublin in great numbers to give Grattan confidence. The Irish demands were granted, and without doubt the constitution of 1782 was due to the inability of the government to oppose any force to the Volunteers, who at this time actually had 80,000 men under arms, and 130,000 on the rolls. It was owing to their opposition that a projected increase of the army had to be given up. The second Convention at Dungannon declared in favour of reform, and, with the Earl of Bristol as leader, the Volunteers became a real danger to the State when they assembled again in the "Volunteer Convention" of November 10, 1783, at Dublin, under the presidency of Lord Charlemont, and drew up a Reform Bill, which excluded all Catholics. After this the better classes retired from the movement, and the ranks began to be filled chiefly with Catholics. In 1785 they were again the idols of the mob, though a vote of thanks to them was lost in the Commons. The failure of a congress to be held under their auspices through the firm action of the government, and the suppression of the Whiteboys (q.v.) in 1787, made them less formidable. Wolfe Tone tried to revive them, but without success, and the Arms Bill of 1792 finally put an end to the movement, the carrying out of the law being entrusted to the soldiery, who met with opposition at Belfast alone. Many of the arms of the Volunteers, however, had previously passed into the hands of the peasantry, and were used in 1798.

Vortigern was, according to the traditional story of the Anglo-Saxon conquest, the prince of a confederacy of tribes in Northern Britain about the middle of the fifth century. The "Historia Brittonum" of Nennius is our authority for the statement that he invited the Saxons into Britain to help him against the Picts and Scots. Hengest (q.v.), their leader, is said, however, very soon to have turned against him, and, after several engagements, to have driven him out of Kent. His many vices were punished, through the intervention of St. Germanus, by a fitting end, fire descending from heaven to consume him, his harem of wives, and all his following! That this story belongs, so far as the details are concerned, to the realm of legend rather than of history, is self-evident. But it is probable that it contains a substratum of truth, since the expedient of calling in one set of barbarians for defence against another was common in the declining years of the Empire, and the story of the mercenaries turning against their employers and becoming conquerors instead of defenders finds many parallels in contemporary history.

Vortimer (GORTIMER) (d. c. 450) was, according to Nennius, the eldest son of Vortigern (q.v.), and the active opponent of Hengest and the Saxon invaders, whom he is said to have valorously encountered on four occasions. According to Nennius's account, Vortimer at first succeeded in confining the Jutish invaders to the isle of Thanet, defeated them in three battles, and forced them to send over to Germany for a fresh supply of warriors. Three times after this he defeated the new-comers. Shortly after this last victory he died, with his last breath bidding his friends bury him by the sea-side, and uttering a prophecy that the strangers would not hold their conquests for ever. There is, however, every reason to suspect the details of the story.

Wade, GEORGE, GENERAL (1673-1748), entered the army in 1690. He served under the Duke of Marlborough during the reign of Queen Anne. In 1708 he was raised to the rank of brigadier-general, and was elected member of parliament for Hindon in 1715. In 1725 he was sent to pacify the Highlands in pursuance of the "Act for Disarming the Highlanders." He seems to have become personally popular, even whilst faithfully obeying most distasteful orders. He employed himself more usefully in making military roads across the Highlands. They have been immortalized in the famous lines—

"If you had but seen these roads before they were made,
You would hold up your hands and bless General Wade."

From 1722 to 1748 he sat as a member for Bath. In 1744 he commanded the British forces in Flanders, but could accomplish nothing against the superior skill of Marshal Saxe. On the outbreak of the Jacobite rebellion of 1745 he collected what troops he could at Newcastle. A false report that he was advancing to relieve Carlisle induced the Pretender to relinquish for a while the siege of that city. However, he pursued the Pretender through Yorkshire, but his inactivity during the campaign was a general subject of complaint, and he was in consequence superseded in command by Hawley.

Wade, Sir William (1546–1623), one of the diplomatists and statesmen of Queen Elizabeth's reign, was sent to Madrid in 1584 to explain to Philip II the causes of his ambassador's (Mendoza) dismissal, but the king refused to see him. The same year he was entrusted with the task of explaining to Mary, Queen of Scots, her hopeless position if she refused a reconciliation with Elizabeth, and in 1585 vainly endeavoured to procure the extradition of the Jesuit, Thomas Morgan (q.v.), from Henry III of France. He subsequently took possession of the Queen of Scots' papers at Chartley after the discovery of the Babington Conspiracy (q.v.). He was knighted by James I in 1603.

Wager of Battle, "a relic of old Teutonic jurisprudence," was apparently a Norman innovation introduced into England under William the Conqueror. It was thereafter used to settle many questions. Witnesses might be compelled to defend their veracity by battle; a man could prove in this way his innocence of crime, his right to property, or his right to obtain payment of a debt. If charged with an offence by a private individual he had the right to plead not guilty, and throw down his glove and declare his readiness to defend his innocence with his body. If the challenge was accepted by the accuser the two proceeded to fight on the appointed day; if the defendant was defeated, or unable to continue the combat all day, he was convicted and punished; while if he was victorious, or could protract the fight till nightfall, he was acquitted, and his adversary was fined sixty shillings and declared infamous. The parties were obliged to fight in their own persons, except the appellant were a woman, a priest, an infant, sixty years old, lame, or blind, in any of which cases he might "counterplead the battle," and compel the defendant to put himself upon trial by his country. The practice of employing "champions" easily developed, however, and in 1275 was recognized by statute. As a Norman innovation trial by battle was much disliked in England, and in borough charters we frequently find exemptions from it granted as a privilege. Frowned upon by the Church, and by the growing body of lawyers who favoured the newer remedies of Henry II, it fell gradually into disrepute, although it remained as a possible alternative in real actions to the Grand Assize and as a means of disproving an appeal of murder down to 1819. In 1817 a certain Abraham Thornton, on his trial for alleged murder, demanded a "trial by battle," and on the refusal of the prosecutor to accede, was discharged; this led, in 1819, to an act abolishing "appeals of murder, treason, felony, or other offences, and Wager of Battel, or joining issue, and trial by Battel in Writs of Right." Waitangi, THE TREATY OF (February 1840), was made between Captain Hobson, representing the British government, and the Maori chiefs. By it the sovereignty of New Zealand was handed over to Great Britain, whilst Captain Hobson promised protection to the natives together with the rights of British subjects, confirming also to the chiefs and tribes of New Zealand the full, exclusive, and undisturbed possession of their lands, etc., "so long as it might be their wish to retain them."

Wakefield, THE BATTLE OF (December 31, 1460), was an important Lancastrian victory during the Wars of the Roses. The battle of Northampton had placed the supreme power in the hands of York, who had been acknowledged heir to the crown, but Queen Margaret, who had fled to Scotland, refused to acknowledge this arrangement, whereby her son was deprived of the succession, and, raising an army in Wales and the north, advanced against the Yorkists. The Duke of York marched against her, and took up his position in his castle at Sandal, near Wakefield. The two forces met on Wakefield Green, between the town and Sandal Castle. The Yorkists, who were greatly inferior in numbers, were defeated; the duke was slain, his son, Rutland, was murdered by Lord Clifford while escaping from the battlefield, and the Earl of Salisbury and others were sent to Pontefract, where they were beheaded.

Wakefield, EDWARD GIBBON (1796–1862), remembered for his imprisonment in 1826 as a result of his marriage with Ellen Turner at Gretna Green, was the originator of the system of colonization bearing his name. It aimed at securing an adequate supply of labour in newly-settled countries by abolishing the free granting of land to intending settlers. Instead of this practice, the land was to be sold at £1 or more per acre, and the proceeds were to be applied to assisting immigration. Thus an industrial element might be secured in the population of the colony which would cause an additional demand for agricultural produce and so increase the total production of wealth. This system, which was at first adopted in South Australia and Victoria, as well as in New Zealand, was strongly opposed by Sir Richard Bourke, governor of New South Wales, and, except in South Australia, never had any hold. In May 1839 Wakefield became private secretary to Lord Durham, while high commissioner of Canada.

Wakeman, SIR GEORGE (fl. 1608-85), was physician to Queen Catherine, wife of Charles II. He was accused of conspiring to poison the king at the instance of the queen (1679). The chief witness against him was Titus Oates (q.v.), whose evidence on this occasion was more than usually contradictory. Wakeman was acquitted, but was so frightened by the menace of a second trial that he left the kingdom.

Walcheren Expedition, THE (1809), was projected by the British government on the renewal of the war between France and Austria, in order to effect a diversion and assist the latter power, by compelling the French to withdraw part of their forces from the Danube valley. The capture of the immense arsenal which Bonaparte had fortified and extended, expressly as a menace to Great Britain, was also a great object. The armament, which was dispatched on July 28, was one of the largest ever sent forth by Britain. It consisted of 35 ships of the line and frigates, and an enormous number of transports, conveying over 40,000 infantry and cavalry; but the results achieved by this great force were miserably inadequate. Lord Chatham, the brother of Pitt, who was in command, was destitute of decisive energy or military capacity. On July 29 part of the British force landed in the isle of Walcheren and seized Middelburg, while other divisions captured the fortresses at the mouths of the Scheldt. Antwerp might have been seized by a coup-de-main; but instead, time was lost in the siege of Flushing, which surrendered on August 16. By the time the British were prepared to begin the siege of Antwerp that city had been put into a thorough state of defence, and the garrison had been very largely reinforced. As it was now the beginning of September, Chatham, suspending operations, withdrew his troops to the island of Walcheren, and kept 15,000 of them there as a garrison, while the remainder were sent back to England. But the sanitary arrangements of the army were extraordinarily bad, and the damp climate of Walcheren told terribly on the soldiers. Before a month was over half the garrison was in hospital. Orders were therefore given to destroy Flushing and abandon the island, which was completely evacuated before the end of the year. The failure of the expedition was made the occasion of violent attacks in parliament, and the ministry were only saved from a vote of censure by a narrow majority. A violent quarrel broke out between Canning, who was foreign minister, and Castlereagh, who, as war minister, was held to be largely responsible for the mismanagement of the campaign. It resulted in a duel (September 21), followed by the resignation of both ministers.

Waldegrave, SIR EDWARD (1517-61), one of Mary's most trusted advisers, used his utmost endeavours to prevent the queen's marriage with Philip II of Spain. He was appointed in 1558 on a committee of ways and means, but found no favour with Elizabeth, by whom he was sent to the Tower for transgressing the Act of Uniformity (1561).

Walden, ROGER, Archbishop of Canterbury (d. 1406), was secretary to Richard II, by whom he was employed on diplomatic errands. In 1395 he was appointed lord high treasurer of England. When Archbishop Arundel was driven into exile in 1397 the king obtained the archbishopric from the pope for Walden. On the deposition of Richard II Walden's life was threatened, but he came to terms with Arundel and, resigning the see, retired into private life. In 1405 he was elected Bishop of London by Arundel's influence, and held that see till his death in the next year.

Wales is strictly the district inhabited by the foreigners, for that is the literal meaning of the term "Welsh," applied by the English to all the Britons alike. Its limits have varied with the progress of the English arms. In the sixth century it included an unbroken stretch of country from the Clyde to the English Channel, but the conquest of Chester and the Severn Valley at the end of that century cut up the land of the Welsh into three distinct portions, of which the northern part has been described under Cumbria, and the southern under Damnonia. It remains to speak of the central portion, which we still call Wales, but which was then called North Wales, to distinguish it from West Wales, south of the Bristol Channel, and whose inhabitants called themselves Cymry, and the land Cymru. Before the end of the sixth century the modern Wales was simply a fragment of South Britain. It was originally peopled by the primitive pre-Aryan savages, who are thought to have largely survived in the great tribe of the Silures; then by Goidels of the earlier Celtic migration, who long maintained their hold in the west; and then by Brythonic Celts, who were in turn subdued by the Romans, whose roads, towns, and mines showed the reality of their power. Their withdrawal in 410 led to the breaking up of settled government, the relapse of the Britons into the tribal organizations so characteristic of the Celts, the relaxation of the feeble bonds which Roman Christianity had cast over them, and an anarchy which threatened speedy conquest by the English.

During the sixth century, however, a remarkable revival of energy seems to have occurred in Celtic Britain, and not least in Wales. The political revival, which set bounds to the English conquest, and united the Britons, firstly under Gwledigau, or temporary generals in war, such as the famous Arthur, and, at a later stage, under national kings, such as Cadwallon, who held Northumbria a whole year in servitude—the political revival, perhaps, affected Strathelyde more intimately than Wales. But even in Gildas we read of great princes, like Maelgwn of Gwynedd, and the tradition of the migration of Cunedda from the region of the Wall to North Wales, of the expulsion of the Goidel by his descendants, and the story of Kentigern's wanderings from Clyde to Clwyd show that Wales, too, was affected by the movement. The peculiar organization of the Celtic Church certainly originated in Wales, though its highest development was worked out in Ireland and Scotland.

But the promise of national development was never fulfilled. Enough was done to set limits to the Saxon conquest, but no really united state was formed. Despite the later stories of Kings of all Britain, and Kings of all Wales, Wales was during nearly the whole of its history split up into an infinity of tribal states, over which very rarely some powerful character or vigorous stock acquired a loose overlordship that was never strong enough to make itself permanent. In the north the Kings of Gwynedd were, perhaps, the strongest line in Wales, but their authority over much of the wide district so named was probably very slight. In the south we know of a very large number of petty states. In the south-west the kingdom of Demetia or Dyfed was in early times the most important. But to the north the aggressive state of Ceredigion grew at the expense of the older kingdom. Gwent, Morganwg, Brecheiniog, and, in the north-east, Powis, were other important divisions. In short, Wales was a group of clan states, with a few greater sovereignties, claiming indefinite suzerainty over the lesser ones and each other. The history of these petty states consists primarily in endless and purposeless feuds with each other, true "battles of kites and crows," as no political development, no national state gradually evolved from the conflict. But fierce invaders from east and west made it necessary for the petty kings to unite sometimes for common defence. The English from the east, the Irish Danes from the west, constantly plundered and pillaged. Especially terrible were the ravages of the "black pagans" from beyond sea. After a long period of predatory incursions they perhaps ultimately formed a permanent settlement in Dyfed. On the west the Mercian overlords were formidable neighbours during the eighth century. Offa conquered Pengwern and the western portion of Powis, and built a dyke from Dee to Wye to mark off the limits of his kingdom and keep the Welsh marauders in check. He probably co-operated with Elvod, Bishop of Bangor, in forcing the Catholic Easter on the unwilling Welsh. During this period the meagre Welsh annals give a bare catalogue of obscure kings. The end of the Mercian overlordship left the way clear for the development of the remarkable power of Rhodri Mawr (843-877), who seems to have added to his patrimony of Gwynedd the kingdoms of Powis, Ceredigion, and Dyfed, and to have thus been ruler of nearly all Wales. It is said that on his death he divided his dominions into three portions among his three sons, and that the three chief states of later Wales—Gwynedd, with its capital Aberffraw, Powis, with Mathralaw as the royal seat now that Pengwern had become Shrewsbury, and Ceredigion, including Dyfed, with the king's residence at Dinevawr, near Llandilo. Under Rhodri's grandson, Howel Dda (q.v.) of Dinevawr (907-48), another hope of national unity arose. But the West Saxon monarchs were too strong for such attempts. The friendship of Asser had brought Alfred's troops into the western wilderness of Demetia. All the South Welsh kings acknowledged Alfred as their lord. South Welsh bishops were consecrated at Canterbury, and a deadly blow struck at the old wild freedom of the Welsh episcopate where every bishop was, so to say, archbishop as well as bishop of his own see. Howel himself attended Edward's and Athelstan's witenagemots. The laws that go by his name are a curious combination of old Welsh customs with those of the English court. On Howel's death Wales became more anarchic than ever. Its relation to England checked its internal development, but the English supremacy was too weak to impose order and strong government from without.

In 1015 Llewelyn ap Iestyn conquered the usurper Aedhan ap Blegywryd, and inspired with new vigour the kingdom of Gwynedd. His son Gruffydd became king over all Welshmen, and, in close alliance with his father-in-law, Elfgar, Earl of the Mercians, played a really important part in the history of the time. At last the triumph of the house of Godwin proved fatal to the Welsh king. His great victories in Herefordshire, which far exceeded the measure of the border forays which are the staple of Welsh history, were punished by two brilliant English campaigns under Harold in person. At last in 1065, after Harold had ravaged Wales from end to end, Gruffydd was slain by the treachery of his own men. The conqueror divided his dominions among his kinsmen, Bleddyn and Rhiwallon, to be held as dependencies of the English crown, and, by pushing the English frontier still farther westward, prepared the way for the new period of Saxon aggression, which made the Norman Con-

The foundation of the great border Palatinates by William I was the first result of the Conquest on Wales. The earldoms of Hugh of Chester and Roger of Shrewsbury proved an iron barrier which effectually set limits on Welsh forays for the future. Their military organization made them equally capable of becoming centres of offensive warfare. In the true spirit of their race a swarm of Norman knights and adventurers poured over the borders into Wales. The earldom of Chester soon extended its bounds to the Conway, and its vassal, Robert of Rhuddlan, governed the vale of Clwyd. The modern county of Montgomery roughly marks the district now added to the Shrewsbury earldom. Earl Robert of Belesme was the terror of all Welshmen. His brother Arnulf conquered Ceredigion and Dyfed. Bernard of Neufmarché founded the lordship of Brecon in the old district of Brecheiniog. Robert Fitz-Hamon conquered the vale of Glamorgan. Gower, Kidwely, Ystradowy, were similarly appropriated. Unable to withstand the Normans in the field, the Welsh withdrew to their mountain fastnesses, and, in sudden forays, revenged themselves on their oppressors. Revolt after revolt of the conquered peasantry confined the Norman lords to their castle walls. To guard against the repetition of such events, English or Low German colonists were planted in southern Dyfed, in Gower, and perhaps in parts of Glamorgan, and the old inhabitants ruthlessly driven out. Commerce came in the invaders' train, and towns sprang up in a community hitherto unacquainted with urban life. Norman priests and bishops followed the soldiers and merchants. The Welsh sees were finally subjected to Canterbury. The southern bishoprics were permanently bestowed on Normans. By the time of Henry I the Normans had conquered all southern and western Wales worth having. After the fall of Rhys ap Tewdwr (1090) the native princes laid aside even the title of king. In Gwynedd alone, whose monarch now began to be called Princes or Kings of Wales, was a really strong Celtic power left. There the disastrous fate of Norman interlopers into the see of Bangor showed that the native spirit was still unsubdued. The territories thus conquered became known as the Lordships Marcher. Conquered by independent adventurers, they possessed all the rights of a Palatine earldom. [COUNTIES PALATINE.] Their lords were practically kings on their own estates, and were bound to the English monarch by no other tie than simple allegiance. For all practical purposes they were as free as the lords of Aberffraw. After a generation or two, many began to amalgamate with the conquered race, or at least to intermarry with them and get mixed up in their quarrels. The succession of great English barons to some of these lordships—for example, the union of Gloucester and Glamorgan—had an important reflex influence on English politics. Yet the Welsh race was still far from being subdued. The return of Gruffyd ap Cynan from his Irish exile (1100) marks a new development of culture and literature among the Cymry. The Welsh bards renewed their songs. The Welsh chroniclers became more copious. The old laws were re-edited. Even politically they were only reduced to a certain extent. The Marcher lords were as much divided as the Welsh chieftains. English help was far off, and often ineffectual. Physical difficulties always imposed obstacles on feudal armies among the mountains of Gwynedd. Henry II's three expeditions into Wales (1156, 1163, and 1165) were disastrous failures, and were followed by none of those indirect successes which had attended similar invasions of Rufus. Owen Gwynedd (d. 1169) was a prince of vigour, activity, and power. The expensive energy of the Normans was diverted into other channels with the departure of Strongbow to Ireland. The Celtic sympathies of Geoffrey of Monmouth, the strangely chequered career of Giraldus Cambrensis, show the approximation of the two races. Archbishop Baldwin's crusading tour throughout all Wales in 1188 marks the comparative peace that now reigned. The alliance of Llewelyn ap Iorwerth, who became Prince of Gwynedd in 1194, with the baronial opposition to John, shows that, despite differences of race, all feudal dependents of the Angevin monarchs had a common interest in setting limits to the arbitrary power of their imperious overlord. Llewelyn's occupation of Shrewsbury helped the success of the movement that won Magna Carta, and the regard shown to his rights in that famous instrument suggests that the barons were not ungrateful for his aid. Llewelyn's marriage with John's bastard daughter kept him in peace with Henry III for some time. But in 1228 Henry sent an expedition against him which signally failed, and exacted nothing but barren homage from the powerful chieftain. Up to his death in 1240 Llewelyn waged constant and not unsuccessful war on the Lords Marchers, and succeeded in extending his power in some of those southern districts where their power was slight. Between 1240 and 1246 David, son of Llewelyn by his English wife, governed the principality; but in 1246 Llewelyn, son of Gruffyd, son of Llewelyn by a Welsh mother, succeeded him, at first jointly with his brothers, but afterwards alone. The national revival, which had been marked under Llewelyn ap Iorwerth, reached its culminating point in Llewelyn ap Gruffyd. The energy of the Welsh became greater, their literary activity bore greater results.

In 1255-7 the young prince Edward failed in his attempts to curb Llewelyn's power. In alliance with Simon de Montfort, Llewelyn took an active part against the king during the Barons' Wars. His projected marriage with Eleanor, Earl Simon's daughter, involved his alliance with the French crown and the remnants of the disaffected party in England. In 1275 Edward I seized the bride on her way to Wales. A fierce attack of the injured prince upon the Marchers was followed in 1277 by an expedition of Edward that exacted his submission, and in 1278 he was allowed to marry Eleanor. But in 1282 his treacherous brother David incited him to a fresh revolt. Edward resolved to settle the Welsh question once for all. He made a great effort, systematically conquered the country, and, on Llewelyn's death in battle, declared his dominions forfeited to the Crown. Thus Edward I subdued the only native Welsh state of any importance. The Statute of Wales (12 Ed. I) finally annexed the Principality (i.e., the dominions of Llewelyn) to the Crown, introduced the English law, with a special judicial system under the Justice of Snowdon, and established six sherifdoms of Anglesey, Carnarvon, Merioneth, Flint, Carmarthen, and Cardiganshire, with organization analogous to those of the English shires. But the Principality, though united to the Crown, was not absorbed in it. It was not a part of England, but a conquered country. It became the custom to invest with the dignity of Prince of Wales the eldest son of the sovereign. Edward's campaigns and legislation affected the Principality only. The hundred and forty Lordships Marcher went on as before, except that an act of 1354 (28 Ed. III, c. 2) declared them dependent not on the Principality, but on the English crown. Their wild freedom, with its private wars and constant outrages, still continued.

Several revolts showed the unwillingness of Gwynedd to acquiesce in the English conquest. The strong line of Edwardian castles alone kept the country subdued. David's luckless rising in 1283, the revolts of Rhys ap Maredudd in 1287 and 1292, that of Madoc, Mailgwn, and Morgan in 1294, show the difficulty involved in establishing the Edwardian system. After it had slept for nearly a century Welsh national feeling was again aroused by the revolt of Owen Glendower (1400—q.v.), whose private feud with his neighbour, Lord Grey of Ruthin, became the germ of a determined effort to throw off the English yoke. In conjunction with the Percys, the Mortimers, and the Scots, afterwards with French support, Owen managed to defeat expedition after expedition sent against him by Henry IV. From one end of the country to the other he made his power felt, and managed to maintain his independence till his death (about 1415). But the English reconquest was ultimately effected, and a series of harsh penal statutes was passed to check further revolts. The establishment at Ludlow of the Court of the President and Council of Wales (1478) was Edward IV's contribution to the establishment of a stronger system of government. The disorders of the period of revolt gradually disappeared. The conquerors and the conquered began to approximate towards each other. The queen dowager of England, and the last representative of the line of John of Gaunt, both married into the same Welsh family. Henry Tudor became King of England. His son passed a series of statutes which incorporated the Principality with England, restrained the powers of the Lords Marchers, made all Wales shire-ground, and introduced, with English laws, English local self-government and parliamentary representation (27 Hen. VIII, c. 26, and 34 & 35 Hen. VIII, c. 26). The only difference between Wales and England now, besides the still existing, though diminished, powers of the Marchers and the Court of the Council of Wales at Ludlow, was the fact that instead of being united to any English circuit, a special court of justice, called the "King's Great Sessions in Wales," was to be held twice a year under special justices; an arrangement which continued until 1830, when Wales and Cheshire were formed into new English circuits.

These great measures of justice formed a new epoch in Welsh history. The peaceful, if slow, acceptance of the Reformation, the literary and educational revival that began under Elizabeth, illustrate the beneficial results of the change. During the Civil War Wales was, as a whole, strongly Royalist. Some North Welsh castles were the last places to hold out for Charles I. Soon after the Revolution of 1688 the Court of Ludlow, and the remnants of the Marcher jurisdiction, were abolished.

During the eighteenth century the Methodist movement profoundly influenced the character of Wales. While introducing a new religious fervour, a higher tone of morality, and a greater amount of energy, its Puritanism made much havoc with the more harmless features of old Welsh life. The movement began with Griffith Jones, vicar of Llanddowror, whose system of "circulating schools," established in 1730, was the only important step made in that age towards popular education. In 1736 Howell Harris began to preach. His connexion with Whitefield determined the theology of Welsh Methodism. The suspension of the famous preacher, Daniel Rowland of Llangeitho, first turned the Welsh Methodists in the direction of Nonconformity. In 1811 the formal separation from the Church took place. By that time the great bulk of the people had become Dissenters. [As a logical consequence the disestablishment and disendowment of the episcopalian Church of Wales was at length effected by the Welsh Church Act of 1914.] Hardly until the nineteenth century did the industrial revolution affect Wales. The development of the coal and iron trades in the south has since enormously increased its population and resources; [and has led to a steady process of urbanization with resultant depopulation of the rural districts]. Wales, Church of. [CHURCH OF WALES.]

Wales, PRINCE OF, is the title usually borne by the heir apparent of the English sovereign. After the death of Llewelyn, the last native Prince of Wales, Edward I in 1301 created his son Prince of Wales. It is noticeable that, whereas the heir apparent is born Duke of Cornwall, it is only by creation that he becomes Prince of Wales. The English princes who have borne the title are:—

Edward, son of Edward I (afterwards Edward II).
Edward, son of Edward III (the Black Prince).
Richard, son of the Black Prince (afterwards Richard II).

Henry, son of Henry IV (afterwards Henry V).

Edward, son of Henry VI.

Edward, son of Edward IV (afterwards Edward V).

Edward, son of Richard III.

Arthur, son of Henry VII.

Henry, son of Henry VII (afterwards Henry VIII).

Edward, son of Henry VIII (afterwards Edward VI).

Henry, son of James I.

Charles, son of James I (afterwards Charles I).

Charles, son of Charles I (afterwards Charles II).

James, son of James II (the Old Pretender).

George, son of George I (afterwards George II).

Frederick, son of George II.

George, son of Frederick (afterwards George III).

George, son of George III (afterwards George IV).

Albert Edward, son of Queen Victoria (afterwards Edward VII).

George Frederick Ernest Albert, son of Edward VII (now George V).

Wales, THE STATUTE OF (1284), was passed by Edward I immediately after the conquest of Wales. Many English laws and regulations were introduced, such as the English law of succession; while Welsh local customs, as far as they were comparatively unimportant, were retained. [WALES.]

Walker, GEORGE (1618-90), was rector of the parish of Monaghan. He took refuge in Londonderry before the siege of that town, and was active in rousing the inhabitants to resist James II's troops. On April 17, 1689, he was elected one of the governors of the city, an office he continued to hold till August, when he yielded up his authority to Colonel Kirke. There is still a Walker Club in the town, and his statue surmounts the pillar erected on one of the bastions in memory of the siege. When he arrived in London, soon after the delivery of Londonderry from the Irish, the House of Commons passed a vote of thanks to him, and the king gave him £5,000. In June 1690 the bishopric of Derry fell vacant, and William III at once bestowed it on him. He had, however, contracted a passion for war, and much shocked the king by appearing at the head of the men of Londonderry in the campaign of 1690. He fell while leading the resistance to the Irish cavalry at the battle of the Boyne (July 1, 1690).

Walkinshaw, CLEMENTINA (1726?-1802), was a mistress of Charles Edward Stuart, the Young Pretender. He first became acquainted with her on his expedition to Scotland in 1745. He sent for her after his return from that country, and soon she acquired complete dominion over him. It was believed that she was in the pay of the English ministers; accordingly, in 1748, the English Jacobites sent an agent named Macnamara to request that the lady should, for a time at least, retire to a convent. Charles, however, obstinately refused to agree to this. He had a daughter by her in 1753, who died in 1789.

Wallace, WILLIAM, the Scottish national hero, is believed to have been a younger son of Sir Malcolm Wallace of Ellerslie, in Renfrewshire. He began his career as a fugitive from justice, having been outlawed for an offence the nature of which is uncertain. He mustered a guerrilla band, and in May 1297 made an attack on the English quarters at Lanark, where he killed Hazelrigg, the governor. In the same month he pillaged the English court at Scone and almost captured the justiciar himself. His crowning achievement, however, was yet to come. On September 11, 1297, Wallace thoroughly defeated the English at Stirling, following up his victory by a raid into England. The next year he was chosen guardian of the kingdom in the name of King John (Baliol), and as a consequence increased the jealousy of many of the Scottish barons. Meantime Edward had returned from Flanders and hurried to Scotland, where he defeated Wallace at Falkirk (q.v.—July 22, 1298). At this time Wallace disappeared from public life, and is said to have visited France and Rome to enlist the sympathy of King Philip and the pope. It is perhaps more probable that he remained in the wilds of his native country with a few followers. In 1305 he was betrayed into the hands of the English at Glasgow by Sir John Menteith, carried to London, and tried at Westminster. He was condemned as a rebel and traitor to the English king, and executed (August 23, 1305). In spite of the want of authority which characterizes most of the stories told about Sir William Wallace, there seems no doubt that he was a man of great capacity, and a military genius of a high order.

Waller, EDMUND (1606-87), poet, was a relation of John Hampden. He was educated at Cambridge, and in 1623 took his seat in parliament as member for Amersham. The story of his unsuccessful courtship of Lady Dorothy Spencer, the daughter of the Earl of Leicester, appears to be well authenticated. A zealous member of the Long Parliament, Waller was appointed in 1643 one of the commissioners who negotiated with Charles I at Oxford. There he was won over by the court, and played a decidedly equivocal part, agreeing on his return to London to publish a commission of array, and so having collected troops to seize the city by a coup de main. The plot, however, miscarried, and he was heavily fined and condemned to banishment, after an abject submission to the House of Commons. In 1651 he was allowed to return to England, and attempted to curry favour with the Protector by his "Panegyric on Cromwell," which he followed up by an ode to Charles II after the Restoration. "Poets, sire," he wittily remarked to the king, "succeed better in fiction than in truth." In spite of his time-serving disposition, Waller was popular in the House of Commons, of which he was a member until 1683. His poems—dainty, but uninspired productions—have been frequently published. A fairly complete edition appeared in 1694.

Johnson, "Lives of the Poets."

Waller, SIR WILLIAM (1597-1668), was a cousin of Edmund Waller (preceding). His military education was acquired in Germany during the Thirty Years' War. In 1640 he was returned to the Long Parliament as member for Andover. On the outbreak of the Civil War he was sent into the west of England, and at first gained such success as to acquire for himself the title of "William the Conqueror," but in July 1643 he was severely beaten both at Bath and Devizes. Parliament nevertheless thanked him for his exertions. In the following year he fell out with Essex, the commander-in-chief, and in consequence Charles I managed to make a sortie from Oxford and defeat him at Cropredy Bridge (June 29). Waller again returned unsuccessful to London. In 1645 he was removed from his command by the Self-denying Ordinance (q.v.), but soon resumed his appointment, and under Cromwell was successful in the west in the first campaign of the New Model army (q.v.). In 1647 he was one of the leaders of the Presbyterian party who attempted in vain to oppose the advance of the army on the capital, and was one of the eleven members against whom its resentment was especially directed. In 1660, during the troubled time which preceded the Restoration, he was a member of the council of state.

"Vindication of Sir William Waller," by Himself.

Wallingford, THE TREATY OF (1153), is the name usually given to the peace made between Stephen and Henry of Anjou, though only the preliminary negotiations took place at Wallingford, the treaty itself being concluded at Westminster. By this treaty Stephen was to retain the kingdom during his lifetime, but Henry was to succeed him, the rights of Stephen's children to the private dominions of their parent being guaranteed. According to later authorities a scheme of administrative reform was at the same time decided upon, which was intended to restore things as far as possible to the state in which they had been left by Henry I, but of this no mention appears in contemporary chronicles.

Walden, AMALIE SOPHIA MARIANNE, COUNTESS OF YARMOUTH (1704-65), was a mistress of George II. He had known her in Hanover, and shortly after the death of Queen Caroline she was brought to England and created Countess of Yarmouth—the last instance in our annals of a British peerage being bestowed on a royal mistress. Her character was quiet and inoffensive, and though she did not at first possess, she gradually gained considerable influence over the king. She was summoned when George was found dead, and by a codicil to the king's will was bequeathed £10,000. [GEORGE II.]

Walpole, HORACE, 1ST BARON WALPOLE (1678-1757), the elder brother of Sir Robert Walpole, became prominent as secretary to General Stanhope in Spain (1706). In 1707 he was appointed secretary to Henry Boyle, chancellor of the exchequer. In 1709 he was sent as secretary to an embassy to The Hague, and was afterwards in the same position at the negotiations at Gertruydenberg (q.v.). In 1716 he was sent as envoy to The Hague. He subsequently appeared at Hanover, and remonstrated with Stanhope for the suspicions he entertained of Townshend, and was sent home with letters calculated to heal the breach in the ministry. In 1720 he was appointed secretary to the Duke of Grafton, lord-lieutenant of Ireland. In 1723 he was dispatched to Paris to counteract Sir Luke Schaub (q.v.). He ardently attached himself to Cardinal Fleury, and remained in France until 1727. In 1728 he was one of the plenipotentiaries to the congress at Soissons. In 1733 he was sent as envoy to the States-General. In 1739 he was sent to Holland to receive the auxiliary troops stipulated in case of hostilities. In 1741 he was made secretary to the exchequer, and in 1756 was raised to the peerage. According to his nephew, "he knew something of everything but how to hold his tongue, or how to apply his knowledge."

Walpole, HORACE, 4TH EARL OF ORFORD (1717-97), was the fourth son of Sir Robert Walpole, and the nephew of Lord Walpole. In 1741 he entered parliament for Callington, but he never took a prominent part in debate. In 1757 he exerted himself in favour of Admiral Byng. He remained in parliament till 1767. In 1791 he succeeded his nephew in the family title and estates; but never took his seat in the House of Lords. So far as he had any political feeling at all, he was inclined to a speculative republicanism. As a man of letters, virtuoso, novelist, critic, and retailer of public and private gossip, Horace Walpole is one of the most characteristic figures of the eighteenth century. His "Memoirs" of the last ten years of George II's reign, though inaccurate and prejudiced, contain a good deal of information, and his letters (which are among the most entertaining in the language) are very valuable for the insight they give into the social history of the century.

Walpole, SIR ROBERT, 1ST EARL OF ORFORD (1676-1745), was the son of a Norfolk gentleman, and was educated at Eton and King's College, Cambridge. In 1701 he entered parliament as member for Castle Rising, and in 1702 for King's Lynn. He soon attracted the attention of the Whig leaders. In 1705 he was placed on the council of Prince George of Denmark as lord high admiral, and in 1708 succeeded St. John as secretary at war. In 1710 he was one of the managers of Sacheverell's trial, of which he secretly disapproved; and when the Whig ministry was driven from office he persisted in resigning in spite of Harley's solicitations to him that he should retain his place. He now became with Somers a leader of the Whig opposition, and being charged with speculations as secretary at war he was expelled the House and sent to the Tower, where he remained till the prorogation. His defence was, however, quite complete, and he was re-elected for King's Lynn. He wrote at this time two able pamphlets in support of the late ministry, "The Debts of the Nation Stated and Considered," and "The Thirty-five Millions Accounted For." On the accession of George I Walpole was chosen chairman of the committee of inquiry into the conduct of the last ministry. In 1715 he became first lord of the treasury and chancellor of the exchequer. But, disliked by the king, and angry at the dismissal of Townshend, he resigned in 1717. In this year he had established the first sinking fund. Immediately he passed into unscrupulous opposition, and spoke against the Mutiny Act, the Quadruple Alliance, the Peerage Bill, and the repeal of the Schism Act. Finding opposition hopeless, he offered to rejoin the ministry, but was only made paymaster of the forces, 1720. On the fall of the South Sea Company it was felt that he alone could deal with the matter, and his measures, though severe, were felt to be just. On the death of Stanhope he was left without a rival, and became chancellor of the exchequer and prime minister (April 1721). His history is now the history of England. He crushed Atterbury's plot (q.v.), and taxed the Non-jurors' estates to the amount of £100,000. Already his jealousy of rivals, the great fault in his character as a minister, had become apparent; and he and Townshend drove Carteret from office. Meanwhile the situation abroad had become complicated; the alliance between Austria, Spain, and the Duke of Bourbon's party in France was checked by the Treaty of Hanover between Great Britain and France. On the death of George I Walpole, disliked by the new king, found himself in danger of being superseded by Sir Spencer Compton. Owing to the representations of Queen Caroline he remained in power. The opposition consisted of discontented Whigs led by Pulteney, and the remnant of the Tories under Bolingbroke. In 1730 Walpole quarrelled with Townshend, who retired from political life, and in 1733 with Chesterfield. His supporters consisted of such second-rate men as Newcastle, Stanhope, Compton, and Harrington. He had, however, at his back a majority secured by bribery. In 1729 the Treaty of Seville (q.v.) preserved the peace of Europe for a time. In 1733 Walpole brought forward his celebrated excise scheme, a measure thoroughly sound and justifiable; but such was the success of Pulteney in rousing public feeling against it that he had to abandon it. In 1734 he was much blamed for keeping aloof from the war waged by the emperor against France and Spain. In this year the opposition joined to attack the Septennial Act. They failed; and Bolingbroke withdrawing to France, the leadership of the party fell on the Prince of Wales, whom Walpole had offended by resisting the increase of his income. In 1737 Queen Caroline's death deprived him of a staunch and faithful friend. The opposition, now reinforced by Pitt, continued to attack his pacific policy; Newcastle began to intrigue against him, and favoured the king's desire for war. Nevertheless Walpole concluded a convention with Spain; and the opposition, wishing to drive matters to a crisis, seceded from the House. It had become obvious that he must declare war or resign. He chose the former course (1739). The war was disastrous. [GEORGE II.] In February 1741 Sandys proposed that he should be removed from the king's councils. The motion was thrown out; but in the following year Walpole, taking his defeat on the Chippenham election petition (February 2, 1742) as a test, resigned. He was created Earl of Orford. In March a secret committee of inquiry against him was chosen; but in spite of its animosity it failed to bring any but the most trivial charges against the ex-minister. He seldom spoke in the Lords, having, as he remarked to his brother Horace, "left his tongue in the Commons." In 1745 he died, having retained his influence with the king to the last. Walpole's character was exposed to the most violent misrepresentation from his contemporaries. His jealousy of power made many eminent men of the age his enemies; while the corruption by which he maintained his position is indisputable. But to him are due the completion of the Revolution Settlement, and the preservation of peace at a time when peace was most required by his country. "The prudence, steadiness, and vigilance of that man," says Burke ("Appeal from the New Whigs," etc.), "preserved the crown to this royal family, and with it their laws and liberty to this country."

Walsingham, Sir Francis (1530?-1590), "the most penetrating statesman of his time," was born at Chislehurst, in Kent, and passed most of his youth abroad. On his return to England after the accession of Queen Elizabeth his abilities and accomplishments recommended him to the notice of Lord Burghley, who sent him to the court of France as ambassador (1570), in which capacity he showed great "fidelity, diligence, and caution." In 1573 Sir Francis was recalled, sworn of the privy council, and made one of the principal secretaries of state, devoting himself especially from this date to the unravelling of the numerous plots against the queen and her government. His system of espionage was most elaborate, and his spies were active, faithful, and ubiquitous. He was knighted in 1577. In 1581 he was employed to negotiate the proposed marriage between Elizabeth and the Duke of Anjou, but failed to bring the matter to a successful issue, through the caprice of the queen herself. Two years later Walsingham was sent on a mission to Scotland, and subsequently had the satisfaction of detecting Babington's conspiracy (q.v.) and of implicating in it the Queen of Scots. That Sir Francis was her enemy there is no doubt, but it is unlikely that he forged any of the letters produced in evidence, as Mary declared, and his reputed letter to Sir Amyas Paulet, urging him "to find out some way to shorten the life of the Scots queen," is most probably a forgery. He was subsequently the means of preventing a breach between Elizabeth and James VI. Sir Francis, who was a staunch Protestant, and a thoroughly religious man, did his best to procure toleration for the Puritans; he "has the honour of having sustained and cemented the Protestant cause in times of its greatest peril, and of having effectually ruined the interests of popery by detecting and baffling all its plots." The integrity of his character was such that with every facility for amassing wealth in an age of corruption, he died so poor as to leave barely enough to defray the expenses of his burial. A biographer of the following century (Lloyd) says of him, "His head was so strong that he could look into the depths of men and business, and dive into the whirlpools of state. Dexterous he was in finding a secret; close in keeping it. His conversation was insinuating and reserved; he saw every man, and none saw him."

Walter, Hubert, Archbishop of Canterbury (1193-1205), and justiciar (1194-98), was a nephew of Ranulf de Glanville (q.v.), and first came into prominence during King Richard's captivity. He had accompanied the king on his crusade, and on his way homewards, hearing that Richard had been taken prisoner, he visited him. The king sent him over to England to act as vicegerent in his absence, to counteract the intrigues of John, and raise the ransom, while at the same time he used his influence to obtain Hubert's election to the archbishopric. In 1194 he was appointed justiciar, and held that office for four years, governing well and vigorously, his most important work being the repression of the insurrection of William Fitz-Osbert. To his administration belongs the initiation of several significant constitutional changes. The germs of the office of coroner and of that of justice of the peace are to be seen in his measures of 1194 and 1195, while important new departures in the sphere of taxation were necessitated to meet the heavy expenses incurred as a result of Richard's wars and captivity. On the death of Richard, Hubert supported the claims of John to the throne, and was by him appointed chancellor. His death removed a powerful check upon the violence and tyranny of the king and was followed by the outbreak of the great quarrel with the Papacy over the question of the appointment of his successor to the see of Canterbury. Hubert Walter is a favourable specimen of the statesman-ecclesiastic of the Middle Ages, and it is in the former light that he more frequently appears. He was a strong minister, and although as a good Englishman he made the pressure of his master's hand lie as light as he could upon the people, as a good servant he tried to get out of the people as much treasure as he could for his master. In the raising of the money and in the administration of justice he tried and did much to train the people to habits of self-government. He taught them how to assess their taxes by jury, to elect the grand jury for the assizes of the judges, to choose representative knights to transact legal and judicial work—such representative knights as at a later time made convenient precedents for parliamentary representation. The whole working of elective and representative institutions gained greatly under his management. He educated the people against the better time to come.

Walter, Sir John (1566-1630), was attorney-general to Prince Charles in 1619, but refused to conduct the prosecution against Sir Edward Coke. Notwithstanding this, he was made chief baron of the Exchequer by Charles I in 1625. He showed considerable independence and spirit in the exercise of his judicial functions, and in 1629 gave his opinion against Holles and other members of parliament being prosecuted for acts done in the House of Commons. For this the king prohibited his taking his seat on the bench, though he nominally held his office till his death.

Walter, Lucy (1630?-1658), was the daughter of a Welsh gentleman, and in 1648 became the mistress of Charles II, by whom she was the mother of James, Duke of Monmouth. She lived with Charles in Holland. In 1656 she came over to England, where she was imprisoned in the Tower, but shortly afterwards released. After this little or nothing is known of her. When Monmouth put forward his claims to the throne it was contended by his adherents that his mother had been secretly married to Charles II, but of this assertion no proof was forthcoming, and Monmouth himself subsequently retracted it.

M. C. La Rothe, "Memoirs of the Court of England in 1675," 1913; A. I. Dasent, "Private Life of Charles II," 1927.

Waltheof (d. 1076) was a powerful nobleman, the son of Siward of Northumbria. After the battle of Hastings he submitted to William the Conqueror, and was allowed to retain his earldom of Northampton and Huntingdon. Subsequently, in 1069, he rebelled, but was forgiven, retained in his earldom, and married to the conqueror's niece, Judith. In 1072 he was given the earldom of Northumbria in succession to Gospatrick. In 1075 he was implicated in the conspiracy of the Earls of Hereford and Norfolk, which had for its object the partition of England into three earldoms under a purely nominal kingship. What Waltheof's share in this plot was is uncertain, probably it was no more than a tacit acquiescence. When the rebellion broke out he betrayed the plot to Lanfranc, and was for the moment pardoned, but in May 1076 he was executed at Winchester, it is said at the instigation of his wife. His body was removed to Croyland, where miracles were said to be worked at his tomb. The English looked upon Waltheof as a martyr, and the later troubles of William's reign were considered by them to be judgments on him for the murder of the earl.

Walton, VALENTINE (d. 1661?), married Margaret, sister of Oliver Cromwell, and joined the Parliamentary cause in the Civil War. In 1646 he was made a colonel, and in 1648 was appointed one of the members of the High Court of Justice to try the king. He was present at most of the sittings, and signed the death warrant. In 1649 he was made one of the council of state, but his stern republican views did not recommend him to Cromwell, and after the dissolution of the Long Parliament he retired into private life till Richard Cromwell's deposition, when he declared for the parliament against the army, and joined Monck. Perceiving that the Restoration was inevitable, he withdrew to the continent, where he remained in disguise till his death.

Walworth, Sir William (d. 1385), a citizen of London, was appointed with John Philipot in 1377 by parliament to supervise the collection and expenditure of the two tenths and fifteenths granted on October 13. In 1374 and again in 1381 he was lord mayor of London, and in the latter year attended the young king at his conference with Wat Tyler and the other insurgents. Fearing that Tyler was about to attack Richard, Walworth slew the rebel leader, for which feat he received the honour of knighthood.

Wandewash, THE BATTLE OF (January 22, 1760), was fought during the Seven Years' War between the French and British in India. The two armies of Lally and Coote encountered each other near Wandewash. The British had 1,900 Europeans and 2,100 native infantry, with 1,250 native cavalry, and 16 field pieces; the French 2,250 native cavalry and 1,300 sepoy, besides their Mahratta horse, with 20 field pieces. The forces were therefore fairly equal. After the combat, the French, who had suffered very severely, retreated. If the British native horse had done their duty, the defeat might have been even more decisive.

Wapentake is a name of Danish origin, and occurs only in the districts occupied by the Danes (e.g., Lincolnshire, Derbyshire, Nottinghamshire, Leicestershire, Rutland, Yorkshire, Lancashire), where it corresponds to the hundred (q.v.) of other parts of the kingdom.

Warbeck, PERKIN (d. 1499), was one of the most celebrated impostors in history, who, for several years during the reign of Henry VII, succeeded in persuading many persons that he was Richard, Duke of York, the younger of the two princes generally supposed to have been murdered in the Tower under Richard III. According to the story of the writers under the Tudors, he was in reality the son of John Osbek, a Jew of Tournai, who settled in London in the reign of Edward IV and afterwards returned to Tournai. The lad, after his father's death, went to Antwerp, and came into communication with the agents of the Duchess Margaret of Burgundy, who, struck by his noble demeanour and resemblance to the Yorkist family, conceived the design of bringing him up as a pretender to the English throne. This story is borne out by Warbeck's own "Confession," and by a letter of Henry VII to Sir Gilbert Talbot as early as 1493. The mystery can hardly be completely solved. The history of Warbeck's proceedings is briefly this. In 1492 he made his appearance in Cork as Richard Plantagenet, Duke of York, and obtained a reception so encouraging to his hopes of success that Charles VIII of France thought it well to invite him to take up his residence in Paris. He did not, however, have any long enjoyment of the French king's protection and hospitality, for Henry made it a special article of the treaty concluded at Etaples in the autumn of 1492 that no further shelter or assistance should be given to Warbeck. Flanders was the pretender's next refuge, and here he received a most cordial welcome from Margaret, Duchess of Burgundy, who acknowledged him at once as her nephew, honouring him on all occasions with the title of the "White Rose of England." Warbeck's arrival in Flanders was the signal for the beginning of a vast system of conspiracy in England against Henry's life and authority; but the king's resolute caution and the zealous activity of his spies, conspicuous among whom was Sir Robert Clifford, proved more than a match for the efforts of his enemies. Sir William Stanley, Lord Fitzwalter, Sir Simon Montfort, all prominent adherents of Warbeck, were brought to the block; and the pretended Duke of York, forced by these occurrences into a display of decided action, made in July 1495 a hurried descent upon the coast of Kent, at Deal. This, however, was a miserable failure, ending in the capture of 159 of his troops by the people of Sandwich. This experience of the feeling of the country for his cause drove Warbeck in despair to Flanders; but the commercial treaty concluded in February 1496, between Henry VII and Philip, Duke of Burgundy, expressly stipulating for his expulsion, the impostor, after an unsuccessful attempt to make a settlement in Ireland, crossed over thence to Scotland. Here his fortunes began for a time to look brighter; the Scottish monarch received him as Richard IV, the lawful King of England, and, as a very practical proof of the sincerity of his belief in his pretensions, bestowed upon him in marriage a kinswoman of his own, the Lady Catherine Gordon. Two fruitless invasions of England, and probably, too, the influence of Ferdinand of Spain, tended greatly to cool James IV's affection for Warbeck's cause, and in July 1497 he requested him to leave the country. Thus once again abandoned by his friends, Warbeck found a temporary refuge in the wilds and fastnesses of Ireland, which, however, he left on receiving an invitation from the people of Devon and Cornwall to make another attempt in England. He landed accordingly at Whitesand Bay, near Penzance, September 27, 1497, and, after capturing St. Michael's Mount, laid active siege to Exeter. On the approach, however, of the royal forces under Lord Daubeney, Warbeck retired to Taunton, whence, in despair of success, he withdrew secretly to the sanctuary of Beaulieu, in the New Forest. Here, on promise of his life being spared, he surrendered himself, October 5, to Lord Daubeney, by whom he was dispatched a prisoner to London. For a time Warbeck was treated with marked leniency, but on his attempting to escape in June 1498 he was at once placed in close confinement in the Tower; and in November 1499 he was executed in company with his fellow-prisoner, the young Earl of Warwick, on a charge of again attempting to escape, and of having conspired with Warwick and others, as a part of his plan, to get forcible possession of the Tower.

Ward, JOHN WILLIAM, 1ST EARL DUDLEY AND WARD (1781-1833), was elected member for Downton in 1802, and soon distinguished himself as a speaker in the House of Commons. In 1823 he succeeded his father in the peerage, and on the formation of Canning's ministry became head of the foreign office (1827), in which capacity he signed the Treaty of London (July 6), and the same year was raised to the dignity of an earl. In 1828 he joined Wellington's cabinet as foreign secretary, but retired in May of that year along with Huskisson and the other Canningites, Palmerston, Granville, and Grant. He was a man of eccentric manners, with a habit of thinking aloud. It was of him that Rogers wrote his celebrated couplet—

"They say Ward has no heart, but I deny it;
He has a heart, he gets his speeches by it."

Dudley, "Letters to 'Ivy,'" ed. S. H. Romilly, 1905.

Wardrobes, THE. In the beginning the king's wardrobe was part of the king's chamber, being the small room adjacent, in which garments and valuables were kept. When the administrative work of the chamber increased, the wardrobe, becoming a repository for money and records, grew into a third treasury, and in the thirteenth century superseded the chamber as the financial and administrative department of the household. The chief officials of the wardrobe were a lay steward and a clerical keeper. Most of its revenue came from the exchequer, to which the keeper rendered an account, checked by a counter-roll, compiled by its second clerical officer, the controller. The controller was also keeper of the privy seal until 1312. As Chancery (q.v.) became more occupied with public business, the wardrobe, already the domestic exchequer, developed into the domestic chancery. Moreover, when the king went to war in person the wardrobe administered the finances of the undertaking, notably of the Scottish and Welsh wars of Edward I, and of many of the campaigns of the Hundred Years' War. Immediate dependence upon the king, freedom from rigid tradition, and machinery easily adaptable to the needs of the household in arms combined to fit the wardrobe for such a task. As both wardrobe and chamber followed the court, it was convenient to have depositories or wardrobes in many of the places where the household stayed, in which cumbersome and other storable goods could be safely left until needed. To look after such stores there arose a subordinate wardrobe, first described as the GREAT WARDROBE in 1253—"great" indicating the size of the articles handled, not the dignity of the office. Most of the officials, of whom the head was the clerk of the great wardrobe, accompanied the household. But gradually the great wardrobe set up a central depot, first in the Tower of London, and later in various houses in the city of London. The former house of the Bardi in Lombard Street was used intermittently from 1331 to 1361, when permanent quarters were obtained in the parish of St. Andrew's by Baynard's Castle. There the great wardrobe stayed until the Great Fire. After that it was removed to Buckingham Street in the Savoy, and later was given accommodation in Great Queen Street. It accounted to the king's wardrobe up to 1324, and afterwards to the exchequer (q.v.), except between 1351 and 1360. The great wardrobe was also a clothing and arms and armour factory, and the collecting and distributing agent of the goods it stored and made. In war-time it was the ministry of munitions until another subordinate wardrobe, the PRIVY WARDROBE, grew up to look after arms and armour. In essence this was a movable store of chamber, wardrobe, and great wardrobe commodities. Between 1323 and 1344, directed by its keeper, a clerk, it established head-quarters in the Tower of London. The office in the Tower became independent of the court before 1360, and by 1399 was equally independent of chamber and great wardrobe, a small privy wardrobe being retained within the household. The premises of the privy wardrobe in the Tower were sacked by the rebels of 1381. The final result of all the fourteenth-century differentiation was that the king's wardrobe became, except in time of war, little more than an office of accounts for the household, described as the "wardrobe of the household," or more simply as "the household." When the privy wardrobe in the course of the fifteenth century grew into the king's armouries in the Tower of London, the great wardrobe was generally called "the wardrobe." It was abolished in 1782 and little even of the wardrobe of the household survived Burke's economical reform. [CHAMBER; HOUSEHOLD, THE ROYAL; SEAL, THE PRIVY.]

Wards, THE COURT OF, was a court of record founded by 32 Hen. VIII, c. 46, for the survey and management of the rights of the Crown over its wards. Being joined to the Court of Liveries by 33 Hen. VIII, ch. 22, it was called the Court of Wards and Liveries. The seal of the court was kept by its chief officer, the master of the wards. Its province was to see that the king had the full profits of tenure, arising from the custody of the heirs of his tenants being infants or idiots, from the licences and fines for the marriage of the king's widows, and from the sums paid for livery of seisin by the heir on entering on his estate. A Court of Wards established in Ireland by James I compelled all heirs in the king's custody to be educated as Protestants, and enforced the oath of supremacy as a condition of livery of seisin. The jurisdiction of the Court of Wards was unduly extended, and became very oppressive under the first two Stuart kings. On February 24, 1645, the House of Commons "passed a vote that the Court of Wards itself, and all wardships, tenures, licences for alienation, etc., should be taken away"; and the lords concurred therein. The court was finally abolished by the statute 12 Car. ii, ch. 24, which destroyed military tenures.

Wardship ranked as one of the incidents of tenure by knight service (q.v.) and by grand serjeanty (q.v.), and consisted in the right of the lord, if the heir were under age on the death of the ancestor, to the custody of his land and person. The king possessed a right of prerogative wardship which entitled him to the custody of all the lands of a tenant-in-chief of whomsoever they were held, and of the person of the heir, to the exclusion of all other claimants. The right, which was obviously capable of great abuse, was carefully limited by Magna Carta. But increasing stress was laid on it by the Crown in proportion as the original meaning of feudal tenure was lost sight of, and in the sixteenth century the Court of Wards and Liveries was set up for the express purpose of regulating and administering the royal profits under this head. [MARRIAGE, THE RIGHT OF; FEUDALISM.]

Warene, JOHN DE, EARL OF SURREY (sometimes called Earl Warene) (d. 1304), was an adherent of Henry III in the early part of the Barons' War, and fought on the royalist side at Lewes. After the defeat he fled to France and his lands were confiscated by de Montfort. Returning in May 1265, he joined the escaped Edward at Ludlow, and participated in the Evesham campaign. Subsequently, however, he quarrelled with the king, as a result of an assault delivered upon the Zouches during the trial of a case between them in Westminster Hall in 1270. He retired to his estates in Surrey, and fortified his castle of Reigate against Prince Edward, but was compelled to surrender. He did not, however, entirely forfeit Edward's favour. He bore a conspicuous part in the Welsh and Scottish wars, and was appointed warden of Scotland in 1296. In 1297 he was in command of the army which was defeated by Wallace at Stirling. Despite this disaster he again commanded expeditions in 1298, and fought at the battle of Falkirk. Notwithstanding his services to the Crown he was a strong supporter of the privileges of his order. He led the resistance to the quo warranto inquiry of 1278-9, and his sympathies were with the baronage in the agitation for the confirmation of the charters in the Lincoln parliament of 1301.

Warrenne, JOHN DE, EARL OF SURREY AND SUSSEX (d. 1347), succeeded his grandfather John (q.v.) in 1304. During the early years of Edward II's reign Warrenne vacillated between the royal and the baronial parties. In 1317 he embarked on a fierce quarrel with Thomas of Lancaster, whose wife Alice he abducted, but a reconciliation was effected in 1319. He joined with Lancaster in securing the rule of the Despensers, but in 1322 he espoused the cause of the king, and with Arundel was the last of the earls to remain faithful to Edward after the landing of Mortimer and Isabella. He subsequently made his peace with the invaders, however, and was appointed one of the council of regency during Edward III's minority. He supported the cause of Baliol in the hope of securing a Scottish earldom and participated in the expedition of 1333, but his prospects of reward vanished with Baliol's final discomfiture. He acted on several occasions as a councillor of regency in the absence of Edward III abroad in 1338, 1340, and 1345. On his death in June 1347 the bulk of his estates reverted to the Crown.

Warrenne, WILLIAM DE (d. 1088), a Norman baron, distantly related to the Conqueror, fought on the Norman side at the battle of Hastings, and in 1075 was appointed one of the chief justiciars of the kingdom in William's absence. He assisted William Rufus against Robert in 1088, and died, perhaps of a wound received at the siege of Pevensey, in June 1088. He seems to have received from Rufus, as a reward for his services, the grant of the earldom of Surrey.

Warham, WILLIAM, Archbishop of Canterbury (1450?-1532), was highly distinguished among the many prelates who favoured the spread of the new learning in England. Among his protégés was Erasmus, who speaks of him in terms of great regard. Warham was made keeper of the great seal (1502), and lord chancellor (1504), an office in which he was continued by Henry VIII. In the following year he became successively Bishop of London and Archbishop of Canterbury. The chief event of his primacy was an inquiry into the condition of the monasteries with a view to their reform. In 1515 he resigned the chancellorship on account of some difference with Wolsey, then Archbishop of York. We subsequently find him commenting adversely on the cardinal's severe taxation. The growing opposition to Rome greatly alarmed him; and when the clergy took the grave step of acknowledging that they could not legislate without the consent of parliament he resigned office, and not long afterwards died.

War Office, THE, was constituted a department of state during the military reforms of the nineteenth century. Until 1854 the administration of the army was in the hands of the secretary of state for war and colonies (sitting at the colonial office), the secretary at war (the parliamentary representative of the army), the commander-in-chief (responsible to the Crown), the master-general and board of ordnance, and the commissariat department. But in 1854 the business of war was separated from that of the colonies, and in 1855 the offices of secretary of state for war and secretary at war were amalgamated. The board of ordnance was abolished. In 1870 the control of the commander-in-chief was amalgamated with that of the secretary for war.

Warrants, GENERAL. [GENERAL WARRANTS.]

Warrington, THE TOWN OF, near Liverpool, was an object of contention more than once by the rival parties in the Civil War. In the summer of 1643 it was besieged and taken by the Parliamentarians, and in 1648 the Scots were defeated there by General Lambert after a severe tussle. Again, in 1651, it was the scene of a partial success gained by Charles II over the forces of the Commonwealth. An attempt was made to check the Young Pretender's army there in 1745, but it was foiled by the activity of the rebels. A charter of incorporation was granted in 1847.

Warriston, ARCHIBALD JOHNSTON, LORD (1611-63). [JOHNSTON.]

Warwick was probably one of the capitals of the Mercian kings. Destroyed by the Danes, it was rebuilt by Ethelfleda, the "Lady of the Mercians" (q.v.), who built a fortress there in 913. It appears as a borough in Domesday. The castle was repaired and enlarged under William the Conqueror. It sent members to parliament from the reign of Edward I onwards, but was not regularly incorporated till the reign of Philip and Mary.

Warwick, PEERAGE OF. The earldom of Warwick appears to have been first conferred on Roger de Bellomonte by William the Conqueror, c. 1090. In the thirteenth century the dignity passed by the successive marriages of Margaret, daughter and heiress of the 6th earl, to John Marshal and John de Plessis, Earls of Pembroke, and subsequently to her cousin, William Mauduit, from whom it descended in 1268 to William de Beauchamp. In 1449 Richard Neville, eldest son of Richard, Earl of Salisbury, married Anne, the heiress of the Beauchamp estates, and was created Earl of Warwick. In 1471, on the attainder of the earl after the battle of Barnet, the dignity was conferred on the Duke of Clarence, who had married his daughter Isabella. Clarence's son, Edward Plantagenet, bore the title, but it became extinct on his execution in 1499. In 1547 it was revived for John Dudley, afterwards Duke of Northumberland, and was also borne in turn by his sons John and Ambrose Dudley. On the latter's death in 1589 it became extinct. It was revived in 1618, and conferred on Robert, Baron Rich, but became extinct in this family in 1759. It was revived the same year for Fulk Greville, Earl Brooke, whose descendants have since borne the titles of Brooke and Warwick.

Warwick, EARLS OF. [BEAUCHAMP; DUDLEY; NEVILLE.]

Warwick, EDWARD, EARL OF (1475-99), was the son of George, Duke of Clarence, brother of Edward IV, by Isabel, daughter of Richard, Earl of Warwick. After the execution of his father in 1478 the young earl was kept in honourable confinement at the castle of Sheriff-Hutton, in Yorkshire, until Henry's accession to the throne in 1485, when the earl's Yorkist blood, and the strong claims it gave him to the crown of England, made it a very obvious necessity on the new king's part to have him placed in the more secure prison of the Tower of London. From there he never again emerged except on two occasions, viz., in 1487, when he was paraded through the principal streets of London to disprove the imposture of Lambert Simnel, and in 1499, when he was beheaded (November 28) on a charge of being concerned with Perkin Warbeck (q.v.), then also a prisoner in the Tower, in a conspiracy to get forcible possession of the Tower and effect the overthrow of Henry's government.

Washington, founded in 1790 as the Federal capital of the United States, was attacked by the British during the American War (1812-14). A body of troops under General Ross was landed on Chesapeake Bay, while a fleet under Admiral Cockburn assisted in the operations. The Americans were able to offer little assistance to the veterans of the Peninsula, who had been sent straight off from Bordeaux for this service. The town was occupied by the British (August) after the battle of Bladensburg (q.v.), and though there was little loss of life, the Capitol and nearly all the public buildings were destroyed; an act which caused great indignation both in America and Europe. Washington, THE TREATY OF (May 8, 1871), was concluded between Great Britain and the United States. Its provisions were that a mixed court of arbitrators should meet to adjust the Alabama claims at Geneva, and that by this award the two nations should be bound, prescribing also the rules in accordance with which the arbitrators should decide on their verdict; that the inhabitants of the United States should have the liberty to take fish of every kind, except shell-fish, on the sea-coasts and shores and in the bays, harbours, and creeks of Quebec, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, and the colony of Prince Edward's Island, and of the various islands adjacent, with permission to land for the purpose of drying their nets or curing their fish; that this liberty should extend only to sea-fishing; that the subjects of Great Britain should have similar rights of fishing and landing on the eastern sea coasts and shores of the United States north of the 39th parallel; that the navigation of the River St. Lawrence, its tributaries and canals, should be open to the subjects of the United States; that in return Lake Michigan, and the canals between it and the Atlantic, should be open to British subjects; that the San Juan question should be decided by arbitration; that this treaty should last for ten years, and should not expire after that time until two years had elapsed from the date when notice of withdrawal was given by either party. In accordance with this treaty the Geneva Commission of Arbitrators (q.v.) met to decide the Alabama claims, and the San Juan question (q.v.) was arbitrated by the German Emperor William, 1872. Washington, GEORGE (1732-99), distinguished himself at the age of nineteen, on the outbreak of hostilities between Great Britain and France, and was aide-de-camp to General Braddock in his unsuccessful expedition against Fort Duquesne, taking part also in its capture in 1758. Together with Patrick Henry, he represented Virginia at the general congress at Virginia in 1774, and expressed moderate views by no means favourable to secession. On the outbreak of the War of Independence he was chosen commander-in-chief. This is the place for the very briefest account only of his military operations. His first great success was in compelling the British to evacuate Boston in March 1776, but he was defeated at Long Island by General Howe, and compelled to retreat west of the Delaware. A succession of defeats, notably at Brandywine in September 1777, followed two slight successes at Trenton and Princetown, but they were more than compensated by the victory of Gates at Saratoga (October 1777). In June 1778 he fought an indecisive battle at Monmouth Court House. During the greater part of 1779 and 1780 he remained inactive, owing to the weakness of his army; but in 1781, having been appointed to the command of the army of the South, he was enabled to direct the important operations of Green and Morgan, which resulted in the collapse of the British attack, and the surrender of Lord Cornwallis. On the conclusion of peace (1783) Washington resigned his commission to congress, and retired to his farm. He was, however, elected President of the National Convention at Philadelphia which remodelled the constitution (1787). Two years later he was elected President of the United States, and again in 1792. Perhaps the most distinguishing feature in his tenure of office was the skill with which he kept America clear of the complications created by the French Revolution. In 1794 hostilities seemed imminent with Great Britain, but Washington averted them by sending John Jay to London on a special mission, and two years later negotiated a commercial treaty. He declined to be nominated for the presidency a third time. Just before his death, when war with France seemed at hand, he was appointed commander-in-chief. [AMERICAN INDEPENDENCE, WAR OF.]

Waterloo, THE BATTLE OF (June 18, 1815), was one of the decisive battles in history, since it closed the great European war against France, and decided the fate of Napoleon and of Europe. In June 1815 Napoleon crossed the Belgian frontier. Wellington's army was drawn up so as to cover Brussels, in a long line from Charleroi to Antwerp. The Prussians, under Blücher, extended eastward from Charleroi to Liège. Napoleon attempted to push between the two armies, and to crush them in detail. On the 15th he attacked the Prussians at Charleroi, and drove them back. On the 16th his right attacked the Prussians at Ligny, and, after a hard battle, forced them to retreat. Ney, with the French left, at the same time attacked the British at Quatre Bras. After fighting all day they fell back. The British slowly retired towards Brussels on the 17th. Wellington, relying on assistance from Blücher, who was slowly retreating towards Wavre, determined to fight at Waterloo. The field of battle consisted of two low lines of hills, running parallel to each other, east and west, and separated by a valley about half a mile in breadth. Wellington took up a position on the northern ridge, about twelve miles south of Brussels, with the Forest of Soignes in his rear, the centre of the position being the hamlet of Mont St. Jean. His army was drawn up in two lines. On the extreme left of the front line were light cavalry; next to them were the fifth and fourth Hanoverian brigades. On the right of these was Bylandt's Dutch and Belgian infantry, with Pack and Kemp's brigades on their right. On their right, and garrisoning the farm-buildings of La Haye Sainte, stood the Third Division, under Alten, consisting of the King's German legion and a Hanoverian brigade. To their right again was Halkett's brigade, and the two brigades of the Guards, under Maitland and Byng, who held the farm of Hougomont. The second line was composed entirely of cavalry, the greatest strength being concentrated behind the centre, resting on the Charleroi road, Lord Uxbridge being in command of the whole. The French on the opposite ridge were drawn up in two lines, with the entire Imperial Guard, cavalry, and infantry, in rear of the centre as a reserve. The battle began at half-past eleven by a fierce attack on Hougomont under Jerome: but though the French won the gardens and orchards, they could not drive the Guards from the buildings. As this attack failed in its main object, Napoleon directed a grand attack on the left-centre of the allied position. As the columns approached, the Dutch and Belgian troops fled in panic; but Picton, with the 3,000 men who formed the brigades of Pack and Kemp, seized the moment when the French halted on the brow of the hill. His men fired a volley at thirty yards' distance, and then, charging, drove the columns back over the hill. Meanwhile Kellermann's cuirassiers, who had ridden up the Charleroi road in support of Ney's attack, had been charged by Lord Uxbridge, at the head of the Household Brigade, and had been driven back in headlong confusion. It was about half-past three when Napoleon found that his grand attack had failed, and that, far from making any way, he had very much weakened his right wing, while, at the same time, there were sure signs of the approach of the Prussians. He directed all his splendid cavalry to attack the centre and right, while fresh assaults were made upon Hougomont and La Haye Sainte. But the cuirassiers could make no impression on the impenetrable squares of British infantry, and the artillery played upon them as they retired, until they were almost wholly destroyed. In the meantime the attacks on La Haye Sainte had been carried on with determined vigour; and between six and seven o'clock the French took the place. The Prussians were pressing on, and were already carrying on a fierce contest for the possession of Plancenoit, which lay in the rear of the French right, and which the Young Guard had been detached to hold. Napoleon ordered the Old Guard, who had as yet taken no part in the struggle, to advance. The two columns advanced between La Haye Sainte and Hougomont. They were unexpectedly encountered at the top of the ascent by Maitland's Guards, who were lying down. When the French arrived at the top the Guards suddenly rose up, at a distance of fifty yards, and while the French attempted to deploy into line, showered volley after volley into their ranks, till they became disordered. Then the Guards charged, and drove the French column headlong down the hill, returning to their position, however, in time to take part in the destruction of the second column, which bore on, undismayed, slightly towards the left. The column broke and fled in disorder. Napoleon, meanwhile, was rallying the remains of the first column of the Old Guard round La Belle Alliance; but Wellington now took the offensive. Soon after eight o'clock he gave the word for a general advance along the whole line. The British troops rushed down from the ridge, and up the opposite slope. The Old Guard bravely rallied, and attempted to stem the current. But it was in vain. The British swept away all resistance in their impetuous rush; and the French army gave itself up to flight in hopeless confusion. Well-ton, riding back, met Blücher at La Belle Alliance and entrusted to him the pursuit with the Prussians, who were comparatively fresh. The allies, under Wellington, lost 15,000 men killed and wounded in the battle; the Prussians 7,000; but the French army was annihilated. It lost from 23,000 to 30,000, and the survivors were a mere scattered mob. Wellington's army had numbered about 68,000 at the beginning of the battle, Napoleon's about 72,000.

Watson, RICHARD, Bishop of Llandaff (1737-1816), was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, of which he was elected a fellow in 1760. He became professor of chemistry in 1764, and in 1771 regius professor of divinity. He wrote largely both on scientific subjects and on theology, and had also written some pamphlets to defend and explain Whig principles, when, in July 1782, he was made Bishop of Llandaff by Lord Shelburne. He sided with the Whigs in the House of Lords, and supported the claims of the Prince of Wales in the regency question. In 1792, in his charge to the clergy, he vehemently eulogized the French Revolution. Subsequently he changed his views on this subject, and wrote in 1798 an "Address to the People of Great Britain," which was an energetic appeal in favour of the war against France, and excited immense public attention. In 1803 he wrote another pamphlet on the same subject. His best-known work is perhaps his "Apology for the Bible" against the attacks of Thomas Paine.

Waverers, THE, was the nickname applied to a number of politicians led by Lords Wharcliffe and Harrowby, during the struggle over the first Reform Bill (q.v.). The Waverers objected "to the proposed metropolitan boroughs, to the uniform £10 franchise, and to the idea of single-member representation." Discussion with them failed to pass the bill on its introduction by Lord John Russell on December 12, 1831, but the threat to create peers induced them to vote for the second reading on April 14, 1832, though on May 7 they voted for Lord Lyndhurst's amendment advising that the disfranchising clauses of the bill should be postponed.

Waynflete, WILLIAM OF (d. 1486), was made master of the hospital of St. Mary Magdalen at Winchester about 1426-9, and in 1442 became a fellow of Henry VI's new foundation of Eton and in 1443 its provost. In 1447 he was elected Bishop of Winchester, and in 1456 became chancellor. In 1460 he resigned the great seal, but though he had been an attached friend to Henry VI, he made his peace with Edward IV. During the brief Lancastrian restoration his old loyalties revived, and he himself liberated Henry VI from the Tower; but Edward's return in 1471 convinced him of the hopelessness of the Lancastrian cause, and he made full submission. In 1448 Waynflete secured a charter for the foundation of Magdalen College, Oxford, which is his greatest monument. He also founded a school in his native town (now Wainfleet), in Lincolnshire, and completed the building of Eton College.

Ways and Means, THE COMMITTEE or, is a committee of the whole House of Commons appointed to determine how the money is to be raised which has been voted to the Crown after the resolutions framed by the committee of supply have been agreed to. Its principal duty is to receive the budget or financial statement of the chancellor of the exchequer. Resolutions for new ways of raising revenue are often submitted to it previous to being embodied in bills.

Webb, SIDNEY (b. 1859), with his wife, Beatrice Webb, played a prominent part in developing the British Labour Movement. He was one of the founders of the New Statesman in 1913, took a keen interest in developing the London School of Economics and Political Science, and held the post of president of the board of trade in the first Labour Government, in 1924.

Wedderburn, ALEXANDER, 1ST BARON LOUGHBOROUGH and EARL OF ROSSLYN (1733-1805), was the son of a Scottish advocate and judge. He was called to the Scottish bar, and in 1757 to the English bar. In 1762, through the interest of Lord Bute, he was returned to parliament for the Rothesay and Inverary Burghs. In 1769 he spoke in support of the legality of Wilkes's election. In 1771, however, he left his party, and became solicitor-general to Lord North. In his new office he had no great opportunity of displaying his powers till, in 1773, he defended Lord Clive against General Burgoyne's resolution. During the following years he defended the policy of the ministry on the American war. In 1778 he refused the office of chief baron, and continued in parliament to urge the prosecution of the war. Next year he became attorney-general, and delivered his last great speech in the Lower House in favour of a firm policy of repression towards Ireland. In 1780 he became chief justice of the Common Pleas, with the title of Lord Loughborough. When the coalition ministry was formed (1783) the great seal was put into commission, and he was appointed one of the commissioners, but in 1784 the chancellorship was given to Lord Thurlow. In his disgust, Loughborough became a complete Foxite, took all pains to cultivate favour with the Prince of Wales, and advocated his claims in the debates on the Regency Bill. In 1791 he made a vigorous attack on Pitt's Russian policy, and became so strong a Whig that he advocated measures for Catholic relief. He now opened negotiations with Pitt, who, in return for his services in securing the adherence of the Duke of Portland to the Pitt ministry, obtained for him the great seal (January 1793). In 1794 he advised the state prosecutions for sedition, and, while he cooled towards the Prince of Wales, tried to win favour with George III. In 1800 he opposed all measures for Catholic emancipation connected with the Union, and became estranged from Pitt. The next year he betrayed the prime minister's private correspondence to the king, and thereby obtained the dismissal of Pitt. Addington, succeeding to the vacant place, got rid of Loughborough by the bribe of an elevation to an earldom, with the title of Earl of Rosslyn. Henceforth his parliamentary career was unimportant. At his death George III is reported to have said, "He has not left a greater knave behind him in my dominions."

Wedmore, PEACE OF. [CHIPPENHAM, THE PEACE OF.]

Welles, LEO, 6th Baron Welles (d. 1461), was a distinguished commander in the French wars, and in 1438 was made lieutenant of Ireland, which office he held till 1443. He fought on the Lancastrian side in the Wars of the Roses, and fell in the battle of Towton.

Welles, RICHARD, 7TH BARON WELLES (d. 1470), son of the preceding, was allowed to receive his father's goods and estates by Edward IV, though he had been attainted; and in 1468 he was restored to all his honours. In 1470 his son Robert (q.v.) raised a rebellion in Lincolnshire, and Lord Welles, being unable to induce him to submit, was put to death by Edward, contrary to a promise he had made.

Welles, SIR ROBERT (d. 1470), was the son of Richard, Lord Welles. In 1470 he raised a rebellion in Lincolnshire probably in the Lancastrian interest. He was attacked by the king, and totally defeated in the battle of Losecoat Field, near Stamford. He was captured, and beheaded the day after the battle. Edward then announced that his dying confession had implicated Warwick and Clarence in his treason and turned his army against them. They were caught unprepared and were compelled to take flight to the continent. Their actual relation to the rising is difficult to determine, but it appears improbable that it was engineered in their interest.

Wellesley, ARTHUR, 1ST DUKE OF WELLINGTON (1769-1852), was the fourth son of Garrett, 1st Earl of Mornington. He was educated at Eton, and afterwards at the military college at Angers, where he studied under the celebrated Pignierol. He entered the army in March 1787. His career in the field began in Holland (1794), under the Duke of York. He shared the hardships of this campaign, occupying the post of honour, the rearguard. He received a colonelcy in 1796. His next service was in India, where he passed through the whole of the Mysore War (q.v.) and the siege of Seringapatam (q.v.), being attached to the Nizam's contingent of horse. In July 1799 he was nominated governor of Seringapatam and Mysore, and the command-in-chief of the army of occupation was entrusted to him. He exercised the great powers conferred upon him in such a way as to deserve and obtain the gratitude and respect of the natives, and to display his own extraordinary talents for organization and command. While thus employed he found it necessary to take the field against the marauder Doondiah Waugh, whom he routed and slew. In 1803 he was raised to the rank of major-general, and shortly afterwards the Mahratta War broke out. Wellesley was appointed to the command of the force destined to restore the Peshwa to his throne after the conclusion of the Treaty of Bassein (q.v.), as well as to act against the Mahratta chiefs. Operations in the Deccan were quickly opened, and concluded by the brilliant victories at Assye (September 23, 1803), and Argaum (November 29), which effectually subdued the opposition of Sindhia and the Raja of Berar. Shortly after the close of the Mahratta War Wellesley quitted India, and after an absence of five years landed once more in England. In 1807 he was appointed chief secretary to the lord-lieutenant of Ireland. In the following August he was nominated to a command in the expedition to Copenhagen, and rendered important services, for which he received the special thanks of parliament. On July 12 the same year he started, with a command of 10,000 men, for Portugal, the Portland ministry having sent these troops at the request of the Portuguese government, who feared the ambitious designs of Napoleon. He landed successfully at Mondego, marched on Lisbon, and defeated the French at Roliça (August 17). Sir Harry Burrard, who had been appointed over Wellesley's head, now arrived and took the command, and countermanded all Wellesley's dispositions for the attack on Junot at Torres Vedras. The French therefore assailed the British at Vimeiro (q.v.—August 21) and again Sir Harry Burrard prevented the British success being decisive by forbidding Wellesley to pursue and cut off the French retreat to Torres Vedras. The Convention of Cintra (q.v.) roused the general indignation in Great Britain against the expedition and its commanders, and especially, but most unwarrantably, against Wellesley. He returned to England and resumed his Irish duties and his seat in parliament. In 1809, when the French had entirely occupied the Peninsula, Wellesley was sent out again with 24,000 men. He landed at Lisbon (April 22), marched against Soult, who was strongly posted at Oporto, and drove him into Galicia. The state of his commissariat rendered it impossible to pursue and march on Madrid as he had intended; while the obstinacy and imbecility of the Spanish generals rendered co-operation impossible. In spite, therefore, of the crushing victory of Talavera (q.v.—July 27), he was obliged to retreat. The next year was occupied with the inroad of Napoleon, the victory of Busaco, and the successful defence of the lines of Torres Vedras. At last, in 1812, after the capture of Ciudad Rodrigo (January 19), and Badajoz (April 6), Wellesley began his march across Spain by defeating the French at Salamanca (July 22); opened the road to Madrid; and marched thence to Burgos. He was, however, compelled to retire once more to the Portuguese frontier. In 1813 he marched straight to Vitoria (June 21), and from victory to victory till Soult was finally routed at Orthez (February 27, 1814) and the abdication of Napoleon ended the great Peninsular War (q.v.). At the close of the campaign he was for his services created Marquis of Douro and Duke of Wellington; the House of Commons voted him an annuity of £10,000, which was afterwards commuted for the sum of £400,000, and on July 1 the thanks of the House were conveyed to him by the Speaker. The highest honours were conferred on him by the allies, and he was made a field-marshal in each of the principal armies of Europe. In August he proceeded to Paris to represent the British government at the court of the Tuileries. He remained five months, and bore a principal share in the negotiations of this year. In January 1815 the duke was accredited to Vienna as one of the representatives of Britain at the congress of the European powers (q.v.), and united with Austria and France in resisting the demands of Russia and Prussia. In February Napoleon broke loose from Elba, and Wellington was appointed commander-in-chief against him. The Hundred Days ended at Waterloo (q.v.), and the allied armies marched on Paris, where Wellington had the greatest difficulty in restraining the Prussian desire for vengeance; and it was partly in consequence of his advice that the army of occupation, which was to have remained for five years, evacuated France at the end of three. The military career of the duke thus came to an end. In October 1818, while attending the Congress of Aix-la-Chapelle, he was offered and accepted the office of master-general of the ordnance, with a seat in the cabinet. He took no prominent part, however, in the administration of home affairs, though he shared the odium which accrued to the government from its coercive policy. He represented Great Britain at the Congress of Verona (q.v.) in 1822, and protested against the armed intervention of the French court in the affairs of Spain. In 1826 he was sent on a special mission to St. Petersburg for the purpose of promoting a peaceable settlement of the Eastern question. In the following year he refused to serve under Canning, and resigned the post of commander-in-chief which had naturally come to him on the death of the Duke of York. In 1828 he himself became prime minister of England. The Canningites were allowed to retain their seats for a short time, but very soon dissensions arose, and they were either driven out or resigned spontaneously (May–June, 1828). The great question of Roman Catholic emancipation had now for a quarter of a century occupied the attention of parliament, and had become not so much a question of abstract principle and policy as of national peace and security. The continued anarchy of Ireland, the interminable division of cabinets, the distraction of imperial councils, and the utter impossibility of maintaining such a state of things, at last satisfied the duke and Sir Robert Peel that the time had come when the clamorous demand of the Roman Catholics should be conceded. The premier had a clear perception of the difficulties to be encountered, and the sacrifices which must be made in thus surrendering the citadel of Protestant ascendancy; but having made up his mind that this measure was necessary, he carried it through resolutely and characteristically. His policy was announced in the speech from the throne (February 5, 1829), and so vigorously was the measure pressed that in spite of the most determined opposition the Relief Bill passed both Houses by a large majority, and in little more than a month became law (April). The ministry of the duke was greatly weakened by his victory over the principles and prejudices of his party. His opponents were not conciliated, while many of his old supporters had become furious in their indignation. His foreign policy concentrated on support for Turkey and fear of Russia in the East, non-intervention in the Portugal-Brazil dispute, and immediate recognition of Louis Philippe. The duke failed to read the signs of the times, and his obstinate opposition to parliamentary reform caused the downfall of his ministry, the accession of Earl Grey (1830), and the passing of the Reform Bill (q.v.). At the final crisis of the bill Wellington, at the request of the king, left the House of Lords, followed by about a hundred peers, to allow the bill to pass. All through this period the tide of popular feeling ran strongly against the duke, who found it necessary to protect his windows from the mob by casings of iron. When the excitement of the reform agitation had subsided, popular feeling towards him gradually changed; and during the rest of his life he retained a firm hold on the affections of the English people. In 1834 the king announced his intention to recall the duke to his councils, but the latter insisted that Sir Robert Peel was the proper person to be placed at the head of the government, and himself accepted the post of foreign secretary. In 1835 he retired with his leader, and never again took charge of any of the great civil departments of state. In 1841, on the return of his party to power, he accepted a seat in the cabinet, but without office; though he took an active part in the business of the country. In 1842 he again became commander-in-chief, and was confirmed in the office for life by patent under the great seal. When the Irish famine brought the Anti-Corn-law agitation to a crisis he changed with Peel, and gave that minister the warmest and most consistent support in his new commercial policy. It was, in fact, mainly through the duke's influence that the opposition of the great territorial magnates was withdrawn. On the complete break-up of the Conservative party, in 1846, the duke formally intimated his final retirement from political life, and never again took any part in the debates in the House of Lords except on military matters. But he continued to take the warmest interest in the welfare of the army, the country, and the sovereign, and was regarded by Queen Victoria as a friendly and intimate adviser. With the nation the popularity of "the duke" during his later years was extraordinary and almost unique. Wherever he appeared he was received with enthusiasm and affection. On September 14, 1852, he died at Walmer Castle, where he resided as warden of the Cinque Ports.

Of Wellington's eminence as a general there is no question. In an age of great commanders he was one of the greatest; inferior to few of his contemporaries, save the great opponent whose designs he so often defeated. The integrity, honesty, and disinterested simplicity of his private character are equally little open to doubt. His position as a statesman admits of more dispute. That he did not altogether comprehend the spirit of the age in which he lived can scarcely be denied.

Wellesley, RICHARD COLLEY, MARQUIS

WELLESLEY (1760-1842), was the eldest son of the 1st Earl of Mornington, and elder brother of the Duke of Wellington. He took his seat in the Irish House of Lords as soon as he was of age, and also entered the English House of Commons as member for Beer Alston in 1784, and afterwards for Windsor. He took the Tory side in the debates on the regency of 1788, and greatly distinguished himself. In 1797, having previously occupied a seat on the board of control, he received a British peerage (as Baron Mornington), and was nominated to succeed Lord Cornwallis as governor-general of India. In 1799 he became Marquis Wellesley in the Irish peerage. His governor-generalship in India was an eventful period. On first landing he found the British power exposed to great dangers, owing to the existence of a formidable body of disciplined troops in the service of the Nizam. By great firmness and skill Lord Mornington prevailed on the Nizam to disband his army, and to enter into a subsidary alliance with Great Britain. He next determined to crush the power of Tippoo Sultan (q.v.), who was then deeply engaged in intrigues with France. Owing to the firmness and energy of the viceroy, the troops were speedily put into a state of efficiency. In 1799 war was declared on Tippoo, and three armies advanced on Seringapatam. The Bombay army won a victory at Sudaser, and that of Madras at Malavelly and Ariker. Seringapatam (q.v.) was invested and captured, and Tippoo slain in the assault. Mysore was partitioned, and the Mohammedan dynasty driven out. In 1801 Lord Wellesley organized the Red Sea expedition (q.v.), and dispatched a large force into Egypt to assist in the operations against the French. He then proceeded to intervene in the affairs of the Mahratta states. He forced the Treaty of Bassein (q.v.) upon the Peshwa Baji Rao (q.v.). Thereupon a combination of Sindhia, Holkar, and the Raja of Berar was formed against the British, and the result was the hardly-contested campaigns in which the British, under Colonel Wellesley and Lake, were completely successful. The siege of Aligarh, the battles of Delhi and Laswari, soon reduced Sindhia's French battalions in Hindustan; the battles of Assye and Argaum were followed by the treaties of Deogaon and Surgi Anjengaoon, which embodied the submission of Sindhia and the Bhonsla.

Meanwhile Lord Wellesley had paid much attention to the commercial development of India. He gave great offence to the court of directors partly by the magnitude and expense of his military exploits, partly by allowing private British vessels to trade in India, contrary to the company's monopoly. In 1805 Wellesley was recalled. Attempts were unsuccessfully made in parliament to accuse him of high crimes and misdemeanours, and the court of proprietors passed a vote of censure on him by a large majority. But after thirty years the feeling changed, and the directors, taking advantage of the publication of his dispatches, voted him a grant of £20,000, and ordered his statue to be placed in the India House. His policy in India was to establish British influence; to oblige the native rulers to enter into permanent treaties with him; to place the political management of their provinces in the hands of a British resident; to pay for the support of an army largely officered by Europeans; while the native princes at the same time retained the domestic government in their own hands. "The administration of Lord Wellesley may be regarded as the third great epoch in the formation of the British Indian empire. . . . Lord Wellesley was the first to perceive that in India a political equilibrium was impossible; that peace was only to be insured by establishing the preponderance of British power; and that the task of breaking down the Mahratta confederacy was as practicable as, sooner or later, it must have been necessary, to be undertaken."

In 1809 Wellesley was appointed ambassador in Spain. From 1809 to January 1812 he was secretary for foreign affairs in Spencer Perceval's cabinet, but resigned in consequence of a difference with his colleagues on the Roman Catholic claims in Ireland. In May 1812 he unsuccessfully attempted to form a coalition government. Under Lord Liverpool he was the champion of the rights of the Roman Catholics in Ireland. In 1815 he loudly censured some of the provisions of the peace with France. From 1821 to 1828 he was lord-lieutenant of Ireland, but when his brother, the Duke of Wellington, took office, and declared against the Catholic claims, the lord-lieutenant resigned. In 1831 he was appointed lord steward, under the Grey ministry, and in 1833 again became lord-lieutenant, but resigned in 1834.

Wellington, ARTHUR WELLESLEY, 1ST DUKE OF (1769-1852). [WELLESLEY.]

Welsh Judicature, ABOLITION OF (1830). In 1820 a select committee was appointed to inquire into the Welsh judicature, which had existed for centuries, in spite of proposals to remove it. The Common Laws Commissioners of 1822 decided that its continuance was indefensible. Peel therefore introduced (1830) a bill for its abolition, and for adding an additional judge to each of the three superior courts at Westminster. The bill became law on July 23, 1830 (1 Will. IV, c. 70). The special sessions in Wales were abolished, and that country, with Cheshire, was erected into new circuits, served by the ordinary judges. [COUNCILS, CIVIL.]

Wenlock, JOHN, BARON WENLOCK (d. 1471), was originally a supporter of the Lancastrian party, and fought in the first battle of St. Albans. Subsequently he went over to the Yorkists, and was attainted in 1459. He commanded the rear of the Yorkist army in the battle of Towton, and many honours and rewards were given him by Edward IV. He afterwards joined Warwick and the malcontents (1471), and fought on the Lancastrian side in the battle of Tewkesbury, where he was slain, it is said, by Somerset, who suspected him of treachery.

Wensleydale's Case, LORD (1856). Sir James Parke (1782-1868), judge of the Court of Exchequer, was raised to the peerage by the title of Baron Wensleydale in 1856; but the patent which conferred the title on him (January 16) contained the unusual recital that his barony was to be held "for the term of his natural life." This creation was an attempt to revive a right which had lain in abeyance since the reign of Richard II. There was a very strong feeling in the House of Lords against this, and Lord Lyndhurst acted as its exponent. Three great legal authorities, who seldom united on any point, were agreed in strenuous opposition to this change—Lords Lyndhurst, Brougham, and Campbell. The lord chancellor, on the other hand, supported it, and was probably responsible for it. After some discussion, and the proposal of a great number of resolutions, the government yielded, and conferred on Sir James Parke a patent of peerage drawn up in the ordinary form. He took his seat in the Lords on July 25.

Wentworth, CHARLES WATSON-, 2ND MARQUIS OF ROCKINGHAM (1730-82), succeeded his father in the marquise in 1750, and was in the following year appointed lord-lieutenant of the North and West Ridings of Yorkshire. From his great wealth and influential position, rather than on account of any great ability, he was early recognized as one of the chiefs of the Whig party. When George III succeeded to the throne and displayed his intention of freeing himself from the Whig control, the Marquis of Rockingham, with the rest of his party, found himself in opposition alike to the ministry and the court, and was one of those dismissed from their lord-lieutenancies in 1763. On the death of the Duke of Devonshire in 1764 Rockingham was at once acknowledged as the leader of the Whig party; and in 1765 the king, unable any longer to endure the haughty independence of Grenville, threw himself into the arms of Rockingham. The king, however, never intended to entrust the government of the country for any length of time to a minister whose principles differed from his own on every point, and soon began to thwart the government in every measure by a secret and thoroughly organized opposition. In spite of this the marquis managed to carry some beneficial measures. He soothed the ill-feeling which had been aroused in the American colonies by the Stamp Act, by repealing the obnoxious measure; and at home he passed an act declaring general warrants illegal. But circumstances were too strong for him. He was always a bad speaker, and had thus failed to acquire much personal influence in parliament, or to offer any effectual opposition to the secret influence of the court party. In May 1766 he resigned, and for the next sixteen years remained out of office. He offered all the opposition in his power to the ruinous policy which Lord North pursued towards the colonies, and gave what aid he could to Wilkes in his struggle against the tyranny of the House of Commons on the question of the Middlesex election. By his consistent conduct and unflinching integrity he held his party together through a long period of opposition, until, on North's resignation, he for the second time became prime minister in March 1782. He formed a cabinet which had all the elements of strength and apparently of permanence. Negotiations with the American colonies were opened on a broad and liberal basis, which soon resulted in a peace between the two countries. Burke introduced a large scheme of economical reform ; but Rockingham's death in July prevented the execution of the liberal plans which had been the programme of the administration.

Albemarle, "Rockingham and His Contemporaries"; Rockingham's "Memoirs," 2 vols., 1862. [S. L.]

Wentworth, PETER (1530 ?-1596), was member of parliament for Tregony, in Cornwall, and a man of courage and independence. During the session of 1576 he made a speech reflecting on the undue influence of the queen in parliament, and defending the privileges of the House. For this he was sequestered, and a committee of all the privy councillors in the House was appointed to examine him. He was sent to the Tower, but released at the queen's request in a month, being reprimanded on his knees by the Speaker. In 1588 he was again committed to the Tower through the instrumentality of the Speaker, Serjeant Puckering (afterwards lord keeper), for some questions which he proposed to put in favour of freedom of speech. In 1593 he was again imprisoned for presenting a petition to the lord keeper, desiring "the Lords of the Upper House to join with those of the Lower in imploring her majesty to entail the succession of the crown, for which they had already prepared a bill."

Hallam, "Constitutional History."

Wentworth, THOMAS, 1ST EARL OF STRAFFORD (April 13, 1593—May 12, 1641), the son of Sir William Wentworth, was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, and represented Yorkshire in parliament from 1614 to 1628, with the exception of the assembly of 1626, when he was incapacitated by being appointed sheriff. In parliament he maintained an independent position, inclining rather to the popular party than to the court. In 1621 he opposed the attempt of James to limit the rights of parliament, and proposed a protestation. In 1627 he opposed the forced loan levied by Charles, and was for a short time in confinement. In the parliament of 1628 he for a time exercised great influence in the Commons, and attempted to embody the liberties of the subject in a bill, and thereby to lay a secure foundation for the future, and reconcile king and Commons. But he did not share in the general passion for war with Spain in 1624, nor did he sympathize with the objections of the Puritans to the king's religious policy. What he desired was a government intelligent enough to perceive the real needs of the nation, and strong enough to carry out practical reforms, in spite of the opposition of local and class interests. It was in accordance with these ideas that Wentworth entered the king's service. He was created a peer in July 1628, and became in December of the same year president of the council of the North. He entered the privy council in November 1629, and became lord deputy of Ireland in January 1632. Measures for the better carrying out of the poor law, for the relief of commerce, and for the general improvement of the condition of the people were probably the results of his presence in the council. In the north his vigorous enforcements of the law without respect of persons was the chief characteristic of his administration. In Ireland his abilities had freer scope. He protected trade, founded the flax manufacture, organized a respectable army, and introduced many reforms into the Church and the administration. But his harshness to individuals and his intolerance of opposition gained him numerous enemies amongst the English colonists, whilst his disregard of the king's promises to the native Irish, and the threatened plantation of Connaught, created feelings of distrust and dread which bore fruit in the rebellion of 1641. In September 1639 he was summoned to England, and became at once the leading spirit in the committee of eight, to whom Scottish affairs were entrusted, and the king's chief adviser. In January 1640 he was created Earl of Strafford. By his advice the king summoned the Short Parliament, and dissolved it when it became unruly. In order to carry on the war with Scotland he suggested expedients of every kind—a loan from Spain, the debasement of the coinage, and the employment of the Irish army to subdue Scotland, or if necessary to keep down England. The king appointed him lieutenant-general of the English army (August 20, 1640), but his energy could not avert defeat, and when the council of peers advised the king to summon a parliament his fate was assured. In spite of illness Strafford hurried up to London to impeach the popular leaders for treasonable correspondence. Pym moved Strafford's impeachment on November 11, and he was arrested the same day. His trial began in Westminster Hall on March 22, 1641. The extreme party in the Commons, dissatisfied with the slow and doubtful course of impeachment, brought in a bill of attainder (April 10), which passed its third reading in the Commons on April 21, and in the Lords on May 8. The king's attempts to save Strafford, and above all the discovery of the first Army Plot, sealed his fate, and prevented the acceptance of a suggested compromise, which would have saved his life but incapacitated him from all office. The king postponed his answer as long as he could, and consulted the bishops and judges, but the danger of a popular rising induced him to yield; he gave his assent to the bill (May 10), and Strafford was executed on May 12. His attainder was reversed in 1662.

Wer-gild, in Anglo-Saxon times, was the money value of each man's life, and the sum which, in case of his death by violence, had to be paid by the murderer, either to his kinsmen or gild-brethren, or, in the case of a serf, to his master. The amount of the wer-gild depended on the rank of the person slain, and was carefully graduated. This system of compensation had its roots in the old institution of the blood feud, in which the kindred of the murdered man took direct physical vengeance upon the murderer. [B6r.]

Wesley, JOHN (1703-91), was the second surviving son of Samuel Wesley, rector of Epworth. He was educated at Christ Church, and took orders in 1725. In 1726 he was elected to a fellowship at Lincoln. At the university he and his brother Charles in 1729 formed a society to promote religious study and conversation. They soon became known (from the regularity of their behaviour) as the "Methodists" (q.v.). In 1735 the two brothers went to Georgia to convert the Indians. Their mission was unfruitful, and they returned in 1738. On their return they proclaimed themselves advocates of the doctrine of justification by faith alone. In May 1738 the Wesleys began to form Methodist congregations in London. For the next few years Wesley, with his brother, George Whitefield (q.v.), and a few other coadjutors, was engaged in preaching in London and other parts of England to immense and growing congregations. In spite of much opposition, frequently manifested in the form of riot and violence, the movement rapidly gained ground. John Wesley lived till 1791, by which time the Methodists had established societies in every important town in England, and had a flourishing church in America.

Wessex, THE KINGDOM OF. The question when and how the kingdom of Wessex—destined ultimately to expand into the kingdom of the English—came into being has been in recent years the subject of much controversy. The story given in the "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle" runs as follows. In 495 the "aldermen" Cerdic and Cynric came with five ships to Britain to a place called Cerdices-ora, and fought with the Welsh. In 501 they were followed by a certain Port, who landed at Portsmouth and slew a prince of the Britons; and in 514 by a third invading force led by Stuf and Wihtgar (q.v.). Five years later, we are told, Cerdic and Cynric obtained the kingship, "and from that time the royal line of the West Saxons has reigned." Subsequent engagements between them and the Britons are reported in

527 at Cerdicslea, and in 530 in the Isle of Wight. In 534 Cerdic is said to have died, leaving a well-established authority to his son and colleague Cynric. There is much in this confused and incoherent narrative that is open to doubt. Not only is there a marked tendency to the duplication of incidents, but the names given to the invaders bear a suspicious relation to the places in connexion with which they are mentioned. Port, it is to be suspected, is an eponymous hero created from the name of the Roman harbour Portus Magnus, where he is said to have landed, while Wihtgar seems no less evidently to derive his name from the Wihtgaras of the Isle of Wight. Even the name of Cerdic has a Celtic rather than a Teutonic flavour. The fatal objection to the history of the invasion as given in the "Chronicle" lies, however, in the fact, related by Bæda and confirmed by archaeological evidence, that the regions where the West Saxons are said to have established themselves in the early sixth century had already been conquered and settled by the Jutes. It seems clear that the story of Cerdic and Cynric must, like that of Hengest and Horsa, be relegated to the realm of legend rather than of history. The modern view is that Wessex was originally settled by war bands operating not from the coast but from the Thames valley. In support of this theory may be urged the fact that when the first bishop's stool was established in West Saxon territory it was placed at Dorchester-on-Thames and not at Winchester—the more natural centre if expansion was proceeding in a south to north direction. Moreover, to place early Wessex in the middle Thames valley is to explain the name "Middlesex," which, on this hypothesis, applies to a settlement situated actually between the East and the West Saxons. The most convincing argument is, however, once more furnished by archaeological research. Investigation of the burial grounds, which are our chief source of information for this period, proves not merely that the first settlers of Wight and southern Hampshire were Jutes and not Saxons, but that the earliest West Saxon settlements followed the line of the Thames and the tributaries of its right bank, such as the Kennet and the Wey. Of the manner in which these settlements were effected nothing definite is known. Ceawlin, who ruled from 560 to 591, is the first of the West Saxon kings of whose existence we can be certain. He is reckoned by Bæda as third in the succession of Bretwaldas. It was he who laid the foundations of the power of Wessex, and resumed that advance at the expense of the Britons, which had been suspended for almost a century as a result of the battle of Mount Badon (q.v.). Aided by his brother Cuthwulf, Ceawlin overthrew in 568 Ethelbert of Kent, and in 571 won a great victory at Bedford, probably over his Saxon neighbours, incorporating in his realm the land of the Chilternaetas. Six years later he vanquished the Britons of the south-west at Deorham in Gloucestershire. In 584, however, he suffered a check in the battle of Fethanleag, which has been identified by some authorities with Faddiley in Cheshire and by others with Frethern in Gloucestershire; but the site of which is still uncertain. Some years later disaster overtook Ceawlin. He was defeated in 591 at Wodnesbeorg (q.v.) by a rising of his subjects under his nephew Ceolric, and driven from his kingdom. After his overthrow the fortunes of Wessex suffered a temporary eclipse, and the kingdom was reduced to dependence first upon Kent and then upon Mercia. The years of vassalage were not, however, entirely barren, for in 634 Wessex was converted to Christianity by Birinus, and under Coenwalch (643-72) her frontiers were extended westwards as far as the River Parret. Finally, at the end of the seventh century a revival took place under the two able rulers Ceadwalla and Ine. By Ceadwalla (685-8) Sussex and Kent were subdued, while Ine (688-726) reduced Essex to obedience and advanced his western boundary from the Parret to the Exe. To meet the spiritual needs of the newly-settled district he established a second West Saxon see at Sherborne; and c. 693 he promulgated the code of laws which constitutes one of our most important sources for the social history of the early Anglo-Saxon period. But with his abdication in 726 Wessex once more fell behind in the race for the hegemony of the English kingdoms. Ethelbald of Mercia riveted his yoke so firmly upon her that even Cuthred's great victory at Burford in 752 failed to procure her more than a temporary release. The accession of Egbert to the West Saxon throne in 802 ushers in, however, a new era in the history of the southern kingdom. It was his destiny not merely to extend the frontiers of his realm and establish her independence, but to win for her that supremacy which had been enjoyed in turn by Northumbria and Mercia. Expelled from England by his rival Beorhtric in 796, he had passed several years in exile in Frankland, where, perhaps, he learnt from Charlemagne the lessons in kingcraft which he was later able to put to good advantage in his native land. After ruling for nearly twenty years as the vassal of Mercia he overthrew Beornwulf in the battle of Ellandune (825) and reduced his kingdom to obedience. In the course of the next four years every other state in England was annexed to, or made dependent on, the West Saxons. Kent, Sussex, Surrey, Essex, and East Anglia submitted in 825, and their example was followed by Northumbria in 829. Finally, in 838, a combined force of Danes and Cornishmen was defeated at Hengest Down, and the last stage in the subjugation of the West Welsh was completed. Yet great as was Egbert's achievement, the supremacy he established was no different in kind from that of his Mercian and Northumbrian predecessors in the imperium. It required the operation of an external factor—the Danish incursions of the ninth century—to convert the West Saxon overlordship into the kingship of all England. Under Alfred Wessex was virtually stripped of her external supremacy, but her immediate territory was actually enlarged by the incorporation of south-western Mercia. Under Alfred's son and grandsons the "reconquest of the Danelaw" was accomplished, and in the process Wessex far outgrew her name and lost herself in the kingdom of the English people.

West Africa, BRITISH DOMINIONS IN, consist of the colony and protectorate of Sierra Leone, the Gambia, the colony and protectorate of Nigeria, the mandated territory of the Cameroons, and the Gold Coast Colony. The general history is that of a gradual development from sporadic slaving and trading voyages, coastal trading stations, internal trade and consequent troubles with the natives, to full colonial administration in areas defined by international agreements.

THE COLONY AND PROTECTORATE OF SIERRA LEONE. The colony consists of the peninsula of Sierra Leone, Tasso, York, and Banana Islands, and the township of Bouthe. The rest is the protectorate. Named by Pedro da Cintra (1461) it was the scene of Hawkins's first slave raid in 1562. In 1592 Gregory received a royal licence to trade with Guinea, but no territory was acquired until land was sold to Captain John Taylor in 1787 for the "Black poor," freed negro slaves from London, and used as a repatriation area by the Sierra Leone Company (1791). Nova Scotian freedmen (1792) and Maroons (1800) were also sent there and revolted against the land settlement. In 1808 it was made a Crown colony, and disbanded soldiers from the West Indian regiments landed in 1819. From 1821 to 1828 Gambia and the Gold Coast were under the administration of the governor and his two councillors (appointed from 1792). Again from 1843 to 1850 the Gold Coast and from 1866 to 1888 the Gambia were united to Sierra Leone. In 1896 a protectorate was declared over the hinterland after a boundary agreement with France (1895). The boundary with Liberia was delimited in 1914. The constitution has seen many changes. A nominated executive council of four, with additional nominees to form a legislative council, was established in 1863. In 1866 it became the centre of the British settlements in West Africa, from which Lagos and the Gold Coast were separated in 1874 when the West African settlements of Sierra Leone, and Gambia were given each a legislative council of the officials and two nominated members. Gambia was separated in 1888. The constitution of 1913 and 1922 provided for an executive council of five officials which, together with four nominated unofficial members, composed the legislative council, while from 1913 the administration of the protectorate was separated from the colony but had the same governor. In 1924 an elective element was introduced into the colony legislative council with representation for the protectorate, and the government now is vested in a governor, an executive council of five officials, and a legislative council of the governor and council, together with six other officials to represent the Central, Northern, and Southern Provinces with ten other non-official members.

THE GAMBIA was reached by the Portuguese in 1446. In 1588 British west-country merchants received a ten-years' trading monopoly, while in 1619 Rich's company received its charter and built Fort James. The 1631 company of Young and Digby supplied the West Indies with slaves, and from 1662 to 1672 the Company of Royal Adventurers traded from the coast. The Royal African Company (1672-1752) was given a monopoly of trade from Sallee to the Cape and disputed possession with the French. In 1752 its powers were transferred to the Company of Merchants and an exchange of claims removed French competition in 1783. The slave trade was declared illegal in 1807, negro settlements set up in 1816 and Bathurst ceded. From 1823 to 1830 the Board of Merchants ruled the country, and a lieutenant-governor from 1830 to 1843, when the Gambia was made a separate colony. In 1866 it was joined to the Gold Coast and Lagos under the governor of Sierra Leone and only separated in 1889. A boundary agreement was reached with France in 1889-91 and a protectorate established in 1894 over Kombo. The colony is now ruled by a governor, an executive council of one official and three other members, and a legislative council of governor, two members ex-officio, three other officers, and three unofficials.

THE GOLD COAST COLONY, together with Ashanti, the Protected Northern Territories, and the British mandated Territory of Togoland, has a connexion with English seamen dating from 1364. The Portuguese, however, settled there in 1471 and claimed it on the grounds of a papal bull of 1430. British navigators touched but did not settle there (1553-8), and the Dutch in 1595 and again in 1637 and 1642 when they obliterated the Portuguese forts. Then follows a succession of five British trading companies, 1618, 1631, 1662, 1672, and 1752, the last disappearing in 1821. Meanwhile Swedish (1645-1657) and Brandenburg (q.v.) (1682-1720) settlements appeared, only to be absorbed by the later Danish traders. The Treaty of Breda (1667) had left all to the Dutch. In 1821 it became a Crown colony dependent upon Sierra Leone, but in 1827 the forts were transferred to a committee of London merchants with a local council of administration and a court of justice of five resident merchants. Governor Maclean (1827-43) greatly spread British influence. In 1843 a lieutenant-governor responsible to the governor of Sierra Leone was appointed on the assumption of government by Great Britain and an attempt made to suppress the slave trade. In 1850 the Danes were bought out and the Gold Coast made a separate colony with a governor, executive and legislative councils. Wars with the Ashanti began in 1863 and the colony made again dependent upon Sierra Leone (1866). The next year a division of the coast was made with the Dutch, but in 1871 sole sovereignty was vested in Great Britain by the Anglo-Dutch Convention. On the conclusion of peace with Ashanti (1874) the Gold Coast and Lagos were united again as the Gold Coast Colony with Lagos as the administrative centre, and with legislative and executive councils both nominated. Lagos was separated in 1886. The Conference of Berlin resulted in the delimitation of a neutral zone (1887), and the boundary was adjusted with France (1889-98). In 1897 the Northern Territories were created out of Ashanti, whose turbulent warriors were finally crushed in 1900. [ASHANTI, WARS WITH.] In 1901 the Gold Coast Protectorate was amalgamated to the colony, Ashanti and the Northern Territories being ruled by commissioners. Togoland was captured from Germany in 1914 and the administration reorganized in 1916, to consist of an executive council of governor and six officials, and a legislative council of six officers and some unofficial nominated members. Municipal corporations were established in 1924 and the legislative council enlarged (1926) to consist of governor and sixteen officials together with fourteen unofficial members of whom six were to be unofficial provincial members (four elected natives and one nominated), one a mercantile representative, and three nominated members together with a nominated missionary.

ASHANTI is a tribal confederation annexed to the Gold Coast Colony in 1901. Its king had invaded the British protectorate in 1873 and been defeated by Sir Garnet Wolseley, who imposed upon him the Peace of Formara by which he abandoned his claim to the protectorate and the practice of human sacrifice and was to pay an indemnity. An expedition (1894-6) against Prempeh led to the establishment of a resident at Kumasi. A further attack in 1900 led to its annexation. In 1926 Prempeh, returned from his exile, was elected head chief.

THE NORTHERN TERRITORIES were constituted in 1897 north of Ashanti; the boundaries defined with the French in 1898 and the neutral zone of 1887 partitioned with Germany in 1899. From 1902 it has been administered from the Gold Coast, and in 1922 was divided into Northern and Southern Provinces.

BRITISH SPHERE OF TOGOLAND, formerly a German protectorate, was captured in 1914 and provisionally divided, Great Britain getting the western part and France the eastern. In 1919 France was given all the coast and a League of Nations mandate issued in 1921, since when the northern section has been administered by Britain as part of the Northern Territories and the southern as part of the Eastern Province of Gold Coast Colony.

THE COLONY AND PROTECTORATE OF NIGERIA. First explored in 1805 by Mungo Park, Lagos was the first British possession in the Niger basin, although trading depots had existed on the Oil Rivers. Lagos colony was formed in 1862, became part of the West African Settlements in 1866 with a separate legislative council, was united to the Gold Coast Colony in 1874, and separated in 1886 as the Colony and Protectorate of Lagos. In 1899 it was extended to the boundaries of Northern Nigeria and the Niger Coast Protectorate. Meanwhile various other settlements had sprung up. The United African Company of 1879 had given way to the National African Company (1881). The Berlin Conference (1884-5) made Great Britain guardian of international treaty rights on the Niger, and boundary agreements over Nigeria and Cameroons were made the following year. By the foundation of the Royal Niger Company (1886) a British protectorate had been proclaimed over the river territories. The French boundary to the north (French Sudan) was settled in 1890, and in 1898 the Cameroons boundary extended. In 1897 the Fulah power was crushed and slavery abolished after Lugard's treaty (1894) had secured additions to the west and established a frontier force to face the French, with whom a boundary convention was held in 1898. In 1900 the Niger Company surrendered its rights to the Crown and most of its territories were formed into the Protectorate of Northern Nigeria, where indirect native rule has, with the exception of the Mahdi rising (1906), kept the country quiet. Simultaneously the Oil Rivers Protectorate had been founded in 1885, being ruled by a commissioner from 1891. In 1893 it was extended and called the Niger Coast Protectorate, to which the southern part of the Niger Company's territories were transferred in 1900, together forming the Protectorate of Southern Nigeria, the administration being simultaneously transferred from the foreign to the colonial office.

In 1906 the colony of Lagos and its protected territories was amalgamated with the Protectorate of Southern Nigeria and called the Colony and Protectorate of Southern Nigeria, with three administrative provinces. In 1914 Northern and Southern Nigeria were united to form the Colony and Protectorate of Nigeria, and an advisory council appointed. This was abolished in 1923. During the Great War the German Cameroons were conquered, and in 1923 the legislative council, for which provision had been made in 1914, was enlarged to include elected representatives for the colony and the southern provinces of the protectorate. It is administered from Lagos by a governor, and consists of the colony together with the northern and southern provinces. The legislative council consists of the governor, the executive councillors, the senior residents, and six other officers, together with four elected members and fourteen nominated unofficial members, seven to represent localities and such organizations as the Chamber of Commerce and seven the interests of the Africans. The executive council consists of twelve officials. These two councils govern and represent the colony and the southern provinces, and have control over the Northern Protectorate.

THE CAMEROONS were conquered by the British and French (1914-16), and a provisional agreement in 1916 delimited their spheres. Boundary adjustments were made in 1920. The British sphere is administered from Nigeria.

West Indies, BRITISH POSSESSIONS IN, form the six administrative groups of the Bahamas, Jamaica and its dependencies, the Leeward Island Federation of five presidencies, Barbados, the Windward Island group of three colonies and their dependency, not yet federated, and Trinidad with Tobago. Their history is individual though sharing some features. Most exhibit great vicissitudes of ownership but follow a certain uniformity. Generally ownership was vague and possession rendered precarious by pirates in the seventeenth century; the eighteenth saw Anglo-French rivalry and the determination of ownership by treaty, while the nineteenth saw consolidation, emancipation, and constitutional progress, along Crown colony lines and unification of administrations, perhaps to be completed by a federation scheme. An economic depression followed emancipation, with a revival in the American Civil War. In 1898 Canada gave the West Indies a preferential tariff of 25 per cent., which was raised to 30 per cent. in 1900. In 1912 Great Britain withdrew from the international convention for the suppression of sugar bounties, but preference was delayed until 1918. The Ottawa Conference of 1912 and 1920 extended Canada's tariff preference. The Labour supply problem, accentuated by emigration to Cuba and Lord Hardinge's abolition of the indentured system for Indian coolies in 1916, is acute.

A movement towards federation is taking place. Encouraged by Imperial conferences, a conference on law met in 1916 which resulted in the establishment of a West Indian Court of Appeal for colonies to the windward of the Caribbees. The Associated West Indian Chamber of Commerce met in 1917 and 1920, and in 1921-2 a colonial office mission of the Hon. Edward Wood, Hon. W. Ormsby Gore, and Mr. R. A. Wiseman visited the West Indies to study the constitutional problem. A conference met in London in 1926 of representatives from all the British West Indian colonies, British Guiana, and British Honduras to discuss the establishment of a permanent conference or council.

Westminster Abbey was founded as a Benedictine house by Edward the Confessor (c. 1042) on the site of an earlier church which possibly dated back to the seventh century. His foundation, of which no relic now exists above ground, was consecrated on December 28, 1065. The present church was in great part the work of Henry III., and was begun in 1245 from the eastern end. The reconstruction of the nave in the same style was undertaken by Cardinal Simon Langham at the end of the fourteenth century. In 1503 was begun the erection of Henry VII's new Lady Chapel—"one of the most glorious creations of expiring Gothic." The western towers are an addition of the eighteenth century. Many of the monastic buildings, including the abbot's house, the refectory, dormitory, and infirmary of the monks, and the cellarer's buildings, are still extant. The Chapter House, completed about 1253, was for long the meeting-place of the Commons during the sessions of parliament. It was Edward VI who transferred them to the chapel of St. Stephen in Westminster Palace. The abbey was dissolved by Henry VIII in January 1540, and, after a brief restoration under Mary, was reconstituted as a collegiate church with a dean and prebendaries at the beginning of the reign of Elizabeth. It retained most of the peculiar privileges it had enjoyed as a religious house, but its sanctuary rights were abolished in 1602. The connexion between the abbey and the Crown has been close all through its history. William the Conqueror established the precedent for the coronation there of the English sovereigns, and throughout the Middle Ages the abbey church was the usual place of interment for the kings and queens of England. The conception of Westminster as the "national Valhalla" is of recent growth, and from an æsthetic standpoint its consequences have been too often deplorable.

Westminster Assembly, THE, was convoked by order of the Long Parliament in June 1643, to consider the condition of the Church, as "many things in its liturgy, discipline, and government required further and more perfect reformation." It met on July 1, and, after a sermon from Dr. Twiss, the prolocutor, began its sessions in Henry VII's chapel, whence it afterwards removed (September) to the Jerusalem Chamber. The assembly consisted of both lay and clerical members, and was never very numerous—about 60 attending its ordinary sittings. The great majority of the assembly were inclined to Presbyterianism, and many of them profoundly convinced of its divine right. This party was further strengthened when political necessities involved a close alliance with the Scots, and compelled the assembly to accept the Covenant and to add to its numbers Henderson, Baillie, and other commissioners of the general assembly of the Scottish Church. Their predominance was further assured when the moderate Episcopals, the advocates of "Ussher's model," including the archbishop himself, either refused to sit or withdrew from the assembly. But a small though extremely energetic and intelligent opposition, consisting partly of "Erastians," like the lawyers Selden, St. John, and White-locke; and the divines, Coleman and, to some extent, Lightfoot; and partly of Independents, like the "dissenting brethren," Vane, Nye, Goodwin, Bridge, Burroughs, and Simpson, Burgess, Calamy, Marshall, and Ash, were, with the Scots, the most famous of the Presbyterian party. After 1645 Charles Herle was its prolocutor. The debates of the assembly extended over nearly all possible subjects of theology. From July 1643 to the summer of 1647 it pursued its way uninterrupted. It spent much time on the revision of the articles, which involved endless theological discussion. It superseded the Prayer Book by the "Directory of Public Worship" (November 1644). It did its best to establish a rigid Presbyterian organization, slightly modified by a few insignificant concessions to the Independents, and, pending its establishment, it took upon itself the function of ordaining ministers. It drew up the celebrated "Westminster Confession of Faith" (April 1645—April 1647), with the Longer and Shorter Catechisms, which have since remained the authoritative expositions of British Presbyterianism. Possessing no direct power, it was necessarily somewhat dependent on the Parliament to which it owed its existence; though this did not prevent the active section exalting the spiritual power so highly as to call down upon the assembly the threat of an action for præmunire. After the summer of 1647 the retirement of the Scots marked the ending of the main business of the assembly. The formal sessions ceased on February 22, 1649; but up to March 25, 1652, a small number of its divines continued to meet for the purpose of examining candidates for ordination, until Cromwell's dissolution of the Rump led to their silent disappearance without formal dismissal. Despite their narrowness and bigotry, the members of the Westminster Assembly had shown much learning and zeal, and some moderation, in a critical and arduous duty.

Westminster Conference, THE, or THEOLOGICAL CONTROVERSY, held in Westminster Abbey in March 1559, was the name given to a discussion nominally intended to settle certain questions of doctrine and ritual; but it had been determined beforehand by the Protestant party that the discussion should be in their favour, and that no decision should be arrived at. The subjects of controversy were: (1) The use of prayer in a tongue (Latin) unknown to the people. (2) The right of local churches to change their ceremonies if the edification of the people required it. (3) The propitiatory sacrifice for the quick and dead said to be offered in the Mass. The champions of Catholicism were Bishops White, Baynes, Scot, and Watson, Archdeacon Langdale, Oglethorpe, Cole, Chedsey, the chaplain of Bishop Bonner, and Harpsfield. The Protestants were Scory, Grindal, Coxe, Whitehead, Aymer, Horne, Guest, and Jewel.

Westminster Hall was built by William Rufus in 1097-9. It was used for sittings of the courts of law in 1224. Richard II had the hall rebuilt in 1397. The law courts, which had been attached to the outside walls of the hall, were taken down in 1884 after the completion of the Royal Palace of Justice in the Strand.

Westminster, THE PROVISIONS OF (1259), were drawn up in accordance with the plan prescribed by the Provisions of Oxford (q.v.). They were republished by Henry III in 1262, and again in 1264 during his captivity. They were subsequently embodied in the Statute of Marlborough (1267). They provided for the orderly inheritance of property, forbade the disparaging marriage of wards, and the granting of lands, etc., to aliens; the offices of state and the fortresses were to be put into the hands of Englishmen only; ecclesiastics should not acquire any land without the sanction of the immediate lord, and benefit of clergy was limited.

Stubbs, "Select Charters," ed. H. W. C. Davis, 1913.

Westminster, THE FIRST STATUTE OF (1275), was one of the earliest of Edward I's great legal measures, and was one of reform and consolidation. It contains fifty-one clauses, and covers the whole ground of legislation, so that it is almost a code in itself. Its language now recalls that of Canute or Alfred, now anticipates that of our own day: on the one hand common right is to be done to all, as well poor as rich, without respect of persons; on the other, elections are to be free, and no man is by force, malice, or menace to disturb them. The spirit of the Great Charter is not less discernible; excessive amercements, abuses of wardship, irregular demands for feudal aids, are forbidden in the same words, or by amending enactments. The inquiry system of Henry II, the law of wreck, and the institution of coroner's measures of Richard and his ministers, come under review, as well as the Provisions of Oxford (q.v.) and the Statute of Marlborough.

Westminster, THE SECOND STATUTE OF (1285), like the preceding, is rather a code than a simple statute. It contains the famous article De Donis Conditionalibus (q.v.), which exercised a most important influence on the history of English land laws by enabling the creation of the estate tail. In addition it alters and improves the laws relating to manorial jurisdictions, trial of criminals, the rights of common, dower, and advowsons.

Westminster, THE THIRD STATUTE OF (1290). ["QUIA EMPTORES."]

Westmorland, EARLS OF. [NEVILLE.]

Weston, RICHARD, 1ST EARL OF PORTLAND (1577-1635), became collector of the customs in the port of London (1616), and one of the commissioners charged with the reform of the navy (1618). In September 1621 he was appointed chancellor of the exchequer. In 1624 he strongly opposed war with Spain, but contrived to preserve Buckingham's favour, and was created Baron Weston on April 13, 1628. In the House of Lords he strove to amend the Petition of Right by inserting a clause saving the king's "sovereign right," and two months later he was made lord treasurer (July 1628). After Buckingham's death he succeeded to his influence, and became the king's chief adviser. As such he advised the dissolution of the third parliament, and was threatened with impeachment by Eliot. In foreign affairs he aimed at an understanding with Spain, and he opposed intervention in the Thirty Years' War. His influence in the council was assailed by Laud, by the queen, by the Earl of Holland, and many others, yet he retained the king's confidence till his death. He was created Earl of Portland in 1633.

Wetherell, SIR CHARLES (1770-1846), was the son of Nathan Wetherell, Dean of Hereford. He was educated at Magdalen College, Oxford, and was called to the bar (1794). His friendship with Lord Eldon, who received the great seal in 1801, stood him in good stead. His practice increased continually, and in 1816 he was made king's counsel. In 1817 he undertook the defence of James Watson after the Spa Fields Riots (q.v.), but this proceeding did not further his chances of promotion. In 1813 he was elected to parliament for Shaftesbury, but never acquired any great influence with the House. From 1820 to 1826 he represented the city of Oxford. From 1826 to 1830 he sat for Plympton; and in 1830 he was elected for Boroughbridge, which was disfranchised by the Reform Bill. He then retired from parliament. In 1824 he was appointed solicitor-general by the Earl of Liverpool; and in 1826 he succeeded to the attorney-generalship, an office which he did not, however, hold longer than till April 30 the following year. In 1828 he again became attorney-general under Wellington, but resigned when the government accepted the Catholic Relief Bill (April 1829). He opposed Lord Grey's Reform Bill with the greatest ability and perseverance, and in consequence became extremely unpopular in the country. In 1831, therefore, when he proceeded to Bristol to hold the October sessions as recorder of the town, his carriage was surrounded by an infuriated mob, and he and the other corporate authorities were pelted with stones. Sir Charles retained his office, however, till his death, which was due to an accident when out driving.

Wexford was frequently the scene of conflict in Irish wars and rebellions. It was taken by Maurice Fitzgerald and Robert Fitzstephen in 1169. In 1462 it was seized by Sir John Butler, and recovered by the Earl of Ormonde. In the autumn of 1641 it was captured by the Irish rebels. Cromwell appeared before Wexford after the capture of Drogheda in 1649, refused to grant the terms proposed by the governor, and demanded an unconditional surrender, giving only an hour for reflection. The gates were not opened at the end of the hour granted, and the town was at once stormed. Some 3,000 or 4,000 people were massacred (October 9, 1649). It was in Wexford that the rebellion of 1798 assumed its most dangerous form. It broke out on May 26, and the troops were defeated in rapid succession at Oulast, Enniscorthy, and at the Three Rocks. In consequence of this last defeat, General Fawcett, who had been advancing to support Maxwell, who commanded in Wexford, retreated, and on the 31st Maxwell himself had to follow his example, his men refusing to fight. The Protestant inhabitants and fugitives had fled to the ships in the harbour, but were brought back and thrown into prison. After the rebel defeat at New Ross the Protestants were given a choice between conversion to Catholicism and death. On June 20 ninety-seven Protestants were murdered after a mock trial. The nominal leader of the rebels was Bagenal Harvey (q.v.), but the real leader was Father Murphy (q.v.). Lake's victory at Vinegar Hill (q.v.—June 21, 1798), crushed the Wexford rebellion, and the insurgents evacuated the town the same day.

Whalley, EDWARD (d. 1675 ?), was a member of an ancient Nottinghamshire family, and a first cousin of Oliver Cromwell. He joined the Parliamentary army, and distinguished himself by his bravery at Naseby, for which he was made a colonel of horse. During Charles I's imprisonment at Hampton Court he was placed in Whalley's charge. In 1655 he was made one of the major-generals, and subsequently one of the "lords" of Cromwell's Upper House. He took a prominent part in the trial of the king, and was one of those who signed the death warrant. When the Restoration became inevitable he fled to America, where he led a life of danger, having continually to hide in the woods and among Puritan friends, who protected him from the warrant which had been issued against him.

Whalley, RICHARD (1499 ?-1583), one of the most unscrupulous adherents of Protector Somerset, was receiver-general in Yorkshire, where he managed to appropriate a good deal of the public money. In 1551 he was accused of having formed a plot for the restoration of the Protector, and was sent to the Tower until released on the accession of Mary.

Wharton, PHILIP, DUKE OF WHARTON (1698-1731), son of Thomas, Marquis of Wharton, early displayed extraordinary talents, combined with an utterly dissolute and unprincipled character. In 1716 he went abroad and had interviews with the Pretender and queen-dowager, and offered them his services. He sat in the Irish parliament as a Whig, but on coming to England he passed into opposition. His talents were employed in publishing an opposition paper, known as the True Briton (June 3, 1723—February 17, 1724). In 1720 his violent attack on Lord Stanhope and the ministry, when the South Sea Company was under discussion, so enraged that statesman as to cause a rush of blood to his head, which proved fatal. Wharton made a fine speech in 1723 in defence of Atterbury (q.v.). Shortly afterwards his debts compelled him to leave England. He went to Spain, where he openly attached himself to the Pretender's cause, and was created by him Duke of Northumberland (1726). He became a pretended convert to Roman Catholicism. At this time the schemes of Ripperda, the Spanish minister, had resulted in a close alliance between Spain and Austria, while by a secret treaty these powers pledged themselves to assist the restoration of the Stuarts. But the imprudence of Wharton and Ripperda ruined the plan. Wharton had so far cast aside his nationality as to become a volunteer in the siege of Gibraltar. In 1728 he tried to become reconciled with the British court, but they, through Horace Walpole, refused to remit the indictment for high treason which had been preferred against him. His character has been drawn in Pope's lines :

"Wharton, the scorn and wonder of our days,
Whose ruling passion was the lust of praise.

A fool, with more of wit than half mankind;
Too rash for thought—for action too refin'd;
A tyrant to the wife his heart approves;
A rebel to the very king he loves."

"Memoirs of Wharton," 1731; J. R. Robinson, "Philip, Duke of Wharton," 1896; Lewis Melville, "Life and Writings of Philip, Duke of Wharton," 1913; E. B. Chancellor, "Lives of the Rakes," vol. iii, 1924.

Wharton, Thomas, 1st Marquis of Wharton (1648–1715), was the son of Philip, 4th Lord Wharton, who had fought on the side of the Parliament in the Civil War. He was educated in the strictest Calvinism, but nevertheless became one of the most dissolute of the Cavaliers at the Restoration. He was, however, throughout his life a firm adherent of the Whig party. In 1679 he was elected for Buckinghamshire, where his political influence was very great. It is said that in this and other counties he sent thirty members to parliament. He was one of the boldest opponents of James II. When James reprimanded the Commons on the subject of the Test Act, Wharton proposed that a time should be appointed for taking the king's answer into consideration. By his song "Lillibullero" (q.v.), a satire on Tyrconnell's administration, Wharton afterwards boasted that he had sung a king out of three kingdoms. On the arrival of William in England Wharton joined him at Exeter. When the throne was declared vacant Wharton was the first to propose that it should be occupied by William and Mary. In 1695 he conducted an attack on the Tory ministry. A committee was appointed to examine the books of the City of London and the East India Company. He was placed in the chair; and as the result of the inquiry moved the impeachment of the Duke of Leeds. In 1696 he supported the bill for Fenwick's attainder, which caused the Whigs to triumph completely. He was made chief justice in eyre, retaining his place of comptroller of the household. In 1697 he hoped to become secretary of state, but William refused to grant the request, for fear of alienating the Tories. Next year a Tory reaction set in, and Wharton's candidates were defeated throughout England. In 1700 he proposed amendments in the bill for the resumption of Irish land grants. A struggle took place between the Lords and Commons; but the former yielded, and Wharton retired from London. In 1701 he regained all his influence in Buckinghamshire. On the accession of Anne he was removed from his employments. In 1705 he proposed a Regency Bill in the case of the queen's demise. In 1708, after the junto had joined Godolphin's ministry, he was made lord-lieutenant of Ireland. There he showed great hostility to the Catholics, but was disposed to conciliate the Dissenters. He was superseded by Ormonde in 1710. His administration was bitterly attacked by Swift, whose "Short Character of the Earl of Wharton" is a satire of the most savage character. During the last session of Anne's parliament he displayed great zeal for the Protestant succession. He opposed Bolingbroke's Schism Act; he proposed that the Duke of Lorraine should be compelled to expel the Pretender from his dominions; he advocated the issuing of a proclamation offering a reward for the apprehension of the Pretender, whether dead or alive. On the accession of George I he was made lord privy seal, and created a marquis. In the next year he died. Wharton's private character was irredeemably bad. He was notorious as the greatest profligate in England, and his effrontery and mendacity had no bounds. He was the most thorough-going and unscrupulous of all the Whig party men of the age.

Whig. This famous party name was first used to denote the stern Covenanters of southwestern Scotland, who struggled against the royalist and episcopal restoration of 1660, and frequently rose in fruitless revolt against the government of Charles II. About 1679, during the height of the Popish Plot agitation, the name was applied to the champions of the Exclusion Bill (q.v.), at first in derision, but before long as their accepted name. The Whig party had, however, existed in fact long before it existed in name. It sprang from the old country party, which had begun the contest with Charles I, and had, with varying fortunes, continued to struggle against his son. In this sense the germ of the Whig party is almost as old as the end of the reign of Elizabeth. Proscribed after the failure of the Exclusion Bill, the Whig party found their principles accepted by nearly the whole nation in 1688. The accession of the house of Hanover completed a triumph which lasted until the accession of George III. During this long period of power the Whigs became conservative. Those who had been zealous for the old liberties of the nation, for Magna Carta, the Habeas Corpus Act, and the "Social Contract," now regarded the Revolution, the Toleration Act, and the Bill of Rights as including all the most important of their principles. All now needed was to preserve the admirable constitution which the Revolution had brought, and to govern the country in its spirit. The opposition to the Crown had always been led by the aristocracy. The triumph of the opposition made the English government a "Venetian oligarchy," while reducing the sovereign to the position of the doge. Of this party in its earliest stage Locke was the great teacher; Somers and Walpole, perhaps, the greatest practical statesmen. But the long tenure of power demoralized the party, so that from being stationary it became almost reactionary, while most corrupt in its administration. Attacked both from the popular and royalist sides by Chatham and George III, the lack of agreement between the two elements of opposition, and the narrowly personal character of George III's policy, postponed for a time its final defeat. At last Chatham's son repudiated the name of Whig, and, in alliance with the Crown, dealt a death-blow to the Whig aristocracy. The writings of Burke enshrine in its most perfect form the Whig theory of government. But with the French Revolution new political factors came into play, which revolutionized again the Whig party. The meaning of the term changed. "Revolution Whigs," like Burke, became practically Tories. The more active section of the party became Liberal, if not Radical. Fox was the founder of the New Whigs, whose first principle was admiration of the French Revolution, and who were the progenitors of the modern Liberal party. Their principles triumphed in the Reform Bill of 1832; but once in power the aristocratic and conservative element which still remained in the Whig party began to show itself again to the disgust of the more advanced section of the reformers. Gradually the word Whig became so discredited that Whig progressists preferred to borrow from continental politics the term Liberal as a better designation of their party. The development of new party principles by the changes involved in the Reform Act completed the change. Ultimately the term Whig became almost a term of reproach in the great party which has inherited its traditions; in so far as it still finds a place in current political parlance it is popularly used in a disparaging sense to denote a timid and rather old-fashioned type of aristocratic politician. [T. F. T.]

Whiggamores' Raid, THE (1648), is the name given to the proceedings of a body of Covenanters who assembled at Mauchline in Ayrshire, under Lord Eglinton, and marched to Edinburgh, just before the outbreak of the Bishops' War.

Whitbread, SAMUEL (1758-1815), was the son of a London brewer. He was educated at Eton, and St. John's College, Oxford. In 1790 he was returned to parliament for Bedford, and first signalized himself by a powerful speech in opposition to the proposal of the ministry for a Russian armament. In 1793 he opposed the project of a war with France. Throughout the long sway of Pitt, Whitbread was one of the foremost men among the opposition. When in 1805 the opposition decided to bring Lord Melville to account Whitbread was selected to move the resolutions. Consistent in his view of the war policy throughout, he never ceased to inveigh against the rupture of the Peace of Amiens, and broke with a large section of his own party, who were at last convinced of the insincerity of Napoleon's professions. In 1809 he took a prominent and fearless part in the inquiry into the Duke of York's conduct. On Napoleon's escape from Elba, Whitbread again raised his voice against any attempt to impose a ruler on France and to interfere with the choice of the nation. Unfortunately he only lived just long enough to see the end of a war which he so violently detested. He incurred much odium in his attempts to put down the jobbery which had prevented Drury Lane Theatre from occupying the national position which it ought to have held. The strain thus entailed on him, combined with his parliamentary labours, were too much for him; his mind gave way, and on July 6, 1815, he died by his own hand.

Romilly, "Life."

Whitby, THE SYNOD OF (664), is of great importance in the history of the English Church. It was assembled at the instance of Oswy of Northumbria, then the most powerful king in Britain, to settle the points at issue between the Roman Church (supreme in Wessex, Essex, and East Anglia), and the Celtic Church (supreme in Northumbria and Mercia), as to the date of Easter and other minor details of ritual. The influence of Wilfrid of Ripon sufficed to secure a decision in favour of Rome, and Bishop Colman with his Scottish clerks retired to Iona. Thus ended the danger that Teutonic Britain might be permanently divided into two Churches, the one in communion with Rome, the other with the Celtic peoples of the West.

White, JOHN (1510 ?-1560), Bishop of Lincoln and afterwards of Winchester, was a strong opponent of the Reformation, and was imprisoned in the Tower by Edward VI. Under Mary he obtained high favour at court, and was one of the commissioners appointed to try Cranmer for heresy (1555). On the accession of Elizabeth he was again sent to the Tower for preaching a violent sermon against the queen.

White Bands, THE PARLIAMENT OF (1321), was the name given to the parliament which banished the Despencers, from the white favours which were worn by the adherents of the barons.

Whiteboys, THE. The increased demand for salt beef and salt butter in the middle of the eighteenth century gave a great impetus to the change from tillage to pasture in Ireland. Tithes aggravated the sufferings of the tenants which necessarily followed this change. The Whiteboy movement was the result; it was formidable chiefly in Tipperary and Limerick. In the spring of 1760 troops had to be sent out, together with a special commission to try the numerous offenders, but few were convicted. The leader of the Whiteboys called himself Captain Danger, and from 1762 to 1765 his commands were better obeyed and enforced than the law. At last the gentry formed bodies of volunteers, and this move, together with the execution of a certain Father Nicholas Sheehy in 1766, repressed the outrages for a time. In 1786, however, the Whiteboys reappeared in Munster; they mustered in opposition to the payment of tithes, and forced the people to swear to obey the captain's orders. They disarmed all Protestants, and committed terrible outrages, especially on curates and clergymen of the Established Church. In 1786 they were bold enough to attack a detachment of the 20th Regiment; they were driven off with some difficulty, as they had managed to obtain the arms of the volunteers. In the next year a stringent Crimes Bill was passed. General Luttrell was now sent with troops, and he and Lord Tyrone stopped the movement for the moment. But soon afterwards the high sheriff had to fly for his life from the Whiteboys, and now at last the gentry, roused, and headed by Lord Kenmare, a Catholic, hunted them down without mercy, while shiploads were sent off to Botany Bay. After the rebellion of 1798 nothing was heard of them for some time, but in 1821 they again appeared in Munster as "Whitefeet," and under other names. The Insurrection Act checked them, but in 1833 they were more active than ever.

Whitefield, or WHITFIELD, GEORGE (1714-70), was born at Gloucester and educated at Oxford, where he joined the Methodists. He was ordained at the early age of 21, and after holding various curacies in England went to America to join the Wesleys, reaching Savannah in 1738. He returned to England and met with extraordinary success as a preacher. In 1739 he went again to America, and came back to England in 1741. The rest of his life he spent in travelling and preaching.

Whitelocke, BULSTRODE (1605-75), son of Judge Sir James Whitelocke, became a student at the Middle Temple, and was elected to parliament for Marlow in November 1640. At the trial of the Earl of Strafford, Whitelocke had the charge of the last seven articles of the impeachment. At the outbreak of the war he raised troops, and occupied Oxford for the Parliament (August 1642), but was forced to abandon it immediately. He acted as one of the commissioners for the Parliament during the negotiations at Oxford and Uxbridge, and was also a member of the Westminster Assembly (q.v.). In May 1647 he voted against the disbanding of the army, and in March 1648 was appointed one of the commissioners of the great seal. He became ambassador to Sweden (November 1653). After concluding a treaty of amity with Queen Christina, he returned to England, and resumed his duties as commissioner of the great seal. From this office he was dismissed (June 1655) for opposing Cromwell's ordinance for the reform of Chancery. He was nominated as a member of Cromwell's House of Lords, but refused to accept the title of viscount which the Protector wished to confer on him. Richard Cromwell appointed him keeper of the great seal, but he nevertheless became a member of the council of state of the restored Rump. He remained in retirement from the close of 1659 to the final dissolution of the Long Parliament. The House of Commons by 175 to 134 votes decided that Whitelocke should have the benefit of the Act of Indemnity, and he escaped all punishment.

Whitgift, JOHN (1530 ?-1604), Archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Great Grimsby, educated at Cambridge, and became master of Trinity in 1567. Having early become a zealous advocate of the reformed doctrines, he would have been compelled to quit England during the Marian persecution had he not been protected by his friend Dr. Andrew Perne. After the accession of Elizabeth, Whitgift soon acquired great reputation as a preacher, and in 1573 was made dean of Lincoln, subsequently obtaining the see of Worcester in 1577. In 1583 he accepted the primacy of England in succession to Edmund Grindal (q.v.), and at once set himself to remedy the abuses caused by his predecessor's leniency. He issued articles for the regulation of the Church of extreme severity, and took active measures against the Puritans whom he had formerly attacked in his answer to Cartwright's "Admonition" (q.v.). On the death of Sir Thomas Bromley in 1587 the post of lord high chancellor was offered to the archbishop, but refused by him to his great honour. In 1595 he drew up the famous Lambeth Articles (q.v.), and on the death of the queen endeavoured to win the favour of her successor, an attempt in which he succeeded admirably, owing to his politic flattery of James I. Though nominally president of the Hampton Court Conference (q.v.) in 1604, he delegated most of his duties to Bishop Bancroft, owing to his old age, and died shortly afterwards of a paralytic stroke. Mosheim says of him: "He was disinterested, consistent, single-minded, liberal, and discerning above most men. His great natural blemish was hastiness of temper. This, however, he corrected by a spirit so thoroughly considerate and forgiving that his friends rather apprehended from him undue lenity. When principle was at stake he would make no compromise. In secular politics he did not interfere, usually retiring from the council board when it was unoccupied by ecclesiastical affairs."

Whithern (or CANDIDA CASA) was the capital of the district subsequently known as Galloway, and is said to have been the see of St. Ninian, who in 397 built a church there, which he dedicated to St. Martin of Tours. About 730 the Northumbrians founded a bishopric here under Pecthelm, but the line of Anglic bishops came to an end with Beadulf in 803.

Whittington, RICHARD (d. 1423), hero of the popular nursery tale of Dick Whittington and his cat, was a figure of some importance in the history of London during the late fourteenth and early fifteenth centuries. He is a good type of the mediæval city magnate. By trade a mercer, he three times held office as mayor of London (1397-8, 1406-7, and 1419-20); and enjoyed in turn the confidence of Richard II, Henry IV, and Henry V, to all of whom he lent large sums of money. The legend associated with his name does not appear to have originated earlier than the seventeenth century, and bears no relation to the facts of his career.

Widdrington, SIR THOMAS (d. 1664), was a member of an ancient Northumberland family, and was elected member for Berwick in 1640. He took a prominent part on the Presbyterian side against the bishops, but finding subsequently that the Independents were the rising party, he joined them, and in 1648 was made one of the commissioners of the great seal. He refused to take any part in the king's trial, but in 1651 was made one of the council of state. He was in favour of making the young Duke of Gloucester king under restrictions, but this advice was not relished either by the Cromwellian or Republican factions. Cromwell reappointed him to his commissionership (1654), but on his refusing to assent to the proposed reforms in Chancery he was removed from office in 1655. He was chosen Speaker of the parliament of 1656, in which capacity he presented the Humble Petition and Advice (q.v.) to Cromwell, and strongly advocated his assuming the royal title. In 1658 he was made chief baron of the Exchequer, and in 1660 commissioner of the great seal, which office he held till the Restoration. He owed his rise in great measure to his having married a sister of Lord Fairfax.

Wight, THE ISLE OF (called by the Romans VECTIS, and in "Domesday Book" WICHT and WIHT), was conquered by Claudius in A.D. 43. Its earliest English settlers were Jutes, but no written evidences of their activities remain. In 661 it was conquered by Wulfhere of Wessex and bestowed upon his vassal the King of Sussex. It suffered severely from Danish attacks. Earl Godwin, after his banishment by Edward the Confessor, made a descent on the island in 1052. After the Conquest William allotted the island to William Fitz-Osbern, who was created lord of the Isle of Wight. Fitz-Osbern built the greater part of Carisbrooke Castle. The island was temporarily held by the French just after the accession of Richard II, and was frequently plundered by them down to the time of Richard III. In the reign of Henry VI it was allotted to the Earl of Warwick, and on the accession of Edward IV it passed to Earl Rivers, whose successors, the Woodvilles, were captains of the Isle of Wight for several generations. The first governor of the island was the Earl of Pembroke, appointed by the Long Parliament. He was succeeded by Colonel Hammond, to whom Charles I repaired after his escape from Hampton Court. During the imprisonment of the king at Carisbrooke, and subsequently at Hurst Castle, the complicated negotiations and intrigues between the king and parliament were carried on chiefly at Newport. The title of captain was revived in 1889 in favour of Prince Henry of Battenberg.

Wiglaf, KING OF MERCA (827-839), succeeded Ludecan. In 829 he was driven out of his kingdom by Egbert of Wessex, who himself assumed the rule of Mercia; but next year he was allowed to return, and ruled as the vassal of Wessex for the rest of his reign.

Wigmore, ROGER MORTIMER, 8TH BARON OF (1287?-1330). [MORTIMER.]

Wihgtar (d. 543?), according to the traditional account of the Anglo-Saxon invasions of Britain, was one of the founders of the kingdom of Wessex. Together with his brother Stuf he landed in Britain in 514, and in 534 the brothers received the Isle of Wight as a tributary kingdom from Cerdic and his son Cynric. The authenticity of the story is, however, more than doubtful. Wihgtar appears to have been a purely legendary person—the eponymous hero of the men of Wight—the Wihgtaras. [WESSEX.]

Wihtrred, KING OF KENT (694-725), was the brother of Edric. After the death of the latter in 686 Kent suffered severely from the ravages of Ceadwalla of Wessex, and after his abdication lapsed into anarchy. Not until 694 did Wihtrred, brother of the last native king, succeed in establishing himself in sole authority. His reign was successful, and he is spoken of as "an admirable ruler, an invincible warrior, and a pious Christian."

Wilberforce, WILLIAM (1759-1833), a member of an old Yorkshire family, was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, where he formed a close friendship with Pitt. On leaving Cambridge he was returned to parliament for Hull, his native town (1780). He at once opposed North, especially in regard to the American War. But on Pitt becoming prime minister he exerted all his powers in support of the struggling government; and at the general election in 1784 he was identified with the Tories, and chosen to represent his native county against all the influence of the Whig families. In parliament he strongly supported Pitt's measures for parliamentary reform. In 1787 he first mentioned in parliament the subject of the slave trade, with which his name is most familiarly associated, and in the next year proposed a resolution pledging the House to take the subject into consideration (May 9). After a long series of preliminary struggles Wilberforce, in 1791, proposed to prevent the further importation of African negroes into the colonies. The bill was rejected by a majority of seventy-five votes (April 18). The next year he proposed a measure for gradually educating the negroes, so that they might at length be fit to be emancipated. This was passed; and from that time forward Wilberforce persevered in order to obtain the total abolition of the trade. His efforts were at length crowned with success. What his friend Pitt had found impossible to achieve, the Whig administration of 1807 accomplished with little difficulty (May 25) with only sixteen dissentient voices, a triumphant result, which was no doubt in some measure due to the opportune appearance of a book by Wilberforce on the subject. Already in 1797 he had acquired considerable celebrity as an author by a book discussing the contrast between the practice and profession of English Christianity, especially among the upper classes. After the abolition of the English slave trade, he was not satisfied at the result of his exertions, but still strove for its universal extinction by all countries. But his efforts were not entirely confined in this particular channel. He took an active part in miscellaneous questions, and gained a very conspicuous place in parliament, both by his own genius and singularly captivating oratory and by his entire independence of party. An instance of this may be seen in his conduct with regard to Lord Melville, whose refusal to render an account of public moneys he criticized sharply, in spite of his friendship for Melville's patron, Pitt. In 1812 he retired, on account of ill-health, from the representation of Yorkshire, which had at six successive elections triumphantly returned him, and in 1825 he retired altogether from parliament. He lived on in broken health for eight years more, and died in 1833. "Few persons," said Lord Brougham, "have ever either reached a higher and more enviable place in the esteem of their fellow-creatures, or have better deserved the place than Wilberforce, whose genius was elevated by his virtues, and exalted by his piety."

"Wild Geese," THE, was the name given to young Irishmen who were recruited (chiefly from Kerry) for the Irish Brigade in the French service. In 1721 as many as 20,000 are said to have left the country. In 1730 and 1741 certain French officers were allowed by the government to recruit in Ireland. The Wild Geese were most numerous, however, during the War of the Austrian Succession (1739-48).

Wilde, THOMAS, LORD TRURO (1782-1855), was the son of an attorney. He was educated at St. Paul's School, called to the bar at the Inner Temple (1817), and rose steadily in his profession. In 1820 he was engaged as one of the counsel for Queen Caroline on her trial. He entered the House of Commons as Whig member for Newark (1831); lost his seat in 1832; but was returned in 1835, 1837, and 1839. In 1839 he became solicitor-general, and in 1841 he was advanced to the attorney-generalship, but retired the same year with his party. In 1846 he was again attorney-general, and in 1850 was made lord chancellor by Lord John Russell, and created a peer. In 1852 he retired with his party. As lord chancellor, he appointed a commission to inquire into the jurisdiction, pleading, and practice of the Court of Chancery. Their report recommended the abolition of the masters' offices, a measure which Lord Truro succeeded in passing, though he had quitted office at the time. Several other important reforms in the procedure of the Chancery court and offices were effected by him.

Wilfrid (or WILFRITH), ST. (634-709), began his ecclesiastical career as a novice at Lindisfarne. In 653 he went to Rome in the company of Benedict Biscop. On his return he became tutor to the son of Oswy, King of Northumbria, from whom he received the abbacy of Ripon. At the Synod of Whitby (q.v.) (664) he upheld the Roman cause, of which his sojourn on the continent had made him a firm adherent; and it was largely through his influence that Oswy's decision was given in favour of Rome. After the departure of the Scottish clergy he was appointed to the see of York, and crossed over to Gaul to obtain consecration from Agilbert, Bishop of Paris. During his prolonged absence Oswy appointed

Chad bishop in his place, and Wilfrid, on his return, found himself obliged to retire to Ripon. In 669, however, Chad resigned York to him, and Wilfrid held it until 678; but in that year he again quarrelled with the Northumbrian king. Under the scheme of Theodore of Tarsus (q.v.) for reorganizing the English diocesan system, Wilfrid's great see of York, which comprised the whole of the Northumbrian kingdom, was, without his consent, split into three. Wilfrid, finding his protests unavailing, departed to lay his case before the pope, Bosa being instituted Bishop of York in his place. After spending some time among the heathen of Friesland he reached Rome in 679. He obtained a papal decree ordering his restoration; but it was disregarded by King Egfrid, who threw the returned exile into prison. Released after some nine months, Wilfrid sought refuge among the heathen South Saxons, whom between 681 and 686 he converted to Christianity. At length, after Egfrid's death, Wilfrid was reconciled to Archbishop Theodore and restored to the diminished see of York; but his stormy career was not yet over. In 691 he quarrelled with Aldfrid, Egfrid's pacific successor, who wished to found a fourth Northumbrian diocese at Ripon. Exiled from the northern kingdom, he accepted from Ethelred of Mercia the see of Leicester, which he held for no less than eleven years. In 703-4 he once more appealed to Rome, and again secured a decision in his favour. Aldfrid refused to accept the papal decree and it was not until after his death in 705 that a compromise was at length effected. Wilfrid was not restored to York, but he received instead the diocese of Hexham, and Ripon was given back to him. He died at Oundle four years later. His indefatigable zeal, his support of monasticism, and his missionary activity earned him the title of saint; but to an impartial observer it appears that his troubles were largely of his own making. He was proud and unconciliatory in disposition, and his resistance to king and archbishop seems to have been dictated rather by self-interest than by any considerations of wider policy.

Wilkes, JOHN (1727-97), the son of Israel Wilkes, a rich distiller, was born on October 17, 1727. Early in life he was persuaded to marry a rich heiress, whom he treated with much cruelty and neglect. In the gayest and most vicious society of a gay and vicious age he soon became conspicuous by the brilliance of his wit and his reckless debauchery. In 1757, after being previously rejected at Berwick, he bought himself a seat in parliament for Aylesbury. On June 5, 1762, with Churchill's help, he started a periodical, known as the North Briton. In it he cleverly managed to suit the popular sentiments of the time, and especially pandered to the general indignation against Bute, and the animosity felt towards the Scottish nation. On April 23, 1763, appeared

"Number 45," which attacked the king's speech at the close of the late session. Grenville signaled his entrance into office by arresting Wilkes under a general warrant. After being examined before Lords Halifax and Egremont, the secretaries of state, he was sent to the Tower, from which he was soon released in virtue of his prerogative as a member of parliament. He then retired to Paris. On the meeting of parliament in November a resolution was passed, declaring No. 45 to be "a false, scandalous, and malicious libel" (November 15); and it was also resolved that privilege of parliament did not extend to the case of writing and publishing seditious libels. Being prevented from obeying an order of the House to attend in his place, he was expelled in his absence. The Lords went further; and, on the information of Lord Sandwich, who had himself been a partner in nearly all Wilkes's vices, ordered prosecution to be instituted against him on account of a work entitled "An Essay on Woman," of which thirteen copies only had been printed, and those for private circulation. Wilkes knew that the court of King's Bench, under the presidency of Lord Mansfield, would decide against him, and preferred to be condemned in his absence. The sentence passed on him was outlawry, and for four years he remained abroad. In February 1768 he ventured again to appear in London, and in the conspicuous position of candidate for the City. He was defeated, but at once announced himself as a candidate for Middlesex. He was welcomed with acclamations by the electors, and elected by an overwhelming majority (March 28). The outlawry was at length reversed; but on the original charge Wilkes was ordered to pay a fine of £1,000, and sentenced to imprisonment for twenty-two calendar months. In November 1768 Wilkes addressed a petition to the House, in which he claimed his privilege against further imprisonment. This was disallowed. In the February following his expulsion was voted, and a new writ was issued for Middlesex. He was again elected. The Commons replied by a decision that Wilkes having been expelled was incapable of being returned to the same parliament, and that his election was null and void; but the electors of Middlesex again returned him by a majority of 800 over the court candidate, Colonel Luttrell. The House now decided that Luttrell ought to have been elected. A petition against Luttrell's election was lodged; but the House was not to be convinced by the arguments of Grenville, Wedderburn, and Burke, and confirmed his election. In January 1770 Dowdeswell twice attacked the resolution of the Commons in a substantive motion, and the protest was annually renewed by Sir George Savile, only to meet with a contemptuous rejection. At length, in 1774, the parliament was dissolved; and Wilkes was returned again for Middlesex (October 29), while he held the office of lord mayor. The contest was not reopened,

Wilkes was allowed to take his seat, and he now bent all his efforts to have the resolution which had declared his incapacity expunged from the journals of the House "as subversive of the rights of the whole body of electors." Year after year he proposed his motion, but it was not till May 3, 1782, when the Rockingham government was in power, that all the declarations, orders, and resolutions on the Middlesex election were expunged from the journals. Thus at length, by his firm conduct, Wilkes had obtained from parliament a clear recognition of the right of every constituency to return the member of its choice. But in the meantime he had been waging another contest with the same body. The right of reporting the debates of the House had been always denied by parliament, and had been watched with cautious jealousy, and the printers who issued reports of debates were prosecuted. Wilkes took up their cause, and was backed by all the strength of the City authorities, and the contest finally took the form of a struggle between parliament and the City, in the course of which Lord Mayor Crosby and Alderman Oliver, both members of the House, were in March 1771 committed to the Tower. The House, however, shrank from a new contest with Wilkes, who was the chief offender. The imprisoned members were released on the prorogation of parliament, and the contest thus ended in the defeat of parliament. As a parliamentary speaker Wilkes was an utter failure, and never carried any weight in the House. The electors of Middlesex still stood by him as long as he chose to ask for their support. His cheerful disposition was not affected by the change in his position, and he was never happier than in the society of his dearly-loved daughter. At length, "reconciled to every reputable opponent, from the king downwards," he died at the close of 1799.

William I, KING OF THE ENGLISH (December 25, 1066—September 9, 1087). This, the most masterly spirit of the most masterly race of his time, was a grandson alike of Richard the Good, Duke of Normandy, and of Fulk, the tanner of Falaise, and was born at Falaise in 1027 or 1028. The tanner's daughter, Harlotta, or Herleva, is said to have caught the eye of the duke's son as she was washing linen; an irregular union followed, which lasted through the remainder of Robert's life and brief tenure of the duchy (1028-35). Of this union William, famous as the Bastard, and a daughter, Adelaide, afterwards Countess of Ponthieu, were the issue. After her lover's death Herleva wedded a noble Norman, Herlwin of Conteville, and bore him two children, Odo and Robert, who were both to share in the greatness of their half-brother. Odo became Bishop of Bayeux and Earl of Kent; Robert, Earl of Mortain and of Cornwall. William was barely eight years old when his life entered the domain of history. In 1035 his father died at Nicæa, as he was returning from Jerusalem. Before leaving Normandy Duke Robert had persuaded his chief nobles to swear allegiance to the lad as heir to the duchy, and they now nominally kept their word. William became Duke of Normandy, but his first twelve years of rule were such as few princes have been called on to face, as only a rarely-gifted boy could live through. The Norman nobles threw off all governance; despising the child-duke and his guardians, they did what was right in their own eyes; they waged private war, and plotted against and killed one another as if no central authority existed. The other members of the ducal family, resenting the preference of a bastard to one of themselves, made their young kinsman the constant mark of murderous designs, and William had more than one miraculous deliverance out of their hands. His friends were few and weak; even the French king, Henry, who owed his crown to William's father, turned against him; and robbed him of an important frontier fortress, Tillières. His boyhood was one of unceasing mortifications, anxieties, treacheries, perils, and alarms, but redeemed by one reassuring experience, the touching fidelity of his guardians and humble friends. Two of these were poisoned, and one laid down his life to save his young master's. This was Osbern, who held the door of William's sleeping-room in the castle of Vaudreuil against a sudden inburst of armed men seeking his life, and, before falling dead, had won him the time needed for his escape. Then his maternal uncle, Walter, took up the task of self-devotion, patiently keeping watch over his steps, and sheltering him from harm, till his character had begun to show its natural strength, and Ralph of Wacey, an honourable kinsman, had accepted the post of guardian. The ground was now somewhat firmer under William's feet; at fifteen he was able to give his earliest proof of a capacity for bridling anarchy by wresting Falaise Castle from a rebellious vassal. His independent career began in 1047 in a very striking manner. The lawless spirits of the Cotentin, where the Danish blood and temper still abounded, had risen in rebellion, surprised the castle of Valognes where William was lying, and forced him to flee for his life through the darkness of the night. Not long afterwards he met them with the most loyal of his vassals and his reconciled lord, the French king, at Val-ès-dunes, near Caen, and beat them utterly, crushing the revolt at a single blow. Then, as generally through his life, he treated his vanquished rebels with singular clemency. Thus firmly fixed in his ducal seat, he proceeded to achievements that gained him a European fame before he ever drew sword in England. He established law and order throughout his duchy, adding such correctives to the prevalent feudalism as might make a strong central government possible. His measures met with a stubborn resistance, and over and over again he reduced to submission the ungovernable among his subjects. With the hereditary foe of his house, Geoffrey Martel of Anjou, he resolutely grappled, and in 1049 recovered Alençon, and snatched Domfront from him, departing at the former place from his accustomed lenity by striking off the hands and feet of thirty-two of its defenders, who had beaten hides over their walls in scornful reference to his origin. He took the first step towards his conquest of England by visiting King Edward, his childless kinsman, in 1051, and receiving from him the assurances, necessarily vague, that he afterwards gave out to have been a promise of the succession to the kingdom. In 1053, apparently, he took to wife, despite Pope Leo's inhibition, his cousin, Matilda of Flanders, Count Baldwin's daughter, whom he had loved for four years. The papal ban under which he then fell was not removed till 1060; and religious and charitable foundations were erected by him and his wife as the prescribed atonement for their defiance of the Church. His growing greatness then gave offence to his suzerain, King Henry, who twice led an army into Normandy to clip the wings of his power. On the first occasion (1054) one of his two invading columns was surprised and routed by Robert of Eu at Mortemer, whereupon the other made all haste to get home again. On the second (1058), just when his force had been halved by the rising tide of the Dive, near Varaville, William came down upon the hinder half thus isolated, and cut it in pieces, scaring Henry not only into a swift retreat, but also into the making of a peace that restored Tillières, and proved lasting. By this time the duchy had increased considerably at the expense of its neighbours, especially of Anjou, and in the wisdom of its rule and general prosperity out-distanced most other states. In 1063 William made his great continental acquisition in the conquest of Maine, upon which a compact with its last count, Herbert Wakedog, gave him a claim, but which the resistance of a part of the people obliged him to reduce by force of arms. Next year he made war on Conan of Brittany with complete success. This was perhaps the expedition on which Harold of England, an impressed guest, was his companion, and after which Harold took the oath that Norman writers declare to have pledged him to uphold the duke's claim to the English throne: for the greatest crisis of William's life, and one of the greatest in European history, was approaching.

Early in 1066 it came. Edward of England died on January 5, and the vacant throne was at once filled by Harold. William felt himself overreached, and lost no time in making himself even with his ready rival, and vindicating his position as a candidate for the English crown. He proceeded to seek material and moral support from every quarter that could supply either, won over the pope, won over his unwilling subjects, drew to his banner swarms of volunteers from surrounding lands, and thus gathered round his cause not merely a noble host of fighting men, but the general sympathy of Europe. On September 28 he landed at Pevensey, marched to Hastings, and on October 14 decided Harold's fate, his own, and England's, at the terrible fight of Senlac. It was his battle in every sense; above all earthly forces, it was his own skill, ready resource, and prowess that gave him the victory. His subsequent movements made him master of the south-eastern counties; at Berkhamstead he was offered, and accepted, the kingdom, and on Christmas Day he was crowned at Westminster. Thus he became a conqueror. But the task of completing and securing his conquest still lay before him, and it cost him four years of rarely-exemplified vigilance, toil, and endurance. After a long visit to Normandy in 1067 he was recalled thence to deal with risings of his new subjects. He won Exeter, and subdued the western counties; marched to Warwick, and brought the Earls Edwin and Morkere, who had rebelled against him, to their knees, entered York, and subdued the northern counties. Next year (1069) he had to confront a general outburst of the west, midlands, and north, and a great Danish invasion, but by wise management and indomitable valour he overcame both insurgents and invaders. He found arguments that persuaded the Danes to withdraw, scattered the rebels, or drove them before him, stormed York, while the men of the west sank under the blows of his captains. As a warning to all rebels he utterly laid waste and practically depopulated all northern England. A winter march upon Chester, across a country impassable to an army less resolutely led, virtually completed the work of conquest (1070). There remained a last centre of resistance in the Isle of Ely, which was not finally subdued until a year later.

But other work remained. The Church was more firmly linked to the centre of western Christendom; its administration was separated from the general, of which it had hitherto been a part; the ranks of the clergy were strengthened by the preferment to high place among them of foreign genius and learning, such as was Lanfranc of Pavia and Bec, and an impulse was given to the building of churches after a grander type. Rules of law, not inequitably fitted to the wants of a mixed population, were framed and established; a strict execution of justice was everywhere enforced, and trading in slaves was forbidden. Edgar the Atheling was conciliated, and became one of William's most favoured courtiers. Conqueror as he was, William strove hard to prevent the Norman yoke being excessively galling to the conquered. But he had still much fighting to do, both abroad and in Britain. Abroad he had, in 1073, to recover rebellious Maine, with a force that was in a large measure English, to suppress a rising of his son Robert against him, to counteract the enmity of Philip of France and Fulk of Anjou. At home he saw reason to invade Scotland in 1072; and, marching as far as Abernethy, made a peace there with King Malcolm. In 1075, during one of his absences, the Earls of Hereford and Norfolk, whose feudal instincts he had curbed, rebelled, but were defeated by Lanfranc. For his part in this affair Waltheof died on the scaffold. William's greatest deed was his last, the compilation of Domesday Book, accomplished in 1086. Sorrows came upon him in later life; his son Richard was killed in the New Forest; in 1083 his wife, Matilda, died; his brother, Odo, entered into intrigues that forced William to throw him into prison. On September 9, 1087, his own busy and brilliant career came to a close. Philip of France had once more picked a quarrel with him; this exploded in war, in the course of which Mantes was burnt, and William received a mortal injury by a fall from his horse. Borne to the priory of St. Gervais, near Rouen, he there died. He was buried in his own foundation of St. Stephen's in Caen. William was a man of extraordinary power and of many virtues, intellectual and moral, a certain greatness of soul being the chief. To Englishmen his value has been principally this—he was the founder of strong government in England. We must bear in mind that his best-known title is now misleading; "conqueror" in his days meant merely "acquirer," a gainer of possessions in any other way than by regular process, such as inheritance. Strictly speaking, William III was also a conqueror.

William II, KING (b. 1060?, s. September 26, 1087, d. August 2, 1100). William the Red (Rufus) was the third son of the Conqueror and Matilda of Flanders. He was the Conqueror's favourite son; for he had never swerved from his filial obligations, and had shown his father a seemingly sincere affection. He was, moreover, a young man of good parts and steadfastness—knowing well, and always acting upon, the distinction between substance and shadow. Nor did his vices develop early. It is nothing surprising, then, to be told that when the elder William lay upon his dying bed, he expressed a wish that this most dutiful of sons should have England after his death; he is said to have even given Rufus a letter to Lanfranc, recommending his cause to the influential primate's support. With this, William at once hastened to England. There was much in the situation to discourage him. Most of the barons would have preferred his eldest brother, Robert, and Lanfranc himself was undecided at first. The primate's indecision, however, soon gave way; he may have concluded that the strong-tempered William, despite his faults, would probably be a more effective king than the easy-natured Robert, when feudal anarchy was the most menacing evil; at any rate he secured the crown for William. But he made conditions. These were, that William should swear to maintain justice and mercy throughout the kingdom, to defend, against all, the peace, freedom, and security of all churches, and to comply with his instructions and counsels in and through all things. William took the prescribed oaths with the utmost readiness; and seventeen days after the father's death, and possibly after observing some form of election, Lanfranc crowned the son. A few months later a powerful section of the nobles, discontented at the separation of the kingdom from the duchy (of whom Odo, now released and restored to his earldom of Kent, Roger, Earl of Shrewsbury, William of St. Carleif, Bishop of Durham, were the chief), took up arms with the design of reuniting the two countries by making Robert king; and a force sent by Robert crossed to Pevensy to their aid. By Lanfranc's advice William threw himself on the support of the native English, solemnly promising them better laws, lighter taxation, and other good things; and the English, urged on by expectation and St. Wulfstan, crowded to his standard. Their success was complete. The invaders were driven back from Pevensy over the sea; Rochester was taken after a dogged siege; and when Odo perfidiously renewed the strife, William once more called the natives to his help, commanding all those who did not wish to be branded as nothing to join him. They joined him in flocks; and Odo was chased with ignominy from the land. But William soon forgot his promises, and the death of Lanfranc, in 1089, left him uncontrolled. His subsequent career was marked by selfishness and wanton tyranny, moderated only by occasional fits of sickness. The Church in particular felt his grasping hand. The revenues of vacant sees and abbeys were seized, and, further to enrich the Crown, the vacancies were deliberately prolonged. It was his policy to deal with clerical exactly as with lay fees, to get the entire Church organization into his power, and make it a perpetual feeder of his own revenues. In Anselm, however, whom he had nominated to the see of Canterbury in 1093, after four years' vacancy, when he was prostrate at Gloucester by a dangerous illness, he found an uncompromising adversary. The meek primate stoutly withstood all William's efforts to enslave the Church and degrade the clergy; he carefully avoided every trap that William laid in his path to surprise him into an admission of an authority over the Church, or doing anything that had the appearance of simony; a prolonged quarrel ensued; the Council of Rockingham (q.v.) failed to reconcile the two; and Anselm went into exile for a time. Then William had his unrestrained will. His confidential adviser and instrument was the notorious Ranulf Flambard (q.v.), the justiciar, who earned much infamy in his service by the zeal and callousness with which he executed his purposes. The Danegeld was revived; in 1094 the fyrd of the kingdom was marched down to Hastings to be dispatched for service in Normandy, only to be dismissed on payment to the Crown of the ten shillings with which each man had been furnished for his expenses; not a pretence that ingenuity could suggest for extorting money was overlooked; the forest law was mercilessly enforced. The nobility of the Conquest also suffered grievously; gaps were made in their ranks, and forfeitures were frequent. No class escaped oppression. In 1091 he carried the war against Robert into Normandy, then combined with him to despoil Henry, and succeeded. He took Cumberland from the King of Scots in 1092, settled a southern colony there, and refounded Carlisle. In 1096 he took advantage of Robert's eagerness to get away on the first Crusade to make a keen bargain with him for the administration of Normandy and Maine. He afterwards suppressed with astonishing promptitude a rebellion in Maine. On August 2, 1100, he was accidentally killed in the New Forest by an arrow that was originally dispatched by his own or some unknown hand. William Rufus was one of the most graceless of all our early kings, was irreligious, greedy, and utterly devoid of principle. He was, however, a man of excellent mental gifts; and was a sayer of sharp sayings, chiefly cynical.

[J. R.]

William III, KING OF ENGLAND AND PRINCE OF ORANGE (b. November 4, 1650, s. February 13, 1639, d. March 8, 1702), was the son of William II, Prince of Orange, and Mary, daughter of King Charles I of England. He was born a few days after his father's death, and his youth was passed under the jealous guardianship of the aristocratic party in the Netherlands, headed by John de Witt. His exclusion from the Stadtholderate was suggested by Cromwell, and agreed to by the States (1654). William received but little education, but early showed great interest in political and military questions, and in the doctrines of Calvinism. From a child he was weak and sickly. His chief and almost only amusement was the chase. At the age of fifteen he was deprived of his personal attendants by the jealous government. He took a part in the councils of state at eighteen. The French invasion changed this state of affairs. The de Witts were murdered by the populace; and William, who neglected to punish the murderers, became the head of the government. In 1672 he took command of the army, recovered Naerden, and took Bonn. Louis XIV thereupon confiscated his principalities and gave them to the Count of Auvergne. During the next four years he fought the French without much success. He was defeated by Condé at Senef (1674), and failed in his attempts to take Oudenarde and Maestricht (1676); he was driven back at Cassel, and compelled to raise the siege of Charleroi. Nevertheless the Dutch had already elected him stadtholder, captain-general and admiral-general, and extended the offices to his descendants (February 1674). Charles II of England determined thereupon to marry him to his niece Mary, daughter of James, Duke of York. After some deliberation on the part of William, the marriage took place (November 1677), and a scheme was formed for an alliance with England which the States-General declined to ratify. Aided by the English he attacked Marshal Luxemburg near Mons with some success, but the news of the conclusion of the Treaty of Nimeguen caused him to suspend operations (1678). We next find him planning a great European combination against Louis XIV. A scheme was on foot for making him the future Protector of England (1681). He attempted to mediate between Charles II and his parliament, and proposed a congress for the settlement of all questions at issue in Europe (1683). On the accession of James II the Prince of Orange drew nearer to him, although steadily opposing his Romanizing schemes. He opposed Monmouth's rash attempt on the Crown, advising him to go and fight the Turks; and although the blunders of the States-General permitted his departure for England, William sent back the English regiments which were in the Dutch service. His attention was now entirely absorbed by his design of uniting the nations of Europe in resistance to Louis XIV, and he rejected all ideas of an invasion of England to which he was urged by Mordaunt. He saw that his claims would clash with those of his wife. Still the romanizing schemes of James II gradually made him the head of the English opposition. He wrote to the king strongly recommending the withdrawal of the Declaration of Indulgence. In 1686 he sent his envoy Dykvelt to England to confer with the leading statesmen. He was now completely estranged from James II, who was much annoyed by the publication at this time of William's views concerning the Indulgence. On the birth of the young Prince of Wales William sent his congratulations to James. In May 1688 Edward Russell (q.v.) went over to Holland to sound the prince, but received a guarded reply. In August he received an invitation to England, signed by seven leading men, which he accepted. Great difficulties lay before him. He was afraid of the veto of the States-General, and of the alienation of the Catholic powers. James's treatment of the clergy, and importation of Irish troops to England, removed his difficulties there. Having completed his preparations, William issued a declaration, in which he stated his intention of going to England with an armed force as husband of the heiress of England. After being driven back by the winds, he landed at Torbay (November 5). At Exeter he was joined by many influential personages, and James was deserted by the army at Salisbury. William advanced towards London, and negotiations were opened between him and the king. James, however, resolved to fly, but was stopped by some fishermen and returned to London. William's position was now extremely difficult, but he was greatly relieved by the final escape of James to France. The convention which met on January 22, 1689, declared the throne vacant, and after passing the Declaration of Right (q.v.), caused William and Mary to be proclaimed King and Queen of England (February 13, 1689).

The reign may be said to be roughly divided into two parts by the Treaty of Ryswick (1697), during the first of which William was engaged in active resistance of Louis XIV, while the second was modified by the Spanish Succession question. William's first ministry was of a mixed character. War was declared against France in May. In Ireland the native race showed every inclination to hold out for King James, who betook himself thither. Londonderry was besieged, but relieved by Kirke, and the battle of Newtown Butler (q.v.) gave William the advantage for the time being. Meanwhile in Scotland the crown was offered to William (April 11). Dundee, however, raised the Highlanders in favour of James, and won a battle, but lost his life at Killiecrankie (q.v.). Mackay, by his victories at St. Johnstone's and Dunkeld, concluded the war. At home, party quarrels reached a great height, but parliament passed the Bill of Rights. Next year William determined to go to Ireland and relieve Schomberg. He won the battle of the Boyne (July 1), but was compelled to raise the siege of Limerick and return home. The English fleet had been disgracefully beaten at Beachy Head. In 1691 Ginkel (q.v.) concluded the Irish war by taking Athlone, winning the battle of Aghrim (q.v.), and besieging Limerick. The Pacification of Limerick settled the Irish question for a time. At home Preston's plot was discovered and thwarted. Abroad, though unsuccessful in the field, William greatly strengthened his great coalition by the congress at The Hague. Early in 1692 Marlborough's intrigues with the Jacobites in France were discovered, and he was dismissed from his office, and in consequence the Princess Anne quarrelled with the queen. The massacre of Glencoe (February 13) (q.v.) must ever remain a stain on the memory of William III. The projected invasion of England was thwarted by Russell's great victory off La Hogue (May 19). William was defeated by Marshal Luxemburg at Steinkirk in August. In parliament Montagu's financial ability re-established the Land Tax, and started a loan which proved the origin of the national debt. Military and naval affairs were unfortunate in their results in 1693. The loss of the Smyrna fleet was followed by the defeat at Landen in July. William, disgusted with party quarrels, determined to form a united Whig ministry. The year 1694 is important from a financial point of view. The Bank of England was established, and the East India Company's charter renewed. The disclosure of the venality in connexion with the East India Company compelled the Tories, Sir John Trevor and Carmarthen, to retire from office. The naval events of the year are unimportant, although Marlborough's treachery had resulted in the destruction of the expedition against Brest. The Triennial Act, which had previously been vetoed by William, passed in December. In the same month Queen Mary died of small-pox, and William was almost heart-broken at her loss. In the next year William was successful in his operations against Namur, which surrendered in August. The year 1796 opened successfully with the re-establishment of the currency. The Tory Land Bank, however, proved a failure, and the money required by the king was furnished by the Bank of England. The discovery of Berwick's plot, and the infamous Assassination Plot (q.v.), created great enthusiasm, and an association was formed for the protection of the king. The chief business of the session was the trial and attainder of Sir John Fenwick (q.v.), who was executed in the following January. The ministry was now completely Whig. The war with France was concluded by the Treaty of Ryswick (q.v.—September 1697).

William was deeply mortified by the successful introduction of the bill for the reduction of the standing army. The Irish parliament of this year passed several statutes of a highly penal nature. In 1698 Montagu formed a General East India Company as a rival to that already existing, but the scheme was eventually a failure. An attempt to settle the Spanish Succession question resolved itself into the First Partition Treaty (q.v.—October 11). The Tory party, now very strong, succeeded in carrying a bill which necessitated the dismissal of the Dutch guards. The king, deeply mortified, formed the intention of abandoning England, and was only dissuaded by the prayers of Somers. The majority in the Commons severely attacked the measures of the late ministry, their favourite objects being Montagu and Russell. They also "tacked" to the Land Tax Bill a clause empowering commissioners to inquire into the disposal of forfeited lands in Ireland. William in anger prorogued parliament (May 4, 1698). Discontent in Scotland reached a high pitch when news arrived of the utter failure of the great Darien scheme. The Resumption Bill was passed in April 1700, greatly to the annoyance of William and at the risk of a permanent breach between the two Houses. Meanwhile the diplomacy of William had brought about the Second Partition Treaty (q.v.). It was not well received in England. William now dismissed his old ministry, and relied on an entirely Tory administration, which passed the Act of Succession necessitated by the death of the young Duke of Gloucester, the heir to the throne. The Commons hurried on impeachments against the late ministry on account of their share in the Partition Treaties, which, however, proved abortive. The Kentish Petition (q.v.) and the Legion Memorial (q.v.) proved at the same time that popular feeling was on the king's side. He ventured, therefore, to prorogue parliament (June 1701). He went to Holland, and there consolidated the grand alliance between England, Holland, and the emperor, directed against the evident intention of Louis XIV to seize the Spanish throne for his grandson. Soon afterwards James II died and the French king acknowledged the Pretender as King of England (September 6). This thoroughly roused English patriotism, and loyal addresses poured in on all sides. William, who had returned in ill-health in November, accordingly seized the opportunity to summon a new parliament. It was of a far more Whig temper than its predecessor. The "pretended Prince of Wales" was attainted of high treason, and an abjuration oath made necessary for every employment in Church and State. But William's days were numbered. On February 20 he fell from his horse and broke his collar-bone. He gave his assent to the Succession Act, and surrounded by his old friends breathed his last on March 8 (1702). "Wherein," says Ranke, "lay his greatness? It lay in the position he took up and steadily maintained; in the world-wide historic results, some of which he himself achieved in his lifetime, while of others he only laid the foundations, or advanced them a stage. . . . The most important question of the day, and that of the highest importance for the future of mankind in Europe, was the rise of the French monarchy to universal preponderance, which threatened the independence of every country and every race. The living impulse, then, which determined King William's career sprang out of his opposition to this already domineering and over-grasping power. If this was to be carried through, no political or theological party attitude was to be thought of. To have brought a coalition of heterogeneous elements into existence, and to have successfully opposed it to the overwhelming might of France—this is the historic achievement of William III. No one was ever cleverer at building up confederations and holding them together, or in commanding armies of the most various composition without arousing national antipathies; no one knew better how in contests at home to await the right moment, to give way, and yet to hold fast."

William IV, KING (b. August 21, 1765, s. June 26, 1830, d. June 20, 1837), was the third son of George III and Queen Charlotte. At the age of thirteen he was entered as a midshipman on board the Prince George, a 98-gun ship.

In 1779 he saw active service under Rodney, and served his time as a midshipman in cruising vessels in the West Indies, and off the coast of Nova Scotia and Canada. He served under Lord Keith on the North American station, under Lord Hood off the Delaware River, and under Nelson upon the Leeward Island station. Between the latter commander and himself a strong and lasting friendship grew up. In 1785 he received his lieutenant's commission. In 1786 he was appointed captain of the Pegasus. In 1787 he sailed for the West Indies as commander of the Andromeda frigate. In 1790 he was made rear-admiral of the blue by order in council. On May 20, 1789, he was created Duke of Clarence and St. Andrews and Earl of Munster, and on June 8 following took his seat in the House of Lords. In 1811 he was made admiral of the fleet, and in 1814 hoisted his flag to convoy Louis XVIII of France to his kingdom. During the earlier part of the same year he was present as an amateur before Antwerp, and distinguished himself by his coolness and courage. A marriage was negotiated for him with the Princess Adelaide Louisa, daughter of the Duke of Saxe-Coburg Meiningen. They were married at Kew, 1818, and shortly afterwards proceeded to reside in Hanover, parliament having granted on the occasion an accession of only £6,000 to the duke's income. The duchess had two daughters, who both died almost immediately. At the prosecution of Queen Caroline (1820) the Duke of Clarence supported the bill of pains and penalties. On the death of his brother, the Duke of York (1827), he became heir presumptive to the crown, and received an accession to his income, which raised it to £40,000 a year. On April 17, 1827, he was appointed lord high admiral. His conduct in the office was eccentric, and after much friction with the lords of the admiralty he quarrelled with Sir George Cockburn and had to resign the office (August 11, 1828). At the death of George IV the Duke of Clarence, from a position of comparative obscurity, succeeded to the throne (June 26, 1830). In the presence of the privy council assembled on that day, according to custom, the new king, with marked emphasis, expressed to the Duke of Wellington his entire approval of the way in which his grace had carried on the government hitherto. Nevertheless, he was at first favourable to reform, but the disturbances at home and the fall of Charles X of France frightened him, and in the crisis of May 1832, when the Lords were preparing to reject the bill a third time, he would not consent to create new peers, and allowed the Grey ministry to resign. But the failure of Wellington to form a ministry convinced him that the feeling of the nation was emphatically in favour of the bill. He used his personal intercession with the peers to induce them to pass the bill, and was even prepared to "swamp" the House of Lords with new peers if the advice was rejected. The bill, however, was carried, and followed by the other reforming statutes which have made William IV's short reign an eventful period in modern English history. The king liked neither the Whig ministers nor their policy, and in 1834 (November 15) he exercised his prerogative, and suddenly dismissed Lord Melbourne and his colleagues. But the Peel ministry was hopelessly weak, and in 1835 (April) the king found it expedient to recall Lord Melbourne to his councils. William IV, though not greatly distinguished for talent and character, was a kindly and good-natured man, with the courage and firmness of his race, if also with its hereditary obstinacy. "He would have passed," says Walpole, "in private life for a good-natured sailor."

William Clito (d. 1128) was the eldest son of Robert of Normandy. After the battle of Tenchebrai he was placed under the care of Helie de St. Saen, who guarded him most loyally against Henry's attempts to seize him. His claims were supported by the French king and Fulk V of Anjou, the latter of whom affianced his daughter Sibyl to him. The victory of Henry at Brenneville destroyed his hopes, and he had to content himself with claiming the county of Flanders, to which he had succeeded by the failure of the male line. He had almost succeeded in making himself master of the county when he was pierced by a lance while besieging the town of Alost, and died in 1128.

William the Lion, KING OF SCOTLAND (1165-1214), son of Prince Henry and Ada de Warenne, succeeded his brother, Malcolm IV, as King of Scotland (1165). Having failed to obtain from Henry II the restoration of Northumberland from the English king, he listened eagerly to the proposals of Prince Henry of England, and in 1173 hurried to the north of England, whence, however, he was driven back by Richard de Lucy and Humphrey de Bohun. The following year he again invaded England, took several castles, and laid waste the country. But he was ambushed while superintending the siege of Alnwick Castle (July 13), and hurried with every symptom of indignity before Henry at Northampton. The English king sent his royal prisoner to Falaise in Normandy, where, in December 1174, a treaty was concluded in which William specifically acknowledged the supremacy of England over Scotland. Early the next year the Scottish king did homage to Henry at York for Scotland and Galloway. This subjection lasted until Richard I restored Scottish independence for the sum of 10,000 marks in 1189. On William's release after the Treaty of Falaise he found himself compelled to quell an insurrection in Galloway, and to subdue Ross a few years later (1179). In 1181 a fresh insurrection, due partly to dissatisfaction at the Treaty of Falaise, broke out in the north in favour of Donald Bane MacWilliam, and lasted six years, during which time William was also once more at variance with the people of Galloway. In 1188 an abortive conference was held at Brigham between the King of Scotland and the Bishop of Durham as the representative of Henry II. In 1196 William took Caithness from the Norwegian Earl Harold, but restored it to him on payment of a sum of money (1202). The suppression of another insurrection under Godfrey MacWilliam, in Ross (1211), was the closing act of William's domestic troubles. In the early part of his reign he had quarrelled (on grounds similar to those which embroiled John with Innocent III) with Pope Alexander III, who placed his kingdom under an interdict, which was, however, removed by Lucius III in 1182. In 1203 an interview with the English king at Lincoln regarding the earldom of Northumberland (November 1200) having proved unsatisfactory, he supported the papal attack on John and expressed his satisfaction at the interdict laid on England. From this time for nine years England and Scotland were frequently on the point of coming to blows owing to John's persistence in attempting to build a castle at Tweedmouth to overlook Berwick. In 1212, however, a close alliance was made between the two kings at Durham, on condition of John's assistance in the suppression of the rebellion in Ross. In December 1214 William died at Stirling, leaving behind him a reputation for energy of character and impetuosity. It was his constant but unsuccessful endeavour to carry out the policy of his grandfather David. He left Scotland in a far more advanced state of feudalism than his predecessor had done. William married Ermengarde de Bellomonte.

Williams, JOHN, Archbishop of York (1582-1650), was a member of an old Welsh family, and, after a brilliant university career, received many valuable preferments in the Church, being at length made dean of Westminster in 1620. He was also one of the royal chaplains, and high in favour both with James I and Buckingham. In 1621 he was made lord chancellor, in which office his great ability and industry supplied the place of early legal training, and in the same year was appointed Bishop of Lincoln. But Buckingham's favour did not last long, and by his influence Charles I removed Williams from his office in 1625. Laud also was a great antagonist of his, and through his influence Williams was condemned in 1637 to pay a heavy fine, to imprisonment, and to suspension from his ecclesiastical functions on the charge of having revealed the king's secrets and tampered with witnesses (July 11). In 1640 he was released, and soon regained the king's favour by supporting the cause of the prerogative and episcopacy, and in 1641 was advanced to the archbishopric of York. Soon after this he was insulted by the mob, and on protesting with the other bishops against their being thus excluded from parliament, he was sent to the Tower. After the outbreak of the Civil War he zealously assisted the king, both with money and advice, and is said to have mourned sincerely for his death. His character is very unfavourably painted by Clarendon, who declared him to have been "of a proud, restless, and overweening spirit, a very imperious and fiery temper, and a very corrupt nature." On the other hand, Foss, summing up his character, comes to the conclusion that he was, "though too much of a temporizer, honest and sincere, and generally wise in the advice which he offered, and to the monarchs whom he served he was faithful and true."

Williams, Sir Roger (1540 ?-1595), one of the bravest soldiers of Elizabeth's reign, served in the Netherlands under Sir John Norris and the Earl of Leicester, the latter of whom treated him exceedingly badly through jealousy of one who had so distinguished himself. Williams was present at Zutphen (q.v.). In 1587 the Prince of Parma in vain endeavoured to induce him to quit his allegiance and enter the Spanish service.

Willoughby, Francis, 5th Lord Willoughby of Parham (1613 ?-1666), was for some time connected with the Parliamentary party. After the execution of Charles I he joined the Royalists, and in 1650 went out to Barbados, where in the following year he defeated an expedition under Admiral Sir George Ayscue, which had been sent out by Cromwell to punish the Royalist proclivities of the Barbadians. He was soon afterwards compelled to return to England, where, after the Restoration, he obtained substantial marks of favour from Charles II. In 1663 he returned to Barbados as governor, and in the following year took St. Lucia. Two years later he perished in an expedition to recapture St. Kitt's.

Willoughby, Sir Robert, 1st Baron Willoughby de Broke (d. 1502), was a zealous adherent of the house of Lancaster. He supported the rebellion of Buckingham in 1483, and later fled to join Henry, Earl of Richmond, in Brittany. He accompanied Henry to England in 1485 and fought at Bosworth. As a mark of Henry's gratitude for his past services, Sir Robert Willoughby was raised to the peerage under the title of Lord Willoughby de Broke, and thenceforward was entrusted with many important missions of a military and diplomatic character. In 1489 he was given the command of the English force sent to the aid of the Duke of Brittany, and in 1497 relieved Exeter when besieged by the Cornish rebels.

Willoughby, Robert, Baron Willoughby de Eresby (1385 ?-1452), was a distinguished military commander of the fifteenth century. In 1415 he was present with Henry V at the siege of Harfleur and the battle of Agincourt. In 1418 he was at the siege of Rouen, and in 1424 at Verneuil. The following year, in company with Sir John Fastolfe, he defeated the French and relieved Alençon. In 1428 he accompanied Cardinal Beaufort in his expedition to Bohemia. Returning, he again took part in the French war, assisted at the capture of St. Denis and Pontoise in 1435, and was charged with the defence of Paris in that year. He was obliged to surrender the capital in April 1436. One of his last exploits was the defeat of the French at Amiens, in 1441. He died July 25, 1452.

Wills, The Statute of (1540), was explained and re-enacted in 1543. Its object was to remove the restrictions imposed, under the Plantagenets, on the testamentary power over freehold land. It provided, therefore, that anyone being seized in fee simple, and being a person capable of making a will, might devise to any other person, except to bodies corporate, two-thirds of his lands and tenements held in chivalry, and the whole of those held in socage. On the abolition of chivalry after the Restoration this practically included all landed property except copyhold tenements.

Willmington, Spencer Compton, Earl of (1673 ?-1743). [COMPTON.]

Wilson, Sir Archdale (1803-74), entered the Bengal army 1819; served at the siege of Bharrpur (1825-6); commanded the artillery as lieutenant-colonel in the Jalandar Doab in 1848-9, and rose through various grades to brigadier-commander of the Bengal artillery at Meerut (1856). Here the Indian Mutiny (q.v.) first broke out, and here Wilson gained the first victory over the insurgents. On June 7 he joined Sir Henry Barnard at Alipur, and on the latter's death succeeded to the command of the army besieging Delhi. On September 20 Delhi surrendered to him. Wilson subsequently commanded the artillery at the siege of Lucknow. For these services he was thanked by both Houses, made in succession a companion, knight-commander, and grand cross of the Bath, granted a pension of £1,000 a year by the East India Company, and created a baronet.

Wiltshire, Earls of. [BOLEYN; BUTLER; SCROPE.]

Wimbeldon, Edward Cecil, Viscount (1572-1638). [CECIL.]

Winchelsey, Robert, Archbishop of Canterbury 1294-1313, was born at Winchelsea in Kent, and after a most distinguished academic career, during which he was successively rector of the University of Paris and chancellor of Oxford, he was elected to the archbishopric.

In 1296 Boniface VIII issued the famous Bull Clericis Laicos (q.v.), forbidding the payment of taxes to the king by the clergy without the leave of the pope; Winchelsey gladly availed himself of the excuse to decline to allow any further grant of Church revenue to the king. The contest with Edward I was a protracted one; the clergy refusing to pay were outlawed (January 1297), and the possessions of the see of Canterbury seized. But a compromise had at length to be made, and Winchelsey announced his willingness to allow individual clerks to make voluntary contributions for the defence of the kingdom. A formal reconciliation was effected between king and archbishop in July; the latter acknowledging that the papal prohibition did not apply to money required for purposes of national defence, and offering to do his best to obtain a grant from the clergy if the king would confirm the charters. In November convocation accordingly granted a tenth, the charters having in the meantime been confirmed by the regency in Edward's absence in Flanders. In 1300 the charters were again confirmed, certain important articles being added to them. In 1301 Winchelsey once more quarrelled with the king. In 1305, with the election of Edward's vassal, Bertrand de Goth, to the Papacy as Clement V, the archbishop's defeat was ensured. He demanded the removal from the treasury of Walter Langton, Bishop of Chichester, and created constant friction by his rigid insistence upon his metropolitan rights. Next year Winchelsey was suspended and cited before the Curia. He left England in May, and did not return again till after the death of Edward I. During Edward II's reign we find him opposing Gaveston (q.v.), and, as an Ordainer (q.v.), doing what he could to restrain the excesses of the young king. Winchelsey was eminent as a scholar and a divine, and famous for his charity and piety; but in public affairs he attempted to play the part of a Stephen Langton, for which he was unsuited, and for which there was no necessity. His policy was also complicated by the foolish arrogance of Boniface, and by the determination of Edward. By his want of tact and inordinate love of power the archbishop alienated both the king and the pope.

Winchester (the GWENT of the Celts, and VENTA BELGARUM of the Romans) was probably an important town before the Roman invasion. It was conquered by the Saxons in the early sixth century, and became the capital of the West Saxon kingdom in the seventh century. In 676 it was made the seat of a bishopric. In 860 it was taken by the Danes. During the later West Saxon and Danish period it was very frequently the centre of government for England, and the place where the witenagemot was held. In 1141 it was burnt during the war between Stephen and the Empress Maud. In June 1216 it was taken by Louis the Dauphin. In 1265 it was sacked by Simon de Montfort. In 1285 the important Statute of Winchester was passed here by Edward I. The cathedral was, according to tradition, founded by Kynegils in the first half of the seventh century, was rebuilt in the eleventh century, and reconstructed by Bishops Wykeham, Beaufort, and Waynflete (q.v.) in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. The college was founded by William of Wykeham (q.v.) in 1387. In March 1644 Waller inflicted a defeat on the Royalists at Clinton Down near Winchester. On October 6 of the following year the town was captured by Cromwell, and the castle was demolished; on the site of this fortress a palace was begun in 1683, but was left unfinished.

Winchester, SIR WILLIAM PAULET, 1ST MARQUIS OF (1485 ?-1572). [PAULET.]

Winchester, THE STATUTE OF (1285), was one of the enactments by which Edward I developed and improved upon the legislation of Henry II. This statute was intended to place the military system on a better footing, and reorganized the watch and ward. It revived and developed the military and police action of the hundred, the hue and cry, the watch and ward, the fyrd or militia of the counties. The Assize of Arms (q.v.), with its provisions that every man should keep armour and weapons proper to his condition, was re-enacted and brought up to date. The statute, in fact, attempted to restore the ancient and popular military system of the English, which had outlived the Conquest.

Windebank, SIR FRANCIS (1582-1646), son of Sir Thomas Windebank, was educated at St. John's College, Oxford, where he took the degree of B.A. in 1601. He became clerk of the council, and was, by the influence of his old friend Laud, appointed secretary of state (June 1632). He was the king's agent in the secret negotiations with Spain in 1634, the intermediary between Charles and the papal agent, Panzani, and one of the committee of eight entrusted with Scottish affairs (1639). In May 1640 he applied to the pope's agent, Rossetti, for money and arms to be employed against the Scots. On the assembly of the Long Parliament he was attached for non-execution of the penal laws against the Catholics, and fled to France (December 10, 1640), where he died.

Windham, WILLIAM (1750-1810), was educated at Eton and Oxford. His first appearance in politics was at a meeting of the county gentlemen of Norfolk on January 28, 1778, where he spoke with much vigour against a proposal to subscribe to aid the government in carrying on the war against the American Colonies. In 1782 he unsuccessfully contested Norwich, and very soon made himself conspicuous, until in the following year he was appointed chief secretary to the lord-lieutenant of Ireland, which position he resigned within four months on finding that it required the employment of acts which he felt to be dishonourable. He entered parliament as member for Norwich in 1784; became very intimate with Burke and Dr. Johnson, and although at first, like all the Whigs, he hailed with joy the outbreak of the French Revolution, yet in 1793, horrified by the later outrages of the movement, he took Burke's view, and was a warm advocate of the policy which Burke wished to see adopted towards the Revolutionary government. In the following year he went on a mission to the Duke of York, who was in command of an expedition in Flanders, and was in the same year appointed secretary at war, with a seat in the cabinet. He followed Pitt out of office in 1801, and did not again take office until, after Pitt's death, he became secretary at war and of the colonies in the administration of "All the Talents" (q.v.). On their dismissal Windham too returned to opposition, and remained in that position until in January 1810 he died of a tumour produced by his extraordinary endeavours to rescue a great library from flames. Of his position as a speaker and a statesman, Sir Erskine May says, "Superior to Sheridan in education and attainments, and little inferior in wit, he never achieved successes so dazzling; yet he maintained a higher place among the debaters of his age. Though his pretensions to the higher qualities of a statesman were inconsiderable, and his want of discretion and temper too often impaired his unquestionable merits in debate, his numerous talents and virtues graced a long and distinguished public life."

Window Tax, THE, was first imposed in 1695 by the Act 6 & 7 Wm. III, c. 18, to make up the deficiency arising from clipped coin in the recoining of silver. It was frequently reimposed, notwithstanding its injurious effect in offering an obstacle to good ventilation. When it was extended in 1766 to houses having seven windows and over, the number of such houses decreased by nearly two-thirds. In 1798 it was extended to houses with six windows. It was reduced in 1823, and repealed and the house tax substituted for it in July 1851.

Windsor Castle appears to have been first regularly used as a royal residence by the Norman kings, although there was certainly a fortress there previous to the Conquest. To the Conqueror's building Henry III made several additions; but it was in the reign of Edward III, under the designing hand of William of Wykeham, that the castle as we now know it began to rise. St. George's Chapel was rebuilt by Edward IV, its architects being Richard Beauchamp, Bishop of Salisbury, and, after his death in 1481, Sir Reginald Bray, architect of Henry VII's Chapel at Westminster. Elizabeth formed the terraces, and erected or altered the gate known by her name. Charles II erected the Star building, which was afterwards Gothicized by James Wyatt. Traces of Sir Christopher Wren are to be found in the edifice, but his plan of rebuilding the south side of the Upper Ward was not carried out. St. George's Chapel, which was much injured by the Puritans in 1648, was restored in 1787-90, and further renovations are at present in progress.

Windward Islands, THE, a group of islands forming a British colony in the West Indies, a confederation of the three colonies of St. Lucia, St. Vincent, and Grenada (q.v.), with their dependency the Grenadines. Each island retains its own institutions and they have neither legislature, revenue, nor tariffs in common, though a common court of appeal exists for them and Barbados, and a common executive. In 1920-1 they petitioned the king for representative government in place of Crown-colony government. The colonial office mission of 1921-2 recommended this to the Imperial government.

Wingfield, SIR ANTHONY (1485?-1552), vice-chamberlain to Henry VIII (1547), was named in the king's will one of the council who were to govern during the minority of Edward VI. He bore a leading part in the measures taken against Protector Somerset.

Winter, ADMIRAL SIR WILLIAM (d. 1589), was sent to the Firth of Forth by Elizabeth in 1559 to do any damage he could to the French. The queen, as was her wont, commissioned him to act on his own responsibility, being thus enabled to disavow his actions in case of failure. On his arrival in the Firth he managed to provoke the French to attack him, and retaliated by seizing Burntisland, which had been occupied by the enemy, and destroying some of their vessels. Had his successes at sea been backed up by energetic action on the part of the land forces, Leith would have fallen at once. In 1569 Winter commanded an expedition to La Rochelle (q.v.), which brought supplies to Condé, and in 1580 did good service on the Irish coast, being present at Smerwick. He is credited with having originated the plan of sending fire-ships amongst the Spanish vessels, which proved so destructive to the Armada. The mixture of caution and dashing courage which he displayed, together with his steadfast loyalty, made him one of the most valued servants of Elizabeth, and he well deserved Cecil's praise—"of Mr. Winter all men speak so well, I need not mention him."

Winwaed, THE BATTLE OF THE (655), between Penda of Mercia and Oswy of Northumbria, resulted in the defeat and death of the former. The River Winwaed is usually identified with the Aire, and the site of the battle is said to have been Winwedfield, near Leeds. This identification is not, however, completely established. Some historians prefer to locate the site in Bernicia rather than Deira.

Wishart, GEORGE (1513 ?–1546) was one of the Protestant preachers who incurred the wrath of Cardinal Beaton. He was tried at St. Andrews and burnt (1546). He is said to have entered thoroughly into the plot for assassinating the cardinal.

Wishart, ROBERT, Bishop of Glasgow, was one of the Scottish commissioners (1289) who tried to arrange for the marriage of the Maid of Norway and Prince Edward. He joined Wallace's party in 1297, but in a few months later negotiated the treaty by which many of the Scottish nobles made submission to Edward. In 1303 he was exiled for two years, but the next year recovered Edward's favour. He counselled the English king to hold a general assembly of the Scottish nation at Perth in 1304, and to appoint commissioners to regulate the government of Scotland. He was continually taking oaths of fealty to one side or another, and breaking them. Having sided with Robert Bruce in 1306, he was taken prisoner in the same year at Cupar in Fife, and imprisoned at Nottingham.

Witenagemot, THE, means the meeting or council of the wise men (Witan), and in Anglo-Saxon times was the highest council in the land. The theory that the witenagemot was an assembly to which every freeman had a right to come (as he undoubtedly had to the shire-moot) is untenable. We have no evidence of any such right beyond the fact that at certain national crises, as at the exile of Godwin in 1051, or on sudden Danish invasions, and even at the election of a new king, a tumultuous concourse of spectators attended the meetings of the witan, and shouted applause or disapprobation of the proposals made. Such claims that the witenagemot has to the position of a national council rest upon the fact that it contained the official leaders of the nation, both in Church and State. But it was primarily a royal and aristocratic council. It consisted of the king, sometimes accompanied by his wife and sons; the bishops of the kingdom, the ealdormen of the shires or provinces, and a number of the king's friends and dependents. These last generally describe themselves as ministri, or king's thegns, and numbered amongst themselves no doubt the chief officers of the household, and the most eminent of the persons who stood in the relation of gesith or comes to the king, and were bound to him by the oath of fealty. Occasionally a præfectus or gerefa appears in the early charters; he is probably the heah-gerefa or high-steward of the household. Under the later kings a considerable number of abbots attest the charters. Thus the witan was a small body of men of high position, all closely connected with the administration. The tendency was towards the increase of the king's thegns, who at the end of the West Saxon period outnumbered all the other members of the council. Probably the witenagemot met at regular intervals and at fixed places, but in the absence of exact dates it is impossible to speak with certainty about this. With regard to the functions of the witan Kemble laid down twelve canons on the subject as follows:—(1) They possessed a consultative voice, and a right to consider every public act which could be authorized by the king. (2) They deliberated upon the making of new laws which were to be added to the existing folk-right, and which were then promulgated by their own and the king's authority. (3) They had the power of making alliances and treaties of peace, and of settling their terms. (4) They had the power of electing the king. (5) They had the power to depose the king if his government was not conducted for the benefit of his people. (6) They had the power with the king of appointing prelates to vacant sees. (7) The king and the witan had also power to regulate ecclesiastical matters, appoint fasts and festivals, and decide upon the levy and expenditure of ecclesiastical revenues. (8) The king and the witan had power to levy taxes for the public service. (9) The king and his witan had power to raise land and sea forces when occasion demanded. (10) The witan possessed the power of recommending, assenting to, and guaranteeing grants of land. (11) The witan possessed the power of adjudging the lands of offenders and intestates to be forfeit to the king. (12) The witan acted as a supreme court of justice both in civil and criminal causes. Thus according to Kemble the witenagemot was a supreme council for deliberation, administration, and assent, as well as for judicial and taxative purposes. Its real power, however, naturally varied inversely with that of the king. Under a strong king many of these claims were futile; all land seems, by the eleventh century, to have been regarded as at the king's disposal really if not in name; the sheriffs, ealdorman, and bishops were named by the king; if he were a pious one, the bishops were chosen by him with respect to the consent of the diocesan clergy; if he were a peremptory one, they were appointed by his determined will. But the powers of legislation and taxation (in so far as such terms are applicable in the pre-Norman period, when legislation was merely the codification of custom, and the only form of "national" taxation was the Danegeld) were never lost, nor did the king execute judgment without a court which was in name and in reality perhaps a portion of the witenagemot. It may be added that the power of election tended to become purely formal, and that the power of deposition was very seldom exercised. After the union of the kingdoms the crown remained in the West Saxon family, and ordinarily went by hereditary descent, though in all cases a formal election was made, and though in several cases an uncle of full age was preferred to the infant son of the deceased sovereign. The elevation of Canute to the throne is an exception, but his title rested rather on conquest than on election, so that the election of Harold II remains the sole instance of the witan freely electing a king outside the royal house. Of deposition there is likewise but a solitary instance after Egbert, that of Ethelred II in 1013. [S. L.]

Wodehouse, JOHN, 1ST EARL OF KIMBERLEY (1826-1902), was the eldest son of Henry, 3rd Baron Wodehouse. In 1852 he took office as under-secretary for foreign affairs till 1856, when he was appointed ambassador at St. Petersburg. In 1858 he returned, and resumed his post in Lord Palmerston's second administration (1859). In 1863 he was sent on a special mission to Denmark to endeavour to settle the Schleswig-Holstein difficulty (q.v.), and next year succeeded the Earl of Carlisle as lord-lieutenant of Ireland, resigning the post when Lord John Russell's administration retired in 1866. He held the office of privy seal from 1868 to 1870, when he accepted the colonial office. In 1874 he retired with his colleagues. In 1880 he became colonial secretary, and in 1882 secretary for India. From 1892 to 1894 he was secretary for India and lord president of the council, and in 1894-5 foreign secretary. On the resignation of Lord Rosebery in 1896 he became leader of the Liberal peers.

Wodnesbeorg was the scene of two important battles in Anglo-Saxon history—one in 591, in which Ceawlin of Wessex was defeated by his nephew Ceolric, the other in 715, when Ine repulsed the Mercians. Wodnesbeorg has usually been identified with Wamborough, on the Wiltshire downs near Swindon, but the authorities are not entirely unanimous on the point.

Wolfe, ARTHUR, 1ST VISCOUNT KILWARDEN (1739-1803), was made solicitor-general for Ireland in 1787, and attorney-general in 1789. In 1798 he became lord chief justice of the King's Bench, and was elevated to the peerage. In 1803, while driving into Dublin when Emmet's short-lived insurrection was raging, he was piked by the rebels. As a judge he was well known for his inclinations to mercy; and, being Curran's friend, was able to save that statesman from many annoyances in 1798.

Wolfe, GENERAL JAMES (1727-59), entered the army at the age of fourteen, and was present at the battles of Dettingen (1742), Fontenoy (1745), and Lauffeldt (1747). He first attracted Pitt's notice in 1757, when a combined military and naval expedition was dispatched against Rochefort under Admiral Hawke and General Mordaunt. Wolfe went with it as quartermaster-general. In 1758 he served under General Amherst at the siege of Louisbourg on Cape Breton Island. Louisbourg gave in on July 26. In 1759 Pitt entrusted him with the attack on Quebec, appointing him major-general. He sailed on February 17 from Spithead, arrived at Halifax, Nova Scotia, on April 30, and opened the siege of Quebec on July 12. Wolfe captured the town, but died at the moment of victory (September 13). [QUEBEC, THE CAPTURE OF.]

Wolseley, FIELD-MARSHAL GARNET JOSEPH, 1ST VISCOUNT WOLSELEY (1833-1913), served in the Burmese and Crimean Wars (1852-3 and 1854-6), in the Indian Mutiny and the Second Chinese War. In 1869 he was appointed to the command of the Red River Expedition (q.v.), and in 1873, as major-general, commanded the troops in the Ashanti War. Upon his return he was thanked by parliament, and a grant was conferred upon him. In 1875 he was sent to administer Natal, and in 1876 became a member of the council of India. In 1878 he was appointed high commissioner in Cyprus, and in 1879 returned to Natal as governor and reduced Secocoeni to submission. In 1882 he commanded the Egyptian expedition, won the victory of Tel-el-Kebir, and was rewarded with a barony. In September 1884, he led the expedition to Khartoum for the relief of General Gordon, and was made a viscount. In 1890 he became commander-in-chief of the army in Ireland, field-marshal in 1894, and in 1895 commander-in-chief of the British army, for a term of five years. He died on March 15, 1913, and was buried in St. Paul's Cathedral.

Wolsey, THOMAS, Cardinal and Archbishop of York (1471-1530), was the son of a wealthy Ipswich butcher. Educated at Magdalen College, he obtained his degree when barely fifteen; and, as a consequence, became familiarly known among the university associates as the "Boy Bachelor." In virtue of this early proficiency Wolsey soon succeeded to a Magdalen fellowship, and was shortly afterwards appointed master of the school attached to his college. Among his pupils at this school were the sons of the Marquis of Dorset, who presented Wolsey, in October 1500, to the living of Lymington, in Somersetshire. Here Wolsey is said to have on one occasion played so unbecomingly a part in his parish revelries as to bring upon himself the degradation of the stocks, and to have been compelled to abandon his living. By this time, however, he had made many influential friends, and through the interest of some of these he obtained the post of secretary and domestic chaplain to Henry Deane, Archbishop of Canterbury, which he continued to hold till the death of the primate in 1503, when he secured an appointment in the chaplaincy at Calais. The strong common sense Wolsey displayed in the discharge of his duties caused him to be appointed one of the chaplains to the king. Wolsey soon secured the notice and friendship of Bishop Fox, the lord privy seal, and of Sir Thomas Lovel, the treasurer of the royal household. He was thus speedily selected for the transaction of Henry's more confidential business; and so highly appreciated were his diplomatic services at the courts of Germany and Scotland that the king, some two months before his death, conferred upon him the deanery of Lincoln (1509). While, however, Wolsey's tact and energy were a strong recommendation of him to a keen judge of men like Henry VII, his wit, gay humour, and varied personal accomplishments made him the indispensable companion of that monarch's successor; and his upward progress under Henry VIII was rapid and brilliant. Soon occupying the position of almoner to the king, and of a royal councillor, Wolsey received in quick succession the living of Torrington, in Devon, the registrarship of the order of the Garter, a Windsor canonry, and the important deanery of York. Accompanying Henry to France in 1513, he was appointed by him to the see of Tournay, which the fortune of war had temporarily placed in English hands; and as compensation for the purely nominal character of this last preferment Wolsey was promoted in February 1514 to the bishopric of Lincoln, whence he was translated, before the expiration of the year, to the archbishopric of York. In the following year (1515) his English dignities were crowned by the reception of a cardinal's hat from Pope Leo X, with the title of St. Cecilia, an honour which was quickly succeeded by a commission from the pontiff as legatus a latere. About this time, too, his revenues from various sources were still further increased by the gift from the king of the administration of the see of Bath and Wells, and the temporalities of the wealthy abbey of St. Albans; and by the enjoyment, one after the other, of the bishoprics of Durham and Winchester. Wolsey's position at Henry's court was now not only one of enormous emolument, but one that carried with it a degree of power and influence more extensive than had ever previously been wielded by a minister of the Crown. For several years, indeed, he directed the foreign policy of his country, lending English support to France and Germany alternately, according as it seemed to suit the varying necessities of his own personal interests, while his supremacy in all that related to the domestic government of the kingdom was only nominally subordinate to that of Henry himself. Difficult and dangerous, however, as was the commanding position to which he had attained with such unexampled rapidity, Wolsey succeeded in holding his place in the king's favour for some considerable time, and his good fortune in this respect was due not only to the watchful tact with which on all occasions he conducted himself in his dealings with Henry, but also partly to the fact that the primary object of his ambition, viz., the reformation and aggrandizement of the English Church, was one for which, in the early period of his reign at least, the king had felt a considerable degree of sympathy. While he impressed the popular mind with the pre-eminent state and magnificence of a Church dignitary, by the everyday pomp of his household arrangements, and by his gorgeous preparations for the reception of his cardinal's hat, he endeavoured to awaken a more permanent respect for the clergy as a body by instituting a series of greatly-needed ecclesiastical reforms. Conspicuous among his measures for purging the Church of some of the more crying abuses into which she had fallen latterly were the suppression of several of the smaller monasteries, and the devotion of the funds thus obtained to the establishment of Cardinal's College (now Christ Church) at Oxford, and of a new grammar school at Ipswich, designed to serve as a sort of preparatory institution for the university. In his endeavours to raise the social status of the Church, and to make her ordained servants an example to the country of sound learning and morality of life, Wolsey was compelled to make the utmost use of the power at his command. It was his zeal in this matter that led him to hazard a breach of the Statute of Præmunire by accepting the appointment of papal legate from Leo X, for experience speedily taught him that the authority of an ordinary English prelate was quite insufficient to act with any effect against the monasteries and other strongholds of ecclesiastical corruption.

Rapid beyond all comparison as had been Wolsey's rise to the position of the most influential subject in Europe, his fall was fully as sudden and conspicuous. By the indecision he exhibited in the matter of Henry's divorce he not only lost the king's confidence, but excited against himself the disappointed fury of Anne Boleyn. His enemies, who were many and powerful, were not slow to take advantage of his misfortunes and to revive popular indignation against him on account of his oppressive taxation and his arbitrary system of government. Prosecuted in 1529 under the Statute of Præmunire (q.v.), he had to resign the great seal and retire to his see of Winchester. This evidence, however, of his lost influence was not sufficient to satisfy the jealous vengeance of his political rivals; and, though he received several kind messages from the king, his troubles were speedily augmented by his impeachment in the House of Lords. The faithful devotion of Wolsey's servant, Thomas Cromwell, and some lingering remnant of regard in Henry's heart for the once powerful cardinal, caused the bill to be thrown out of the House of Commons; but the Statute of Præmunire was allowed to have its full course, and all Wolsey's property was declared forfeited to the Crown. The fallen minister was allowed subsequently to withdraw to his diocese of York; but was again arrested in 1530 on a charge of high treason. On the way to London to meet his trial he died at Leicester Abbey on November

Wolverhampton, HENRY FOWLER, VISCOUNT (1830-1911). [FOWLER.]

Wood, SIR ANDREW, of Largs, was the first great naval officer Scotland possessed. On the murder of James III he declared for his son against the council. He was taken into high favour by James IV, with whom the creation of a navy came to be a special object. In 1490 he captured five English vessels with only two of his own; and subsequently took the three ships which had been sent under the command of Stephen Ball to avenge the insult.

Wood, SIR CHARLES, 1ST VISCOUNT HALIFAX (1800-85), was educated at Oriel College, Oxford, and succeeded to the baronetcy in 1846. In the same year he had been returned to the House of Commons as member for Great Grimsby, and afterwards sat for Wareham, Halifax, and Ripon. In 1832 he was appointed secretary to the treasury; in 1835 secretary to the admiralty. In 1846 he took office under Lord Russell as chancellor of the exchequer, until 1852. He entered the Aberdeen cabinet in 1852 as president of the board of control; became first lord of the admiralty in Palmerston's first administration, from 1855 to 1858; and in Palmerston's second administration secretary of state for India, and president of the Indian council from 1859 to 1866. In 1866 he was created Viscount Halifax, and took office under Gladstone in 1870 as lord privy seal.

Wood, WILLIAM PAGE, BARON HATHERLEY (1801-81), second son of Sir Matthew Wood, was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn, 1827. He was elected for the city of Oxford in 1847, in the Liberal interest, and continued to represent that constituency till 1852. In 1849 he was appointed vice-chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster, in 1851 he became solicitor-general, and in 1852 vice-chancellor. In 1868 he was appointed a judge of the Court of Appeal in Chancery and sworn of the privy council, and in 1868 lord chancellor. He resigned in 1872.

Woodfall, HENRY SAMPSON (1739-1805), a printer, was tried in 1770 for publishing Junius's "Letter to the King." The right of the jury to judge of the criminality of the libel having been denied by Lord Mansfield, they found the prisoner guilty of "printing and publishing only." Lord Mansfield was severely taken to task in the House of Lords for his arbitrary conduct, but the question was not settled until twenty years after, by Fox's Libel Act.

Wood's Halfpence (1722-5). There was no mint in Ireland in 1722, and there being a want of small coin, and a great deal of base money dating from the times of Elizabeth and James I, a patent for coining copper money was granted to the royal mistress, the Duchess of Kendal, and by her sold to William Wood, a Wolverhampton ironmonger, for £10,000. He was to be allowed to coin £100,800 worth of halfpence and farthings, a pound of copper to be coined into thirty pence, for Ireland; and was to pay £200 annually to the controller of the coinage, and £100 annually to the treasury. In England twenty-three pence only were coined from one pound, but as the cost of transport and an import duty had to be considered, the difference was not really unreasonable. The gains Wood would make were calculated at £4,000, and no doubt the amount of copper to be put in circulation was excessive, since about £15,000 worth would have been enough. The excitement in Ireland, however, was out of all proportion to the real importance of the matter, the Irish House of Commons absurdly enough pretending that Ireland would lose £150 on every 100 lb. of copper coined; it was also intimated that the coin as actually issued was debased. Sir Isaac Newton, however, examined it and found it fully as good as was required. In 1723 the sum to be coined was reduced, but in 1724 Swift's "Drapier's Letters" appeared, and all Ireland, including even the chancellor and archbishop of Dublin, was unanimous in refusing the new halfpence. Carteret came over and attempted to prosecute the "Drapier," but the grand jury not only ignored the indictment, but presented all persons who had accepted the new coin. At last in 1725 Walpole gave in to the clamour raised in Ireland, the patent was revoked, and the Irish parliament passed a vote of thanks to the king. Wood got £3,000 for eight years as compensation from the Irish pension list, but under a false name.

Woodville, ANTHONY, 2ND EARL RIVERS (d. 1483), was the son of Richard, 1st Earl Rivers, and brother-in-law of Edward IV. He married the daughter and heiress of Lord Scales, and in 1462 was summoned to parliament as Baron Scales. He took part in the siege of Alnwick, and in 1470 accompanied Edward in his flight to the Netherlands, returning with him in the next year. In 1469, by the death of his father, he became Earl Rivers. He received many honours from Edward, and, among other offices, held that of governor to the young Prince Edward. On the death of Edward IV he was in possession of the person of the young king, but the jealousy of the old nobility favoured Gloucester's designs, and Rivers was seized at Northampton and carried to Pontefract, where he was beheaded. He was the noblest and most accomplished of the victims of Richard III; the patron of Caxton, a translator from the French, and the author of various original poems, of which that written on the eve of his execution is the only one extant.

Woodville, EDWARD, LORD, was a brother of Edward IV's wife, and consequently uncle to the queen of Henry VII. He obtained a temporary notoriety in the reign of this latter monarch by his expedition at the head of 400 men to aid the Duke of Brittany in 1488, notwithstanding the king's positive orders against the dispatch from England of any expedition with such an object. Besides exciting considerable indignation in France, this proceeding on the part of Lord Woodville had the effect of forcing Henry to adopt a definite position with regard to the dispute between France and Brittany. The news of the French victory at St. Aubin (July 28, 1488), and the death of Lord Woodville, with the almost total destruction of the small English force which he commanded, raised public feeling in England to an extent which Henry could no longer afford to ignore; and, although there continued to be a secret arrangement with Charles VIII on the subject, a supply of troops was at once sent to the aid of Brittany. At the time of the ill-starred expedition which ended in defeat and slaughter at St. Aubin, Woodville was governor of the Isle of Wight.

Woodville, ELIZABETH. [ELIZABETH WOODVILLE.]

Woodville, RICHARD, 1ST EARL RIVERS (d. 1469), fought in the French wars in Henry VI's reign, and married Jacquetta of Luxemburg (q.v.), widow of the Duke of Bedford. For this clandestine marriage his wife was fined a thousand pounds, but Woodville was soon afterwards restored to favour, and in 1448 made Baron Rivers. In the Wars of the Roses he fought on the Lancastrian side, but in 1464 his daughter Elizabeth, who was the widow of Sir John Grey, was secretly married to the young king, Edward IV. By his son-in-law Rivers was raised to high honours, made constable of England, and in 1466 created Earl Rivers, and his sons received equal advantages from their connexion with the sovereign. The Woodvilles were hated by the old nobility on account of their rapid rise, while the people complained of their avarice. In 1469 a rebellion broke out, headed by Sir John Conyers (q.v.), the insurgents complaining of the influence of the queen's friends. Having defeated the royal troops at Edgcott (q.v.), the rebels seized Earl Rivers and his son John, and put them to death at Kenilworth.

Worcester, THE BATTLE OF (September 3, 1651), was fought between the Scots and the Parliamentarians during the unsuccessful expedition of Charles II to England previous to the Restoration. After the battle of Dunbar and the capture of Edinburgh by Cromwell, Charles made a sudden movement southwards in January, hoping to cut off a portion of the English army, which lay south of the Forth. Cromwell thereupon moved northwards towards Perth, and deliberately left open the way to England. The king promptly hastened across the frontier, and advanced rapidly to Worcester, which he entered on August 22. There he lay inactive, and allowed Cromwell to overtake him. The Parliamentary army attacked in two divisions, connected by a bridge of boats; Fleetwood on the west bank of the Severn, Cromwell marching on the east bank upon the town itself. Charles first attacked Cromwell, but without success, and he was driven back into the town, where the two divisions of the enemy met and drove the Royalists through the streets. They made no attempt to rally, and the war soon came to an end.

Worcester, THE CITY AND BOROUGH OF, has, perhaps, had a more disturbed history than any other town in England. From 894, when it was almost entirely destroyed by the Danes, its annals present a long series of sieges, burnings, and captures. Rebuilt by Ethelred, it was retaken by Hardicanute in 1041. In 1074 it was occupied by the barons of Hereford, and a conspiracy against William I crushed. The cathedral, founded by Bishop Oswald in 983 on the ruins of a previous building, was destroyed by fire. It was rebuilt by Bishop Wulstan in 1084, but again suffered twice from fire, and was repaired and reconsecrated in 1280. During the troubles of Stephen's reign Worcester was plundered by the Empress Matilda (1139), and besieged by the king (1149), and again by his son, Eustace. Hugh of Mortimer held the castle against Henry II in 1157. A council was held there in 1240. In Henry III's reign it became a stronghold of the baronial party, falling to Simon de Montfort in 1263, and the king being taken there after the battle of Lewes. Worcester was plundered in 1401 by Owen Glendower, who held it until driven off by Henry IV. In 1642 it was taken by Prince Rupert, but was recovered by the Parliamentarians under Colonel Fiennes in the same year. Lastly, Charles II was defeated there in September 1651.

Worcester, EARLS OF. [PERCY; TIP-TOE.]

Worms, THE TREATY OF (September 13, 1743), was signed by Great Britain, Austria, and Sardinia. After the battle of Dettingen in the War of the Austrian Succession, negotiations for peace were set on foot, but were abruptly broken off owing to the desire of Britain to continue the war with France. The treaty was negotiated by Carteret without reference to the ministers at home, and they accordingly refused to ratify a separate and secret convention by which Maria Theresa was to be supplied with a subsidy of £300,000 a year as long as "the necessity of her affairs shall require." The treaty agreed to assume the Pragmatic Sanction and the European balance of power; the King of Sardinia was to have a yearly subsidy of £200,000 from Britain, the cession of the Vigevanese from Austria, and the command of the allies in Italy, on condition that he should bring to the field an army of 45,000 and renounce his pretensions to the Milanese. This alliance was met by the League of Frankfurt, of which the most important members were France and Prussia. It resulted also in a declaration of war on France by Sardinia, and in the Second Family Compact (October) between France and Spain (q.v.).

Wotton, DR. NICHOLAS (1497?-1567), was employed by Thomas Cromwell (1537) to arrange the marriage of Henry VIII and Anne of Cleves. Made dean of Canterbury and York by Henry, who had a high opinion of his abilities, he was named one of the council of executors appointed by the king's will, and subsequently became a trusted servant of Mary, for whom he discovered the plot of Sir Henry Dudley (1556). In the same year he laid bare a conspiracy to seize Calais, and averted the danger for the moment. In 1558 he was one of the English representatives in the discussion of a proposed peace with France, which took place at Cercamp, and in the following year was present at the negotiations at Cateau-Cambrésis, while in 1565 he was sent to Bruges to discuss the subject of the suppression of English pirates who were alleged to be doing great damage to the Spanish shipping. Dr. Wotton was offered the primacy in 1559 before the appointment of Archbishop Parker, but refused it, knowing that he was no theologian, and that "more than administrative ability and knowledge of the world was at this time required in the primate."

Wrangel Island (or LONG'S ISLAND), an Arctic island off the north-east coast of Siberia, was discovered in 1849 by James Long, and occupied by shipwrecked members of Stefansson's Arctic expedition of 1914. The British flag was raised by Stefansson in 1921 on behalf of Canada, but in 1916 Russia had asserted her rights over the island, and in 1924 formally took possession of it.

Wray, SIR CHRISTOPHER (1524-92), one of the favourite judges of Queen Elizabeth, was an active member of parliament during the reign of Mary and until 1571, when he was chosen Speaker. In 1572 he was made a justice, and two years later chief justice of the Queen's Bench, in which capacity he presided at the trial of Secretary Davison. Sir Edward Coke called him "a most reverend judge, of profound and judicial knowledge, accompanied with a ready and singular capacity, grave and sensible elocution, and continual and admirable patience."

Wren, SIR CHRISTOPHER (1632-1723), was born at East Knoyle, Wiltshire, and educated at Westminster and Wadham College, Oxford. He was one of the founders of the Royal Society in 1660, and was its president from 1680 to 1682. But his fame rests chiefly on his architectural achievements. He took up architecture professionally in 1661, and had already designed the chapel of Pembroke College, Cambridge, and the Sheldonian Theatre at Oxford, when his great opportunity came with the Fire of London. The office of "surveyor-general and principal architect for rebuilding the whole city" was specially created for him by Charles II. He submitted his first design for the new St. Paul's in 1673, and the cathedral was reported finished in 1716. Meanwhile he rebuilt the Temple (1670-2) and erected 52 churches in London, of which the finest are St. Mary-le-Bow (1671-7) and St. Stephen's, Walbrook (1672-9). He also undertook restoration work in many parts of the country, notably at Salisbury, Lincoln, Chichester, and Westminster Abbey. In 1698 he was appointed surveyor to Westminster Abbey. He retired in 1718, on being superseded in his post of surveyor-general.

Wright, SIR NATHAN (1654-1721), was called to the bar in 1677. He assisted at the trial of the Seven Bishops (q.v.). In 1697 he was created king's serjeant. On the dismissal of Somers (1700) he was appointed lord keeper of the privy seal. In 1702 he addressed the commission which had been appointed to frame the union with Scotland. He rendered himself objectionable by his partisanship of the Church. He was restricted to silence in the Upper House, where he performed the duties of a Speaker, for want of a peerage. We find him accused of leaving out, in his list of the justices of the peace, all who were not of Tory politics. He was removed in 1705. It had been said of him that "his legal acquirements were below the requisite standard, and his character for meanness and avarice ill-qualified him to preside over the most august assembly in the kingdom." [COWPER, WILLIAM; SOMERS, JOHN.]

Wright, WILLIAM (fl. 1530), a doctor of law, flourished in the reign of Henry VIII, and is famous as being Henry's first envoy to Rome respecting his projected divorce from Katharine of Aragon. Wright's mission was entirely without any tangible results, and the facts that (1) Clement VII was at that time a prisoner in the hands of the Emperor Charles V, and (2) Henry's ideas on the subject of the divorce had not reached the decided stage they attained a little later, naturally prevented Wright from doing much more than preparing the papal mind for a favourable reception of the king's wishes.

Wriothesley, HENRY, 3RD EARL OF SOUTHAMPTON (1573-1624), a favourite of Queen Elizabeth and a bosom friend of Essex, was the grandson of Lord Chancellor Wriothesley. In 1597 he took part in the disastrous expedition to the Azores, and two years later followed Essex to Ireland, where he was appointed general of the horse, to the anger of Elizabeth, whose goodwill he had forfeited on his marriage. The queen had the appointment cancelled in July. In 1601 his impetuosity and generous support of his friend led him to take an active part in Essex's rebellion, and he was put on trial for high treason (February 1601). He was condemned, but, owing to the intercession of Sir Robert Cecil, was not executed; he was, however, confined to the Tower until the death of the queen. His literary relations invest his career with particular interest.

Biography by Charlotte C. Stopes, 1922.

Wriothesley, THOMAS, 1ST EARL OF SOUTHAMPTON (1505-50), was appointed lord chancellor in the place of Lord Audley in 1544. He was a zealous Catholic and is said to have tortured Anne Askew with his own hands. Named one of the council of regency in the will of Henry VIII, he was created Earl of Southampton, but failed to obtain the confidence of Somerset, to whom he had long been in opposition. In 1547 Wriothesley of his own authority put the great seal in commission, and appointed four individuals to discharge the duties of chancellor. This act, which was declared by the judges to amount to a misdemeanour, enabled the council to demand his resignation. Shortly after this Lord Seymour of Sudeley tried to draw him into a plot against the Protector, but, probably from caution, he refused his overtures, and gave information of the intrigue. In 1549 he entered into negotiations with Warwick, and took a prominent part in the deposition of Somerset, but soon afterwards retired from the council in disgust at the treatment he received, and died, it is said, of disappointment.

Writs, PARLIAMENTARY, are addressed to the sheriff of a county directing him to cause to be elected a member or members to the House of Commons in case of a general election or vacancy. They issue upon the warrant of the lord chancellor, or, during the sitting of the House, upon the warrant of the Speaker. The first instance of a writ of summons in their later form is in 1213, when the king directed that four discreet knights should be returned from each shire ad loquendum nobiscum de negotiis regni nostri. It was not until the end of the reign of Edward I that parliament assumed its final form, and that the possibility of the merchants and lawyers being summoned as separate "sub-estates" ceased. Of the other "estates" of the realm, writs of summons were addressed in the times of Henry III and Edward I to a certain select number of hereditary barons, who, in conjunction with the prelates, formed, by the middle of the fourteenth century, the House of Lords. The form of the early parliamentary writs illustrates very clearly the different functions of the three orders. The magnates are usually summoned ad tractandum; the Commons, ad consulendum et consentiendum; that is, the latter body are regarded as having inferior powers. Prelates were summoned de fide et dilectione; lords temporal, de fide et homagio or de homagio et ligeantia. Writs of summons to the Commons are important in the qualifications introduced, which vary from the formula "de discretioribus et legalioribus" of 1275 to the qualification that members should be "gladiis cinctos," or belted knights, introduced in 1340. Later changes depend upon the election acts in force at different periods, such as those imposing a property qualification on electors, and directing the methods of election.

For specimens of parliamentary writs see Stubbs, "Select Charters," ed. H. W. O. Davis, 1913; and Palgrave, "Parliamentary Writs"; see also Pasquet, "Origin of the House of Commons."

Wroth, SIR THOMAS (1516-73), was sent to Ireland in 1564 as a special commissioner in conjunction with Sir Nicholas Arnold, to inquire into the complaints which had been made against the English army. He had previously been employed on diplomatic missions in Germany, and had been one of the witnesses to Edward VI's "device" for altering the succession in favour of Lady Jane Grey.

Wrotham Heath, THE BATTLE OF (January 28, 1554), fought during Wyatt's Rebellion, resulted in the defeat of the Kentish insurgents under Sir Henry Isley by Lord Abergavenny. Wrotham is a small town near Sevenoaks in Kent.

Wulfhelm, Archbishop of Canterbury 923-42, was translated from Wells on the death of Ethelm. His episcopate saw the commencement of the movement in favour of monasticism and rigid celibacy, which was to agitate the Church in the reigns of his immediate successors.

Wulfhere, KING OF MERCIA 659-75, was the son of Penda and brother of Peada. On the death of the latter (656) Oswy of Northumbria assumed the government of Mercia, but in 659 the Northumbrian yoke was shaken off and Wulfhere proclaimed king. He was successful in his wars against Wessex which he undertook in 661, and having conquered the land of the Meonwaras and the Isle of Wight, he granted these originally Jutish districts to his vassal Ethelwalch of Sussex. He further established an overlordship over Essex and East Anglia, and advanced the western boundary of Mercia at the expense of the Welsh. He carried on the work of conversion begun by Peada, and established the diocese of Lichfield, of which St. Chad was made bishop.

Wulfred, Archbishop of Canterbury 803-32, was chosen on the death of Ethelhard. He quarrelled with Cenwulf, King of Mercia, who deprived him of some of his estates and laid false charges against him before the pope. With Cenwulf's death, however, in 822, Wulfred's troubles seem to have ended, and he continued to exercise his metropolitan rights in peace until his death in 832.

Wulfstan, SAINT (d. 1095), became Bishop of Worcester in 1062. He supported Harold on his accession, but afterwards made his submission to the Conqueror. He succeeded in retaining his bishopric in spite of the attempt of Lanfranc to displace him; his reputation for sanctity being held to compensate for his notorious illiteracy. He took an active part in the suppression of the rebellions of 1075 and 1088, and was largely instrumental in securing the suppression of the Bristol slave trade. He was popularly venerated as a saint immediately on his death, and was canonized by Innocent III in 1203.

Wyatt, SIR THOMAS (1521 ?-1554), was the son of Sir Thomas Wyatt the poet. In January 1554 he became one of the leaders of the rebellion against Mary, though he is said to have had nothing to do with the origin of the plot. The insurrection, which was caused by national discontent at the contemplated marriage of Mary with Philip II of Spain, had for its object the deposition of the queen in favour of the Princess Elizabeth and Edward Courtenay, Earl of Devon. Sir Thomas Wyatt was charged with the duty of raising Kent, and so well did he perform his mission that Kent was the only part of the country where the rebellion assumed at all formidable dimensions. He excited the applause of his very adversaries by the secrecy and address with which he organized the rising, and by the spirit and perseverance with which he conducted the enterprise. A delay, however, in taking possession of London proved fatal to Wyatt's success; and after a sharp engagement he found himself compelled to surrender at Temple Bar to Sir Maurice Berkeley (February 8). After his capture he implicated Courtenay by his confessions; but though every endeavour was made to extort from him a full revelation, he steadfastly refused to buy his life at the price of an accusation of the Princess Elizabeth, which was what her enemies, with Bishop Gardiner at their head, were labouring to obtain; and at the last moment retracted what he had said concerning Courtenay's guilt. He was executed on April 11.

Memoir by R. F. Nott, 1816; R. P. Cruden, "History of Gravesend," 1842.

Wyclif, JOHN (1320 ?-1384), was born about the year 1320, or a little later. Leland names his birthplace as Ipsreswel, or Hipswell, near Richmond in Yorkshire, and states that he derived his origin from the family which held the lordship of Wycliffe-on-Tees. It was this connexion plainly that drew him to Balliol College, Oxford, which had been founded by John Balliol, of Barnard Castle, on the borders of Durham, in the preceding century. By an old mistake Wyclif has been described as first a commoner of Queen's College, and a confusion (as it appears) with a namesake makes him fellow and seneschal of Merton. In all probability, however, he remained a member of Balliol until he was chosen master of the college some time after 1356, but not later than 1360. In 1361 he was instituted to the college living of Fillingham, near Lincoln, and shortly afterwards resigned the mastership. He does not appear, however, to have given up his work as a teacher in Oxford, for we find him renting rooms at Queen's College, doubtless with this object, at various dates between 1363 and 1380. But in this interval—if we are to accept a view now nearly universally credited, which rests indeed upon abundant contemporary evidence, but which none the less may have arisen from the confusion above referred to with the other John Wyclif, of Merton—the future reformer was nominated by Archbishop Islip in 1365, warden of his foundation of Canterbury Hall, the site of which now forms a portion of Christ Church, Oxford. Wyclif and three fellows, secular clergymen, were appointed in the place of three monks whose position in the hall had been a source of disturbance; but in 1367 Islip's successor, Archbishop Langham, himself a monk, expelled Wyclif and the fellows who had entered with him, and substituted regular clergymen. Wyclif appealed to Rome; judgment was given against him in 1369 and published in 1370, and the sentence was enforced by royal writ in 1372. His living of Fillingham he exchanged in 1368 for Ludgershall, in Buckinghamshire, and in 1374 he was presented by the Crown to the rectory of Lutterworth, in Leicestershire, where he remained until his death.

During these years Wyclif had written a variety of scholastic treatises; then, turning to theology, he had devoted himself in particular to expanding and applying his theory of the divine government, known to us as the doctrine of dominion. He erected a sort of theocratic feudalism where each man "held" of God, without the interposition of any mesne lord, and where "grace" or "charity" was the sole indispensable condition of tenure. When Wyclif went on to explain that the universal power claimed by the pope could only belong by right to the "Lord-in-chief," who had never delegated his authority in that sense to man, it was evident that in the doctrinaire might be found one able to do good service to his country, especially at a time when England was pressed by demands for tribute to the pope, and overrun by his emissaries. Accordingly we find that Wyclif was made chaplain to the king; in 1366 he wrote against the papal claim, and in 1374 acted as one of the royal commissioners at the conference held at Bruges, with the object of settling the disputed question of "provisions." Wyclif now appears as a hearty co-operator with John of Gaunt, though it would seem that the only point they had in common was a desire to repress the overgrown power of the endowed clergy. Through this connexion rather than from any serious charge of incorrect doctrine, Wyclif was cited by William Courtenay, Bishop of London, a declared opponent of the Duke of Lancaster, to appear before him at St. Paul's in February 1377; but the trial broke up in an undignified quarrel between John, who accompanied Wyclif, and the bishop. Wyclif's teaching, however, with regard to the rights of the Church, especially as to the temporalities, had already reached Rome; and a few months later a series of bulls were directed against him by Gregory XI. But the king's death in June delayed their execution, and the attempted action of the Archbishop of Canterbury was thwarted for some time by the independent attitude of the University of Oxford. Meantime Wyclif published his answer to the papal accusation. At length, in the spring of 1378, he had to appear at Lambeth; but here again the session was interrupted by an uproar of the people, who resented the intrusion of papal bulls: and Wyclif was simply forbidden to lecture upon the subjects which had given offence. The Great Schism, however, which began in the same year, exacerbated his opposition to the papacy. He went farther than before, and ventured to dispute the doctrine of transubstantiation. He returned from the clergy to the commonalty, and began to address them in English tracts; he denounced the papacy, the monastic, and now particularly the mendicant, orders. He planned and mainly executed, with the help of John Purvey and other friends, a translation of the Bible into English, the first complete version ever attempted, which was quickly spread abroad in innumerable copies; at least 165 manuscripts of it, in whole or in part, have come down to us, in spite of the strong measures taken by the Church for its suppression. He sent out his disciples, the "poor priests," to preach his doctrines throughout the country. But the hostility among the leading churchmen aroused by these movements was much more languid than might have been anticipated. A vigorous attack was made upon his principal adherents in Oxford, Nicholas Hereford, Repyngdon, Ashton, and Bedeman, in 1382, and they were induced to recant. But the heresiarch himself was hardly at all molested, though his doctrines were condemned by the chancellor of Oxford, and by a provincial council held at the Blackfriars in London, in May 1382: it is said also that he had to appear in person at another council at Oxford in November of that year; but no sentence was passed upon him. He retired unmolested to Lutterworth and died there from a paralysis on December 31, 1384.

Wyclif was a strenuous and conscientious, if in some respects injudicious, advocate of Church reform. So far he was in unison with perhaps a majority of the earnest clergy of his day. With the Franciscans he found a chief cause of the corruption of the Church in the excessive possession of temporal goods by the clergy. He parted company with them, as with all loyal Catholics, when he sought to reform the doctrinal system, and to destroy almost everything upon which the sacerdotal principle was based. But by this very course of teaching he attached the multitude to him, weary as it was of the perfunctory ministrations of a corrupt order. It is in his English works, his short, robust tracts and sermons—far more than in his Latin ones, which, although of a high interest, are but too plainly the products of a declining and artificial period of scholasticism—that Wyclif shows his real genius; and he may almost be said to have invented English prose as a vehicle of literary exposition. His influence was permanent, though not perhaps very extensive; but the fact which makes him a true herald of the Protestant Reformation was his assertion of the rights of the individual conscience before God and against any human intermediary whatsoever.

Matthew's introduction to his "English Works of Wyclif." The two last are of special value. Wyclif's English works have been published by T. Arnold (3 volumes) and Matthew (1 volume). His Latin works, of which hitherto little more than the "Triologus" has seen the light (ed. Lechler), have been published by the Wyclif Society. Later biographies by W. L. Watkinson, 1924, and H. B. Workman, 1926; also J. Gairdner, "Lollardy . . .," 4 vols., 1908. [R. L. P.]

Wykeham, WILLIAM OF (1324-1404), was born at Wickham in Hampshire. He long served Edward III in the capacity of surveyor of works, and built for him many noble edifices, the new royal apartments at Windsor Castle among the number. He became warden of the forests south of the Trent, keeper of the privy seal, Bishop of Winchester, and at length chancellor in 1367. In 1371 he was driven from office by the anti-clerical party and for a time devoted himself to diocesan business and to his various building projects. In the later years of Edward III's reign he was the strenuous opponent of John of Gaunt, and played a leading part in the Good Parliament of 1376 (q.v.). In revenge Lancaster charged him with malversation and misgovernment, and he was deprived of his temporalities. On the accession of Richard II he was restored to favour, but took little further part in public affairs till 1389, when he was induced, much against his inclination, to accept again the office of chancellor. He held the great seal for two years and a half, during which period tranquillity and good government prevailed. In 1391 he retired from public life, and devoted his energies to the administration of his diocese and the founding and endowing of the noble establishments of New College, Oxford, and St. Mary, Winchester. Wykeham was a man of affairs rather than a scholar, but by his munificent foundations he did much to further the cause of learning. In character he was gentle and moderate, and his liberality was inspired by a genuine sympathy and goodness of heart. A contemporary said of him that his enemies, in seeking to impute blame to him, were "trying to find a knot in a rush."

Wyndham, SIR WILLIAM (1687-1740), entered parliament for the county of Somerset (1710), and in 1713 became chancellor of the exchequer. He was a follower of Bolingbroke, and introduced in the House the Schism Act which drove Oxford from office. In Bolingbroke's projected ministry he was to have been head of the commission of the privy seal. Wyndham's Jacobitism had at any rate the merit of sincerity. On the accession of George I he was dismissed from office. In opposition he vigorously opposed the proclamation for a new parliament, for which he was reprimanded by the Speaker, and defended the fallen ministry. In 1715, on the outbreak of the Jacobite insurrection in the north, he was promptly arrested, and committed to the Tower. Bolingbroke informs us that he and Lord Lansdowne were the only two men who could possibly have organized an insurrection in the west of England, and there is no doubt that he held the threads of the conspiracy. On his release he continued until his death a vigorous opponent of Walpole, his eloquence, which was very great, being especially directed against that statesman. He was the recognized leader of the Tory part of the composite opposition. His best speech was made in 1734 against the Septennial Act. In 1739 he announced that he and his friends were going to secede from the House, and solemnly took leave of it for ever. But the manœuvre was not a success, and the opposition returned to their places. It was generally believed at the time that Wyndham wished to play the part of a political martyr, and be sent to the Tower.

Wynendaal, SKIRMISH AT (1708), was one of the episodes of the siege of Lille during the War of the Spanish Succession (q.v.). On September 27 a huge convoy departed from Ostend for the English army. Lamothe, the officer in command of the French cavalry, hastened to intercept it towards evening at Wynendaal, near which the road passes through a wood. He found the wood, however, occupied by General John Richmond Webb, with 6,000 men, supported towards the end of the action by Cadogan, with some squadrons of horse, who drove off the enemy at all points. The convoy arrived safely at the English camp.

Yaxted, FRANCIS (d. 1565), one of the household of Mary, Queen of Scots, was employed by her in various confidential missions, the details of which he invariably betrayed to Elizabeth's minister. In 1565 he was sent to Philip of Spain to obtain the aid of that monarch against the English queen, and was drowned on his way back in charge of a large sum of money, which he was conveying as a present from Spain to Mary. "Yaxted," says

Froude, "was a conspirator of the kind most dangerous to his employers—vain, loud, and confident, fond of boasting of his acquaintance with kings and princes, and 'promising to bring to a good end whatsoever should be committed to him.'"

Yelverton, SIR CHRISTOPHER (1535 ?–1612), who had on several occasions distinguished himself by his parliamentary speeches in favour of the restriction of the royal prerogative within due limits, was elected Speaker of the House of Commons in 1597. By his conduct while holding his office he managed to regain the favour of the queen, which he had forfeited by his previous speeches, and in 1602 was made a judge of the Queen's Bench.

"History of the Yelverton Family," 1861.

Yeomanry, THE, in England, was the name given to a force of volunteer cavalry, first raised in 1761, and embodied in 1797, when numerous regiments were formed. By 1803 they numbered 44,000. In 1814, when the Volunteers were disbanded, many of the Yeomanry regiments were allowed to exist, under regulations providing that they should be called out for short periods of exercise every year. In 1900 the Imperial Yeomanry was raised for service in the Boer War. By the Territorial and Reserve Forces Act, 1907, the Imperial Yeomanry became the cavalry of the Territorial Army (q.v.).

— in Ireland were embodied in September 1796, as the Militia could not be trusted in so dangerous a time. The government, being afraid of a religious war, had long refused the applications of the gentry to be allowed to raise men at their own expense, but could not refuse any longer. The Orangemen entered largely into these corps, of which Dublin alone raised four regiments of foot and four troops of horse. Thirty thousand men were soon under arms, nearly all of whom were Protestants. It was the Yeomanry who effected the disarmament of Ulster in 1797, and to them more than to any other force was the suppression of the rebellion of 1798 due. It cannot, however, be denied that their free use of the lash, the picket, and the pitchcap may have prevented the insurgents from laying down their arms, and have led to many of the cruelties committed by the peasantry.

Yonge, SIR WILLIAM (d. 1755), was the eldest son and successor of Sir Walter Yonge, Bart., of Colyton, near Honiton, in Devonshire. He was elected member for Honiton at the beginning of George I's reign, and succeeded to his father's estates in 1731. In 1717 he was appointed a commissioner for examining the debts due to the army, and in 1724 a lord-commissioner to the treasury. In 1735 he was appointed secretary at war and a member of the privy council. He was a strong supporter of Walpole, who was accustomed to say of him, "that nothing but Yonge's character could keep down such parts, and nothing but his parts could support his character." In 1746 he was a member of the committee for managing the impeachment of Lord Lovat.

York (Latin, Eboracum; Old English, Eborforwic) was the capital of Roman Britain, a fortress where the head-quarters of the Sixth Legion, and for a time of the Ninth, were situated, and the site of an important colony. Its two rivers, the Ouse and the Foss, strengthened its walls, and the former made it an important commercial centre. Constantius Chlorus died there, and Constantine the Great was there hailed Emperor by his troops (A.D. 306). It was also the seat of one of the bishoprics of the Romano-British Church. Under the Anglian kings it preserved its position as a capital; first of Deira, afterwards of the greater kingdom of Northumbria. In 627 Paulinus baptized King Edwin in the hastily-built chapel where the cathedral afterwards rose. The organization of the English Church, effected by Theodore, made York an archbishopric, though quite dependent on Canterbury, until Archbishop Egbert vindicated its claims to metropolitan independence. In the eighth century the learning of men such as Egbert and Alcuin made the great cathedral school of York famous throughout Christendom. In 867 it was taken by the Danes, and its recovery by Athelstan took place in 926. At the Conquest it contained about 10,000 people. It submitted to William, who built a castle there in 1068. It was taken in September 1069 by an English revolt aided by a Danish fleet, but retaken by William without opposition at the end of the year. The town obtained its first charter from Henry II and later rapidly added to its privileges. In the fourteenth century it was governed by a lord mayor and aldermen, and in 1396 it was given the status of a county. During the long wars with Scotland it was very frequently the meeting-place of parliaments. In 1298 Edward I; in 1314, 1318, 1319, and 1322 Edward II; in 1328, 1332, 1333, 1334, and 1335 Edward III held sessions at York, and again in 1464 a parliament was summoned thither by Edward IV. Its commerce continued to flourish, although diminished by the rise of Hull, and Edward III for a time freed the staple there. Henry VI extended its jurisdiction over the wapentake of the Ainsty. The Yorkist kings cultivated the favour of the citizens, and Richard III counted them his truest supporters. York suffered greatly at the Reformation from the destruction of the hospitals, chapels, and chantries which abounded there. It was captured by the rebels during the Pilgrimage of Grace (1536) (q.v.), and became the seat of the council of the North, which was erected there during those disturbances. At York also met the commission which opened the inquiry into the charges against Mary, Queen of Scots (1568). In the civil wars of the next century the city played a still more important part. There, in 1642, Charles I collected his partisans, and the surrender of York in July 1644 sealed the fate of the north of England. Its occupation by Fairfax in January 1660 enabled Monck to advance into England, and materially forwarded the Restoration. Like most other corporations York lost its charter in 1684, and had it restored in November 1688. In the same month Lord Danby seized the city, then governed by Sir John Reresby, and declared for a free parliament and the Protestant religion. At the time of the Revolution of 1688 York probably contained about 10,000 inhabitants. Though its trade was fast diminishing, and its political weight decreased as great manufacturing towns grew up in the north of England, it still retained its importance as a social centre. "What has been, and is, the chief support of the city at present," wrote Drake in his "History of York" (1737), "is the resort to and residence of several country gentlemen with their families in it." As the judicial and political centre of the largest of English counties, as the ecclesiastical centre of a much wider district, it continues to rank amongst the great cities of England.

York, ARCHBISHOPS OF. [ARCHBISHOPS.]

York, HOUSE OF. The regal house of York was the most short-lived of our dynasties. Beginning with the proclamation of Edward IV (March 4, 1461), it ended with the fall of Edward's youngest brother, Richard, on the field of Bosworth (August 22, 1485). It sprang from a marriage, made early in the fifteenth century, between Richard, Earl of Cambridge, and Anne Mortimer, his first cousin twice removed. Richard was the youngest son of the fifth son of Edward III (Edmund, Duke of York), and Anne was the great granddaughter of the third son (Lionel, Duke of Clarence). Thus the designation of the house came from a younger, its title to the crown from an elder, son of Edward III. Another Richard, born in 1410, was the issue of this marriage, and as early as 1424 a succession of events had made this Richard heir-general of Edward III. It came about in this way. The Black Prince's line expired with Richard II; King Edward's second son died in his infancy; Lionel's sole child, Philippa, and her husband, Edmund Mortimer, Earl of March, had a son, Roger, whose children, Edmund and Anne, were in Henry V's reign the only descendants of Lionel, Duke of Clarence. In 1424 Edmund died childless. Consequently, just when the most inefficient of the royal descendants of John of Gaunt, Edward's fourth son, was beginning to reign, the undoubted representative of the third was growing up into a manly vigour and a healthy robustness of character which promised a really competent ruler. Richard had also become the only representative of the family of York, for his father, having conspired with others against Henry V, had been beheaded in the summer of 1415, and a few months afterwards his uncle, Edmund, Duke of York, had fallen at Agincourt, leaving no issue.

Notwithstanding his father's treason, the full favour of the court shone upon Richard's path from the first. He was carefully brought up as his father's, mother's, and uncle's heir, and was allowed to connect himself by marriage with the widespread and influential Neville family, whose head, Ralph, Earl of Westmorland, had indeed been his guardian for a time. He wedded Ralph's daughter, Cecily, and thus, when the big moment arrived, had linked to his aspirations and fortunes such powerful nobles as his brothers-in-law, Richard Neville, Earl of Salisbury, and William, Lord Fauconberg, and Richard's sons, Richard, Earl of Warwick, and John, Lord Montacute; while the advisers of Henry VI unwittingly added to his greatness. By giving him command in France and then making him regent there, and appointing him to the Irish lieutenancy, they threw opportunities in his way which he was able and willing to turn to account. He was, therefore, between 1450 and 1460 the foremost man in England. Yet his claim to the throne was not put forward till the meeting of parliament in October 1460. Its soundness is not indisputable. Succession to the crown did not then follow the same rule as succession to private property; the transmission of a right to the throne through an heiress, such as Philippa of Clarence, had never been established, and, even if it were admitted, its virtue was destroyed by the sixty years' prescription, the acts of parliament, and the oft-repeated oaths of allegiance, that made for Henry's right. The lords of parliament shrank from giving judgment, and Richard agreed not to press his claim on being declared Henry's heir. Slain in the following December with his second son, Edmund, after the fight of Wakefield, he left his rights to his eldest son, Edward, Earl of March, who soon asserted them with a strong hand. Edward simply seized the crown on March 4, 1461. The victory of Towton, and the voice of a parliament that met in November, ratified the act, and Edward IV was recognized as full king from the date of his proclamation. Mismanagement, and the alienation of Warwick, expelled him from the kingdom in 1470, but in 1471 he recovered his royalty, holding it in security till his death in April 1483. By that time his second brother, George, Duke of Clarence, was dead, dispatched, on a condemnation for treason, in some unknown fashion; but Edward left two sons, Edward, called the Fifth, and Richard, and five daughters. His youngest brother, however, Richard, Duke of Gloucester, cunningly supplanted and then murdered the two sons, reigning as Richard III for two years. Richard's crimes estranged from him several staunch Yorkists, who then promoted a marriage between Edward IV's eldest daughter, Elizabeth, and Henry Tudor. Before the combination that ensued Richard perished on Bosworth Field on August 22, 1485. Henry married Elizabeth, and thus the rival houses coalesced. Another daughter of Edward IV's married the Earl of Devon, and was the mother of the Marquis of Exeter, so fortunate and unfortunate in Henry VIII's reign. Clarence, who was married to the Earl of Warwick's elder daughter, Isabella, left two children, Edward, Earl of Warwick, who was kept in prison by Henry VII till complicity with a design of Perkin Warbeck's led to his execution, and Margaret, created Countess of Salisbury, and executed by Henry VIII. The chief historical distinction of the house of York is that it was the first to set the fashion of constitutional despotism in England.

YORKIST KINGS

Edward IV	1460-1483
Edward V	1483
Richard III	1483-1485

York, EDMUND OF LANGLEY, DUKE OF (1341-1402), was the fifth son of Edward III. In 1362 he was made Earl of Cambridge, and on the accession of Richard II was appointed one of the council of regency. He did not take any prominent part in the conflicts of his nephew's reign, but in 1385 was made Duke of York, and in 1394 and 1399, during the king's absence in Ireland, was appointed regent. On Bolingbroke's landing, York raised a force to oppose him, but finding him more powerful than he had expected, he was induced to make terms with him, and to profess the belief that Henry had no traitorous designs against the king. After Richard's deposition and Henry's coronation he retired to his domain, where he spent the last years of his life. He figures as a weak man, of moderate views, and always ready by mediation to prevent civil strife. His desertion of Richard, whose representative he was in England, can scarcely be palliated, particularly as, if he had made a firm stand on hearing of Bolingbroke's landing, the barons would probably have submitted. Edmund was twice married, first to Isabella, daughter of Pedro the Cruel of Castile, and secondly to Joan, daughter of Thomas Holand, Earl of Kent.

Graham Brooks, "The Dukes of York, 1385-1927," 1927.

York, EDWARD "PLANTAGENET," DUKE OF (d. 1415), was the son of Edmund of Langley. In the lifetime of his father he was created Earl of Rutland, and subsequently Duke of Albemarle by Richard II. He took a leading part in the attack on the lords appellant in 1397 and accompanied the king on his expedition to Ireland in the year 1399, but, on learning of Bolingbroke's success, is said to have deserted Richard. Henry deprived him of his dukedom, but despite the fact that Lord Fitzwalter and many other barons accused him of abetting Richard in his tyrannical acts, he received no other punishment. It is said that in 1399 he conspired with the Earl of Huntingdon and others against Henry, but afterwards turned traitor, and revealed the plot to the king. There is, however, no trustworthy evidence of his complicity. He accompanied Henry V to France in 1415, and was one of the commanders in the battle of Agincourt, where he was slain. He married Philippa, daughter of Lord Mohun, but left no issue.

Graham Brooks, "The Dukes of York, 1385-1927," 1927.

York, RICHARD, DUKE OF (1411-60), was the son of Richard, Earl of Cambridge, by Anne, daughter of Roger, Earl of March, and was therefore paternal grandson of Edmund, fifth son of Edward III, and maternal great-great-grandson of Lionel, Edward's third son. In 1425 he was relieved from the effects of his father's attainder, and succeeded to the estates and titles of his uncles, Edward, Duke of York, and Edmund, Earl of March. In 1430 he was made constable of England, and in 1436 he was appointed regent of France on the death of John, Duke of Bedford. In the next year he was recalled, but in 1440 was reappointed, holding office till 1445. In 1447 he was made lieutenant of Ireland, the court party being anxious to rid itself of the presence of one whose descent made him a menace to the Crown. York did not cross to assume his new functions until 1449, but during the year for which he held office he governed Ireland with wisdom and moderation. In the meantime party strife in England culminated in the murder of Suffolk in May 1450, and in the same month Jack Cade's rebellion broke out. How far York was interested in the rising is uncertain, but in August he crossed to England and assumed the overt leadership of the party of opposition to Somerset and the court. He was as popular as Somerset was odious, and had powerful allies in the Nevilles, with whom he was closely connected by his marriage with Cecily, daughter of the Earl of Westmorland. In 1451 a proposal was made in parliament that York should be declared heir to the crown, but this was not seriously entertained, and the proposer was imprisoned. Next year, however, York declaring that his sole object was to rid the king of Somerset and other evil counsellors, raised a force, and marched to London. Henry met him at Blackheath, and consented to the dismissal of Somerset, York in return swearing fealty to the king, and promising for the future to sue for remedy in legal form; but the king made no attempt to redeem his pledge. Meantime the birth of an heir to Henry in 1453 deprived York of all hope of succeeding peacefully to the throne, while the imbecility of the king gave him the office of protector, which he held till Henry's recovery in 1454, Somerset being thrown into prison. On the king's restoration to health York was dismissed and Somerset reinstated. The first battle of St. Albans followed (1455), in which the latter was slain, and the king shortly afterwards becoming once more imbecile, York was again appointed protector (October 1455). When in February 1456 Henry recovered, and York was relieved of his office, two years of comparative peace followed, and in March 1458 a great ceremony of reconciliation took place at St. Paul's. But the misgovernment and misfortunes of the country, and the alienation of the Nevilles as a result of the attempted murder of Warwick, gave York another opportunity in 1459. The Yorkists were marching south when Lord Audley tried to stop them at Blore Heath, but was defeated, and battle was imminent at Ludlow when the defection of Trollop alarmed the Yorkists, and they fled. The duke went to Ireland, and in the parliament held at Coventry at the end of the year was attained. In 1460 the Yorkist lords planned a return to England, and York issued a manifesto against the royal ministers. The battle of Northampton, in which Warwick was victorious, placed the king at their mercy. York himself landed in England in September, and the parliament which met in the next month repealed the duke's attainder. York now for the first time personally asserted his claim to the throne, and after a long discussion a compromise was effected (October 25), by which Henry was to retain the crown during his lifetime, after which it was to revert to York and his heirs. Meanwhile the duke and his sons were not to molest the king; but any attempt on the duke's life was made high treason, and the principality of Wales was handed over to him. However, Queen Margaret, who refused to recognize this arrangement, had meanwhile been collecting an army in the north, and against her the Duke of York marched with a small force. The battle of Wakefield ensued on the last day of the year, and during the struggle York was slain. His head was placed on the walls of York, garnished with a paper crown, but was taken down after the battle of Towton. By his marriage with Cecily Neville the duke had eight sons and four daughters, of whom four sons and one daughter died in childhood. Of the others, Edward and Richard became kings, Edmund was killed at Wakefield, and George was created Duke of Clarence. His daughters were Anne, who married the Duke of Exeter, Elizabeth, who married John, Duke of Suffolk, and Margaret, who married Charles the Bold, Duke of Burgundy.

On Richard's character it is not easy to pronounce. During his career in France and Ireland he won a high reputation as a general and an administrator. That which distinguishes him chiefly in the strife of parties which culminated in his death is his moderation. Not until 1460 did he urge his claim to the throne, and his ultimate abandonment of the rôle of constitutional reformer must be ascribed largely to the provocative and vindictive policy of his inveterate enemy, Margaret of Anjou. During his tenure of power in 1454-5 he displayed caution and restraint, and his treatment of his opponents is throughout in striking contrast to that which became customary in the later stages of the Wars of the Roses.

Graham Brooks, "The Dukes of York, 1385-1927," 1927.

York and Albany, FREDERICK AUGUSTUS, DUKE OF (1763-1827), was the second son of George III, and, as early as his elder brother, broke away from the rigid discipline by which their parents fondly hoped to preserve them from the evils of the world. At the age of twenty-one he was created Duke of York and Albany, and Earl of Ulster. But already in his first year he had been elevated by his father to the half-secularized bishopric of Osnabrück. In 1791 he married Princess Frederica Charlotte, eldest daughter of Frederick William II, King of Prussia, when his income was increased to £70,000 a year by a vote of £18,000. In 1793 he was placed in command of an expedition to the Netherlands, to act with the Prince of Saxe-Coburg against France. Though giving some proofs of personal gallantry, he soon made it clear that his royal birth was his only qualification for command. Fortunately for England the duke became disgusted at his want of success, and retreated, leaving Abercromby in command. As a reward for the military ability displayed in this campaign he was in 1798 appointed commander-in-chief of the forces, and in 1799 was again entrusted with the command of an expedition to the Low Countries, in which, however, the only successes gained were due to Abercromby. The campaign finally ended in a disgraceful convention with the French. The duke was compelled to resign his office because of the shameful disclosures as to the way in which he allowed his mistress, Mrs. Clarke, to influence the military appointments, but was later restored to his old office under his brother's regency. His last act in public life was a most violent speech in the House of Lords against Catholic emancipation in 1825. In January 1827 he died.

Yorke, CHARLES (1722-70), was the second son of Philip, 1st Earl Hardwicke. Called to the bar in 1746, he soon obtained a large practice, and in 1745 made his reputation as a jurist by the publication of "Some Considerations on the Laws of Forfeiture for High Treason." In 1747 he was returned to parliament for Reigate, and in November 1756 he was appointed solicitor-general. In the following July he was doomed to a bitter disappointment when Pitt insisted on making Charles Pratt (q.v.) attorney-general over his head. For this slight he never quite forgave Pitt, and on the accession of George III attached himself to Bute. On Pratt's appointment to the chief justiceship of the Common Pleas in January 1762 he became attorney-general. Bute's administration, however, was short-lived, and early in 1763 he made way for Sir Fletcher

Norton. Out of office Yorke's reputation in the House rose. He strongly condemned the action of the government in issuing general warrants (q.v.). In 1765 he again became attorney-general during the Rockingham administration, but resigned his office on their falling in the following year, and continued in opposition until the last few days of his life; but his activity was confined for the most part to the courts, and was not employed in any vigorous opposition to the government. Towards the beginning of 1770, on the resignation of Lord Camden, he was offered the chancellorship—a post which he accepted after having declined it twice. A week later he died, suspected of having committed suicide.

Sir G. O. Trevelyan, "Early Life of C. J. Fox," 1880.

Yorke, PHILIP, 1ST EARL OF HARDWICKE (1690-1764), the son of an attorney at Dover, was called to the bar in 1715. His political rise was due to Newcastle, Macclesfield, and Stanhope. He first sat for Lewes in 1718, and was made solicitor-general in 1720. From that date he became, in succession, attorney-general (1723), lord chief justice and Lord Hardwicke (1733), and lord chancellor (1737). He supported Walpole through his long administration; but towards the close of it he was constrained to disagree with his chief's peace policy, and became an advocate for war. On the fall of Walpole he continued to hold office under Wilmington, and subsequently under the Pelhams. In 1753 Lord Hardwicke introduced a new Marriage Act [MARRIAGE LAWS], and, during the debates on it had a violent quarrel with Henry Fox, who disapproved of it. In 1754 he was raised to an earldom. He went out of office with the Duke of Newcastle, of whose administration he had been the chief supporter. In 1758 he persuaded the Lords to throw out a bill for the extension of Habeas Corpus, and introduced a measure for abolishing hereditary jurisdiction in Scotland. His last great speech was directed against the Treaty of Paris (q.v.—1763), by which the Seven Years' War was closed. Next year he died, leaving behind him the reputation of being one of the greatest chancellors that have sat on the woolsack since the Revolution.

Biography by P. C. Yorke, 1913.

Yorke, SIR ROLAND (d. 1588), was a "soldier of fortune," and the bitter enemy of Leicester. He is said to have been instrumental in bringing about the treachery of Sir William Stanley in delivering up Deventer to the Spaniards (1587). At the same time Yorke himself gave up the forts at Zutphen, of which he was in command, and went over to Philip II of Spain.

Yorktown, THE SURRENDER OF (October 19, 1781), is memorable as the last important event of the American War of Independence. On August 2 Cornwallis had, in obedience to orders from Clinton, withdrawn into Yorktown, a place whose safety required a naval superiority in its defenders, and at this time that superiority had passed to the French, who had a large fleet under de Grasse in those waters. Cornwallis was aware of the danger of his position, especially when, on September 28, the combined French and American armies appeared in sight. On October 1 the investment was completed, and works were begun with a view to the bombardment of the British position. The bombardment opened on October 14. After an ineffectual attempt to carry the infantry across the straits into Gloucester, a small town on the opposite headland, Cornwallis sent a flag of truce proposing to capitulate on condition that the garrisons of Gloucester and Yorktown should be sent home on their word of honour not again to serve against America or her allies. Washington would not accept these terms, and finally Cornwallis surrendered his public stores and artillery in the two forts, as well as all the shipping in the harbour; the men to remain prisoners of war in America, the ships to become the property of France. With the surrender at Yorktown the war was virtually at an end. Clinton sailed from New York for the Chesapeake on the very day of the capitulation.

Young, ARTHUR (1741–1820), was a writer of a number of works on agriculture and rural economy, to collect information on which subjects he made numerous journeys through the British Isles and on the continent. In 1784 he began a periodical work called the Annals of Agriculture. In 1789 he was appointed secretary to the board of agriculture. Young's works, especially his "Political Arithmetic" (1774) and his "Travels" (1792), are of very great value for the light they throw on the state of society, trade, and agriculture in England, Ireland, and France. Young's account of France, which he visited on the eve of the Revolution, is of singular interest.

Young's "Autobiography"; Sir J. L. Stephen, "Studies of a Biographer," 1898.

Young, ROBERT (1657–1700), one of the most disreputable informers of the seventeenth century, was ordained a deacon in the Irish Church in 1680, but was expelled from his first parish for immorality, and from his third for bigamy. In 1684 he was convicted of having forged Sancroft's signature, and was sentenced to the pillory and imprisonment. When Monmouth's insurrection broke out in 1685 he gave witness of a pretended conspiracy in Suffolk against the king, but his evidence was proved to be false. After the Revolution he determined to become an accuser of the Jacobites, and concocted a story of a plot against William and Mary. In 1692 he forged a paper purporting to be an association for the restoration of the banished king, to which he appended the names of Marlborough, Cornbury, Salisbury, Sancroft, and Thomas Sprat, Bishop of Rochester. A subordinate agent named Stephen Blackhead dropped the paper in one of Sprat's flower-pots.

Young thereupon laid information before the privy council. Marlborough was committed to the Tower and Sprat was taken into custody, but the document could not be found. Blackhead thereupon rescued it from its hiding-place, and gave it to Young, who had it conveyed to the secretary of state. But when confronted by Sprat, Blackhead lost his presence of mind and confessed all. Young, however, with unblushing effrontery persisted in his denial. He was imprisoned and pilloried. He was finally hanged for coining.

Young England Party, THE, was the name given to a group of Tory politicians during the Corn-Law struggles of 1842–6, mostly young members of aristocratic families. They formed a separate party in October 1842, and came prominently before the public in the autumn of 1844. Intimately related to the Oxford Movement through Faber and Newman, it took its theories from Bolingbroke's "Idea of a Patriot King" and Kenelm Digby's "Broadstone of Honour." Young England believed that what was supposed to be the ancient relation between rich and poor should be restored. The landowners and wealthy classes were to be the benevolent protectors and leaders, while the poor were to be obedient and trustful dependents. Every effort was to be made to improve the material condition of the labouring classes, while at the same time a firm resistance was to be offered to the levelling spirit of the age, to free trade, and to the principles of the Liberals generally. The fundamentals of this creed were a veneration for the past, a firm belief in the Church, a lofty imperialism, and sympathy for the working classes. The movement was "the one notable experiment in popular Toryism of which the nineteenth century was witness." Combined with a good deal of coxcombry and conceit, there was an element of usefulness in the Young Englanders. "What the Tractarian priesthood were at this time requiring of their flocks," says Miss Martineau, "the Young England politicians were striving for with the working classes; and the spectacle was seen of Sunday sports encouraged, as in the old Catholic times; and popular festivals revived at which young lords and members of parliament pulled off their coats to play cricket with the labourers, or moved about among the crowd in the park or on the green, in the style of the feudal superior of old." In parliament the Young England politicians, affecting to believe in the "Old Tory principles" of the preceding century, distinguished themselves by their noisy opposition to the Whigs. They opposed the repeal of the Corn Laws, violently attacked Peel for his change of policy, and declined to join the Peelites. Among their most prominent members were Lord John Manners, the Hon. George Smythe, member for Canterbury, and Baillie-Cochrane. Disraeli lent them his support, and was looked upon in some sort as their leader, but he was never fully trusted by them.

The year 1844 was their zenith, marked by the appearance of Disraeli's "Coningsby" and by the formation throughout the country of Athenic Institutions. But in 1845 the party split on the Irish question, Disraeli opposing, and Manners and Smythe supporting, Peel's proposal to increase the endowment of Maynooth College. Disraeli's genius was not to be cramped by his "leadership of a clique"; the founders of Young England were not all men of the same age and ideas.

C. Whibley, "Lord John Manners and his Friends," 2 vols., 1925.

Young Ireland Party. The group of men known under this name, among whom Gavan Duffy, Meagher, and Mitchell are the best known, were at first followers of Daniel O'Connell (q.v.), and did much for the Irish cause by writing papers, historical romances, and national songs, and by publishing old ones. In 1843 they separated from O'Connell after his failure to repel force by force at Clontarf, and began to be known as the Physical Force Party. In 1848 Smith O'Brien (q.v.) became their leader, and as a consequence of his futile attempt at rebellion many of them were sentenced to transportation, or at least had to leave Ireland. Some of them, like Gavan Duffy, attained high distinction in the colonies.

Ypres, THE BATTLES OF (1914-17), were fought in Belgium during the Great War. The first battle (October-November 1914), which involved the loss of over 54,000 British troops, consisted in three German attacks on the combined British 1st Corps and French 9th Corps, from the La Bassée canal to the Yser, on October 30 and November 11 and 17. The British front was subsequently extended to include the Ypres salient in April 1915.

The second battle (April 1915) is remarkable for the chlorine gas attack employed by the German armies in their offensive of April 22-3, which reached the Yser canal and opened up a way to Ypres between the Canadian and Belgian lines. The restoration of a continuous allied line was undertaken by the British at daybreak on the 23rd, and by nightfall was nearly accomplished. The flank was protected once more, and the Channel ports were saved, but the allied position remained serious in the salient.

The third battle (June-November 1917) consisted in a battle round Messines followed by a series of sharp attacks. The British objective was to secure the Armentières-Dixmude ridge, and, as a preliminary, to capture the high ground near Messines and Wytschaete. At the outset the allied line ran north and south from a point a few miles west of Bixchoote to Hooge (3 miles east of Ypres), and thence to a point a few miles east of Armentières, with Messines and Wytschaete in German hands. The attack opened on June 20 with the blowing up of the German front line, and Messines and Wytschaete speedily fell. Then after a lull the second attack was launched on July 31 from Hooge northwards, resulting in the capture of Bixchoote and other points. Bad weather now held up the advance until September 20, when the British secured Polygon Wood (about 6 miles east of Ypres). This attack was followed up by Haig on October 4, and again on October 25 after a spell of bad weather, culminating in the capture of Passchendaele on November 4. This closed the campaign. The Ypres salient had been extended and strengthened, although the German hold on the coast had not been threatened.

Zaman Shah (d. 1802), the ruler of Afghanistan, threatened to invade India during the years 1795-8, and even entered into negotiations with Tippoo Sultan (q.v.). Lord Wellesley, however, concluded an alliance with Persia against him, and internal factions prevented his intended invasion. He was slain during the civil war in 1802.

Zeebrugge, THE ATTACK ON (April 22-3, 1918), was made by British forces on the German submarine bases, the aim being to assault the great mole in Zeebrugge harbour, thus drawing fire, while three blocking-ships were to be sunk in the entrance of the canal. A similar manoeuvre was to be executed at Ostend. The action at Zeebrugge was performed by the cruiser Vindictive and two Liverpool ferry-boats, supported by motor-boats, launches, and destroyers. The Vindictive stormed the mole at midnight on April 22, facilitated the entry of the blocking-ships, and retired in perfect order before 1 a.m. The blocking-ships were scuttled according to programme, and the Flanders submarines checked. The operations at Ostend, however, failed, as the blocking-ships ran aground. Another attempt was made by the Vindictive on May 9 with more success.

Zemindars, THE, are Indian revenue officers, to whom the right of collecting so much revenue was originally farmed out by the Mogul dynasty. These officers tended to become hereditary, and thus to assume the position of an aristocracy collecting tribute from the land, a quota of which was paid into the coffers of the state. In Cornwallis's settlement of Bengal these tax-gatherers were elevated into landed aristocracy, on the model of the English. The term "zemindar" has consequently become identical in meaning with the expression "landed proprietor."

Zululand. In January 1879 a war broke out between the British and the Zulu king, Cetewayo, owing to the refusal of the latter to make reparation for the raids by his subjects upon Natal. A British force under Lord Chelmsford crossed the frontier, but was surprised and attacked at Isandhlwana (January 22, 1879), and defeated with the slaughter of several hundred British troops. The war was continued, and on July 4th, 1880, Cetewayo was completely defeated at Ulundi, taken prisoner by the British, and sent to Cape Town. Zululand was divided into a number of small principalities under the native chiefs, and a "Reserve" territory on the borders of Natal, with a British resident to watch over the country, was instituted. In 1883 Cetewayo was allowed to visit England, and subsequently was replaced (January 26, 1883) in possession of a large part of his dominions. The result, after some months of continual fighting between Cetewayo and the most powerful of his rivals, Usibepu, was that Cetewayo was driven from his throne (July 1883), and soon afterwards died (February 8, 1884). The country remained in a state of considerable disorder, owing to civil war among the chiefs, aided by adventurers from the Transvaal; and in 1888 a rebellion of Dinizulu was crushed, and the country annexed (1897). In 1905-6 the Zulus grew restless under the imposition of a poll-tax, and fighting occurred between the natives and colonial troops. A large colonial force was raised and the rebellion suppressed after some heavy fighting. The northern districts were annexed to Natal in 1903. [SOUTH AFRICA, UNION OF.]

Zutphen, THE BATTLE OF (September 22, 1586), was fought in Guelderland between the Spaniards under the Prince of Parma and the English forces, who were assisting the Dutch, under the Earls of Leicester and Essex and Lord Willoughby. The English were besieging Zutphen, and attempted to cut off a force which was bringing provisions to the beleaguered garrison, but were completely foiled. The battle is famous as the one in which Sir Philip Sidney (q.v.) received his death-wound.

Zuylestein, WILLIAM HENRY (1645-1709), was greatly trusted by William of Orange, afterwards William III, and was employed by him in the intrigues with the English opposition in 1687. He was sent to congratulate King James II on the birth of the Prince of Wales. When William invaded England Zuylestein was sent to James declining a proposed conference with the Prince of Orange. On the accession of William he was made master of the robes. In 1691 he accompanied William to Holland. In 1695 he was created Earl of Rochford, and received large grants of property in Ireland, which were attacked by the Commons in the Resumption Bill (q.v.).

This index refers to subjects on which separate articles are not given, but to which some allusion will be found under the titles here printed in italics. In cases where the reader is in doubt as to the heading under which an article he is in search of may be placed, he will find it useful to refer to this index. For instance, there is no article on "Royal Exchange"; but a glance at the index will show that the subject is treated under the title "Gresham." Alternative names are also given here. Thus, "Aboukir Bay, Battle of," has the reference, "Nile, Battle of the," and "Adelm" refers to "Aldhelm." The numbers in this index stand for the pages in the body of the work on which the matter referred to is to be found, and the letters a and b signify the first and second columns of the pages. Thus, the entry "Abeance, Peerage, 835, a," indicates that reference is made to Abeance in the article PEERAGE, on the first column of page 835.]
